Italian Republic (The), 1802. So Napoleon called the Cisalpine Republic.

In 1801 Savoy and Piedmont were united to France; Milan taken from Austria formed the Cisalpine Republic.

Italian War (The), 1483–1549. Begun in the reign of Charles VIII. and ended in the reign of Henri II. It was an attempt of France to become master of Italy. After sixty-five years of war, Henri signed at Cateau Cambrésis the Paix Malheureuse, by which he renounced Genôa, Naples, Milan, and Corsica.

Though the Italian war brought no material advantage to France, indirectly it was beneficial and brought about the renaissance, which made itself conspicuous in the literature, architecture, and taste of the nation.

Italian of Asia (The). Persian, noted for its harmonious sound, its facility of versification, and its adaptation to music of the lighter forms.

Malay is 'the Italian of the East'; and Telugu 'the Italian of India.'

Italic School (The) of Philosophy. The Pythagorean school, which arose in Italy about 540 B.C. In this school almost all things are explained by relative numbers. The chief of the disciples are Ocellus, Timæus, Archȳtas, Alcmæon, Philolāos, and, somewhat later, Apollōnius of Tyăna.

Italics. Sloping type. Originally called cursiveti, or 'cursive letters,' afterwards 'Venetian letters,' because they were used by the great Venetian printers, Aldo Manuzio (1447–1515), Paolo Manuzio (1512–1574), and Aldo Manuzio the younger (1547–1597). The classical authors issued by these printers are called the 'Aldine editions.' It was silly to adopt the French word Italique instead of Venetian type, but custom has established the word too firmly to be displaced. See 'Roman Type.'

Cursive letters are now employed to mark emphatic words or words of a foreign language.

Iva'rian Dynasty (The). Improperly called 'The Skioldung Dynasty' (q.v.), and sometimes 'The Race of Lodbrok.' The founder was Ivar Vidfadmê, who is said to have reigned from A.D. 647 to 735. The Ivarian dynasty gave fourteen kings, and lasted from 647 to 1056; it followed the Ynglings, and was succeeded by the race of Stenkil. The Ivarian was the second Swedish dynasty, and is sometimes called the 'Race of Sigurd,' from Sigurd-Ring, the 3rd of the line. The reason is this: Harald Hildetand, the grandson and successor of Ivar, lived in Denmark, and sent his nephew Sigurd-Ring to Upsa'la as his viceroy. Sigurd rebelled against his uncle, who was slain in battle, and succeeded him. Lodbrok was the son of Sigurd-Ring.

Jack Boot (A), 1763. The mocking emblem of John . . . Bute, the chief minister of George III. A jack-boot was carried in procession, and burnt in the cider riots raised by Sir Francis Dashwood's unpopular tax on cider and perry. When No. 45 of 'The North Briton' was condemned to be burnt by the common hangman in 1763, the mob rescued the paper and burnt a jack-boot instead.

The scandal was that the Earl of Bute was the paramour of the Dowager Princess of Wales, and the rioters therefore carried a petticoat on a pole as well as a jack-boot, and both were burnt together. John Stuart earl of Bute (1713–1792).

Jack Straw. A priest who, with John Ball of Kent, took a leading part in Wat the Tyler's rebellion of 1381. He was executed the same year.

Jack the Ripper. An unknown person who so called himself, and committed a series of murders in the east end of London on common prostitutes.

The first was 2 April, 1888, when he murdered and mutilated a woman in a most barbarous manner; the next was 7 Aug.; the third was 31 Aug.; the fourth was 8 Sept.; the fifth was 30 Sept., when two women were murdered, one of whom was brutally mutilated; the sixth was 9 Nov.; the seventh was 20 Dec., in a builder's yard; the eighth was 17 July, 1889, at Whitechapel; the ninth was 17 Sept., when the mutilated trunk of a woman was found in Pinchin Street, Whitechapel. The perpetrator of these murders fearlessly announced that he was Jack the Ripper, and the series of murders created quite a panic in Whitechapel. For a parallel case, see 'Monster' (The).

Jackmen. Military retainers dressed in jacks or doublets quilted with iron. These partisans in the middle ages conducted themselves with great insolence towards the industrious part of the community, lived by plunder, and were ready, at the command of their master, for any act of violence.

It is Christie of the Clinthill, the laird's chief jackman; ye know that little havings [behaviour] can be expected from the like o' them.—Sir W. Scott, The Monastery, chap. ix.

Jacksonian Professor of Natural and Experimental Philosophy, in the University of Cambridge. Stipend 500*l.* a year. Founded by the Rev. Richard Jackson, 1783.

Jacob's Stone. The stone used in our coronation service, brought from Scotland by Edward I., and transferred from Ireland to Scotland by one of the Milesian kings.

The 'stone of destiny' is said to have been the stone set up by the patriarch Jacob to commemorate his dream, in which he saw a ladder reaching from earth to heaven. The stone is historic, but the tradition connecting it with Jacob is mythical.

Jaco'bi or Jacobe'ans, 1358. French rebels under the leadership of Guillaume Caillet, surnamed Jacques Bonhomme. Their rebellion is known in history as 'La Jacquerie' (q.v.). ('Froissart,' vol. i. chapters 187, 188, 189.)

Jac'obins, 1207. I. In Church history. The Dominicans of Paris were popularly so called from St. James's Hospital for Strangers assigned to them in 1207 by Alberic. The street in which the hospital stood was in 1219 called the Rue St. Jacques. The Dominican convent subsequently occupied by the Breton Club was not the original hospital referred to above, but an affiliated convent in the Rue St. Honoré. See 'Jacobins, a political club.'

II. A political club in the first French Revolution formed at Versailles in 1789, and at first called the Club Breton, because it was organised by the deputies of Brittany. When the National Assembly was moved to Paris the club followed, and called itself La Société des Amis de la Constitution; but the general public called it the 'Jacobins' Club,' because it held its meetings in the ancient convent of the Jacobins in the Rue St. Honoré. The opinions of this club were very radical and Robespierre was its chief leader. On the fall of Robespierre the club was dissolved, 11 Nov., 1794.

The original platform of the Breton Club was to dethrone Louis XVI. and place the Duke of Orleans on the throne.

Jac'obites (3 syl.). I. Pilgrims to the shrine of St. James of Compostella in Spain (ad Jacobum Compostellanum).

II. In Church history, 541. An oriental sect of Monoph'ysites called after Jacob Zanzale, surnamed Baradæus (i.e. Al Baradas, the ragged) bishop of Edessa. They prevailed especially in Egypt, Syria, Mesopotamia, and Chaldæa. The chief of the sect is called patriarch of Antioch, and lives at Diarbekir, and the next in rank is the maphrian. They recognise only one nature in Jesus Christ, and they used to brand their foreheads with a cross.

III. In British history. The partisans of James II. after his abdication in 1688, his son James called the Old Pretender, and his grandson Charles Edward (the Young Pretender). Many believed at the time in the divine right of kings, and that this right was inalienable. The unpopularity of the first two Georges, whose love was bound up with Hanover, contributed to popularise the Jacobite party.

Jaco'byns. A word applied in newspapers to the ultra-radical party, first in 1889 when Mr. Jacōby was appointed their 'whip.'

This will, of course, have the support of the Jacobyns, the Irish, and the peace-at-any-price faction of the English radicals.—Newspaper leader. 13 Feb., 1890.

Jacquerie (La), 1358. A faction of the revolted peasants of Picardy, who for about six weeks went about in monster gangs attacking all the well-to-do without distinction of sex. Their leader was Guillaume Caillet, the 'Jack Cade' of France, and with 20,000 followers he destroyed thirty castles. He led his gang to Meaux [Mo], where the Duchess of Orléans with some fifty ladies of rank had fled for security. The rebels reached the city gates, and prepared to break them down, when the Captal de Buch, with forty followers, sallied out upon them. The insurgents fled in all directions; 7,000 of them were slain or trampled to death, and Caillet, falling into the hands of Charles the Bad, was beheaded summarily with a sword.

Wat Tyler's insurrection was in 1381. Jack Cade's was 69 years later, in 1450.

Pronounce Zjah-ke-re. Caillet, pronounce Ki-yea.

Jacques Bonhomme. The name assumed by Guillaume Caillet, leader of the revolt called after him 'La Jacquerie' (q.v.).

Pronounce Zjark Bon-num'; Ghe'yum Ki'yea.

Jactitation of Marriage. A false pretension to marriage. The person who utters the pretence is called in law the 'boaster' (jactātor). This pretence is now actionable at law.

Jaffa Massacre (The), 1799. Bonaparte had taken about 2,000 prisoners in his Egyptian campaign; they were a mixed body of Egyptians, Turks, and others. Thinking they would encumber his army, he marched them out to the sandhills, south-east of Jaffa (Joppa), had them all shot, and piled the dead bodies into a pyramid.

Jagello (Dynasty of the), 1386–1572. Succeeded in Poland the House of Anjou. Hedviga, the youngest daughter of Louis the Great king of Hungary and Poland, married Jagello of Lithuania, and thus the dynasty was founded. It gave six kings.

Jagello was the thirteenth son of Gedymin duke of Lithuania.

Jago (Knights of St.). A Spanish military order instituted under Alexander III., the grand-master.

Jain'as, A.D. 500. A very numerous heterodox sect of Hindûs. So called from Jina (deified saint). Like the Buddhists, they deny the divine authority of the Veda; but, with the Brahmans, they admit the institution of 'caste.' The Jainas declined in numbers after 1200.

Sometimes they are called 'Arhatas,' from arhat, another word for 'deified saint.'

Jalès. A borough and château of Languedoc. In Sept. 1790 was formed the Camp de Jalès, consisting of French nobles whose object was to overthrow the Constituent Assembly. The château was burnt to the ground in 1792, and the 'camp' was scattered to the winds.

The camp, which was really 2,000 strong, boasted of being able to bring 70,000 men into the field to put down the revolutionary party.—CARLYLE, French Revolution, vol. ii. bk. v.

James I. of Great Britain, first of the Stuart dynasty (1566, 1603–1625).

Father, Henry Stuart lord Darnley. Mother, Mary queen of Scots, daughter of James V. of Scotland. James I. was great-grandson of the Princess Margaret, a daughter of Henry VII. Wife, Ann daughter of Frederic II. of Denmark. Court favourites, Robert Carr, whom he made duke of Somerset, and George Villiers, whom he created duke of Buckingham.

HENRY VII. was the father of HENRY VIII. and Margaret.
HENRY VIII. was the father of his three successors, EDWARD VI., MARY, and ELIZABETH (all without issue).
Margaret married James IV. of Scotland—the parents of James V. And James V. was the father of Mary queen of Scots.
* * CHARLES I. succeeded his father JAMES I.; and Elizabeth daughter of James I., who married the Elector Palatine, was called 'queen of Bohemia.' Their daughter Sophia was the mother of GEORGE I.

Style and title: 'James D.G. of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland king; Defender of the Faith; and Supreme Head of the Anglican and Hibernian Church.'

James II. (1633, began to reign 1685, abdicated 1688, died at St. Germains 1701).

Father, CHARLES I. Mother, Henrietta Maria of France. Wives (i.) Anne Hyde, who died 1671; (ii.) Marie Beatrix d'Este, who died 1718.

By Anne Hyde he had four sons and four daughters, six of whom died young and two (viz. MARY and ANNE) were queens of England.
The Pretender, James Francis Edward, was the only surviving son of the second wife (1698–1760).

His style and title was: 'James, D.G. of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland king; Defender of the Faith,' &c.

Mary was born 1662, married William prince of Orange 1677, died 1694.
Anne was born 1664, married George of Denmark 1688, died 1714.

James III. (of England). So Louis XIV. recognised the Old Pretender, James son of James II., who had been set aside by the nation over whom he ruled. Louis XIV. insisted that kings reigned 'by divine right,' and, being appointed by God, only God could rightfully depose them.

James VIII., 6 Sept., 1714. James the Pretender, son of James II. of England, was proclaimed at Castleton 'James VIII. of Scotland'; but he was never crowned, and the battles of Preston and Sheriffmuir in 1715 put an end to his hopes of supplanting George I.

James of the Iron Belt. James IV. of Scotland, who fell at Flodden Field (1473, 1488–1513).

James the Conqueror. James I. of Aragon (1206, 1213–1276). So called from his numerous victories over the Moors.

James the Just. James II. of Aragon (1261, 1285–1327). So called from his just and strictly legal dealings with his subjects.

James with the Fiery Face. James II. of Scotland, son of James I. So called from a fiery red stain on his face (1430, 1437–1460).

Jane (Three Heroic Contemporaries named), 1342, &c. Jane wife of De Clisson, Jane wife of De Montfort, and Jane wife of Charles de Blois. Three of the most heroic women that ever lived. All antagonistic to the French and allies of Edward III. The wife of De Blois was called 'Jane the Lame.'

Jan'izary. A corruption of yengicheri, new soldiers. Ottoman infantry, who, in times of peace, acted as a police force, but proved a most unruly lot, their whole history abounding with conspiracies and the assassinations of sultans and viziers. The force was dissolved in 1826, but 15,000 of them were executed and 20,000 were exiled.

The new militia was consecrated and named by a celebrated dervish, who said: 'Let them be called yengi-cheri; may their countenance be ever bright; and, wherever they go, may they return with white [joyous] faces.—GIBBON, lxiv.

Jan'senism, 1640. The tenets of Cornelius Jansen bishop of Ypres, opposed to those of the Jesuits. Jansen was a disciple of St. Augustine, whose religious views were very similar to those of Calvin. He wrote a book called 'Augustinus,' published in 1640; and from this book the following five points were deduced: (1) It is not possible to keep some of God's commandments; (2) Inward grace is irresistible; (3) Man has liberty free from restraint, but not free from predestination, or there could be no such things as sin and merit; (4) The Semi-Pelagians were heretical, because they asserted the necessity of an inward preventive grace; (5) It is heresy to say that Jesus died for all. The book was very severe against the Jesuits, who induced Urban VIII. to condemn it 1642.

Jan'senists, 1640. Disciples of Cornelius Jansen bishop of Ypres (1585–1638). Condemned by Innocent X. in 1653. Blaise Pascal wrote his famous 'Lettres Provinciales' in 1656, in their defence and against the Jesuits, whom he charged with immorality, equivocation, mental reservation, and simony. A formulary was issued by Innocent X. which the Jansenists were required to sign. This they refused to do. Alexander VII. in 1656 issued another bull of condemnation, and again commanded the Jansenists to sign the formulary. Still they refused, and to prevent a split in the church the next pope compromised the matter by withdrawing the formulary. This is called 'The Peace of Clement IX.' 1668. Clement XI. in 1713 issued his bull called 'Unigenitus' in condemnation of the Jansenists, who appealed to a general council, and were therefore called 'Appellants.' In 1720 the Jansenists were banished from France by the Regent Orléans.

The Jansenists were Calvinistic Catholics who maintained the doctrines of grace, predestination, and non-freedom of the will.

Janua'rius's Blood (St.). Januarius bishop of Benevento was beheaded in the tenth and last Roman persecution, about 303. It is said that a lady of Naples caught about an ounce of his blood at the moment of decapitation (!), and this blood, preserved in a phial, from that day to this has lost none of its weight. Three times a year this phial in Naples is brought near the head of the saint, and the blood, which before was congealed, liquefies.

It appears to me that catching the blood [in the phial] was the greatest miracle. The liquefaction is a small affair. Any chemist could manage that.

January 1. Made in England New Year's Day in 1751. (24 Geo. II. c. 23.)

March indubitably is the proper beginning of the year. And our calendar still recognises it as such in the names of the last four months.

January (Edict of), 1562. Which granted to the Huguenots of France full liberty of conscience, provided they held their meetings beyond the barriers of Paris. See 'Edict of Amboise.'

The judge pleaded the Edict of January. 'The Edict of January!' said Guise, laying his hand upon his sword. 'This steel shall speedily cut asunder that edict, however tightly bound.'—G. DE FELICE, History of the Protestants of France, v.

January 21 (1793). Memorable for the decapitation of Louis XVI. The place of execution was what is now called the 'Place de la Concorde.' It is a fête day with Napoleonists.

He gave a jovial supper to his companions on the 21st of January, the anniversary of the execution of Louis XVI.—The Czar, ch. xxxii.

HISTORICAL COINCIDENCES:—

1. The number of letters in Charles I. and Louis XVI. is in both cases 8.
2. The sum of the dates 1649 and 1793 is in both cases 20.
3. The sum of the days 30 and 21 is in both cases 3.
4. The month in both cases is January.
5. Both were Christian kings; both were tried by their subjects; and both were decapitated by judicial sentence.

January 25 (The Manifesto of), 1655. By Gastaldo, 'conservator-general of the holy faith.' 'It is enjoined and commanded on all persons of the pretended reformed religion of every state, inhabitants of Lucerna, Lucernetta, San Giovanni, La Torre, Bibbiana, Fenile, Campiglione, Bricherasco, and San Secondo, to withdraw from the aforesaid places within three days. . . . Those who disobey this edict will incur the penalty of death, and the confiscation of all their property not disposed of to Catholics.

January 30, 1649. Memorable for the decapitation of Charles I. at Whitehall. See 'January 21 n.'

January 31 (Edict or Decree of), 1686. Abolishing the religious services of the Vaudois, or any other form of religious teaching except the Roman Catholic, under pain of death and confiscation of property. It commanded the instant demolition of all houses of worship in which 'the reformed religion' was observed, the banishment of all Vaudois ministers and schoolmasters, the compulsory baptism of all children by Catholic priests, and their education in the Catholic faith.

Janus. One of the gods of old Rome, represented with two faces. Numa Pompilius, according to Livy, built a gate which was to be closed in time of peace. It was closed four times: once B.C. 235, in the consulship of Titus Manlius; again B.C. 29, by Augustus Cæsar; a third time B.C. 25, also by Augustus; and finally A.D. 71 by Vespasian.

St. Augustine says:—

The gates of Janus were not the gates of a temple, but the gates of a passage called Janus, which was used only for military purposes. 'Shut,' therefore, in peace; open in war.—The City of God, vol. i. p. 98.

Japan in 1889 received a new constitution, two chambers being established on the German model.

Japanese Martyrs, 5 Feb., 1597. A number of Franciscan friars crucified near Nagasa'ki. They were beatified in 1627, and canonised by Pius IX. in 1862.

Japanese Perry of the United States, America, whose head is represented on the 90-cent stamps, is Commodore Matthew Calbraith Perry (1795–1858), who made the treaty for the United States with Japan. Both he and his father were celebrated naval officers. See 'American Postage Stamps.'

There was another of the name, also an American naval officer, viz. Oliver Hazard Perry (1785–1820).

Ja'redites (3 syl.). The first American colony, according to the Book of Mormon. They were led from the Tower of Babel, at the dispersion, by Jared. The Jaredites were a wicked and bloody people, who utterly extirpated themselves by war. In B.C. 600 Nephi brought over a new colony from Jerusalem, and these new settlers were called Nephites.

Jarvey (A). A hackney coachman of the olden times. So called from Jarvis, one of the fraternity, who was hanged (BALLANTINE).

Jasher (The Book of). Quoted twice in the Old Testament (Jos. x. 13, and 2 Sam. i. 18). Nothing more is known about it. See 'Literary Forgeries.'

In 1751 Jacob Ilive published a forged book so called, but the forgery was exposed in the 'Monthly Review' Dec. 1751. It was republished by Donaldson in 1854.

Jasper. The first foundation of the celestial city, represented the tribe of Gad in the pectoral of the high priest, and as a zodiacal sign it stands for Pisces. Symbolically it means 'lucky,' or 'win at last.'

Jassy (Treaty of), 9 Jan., 1792. A treaty of peace between Russia and the Porte, which fixed the Dniester as the boundary between Russia and Turkey.

Jaunot. The European Chinaman. His real name is M. Lemaire. He was consul-general of Shanghai, and in 1884 was appointed minister plenipotentiary at Huć. Lemaire was nicknamed Jaunot at school from his singularly yellow complexion. He married a Cochin-Chinese lady, and was appointed interpreter of the French Consulate.

Pronounce Zjone-o.

Jean I. Though enrolled among the kings of France, like Napoleon II., is a vox et præterea nihil. Jean I. was the posthumous son of Louis X. by Clementia his wife; but the child died three weeks after its birth.

Jean le Bon or John the Good. Jean II. of France (1319, 1350–1364). He was brought captive to England after the battle of Poitiers, and remained in captivity from 1357 to 1361, when the French agreed to pay a million and a half sterling for his ransom. Jean returned to Paris and sent his two sons as hostages till the ransom was paid. The two princes violated their parole and escaped to France; whereupon Jean returned to his captivity, saying, 'Good faith must never be violated by a king.' It was this which gained for him the name of 'Le Bon.'

Jeanne d'Arc. The University of Paris condemned her on twelve charges:

I. Her apparitions, inspired by Belial, Satan, and Behemoth.
II. Her sign to the king, a lie.
III. The visits of St. Catherine, a rash belief injurious to the faith.
IV. Her predictions, mere superstitious divination.
V. Her wearing male attire by command of God, blasphemy.
VI. The letters written to the English to depart from France, traitorous, bloodthirsty, and blasphemous.
VII. Her leaving Chinon, filial impiety.
VIII. Her attempt to escape from the tower at Beaurevoir, cowardice.
IX. Her confidence in her salvation, presumption.
X. Her assertion that St. Catherine and St. Margaret do not speak English, blasphemy, and violation of love to our neighbour.

XI. Paying honour to saints, idolatry.
XII. Refusal to submit to the Church (i.e. her tribunal), schism.
The judgment was reversed in 1246, and the former record of the University of Paris torn out of the register and destroyed.

Jedburgh Justice; also called 'Jeddart Justice' and 'Jedwood Justice,' Jeddart and Jedwood being local variations of Jedburgh, in Roxburghshire, Scotland. A summary proceeding against mosstroopers, who were punished without trial if taken flagrante delicto.

Somewhat similar expressions are the following: Cupar Justice, Bradford Law, Jedburgh Law, Halifax Law, Abingdon Law (q.v.), Bursiem Club Law, Mob Law, Lynch Law, &c.

Jeddart Staff (A). A species of battle-axe, especially used in the ancient borough of Jeddart. The armorial bearings of Jeddart are an armed horseman brandishing a battle-axe.

The tongue of a tale-bearer breaketh bones as well as a Jeddart staff.—Sir W. Scott, The Abbot, chap. iv.

Jeffreidos (4 syl.). A mock epic by William Davenant, the subject of which is the combat of Sir Jeffrey Hudson, the dwarf, with a turkey-cock.

Jeffreys' Bloodstone. So the ring presented in 1684 by Charles II. to Chief Justice Jeffreys was popularly called, because he received it just after the execution of Sir Thomas Armstrong.

Jeffreys' Campaign, 1685. So James II. called the circuit of Judge Jeffreys, through Dorchester, Exeter, Taunton, and Wells, after Monmouth's rebellion. As many as 251 persons were condemned to death as partisans of Monmouth.

Jefume, i.e. 'treading on the crucifix.' The Dutch were allowed to traffic in Japan provided they would trample on the crucifix to show they were not Roman Catholics. From 1586 to 1637 Spaniards and Portuguese freely traded in Japan; but at the latter date a Dutchman revealed to the Emperor of Japan a conspiracy formed by the Spaniards and Portuguese to murder him. Both of these people were expelled, and no Roman Catholic was allowed to trade in the country. The Jefume was abolished in 1854, when the ports were thrown open.

Jellale'an Era (The), 1074. The calendar of the Seleucidæ, reformed in the reign of Malek Shah by an assembly of sage astronomers. At this epoch the Persian year was nearly 112 days before the sun, and to make the Persian calendar coincide with the Julian the assembly commanded that the vernal equinox should always be on the fourteenth day of what we call March, and that the intercalary days should be six instead of five every fourth year.

Sir Harris Nicholas calls the word Jelaledin, and says he was a sultan. James B. Fraser calls the word Jellalean, and says that the calendar was reformed, not by a sultan, but by sage astronomers when Malek Shah was sultan.

Jemmy Twitcher. John earl of Sandwich, one of the New Franciscans, an obscene and impious club, of which Wilkes was also a member. Sandwich was especially forward in condemning No. 45 of the 'North Briton,' and in denouncing Wilkes the editor. As Sandwich was just as lewd and blasphemous as Wilkes, this was like the pot calling the kettle 'Black-face.' The 'Beggar's Opera' was running at the time at Covent Garden, and when Macheath uttered the words, 'That Jemmy Twitcher should peach, I own surprises me,' all the theatre applied the words to Sandwich, amidst most tumultuous applause, and ever after the earl went by the name of Jemmy Twitcher.

Jenner'ian Institution (The Royal). Founded in London 1803. In 1808 it merged in the National Vaccine Establishment.

Dr. Edward Jenner in 1798 published his treatise 'An Enquiry into the Causes and Effects of the Variolæ Vaccinæ,' after his first experiment of vaccination in May 1796; and in 1802 received a grant of 10,000*l.* from parliament.

Jenny Geddes (1 syl.). The name of Robert Burns's mare. It was so called after Jenny Geddes of Edinburgh, who took up her stool to throw at the bishop's head when trying in the High Church to introduce the Anglican service.

Jenny mistook the meaning of collect for colic. And when the bishop from the pulpit implored the riotous congregation to hear the collect, she exclaimed, 'Colic, d' you say? Deil colic the wame o' thee!'—i.e. the devil send the colic into thy stomach.

Je'ofail (Statutes of). Statutes for the remedy of slips or accidental errors in a law proceeding. 'Jeofail' is corrupt for J'ai failli, I have made a mistake (in Latin, Lapsus sum).

Jer'emie's Prizes (Dr.). For proficiency in the Septuagint version of the Old Testament and other Hellenistic literature. Two prizes annually in books for undergraduates. Founded in the University of Cambridge by the Very Rev. James Amiraux Jeremie, D.D., dean of Lincoln, in 1870. See 'Regius Professor of Divinity.'

Jerome of Prague (1378–1416). Jerome (2 syl.) was charged with heresy, and, asking what heresy, was told that, lecturing at Heidelberg, he had likened the Holy Trinity to a liquid in three states: water, vapour, and ice. 'Away with him! Away with him! To the stake! To the stake!' roared the council with one voice, and he was burnt to death. See 'Huss.'

St. Patrick's illustration, a leaf of shamrock, was quite as objectionable. Abelard and Jeremy Taylor were equally unorthodox in their attempts to illustrate the 'Three-in-One.' In all these cases the fundamental error is the assumption that the three hypostases are three personal objects or phenomena, which would necessitate their creation. The whole of which supposition is bad philosophy and bad theology.

Jerry-building. Worthless or insecure building; cheap contract work, flimsy and showy. So called from the firm of Jerry, Brothers, Liverpool, house contractors, notorious for their unsubstantial edifices (19th cent., latter half).

The falling-in of two villas at Chalk Farm, while in course of erection, will, I hope, call attention to the system of jerry-building so much in vogue.—Truth, 29 Oct., 1885.

Jerusalem (The Destruction of). This epoch began with the taking of Jerusalem by Titus, Sept. A.D. 70.

Jerusalem Jump (The). A negro religious service, or 'awakening.' While the negro preacher is still ranting, two concentric circles are formed round him. The outer circle is of men, and the inner one of women, facing the men. Each man then takes hold of the opposite woman, and the two jump together violently, shaking hands and shouting at the top of their voices. After about a minute the two circles move, one one way and one another, so that each brother faces a different sister, and again the jumping is repeated. See 'Jumpers.'

This really is not more absurd than the dancing of dervishes.

Jerusalem of Russia (The). Moscow, the 'sacred city.' Close by is the 'Mount of Salvation,' where the natives, coming in full view of their beloved city, kneel and cross themselves.

Jesids (The), or 'Devil Worshippers.' In Russian and Turkish Armenia, the valley of the Tigris, &c. Their holy city is Ba-Hasani. It is said their name is compounded of Jesu (their founder) and Jesid a town. They pray to the rising sun, worship Allah, reverence Mahomet, and deem Christ a great angel ('the son of light'). Their chief concern is to conciliate Shaitan, the devil, whose name they never utter. Thursday is their Sabbath, and they fast forty days in the spring of the year. Their children are baptized, and their ecclesiastical orders consist of sheikhs, fakirs, and djirs (elders). They abhor the colour blue, show the greatest respect to women, widows dress in white, and the dead are buried with their faces turned to the pole-star.

Jes'uates (3 syl.), 1355. A religious order founded by St. John Colombine, and confirmed by Urban V. in 1367. Suppressed in 1668, when all their possessions were given to the Hospitallers of Italy. The object of the order was to administer to the sick and needy. They were suppressed because they were manufacturers of strong drinks. They had popularly the name of 'Aqua Vitæ Fathers.'

Ainsi appelé parce que ses fondateurs avaient toujours le nom de Jésus à la bouche.—BOUILLET.

Jesuits, founded 1538. A religious society founded by Ignatius Loyola, and confirmed by Paul III. in 1540. It was monarchical in its constitution and secular, while all other Catholic societies are more or less democratic and regular. The head of the society is called the General, or 'Præpositus Generalis,' and holds his office for life. This General has absolute command over the whole society, and from his decisions there is no appeal.

The four objects of the society are: (1) the education of youth; (2) the education of others by preaching, &c.; (3) the defence of the Catholic faith against all heretics and unbelievers, and (4) the propagation of the Catholic faith among the heathen. The Jesuits wear no monastic garb, but dress like any other of the 'secular clergy' (q.v.), and live in no religious house, but in private dwellings. Banished from England by 27 Eliz. c. 2 A.D. 1584, banished from France in 1594, expelled from Portugal in 1759, expelled from Spain in 1767, expelled from Naples 1767, expelled from Parma 1768, expelled from Malta 1768, dissolved by Clement XIV. in 1773, expelled from Russia 1820, expelled from Switzerland 1847, expelled from Genŏa 1848, expelled from Naples, the Papal States, Austria, Sicily, 1848. Still they survive.

They are accused of being accessories to the Gunpowder Plot, the Popish Plot, the Thirty Years' War, and almost all the political troubles of Europe.

Jesuits of the Revolution (The). The Girondins are so called by Dumouriez, 'Mémoires,' iii. 314.

Jesuitesses (The), 1534. An order of religious women, founded by two Englishwomen, Warda and Tuittia, in imitation of Loyola's foundation. Abolished by Urban VIII. in 1631.

These women were street preachers. Surely Warda and Tuittia are not English names, but so is the record.

Jesus College. I. In Cambridge University, founded by John Alcock bishop of Ely, in 1496.

II. In Oxford, 1571. Founded by Queen Elizabeth. The head-master is called the principal.

Jesus Paper. Paper bearing the letters I.H.S. for the water-mark. It is of large size.

Jeu de Paume (Day of the), 20 June, 1789. When the States-General assembled 5 May, 1789, to investigate the wrongs of France and adjust the finances, the nobles and clergy snubbed the Tiers Etat; whereupon the Tiers Etat left the Salle de Menu, retired to the tennis court, and constituted themselves the 'National Assembly,' wholly ignoring the nobles and clergy, who refused to join them. They then took an oath not to separate till they had given France a constitution. Seven days afterwards the Duc d'Orléans, with forty-seven of the noblesse and a large number of the clergy, joined the Tiers Etat in the tennis court, and declared themselves the national parliament under the name of the 'Constituent Assembly' (Assemblée Constituante).

Jeu de Paulme (Jewd pome), tennis. The Day of the Jeu de Paume (June 20) was the great holiday during the Revolution.

Jeune (Le). Louis VII. was so called, not for his youth, but for his puerile policy, as Ethelred of England was called the 'Unready,' i.e. the impolitic.

1. Louis VII. began his reign with quarrelling with his clergy, for which he was excommunicated.
2. He interfered with the Count of Vermandois, whereby he got into hot water with the Count of Champagne, and setting fire to the count's castle burnt down the whole town of Vitry.
3. He left his kingdom to conduct an absurd expedition to the Holy Land, which failed throughout.
4. He divorced his wife Eleonore, who married Henry II. of England, whereby France lost Poitou and Aquitane.
5. He went to Palestine by land and not by sea, contrary to the advice of his best counsellors.
6. His wars with England were perfidious and most short-sighted in policy.

Though amiable enough, he failed in everything from want of worldly wisdom, manly energy, and state prudence.

Jeunesse Dorée de Fréron (La), 1794. Those young men of the Thermidorian faction who armed themselves according to the advice of Fréron, given in his journal 'L'Orateur du Peuple.' These were violent against the Jacobin Club, with whom they had frequent skirmishes.

Jew of Tewkesbury (The). This was Salomon, a Jew whom Richard earl of Gloucester, in 1260, offered to pull out of a cesspool into which he had fallen one Saturday; but the Jew refused the proffered aid, saying: 'Sabbata nostra colo; de stercore surgere nolo.' Next day [Sunday] the earl passed again, and the Jew cried to him for help. 'No, no, friend!' replied the earl, 'Sabbata nostra quidem, Salomon, celebrabis ibidem.' This story occurs twice in the 'Chron. Monast. de Melsa,' ii. pp. 134, 137.

Eodem tempore apud Theokesbury, quidam Judæus occidit in latrinam, sed quia tunc erat sabbatum, non permisit se extrahi, nisi sequente die Dominica, propter reverentiam sui sabbati, quamobrem Judæum contigit mori in fœtore.—Rolls Series.

Jews of Damascus (Persecution of the), 1840. A Catholic priest named Thomaso of Damascus, having disappeared suddenly in February, a Jew barber at whose house he was seen was examined by torture, when he accused seven of the most wealthy Jewish merchants of being concerned in the murder. The seven merchants were apprehended; two died under torture, the other five pleaded guilty. A dreadful persecution of the Jews followed, and the absurd notion was confirmed that human blood was necessary for the paschal feast. The English and French interfered, represented to Mehemet Ali the absurdity of the notion, and the persecution ceased.

Jews' Parliament (The), 1243. Six of the richest Jews from each large town of England, and two from each small town, sent by the county sheriffs to meet Henry III. at Worcester, on Quinquagesima Sunday 1243, 'to treat with him for their mutual benefit.' See 'Parliaments.'

The king informed his Jewish advisers that they must raise without delay 20,000 marks (200,000*l.* of money at its present value), one half to be ready by Midsummer day, and the other moiety by Michaelmas day.

Jewel of Europe (The). Sicily. According to legend, God plucked a jewel from his crown out of which he formed Sicily.

Jewel of Seville (The). The Giralda is so called. It is the most beautiful and largest specimen of Oriental architecture of its kind.

Jewish Disabilities Act (The). 21, 22 Vict. c. 49, 22 July, 1858. By this act the oath administered to members of parliament was modified to suit the religious faith of Jews. Baron Rothschild was member for Hythe, and Alderman Salomons for Greenock in 1858.

Jewish Emancipation. Jews emancipated in the United Kingdom from disabilities of holding municipal offices and voting as members of parliament.

1. Naturalised without being required to take the sacrament 1753 (26 Geo. I. c. 26).
2. Admitted to the elective franchise 1832 (2 Wkl. IV. c. 45).
3. Liberty of religious worship granted as to dissenters, 1855 (19 Vict. c. 86).
4. Made eligible to seats in parliament 1858 (21, 22 Vict. c. 49).
5. All disabilities removed, and the oath 'On the true faith of a Christian' omitted 1860.

Jewish Mundane Era (The), B.C. Commences with the vernal equinox 3761. See 'Era.'

Jewish Plato (The). Philo-Judæus of Alexandria, who endeavoured to weld Platonism and the Mosaic institutions together; B.C. 20, died about A.D. 61.

Jewish Sects. See each in loco.

Chasidim	Hero'dians
Beshters	Karaites *
Essenes (2 syl.)	Masboth'eans
Galilæans	Meristes *
Gaulanites (3 syl.), probably Rabbinists of extreme views	Pharisees
Hellēnians *	Sad'ducees
Hellenists	Shebsen
Hem'erobap'tists *	Therapeutæ
	Zealots or Zelotes

Nothing beyond the names is known of those sects to which a * is attached.

Jewish Soc'rates (3 syl.). Moses Mendelssohn, the modern Jewish philosopher (1729–1785). So called for his 'Phædon,' a dialogue on the immortality of the soul in imitation of Plato.

One would think the better appellative would be the 'Jewish Plato.'

Jewry (Statute of). Forbade usury by Jews, and provided that the Jews should live in 'the king's own cities and boroughs where the Chest of Chirographs of Jewry are wont to be.' They were permitted by this statute to buy houses and farms, and to hold them for fifteen years.

Jezebel, Aunt of Dido. See 'Dido.'

Jezre'elites (4 syl.), 1884, or 'The New and Latter House of Israel.' A religious sect founded by James Jershom White, a private of the 16th regiment, who compiled from the works of Joanna Southcott and John Wroe a book which he called 'The Flying Roll.' He called himself Jezreel, and gave himself out to be the spiritual child of Joanna Southcott, the Joshua of Christ, and the Immortal Spirit who held the last message of God to man. White erected a temple 144 feet in length, breadth, and height, at Gillingham, near Chatham. The great hall would hold 5,000 persons. He died 1885, but his wife gave herself out to be Esther the queen, the virgin, and mother of Israel, sent to prepare the people for Christ's second advent in 1895.

Jin'goes (2 syl.), 1877. Russophobists. Those who supposed that Russia would take Constantinople and then our Indian empire; but any Bobadil or warlike blusterer was afterwards called a Jingo. The word was adopted from 'M'Dermott's War Song'—that is, the song sung in music halls by M'Dermott and very popular at the time. The chorus runs thus:—

We don't want to fight, but, by Jingo! if we do,
We've got the ships, we've got the men, we've got the money too.

Jin'goism, 1877. Warlike bluster and Bobadilism. The French chauvinism (q.v.) is now used in much the same sense. See 'Jingoes.'

J. J. In Hogarth's 'Gin Lane,' written on a gibbet, is Sir J[oseph]

J[exyll], obnoxious for his bill to increase the duty on gin.

J. K. L. That is, Dr. Doyle, unquestionably the most accomplished polemical writer of his time, died 1834. The letters stand for James Kildare Leighlin—that is, his Christian name and his see as Catholic bishop.

He [Mr. Stanley] made an exception in favour of the then [1823] celebrated J. K. L. He acknowledged a letter from Dr. Doyle . . . with warm expressions of thanks . . . and expressed a wish to see him on his arrival in Dublin.—HOWITT, History of England (year 1832, p. 215).

Joan Makepeace, 1328. Joan sister of Edward III., who at the age of seven was affianced to David son of Robert Bruce, aged five. This betrothal was brought about by Mortimer (the paramour of Isabella the queen dowager), to cement the peace made between the English and Scotch in the year 1328.

Joan of Arc. Called 'La Pucelle,' 'the Maid of Orleans' (1412–1431). Her sword was the mystic sword of St. Catherine.

Joan of Kent. Joan Bocher, an Anabaptist who was burnt at Smithfield 2 May, 1550. Some say she was convicted and sentenced by Archbishop Cranmer, and others say when Edward VI. was called on to sign the writ of her execution his eyes were full of tears. Others affirm that the writ was issued by the Court of Chancery and that Cranmer had no part in the matter. 'Sir Thomas Browne, who wrote against vulgar errors, influenced the jury to give their verdict against the woman' ('Parr's Works,' iv. 181). See 'Van Paris.'

Blunt ('Reformation in England,' p. 260) says she was condemned, 'probably under the law against Anabaptists, who advocated community of goods.'

Joan the Fair Maid of Kent was quite another person. She married Edward the Black Prince, and died 1385. See 'Pope Joan.'

Joanna and Isabella, 1468–1479. Names which produced a civil war in Castile. The question was, which of these two should succeed Enrique on the throne. Isabella was his sister (wife of Don Ferdinand, who was son of Juan II. king of Navarre), Joanna was the natural daughter of Enrique. The Archbishop of Toledo took the part of Isabella, and undertook to dethrone Enrique, but war for ten years desolated the kingdom. Enrique died, his daughter Joanna retired to a convent, and Isabella with Ferdinand became sove reigns of Aragon and Sicily, Leon and Castile.

Joanna Southcott (1750–1814). The mission of this 'prophetess' began in 1792, when she declared herself to be 'the woman driven into the wilderness' of Rev. xii. Her prophecies are in prose and wretched doggrel, and she gave her followers her seals—that is, bits of paper sealed to insure them against the wrath of God. In 1814 she announced she was about to be the mother of Shiloh the Prince of Peace, but she died the same year of dropsy.

Joanna Southcott was born in Devonshire of humble parents, and was in youth a domestic servant.

Joanna the Mad, Queen of Castile (1479, 1504–1555). She married Philip archduke of Austria, and was the mother of Kaiser Karl V., emperor of the Romans, king of Castile, afterwards of Spain, &c.

Joan'nites (3 syl.). The adherents of John Chrysostom, who stood firmly on his side when Theophilus of Alexandria charged him with heresy and misdemeanour. See below, 'Johannists.'

Jockey of Norfolk. Sir John Howard, a firm adherent of Richard III. On the night before the battle of Bosworth field he found a warning couplet in his tent, running thus:—

Jocky of Norfolk be not too bold,
For Dicon, thy master, is bought and sold.

* Dicon or Dickon of course means Richard III., and Jocky or Jacky = Jack, Jock, or John.

Jockies. Superior sort of vagrants, perhaps a relic of the ancient bards or minstrels. They were well versed in the slogan or gathering-cries of Scotland, and being full of observation, and very entertaining, were admitted into the houses of the well-to-do as guests. The race is now extinct.

The well remembered beggar was his guest.
GOLDSMITH, Deserted Village.

Johannists. A sect which refused to acknowledge the successor of John surnamed Chrysostom, who died in 407. The Johannists refused to return to the general communion till 438, when the body of Chrysostom was brought back to Constantinople and solemnly interred, the emperor himself (Theodosius the Younger) taking part in the service

John. The hated name of kings in England, France, and Scotland. The English king John was certainly as bad a king as ever reigned. In France John I. reigned only a few days, and John II., having lost the battle of Poitiers, died in captivity in London. In Scotland John [Baliol] was a mere tool of Edward I. So greatly was the name disliked in Scotland that John son of Robert II. reigned under the designation of Robert III.

Popes named John. There have been twenty-three popes of this name. One abdicated (John XVIII.); four were deposed (John XII., XIII., XIV., XIX.); two were expelled (John XVI., XVII.); two were charged with heresy (John IV., XXII.); four were imprisoned (John I., VIII., X., XI.); seven were nonentities (John II., III., V., VI., VII., XV., XX.); one was killed accidentally (John XXI.); and one had Sergius III. for a rival pope (John IX.).

JOHN I. (523–526). Imprisoned at Ravenna by Theodoric, and died in prison.
— II., III. Nonentities.
— IV. (640 642). Accused of heresy.
— V., VI., VII. Nonentities.
— VIII. (872 883). Imprisoned by Lambert duke of Spoleto; made his escape to France, and was poisoned.
— IX. (898–900). Had Sergius III. for a rival pope.
— X. (914–928). Cast into prison and murdered by order of Guido and Marozia.
— XI. (931–936). Imprisoned with his mother by Alberic, and died in the castle of St. Angelo.
— XII. (956–964). A most profligate libertine. Was deposed and died suddenly, probably by assassination.
— XIII. (965–972). Imprisoned by his nobles and deposed.
— XIV. (983–985). Deposed; imprisoned by Boniface VII., an antipope, and died in the castle of St. Angelo.
— XV. A nonentity.
— XVI. (985–996). Driven from Rome by Crescentius.
— XVII. (997–998). Antipope. Expelled by Otto III., and barbarously treated by Gregory.
— XVIII. (1003 1009). Abdicated.
— XIX. (1024–1033). Deposed and expelled by Konrad.
— XX. A nonentity.
— XXI. (1276–1277). Crushed to death by the falling in of his palace at Viterbo.
— XXII. (1316–1334). Charged with heresy, and recanted.
— XXIII. (1410–1419). Deposed, and afterwards imprisoned for three years.

 A very sad list indeed.

John Amend-all. John Cade, an Irishman, who gave himself out to be the son of Sir John Mortimer, and heir to the English throne. In May 1450 he encamped on Blackheath with 20,000 followers; but he was captured and killed on 1 July the same year.

John called Robert. John earl of Carrick, eldest son of Robert II. of Scotland, was crowned 1390 as Robert III., because John had proved an ill-omened name in England, France, and Scotland.

John Company. The old East India Company. Also called 'Mother Company.'

In 1857 the 19th Native Infantry feasted the 11th Irregulars, and told them that John Company had sent out Lord Canning to convert India to Christianity.—HOWITT, Hist. of Eng. (year 1857, p. 407).

John Free-born. John Lilburne (1618–1657). So called from his intrepid defence, before the tribunal of the Star Chamber, of his rights as a free-born Englishman.

John-Jacob Christians. A branch of the strict Mennonites, which split from the general body in 1554. So called from their founder. See 'Mennonites' (3 syl.).

John Knox's Liturgy. The Book of Common Prayer used in the Presbyterian Church of Scotland.

Extempore prayer is also used.

John 'Lackland' king of England, (1166, 1199–1216). Father, Henry II.; Mother, Eleanor of Aquitaine; Wives (1) Alice; (2) Avisa daughter of William earl of Gloucester, divorced; (3) Isabelle daughter of Aymer count of Angoulême, by whom he had five children (none by the other two):—

1. HENRY III., his successor.
2. Richard earl of Cornwall, chosen King of the Romans, and crowned at Aix-la-Chapelle in 1257.
3. Jane, married Alexander II. of Scotland in 1221.
4. Eleanor, married first William earl of Pembroke, then Simon de Montfort earl of Leicester, by whom she had two sons, who with their mother were banished for rebellion.
5. Isabella, who married Friedrich II. the Kaiser. She died 1241.

His style and title.—John, D.G. rex Angliæ, dominus Hiberniæ [Iberniæ or Yberniæ], dux Normanniæ. They addressed him 'Rex Anglorum.' This was the first of our kings called 'Dominus Hiberniæ,' which title continued till Henry VIII. changed it into 'King of Ireland.'

John Lackland alone of all the sons of Henry II. had no territory or land left him. Henry, the eldest son, was associated with his father in the government, but died before him; Richard Cœur de Lion had Poitou and Guyenne; Geoffrey had Brittany in right of his wife.

N.B. The first Henry, 'lord of Ireland,' was Henry III. son of John, and in Rymer's 'Fœdera' Dr. Clarke has erroneously ascribed to Henry II. a document belonging to Henry dominus Hyberniæ.

John of Gaunt, fourth [not third] son of Edward III. Was born at Ghent in Flanders, whence he was called John of Gaunt (Ghent). His first wife, Blanche, was daughter of the Duke of Lancaster.

John of Gaunt received his title of duke of Lancaster from his father-in-law.

Henry VII. claimed his title of the crown through John Beaufort, a natural son of John of Gaunt.

John o' Groat's to Land's End (From). Through the entire length of the kingdom. John o' Groat's is furthest north and Land's End, Cornwall, is furthest south of the mainland of Great Britain

John of Jerusalem (Knights of St.), 1120. So called from John patriarch of Alexandria and the place of their abode. The knights subsequently resided at Rhodes (1310–1523). When driven from Rhodes by the Turks they made their abode at Malta, and were called 'Knights of Malta.'

John the Furious. A Norwegian chieftain who went to Ireland (1170) to restore Hascult to his throne of Dublin. He was felled to the ground and slain by Walter de Riddlesford, an English knight, the same year.

John with the Leaden Sword. John duke of Bedford (1424) was so called by Archibald Douglas (Tineman).

John duke of Bedford sent a herald to the Scottish chief [in France] to say he was coming to drink wine and revel with him. The Earl of Douglas returned answer that the duke would be most welcome, and that he had come from Scotland to France on purpose to carouse in his company. Under these terms a challenge to combat was understood to be given and accepted.—Sir W. Scott, History of Scotland, xviii.

Johnnie Cope's Salve, 1745. So the Highlanders called the chocolate taken from the tent of Sir John Cope after the battle of Prestonpans.

Some of the luxuries which the Highlanders found they did not comprehend the use of, and chocolate was soon after cried in the streets of Perth as 'Johnnie Cope's Salve.'—Howitt, History of England (George II. p. 501).

John's College (St.).

I. In Cambridge University. Founded by Lady Margaret countess of Richmond and Derby, mother of Henry VII., in 1511.

The founder of Christ's College also.

II. In Oxford, 1555. Founded by Sir Thomas White, a London alderman. The head-master is called the president.

Johns (Sir). The poor clergy were so called before the Reformation. 'Babbling Sir Johns' (Wordsworth, 'Ecclesiastical Biography,' i. 265). 'Blind Sir Johns' (Jewel, Sermon on Haggai i. 2). Strype speaks of 'Lack-Latin Sir Johns' ('Annals,' 177), and of 'Mumble-matins Sir Johns' ('Annals,' 181).

Johnson Scholarship for theology. Founded in the University of Oxford by John Johnson, D.D., fellow of Magdalen College. In 1878 this scholarship was united to Mrs. Denyer's two theological prizes, and formed into two scholarships called the 'Denyer and Johnson Scholarships' (q.v.).

Johnso'nians, as a religious sect are the followers of the Rev. John Johnson (1662–1725), a nonjuring divine of Liverpool, and author of 'The Unbloody Sacrifice.' They deny the pre-existence of Christ, the three Persons of the godhead, original sin, and the natural immortality of the soul. They baptize by immersion, and believe in the perseverance of the saints.

John-William, or Jean-Guillaume, the French Jack Ketch. Jean-Guillaume was the executioner of Paris under Louis XIII., and numerous allusions are made to him by French authors both in prose and verse.

Et personne de mon royaume
Ne se fera pas Jean-Guillaume,
Pour étrangler à belles mains
Ce larron des plus inhumains?
Virgile travesti, bk. iv. (Dido speaks).

 The French have the verb Jeanguillaume, to John-William [you].

Jomsvi'kings (The). In Danish, Jomsvikingr. The piratical republic of Joms-borg, in the island of Wollin. It was a nest of pirates founded by Danish sea-rovers in the reign of Harald Blaatand (991–1014). This piratical republic continued till the last quarter of the 12th cent., when it was put an end to by Valdemar I. of Denmark (1182–1202).

Jongleurs. 'Joculatōrès,' instrumentalists who accompanied the troubadours to fairs and gentlemen's houses in the middle ages. After the crusade against the Albigenses, the troubadours gradually disappeared, and the jongleurs joined singing to instrumental music, and many danced, juggled, and made fun in all sorts of ways.

Jonköping (Treaty of), 10 Dec., 1809. A treaty of peace between Sweden and Denmark.

Jordan (Mrs.). The actress to whom the Duke of Clarence (William IV.) was virtually married; eight children survived the king, four sons called Fitzclarence and four daughters. The real name of Mrs. Jordan was Dorothy Bland. Her connection with William was suddenly broken off in 1811; she returned to the stage, but she subsequently retired to France, and died at St. Cloud 3 July, 1816. In 1830 William married Adelaide of Saxe-Meiningen, but her two children died before their father did, so the crown went to his niece Victoria, daughter of Edward duke of Kent.

Joseph I. the Victorious. Son of Leopold I. kaiser-king of Germany, of the house of Austria (1676, 1705–1711).

In this reign three great victories were won by Marlborough over the French: 1706 the battle of Ramillies, in 1708 the battle of Oudenarde, and in 1709 the battle of Malplaquet

Joseph the Unfortunate, kaiser, son of Maria Theresa, who always tried to do right and was always disappointed in all his plans. He wrote, half in jest and half in earnest, what he termed his epitaph: 'Here lies Joseph, unfortunate in all his undertakings' (1741, 1765–1790).

Josephs of Amida (The). One of the three branches of the Nestorians. The other two are the 'Elijahs of Mosul' and the 'Simeons of Ormia.' The Josephs are now reconciled to the Church of Rome, and are called 'Chaldean Christians.'

Josephinism. Oppression of the Church by the State, so-called from Joseph II. of Austria.

Josephi'nos, 1808. Those Spanish grandees who had traitorously sided with Napoleon in his scandalous usurpation of the Spanish crown. So called because they supported Joseph Bonaparte, his brother's viceroy-king of Spain, and fled with Joseph to Vittoria for safety on the first reverse of the French arms, at the battle of Baylen, on 19 July. In this defeat Castaños was the Spanish general and Dupont the French.

Jo'sephins, 1885. Followers of Joseph Chamberlain, an advanced Radical.

Jos'ephites (3 syl.). The Mormons who disallow polygamy. So called from Joseph Smith, son of Joseph Smith the founder of Mormonism. These are called the 'Reorganised Church of Jesus Christ of Latter Day Saints.'

There are now one or two other non-polygamous sects.

Joshua of Scotland (The). Robert Bruce king of Scotland (born 1274, king 1306–1329, died 1329).

Josiah of his Country (The), or 'The Josiah of England.' Edward VI. was generally so called in his own day.

Joule's Equivalent. That if a pound of water falls to the ground through 772 feet, and is then suddenly arrested, its temperature will be raised one degree; and, conversely, the heat that would raise the temperature of a pound of water one degree would (if applied to a steam engine) raise 772 lbs. one foot high.

Jour de Rois (Le). The Epiphany. (Twelfth Day), meaning the hypothetical 'Kings' of Cologne. Voltaire has a satire on the three kings—the Pretender (rejected by England, telling his beads in Italy), Stanislaus (ex-king of Poland, smoking his pipe in Austrasia), and the emperor, or King Charles of Bavaria (living at an inn in Franconia), while Maria Theresa is laughing at this Epiphany.

Journal de Paris (the first French daily paper), 1777.

Journal de Trévoux (Le). Published by Jesuits in 1701–1704.

Journal des Révolutions de Paris (Le). A vile republican newspaper in the French Revolution, conducted by Prudhomme. If possible it was even more inflammatory than the 'Ami du Peuple' by Marat. It advocated the murder of Louis XVI., and of all other crowned heads; and recommended the organisation of 100 young men into a band, sworn to assassinate all tyrants, in emulation of Harmodios and Aristogiton of Greece, and of Scævola and the Brutuses of Rome.

Journals. Of the House of Lords commenced 1509; that of the House of Commons in 1547.

Journée des Dupes. See 'Day of the Dupes.'

Journée des Epérons, 1302. The bloody battle of Courtray, in which the French left on the field about 4,000 knights' spurs.

Another Journée des Epérons was in 1513, the battle of Guinegate, in which the French used their spurs in flight more than their swords in fight.

Journée des Farines, 3 Jan. 1591. When the besiegers attempted to surprise St. Denis, occupied by the troops of Henri IV. This was two days after the Béarnais had attempted to surprise Paris. It was called the 'Journée des Farines' because the officers disguised themselves as millers leading horses, asses, carts, and so on, and demanded entrance into the town. Their design was to enter the gates and keep them open till the arrival of the troops; but entrance was denied them, and the alarm given.

Journée des Maubrulés. 'The day of the unburned,' 27 April, 1562. Faveau and Mallart, two Protestants of Brussels, were condemned to be burnt to death. As the executioner was binding Simon Faveau to the stake a woman threw her shoe into the funeral pile. This was a preconcerted signal, and immediately the mob rushed forward, scattered the faggots in all directions, rescued the two victims, and succeeded in sending them out of the country. See 'Rise of the Dutch Republic,' by Motley.

Journées de Juillet. See 'Days of July.'

Journées de Septembre (Les), 2, 3, 4, 5 Sept., 1792. See 'Massacre of September.'

Journées des Barricades. See 'Barricades.'

Jovinian, 4th cent. A heresiarch, and monk of Milan. He rejected fasts, penance, and celibacy, denied the virginity of Mary, and entertained other 'heretical views.' He was condemned by the Council of Milan in 390, and banished by Theodosius.

Joyous Entry (The), 'La Joyeuse Entrée,' 1480. The charter given by Philip the Good to the states of Brabant on his entry into Brussels. On this charter nearly all their privileges rested. In 1789 Kaiser Joseph II. annulled this charter, because the States refused to grant a subsidy. On 20 Nov. Brabant threw off allegiance to Austria, and assumed the title of 'The High and Mighty States.'

The emperor [Joseph II.] on 1 Jan., 1787 (?), published several sweeping edicts, annihilating the most ancient municipal privileges, remodelling the courts of justice, and introducing a totally new system of judicature, in direct violation of the celebrated compact made by Charles V. (?), called 'The Joyous Entry.'—HOWITT, Hist. of Eng. (Geo. III. p. 387).

Joyous Science (The), or 'The Gay Science.' Minstrelsy (Joyeuse Science).

The Joyous Science, as the profession of minstrelsy was called, had its various ranks, like the degrees in the church and in chivalry.—Sir WALTER SCOTT, The Betrothed, chap. xix.

Jubilee (The), 21 June, 1887, when the 50th anniversary of Queen Victoria's accession to the crown was celebrated in the United Kingdom. The colonies and India, for convenience sake, celebrated the anniversary some weeks before 21 June.

There was a Jubilee in the reign of George III., 25 Oct., 1809. He came to the crown 25 Oct., 1760. Queen Victoria succeeded to the throne 21 June, 1837. Hence it will appear that George celebrated his jubilee at the commencement, and Victoria at the completion of the 50th regnal year.

 There are scores of Jubilees of divers sorts, as the Handel Jubilee, the Shakespeare Jubilee, the Jubilee of the Reformation, and the Jubilees of the Catholic Church first proclaimed by Boniface VIII. in 1300, &c.

Judaising Teachers. Compromising Jews who mingled the observance of the law with that of the Gospel. They insisted on the rite of circumcision. Peter and John were for a time at least Judaising teachers.

Judaists. Those Christians who insisted on the perpetual obligation of the Jewish law. All the apostles who were the companions of Jews were Judaists. Paul insisted that the Gospel was meant for all men, and those who thought with him were called Paulinists or Universalists.

Judas (The Irish). Colonel Blood (1628–1680).

Judge-Advocate-General (The). The supreme judge, under the Mutiny Act and Articles of War, of the proceedings of courts-martial. He receives a salary of 2,000*l.* a year, and is a member of the ministry.

Judges. The ancient Carthaginians were ruled by a senate of 300, out of which thirty were selected for the council, and two of the council were suffetes or judges. So the Hebrews, before the appointment of Saul as king, appointed shofetim (judges or bretwaldas) in times of trouble, who were sometimes women. The judges or bretwaldas were—

	B.C.
Othniel	1554—1514
Ehud	1496—1416
Shamgar	1416—1396
Deborah (a woman)	1396—1356
Gideon	1349—1309
Abimelech (his son)	1309—1306
Tola	1306—1283
Jair	1283—1261
Jephthah	1243—1237
Abesan or Ibsan	1237—1230
Ahialon or Elon	1230—1220
Abdon	1220—1212
Samson	1172—1152
Eli (the high priest)	1152—1112
Samuel (priest and prophet)	1092—1080

Judges of Assize. In 1284 superseded justices in eyre (q.v.). Judges of the superior courts commissioned to hold courts or assizes in each county town twice a year.

Judgment and Declaration (A), 1688. Passed in the Oxford Convocation, maintaining the doctrine of non-resistance, and enjoining: 'All and singular the readers, tutors, and catechists, diligently to instruct and ground their scholars in that most necessary doctrine . . . of submitting to every ordinance of man for the Lord's sake, teaching that this submission and obedience is to be clear, absolute, and without exception of any state or order of men.'

Judgment of the Cross (The). Introduced during the reign of Charlemagne. The plaintiff and defendant of a suit were required to cross their arms upon their breast, and he who could hold out the longest gained the suit.

All ordeals and all oaths are appeals to the judgment of God. Ordeals have been abolished in England ever since 1219, but oaths are still administered (1890). The notion is that God will supplement man's ignorance and idleness by a miraculous interference on the side of what is right In regard to oaths, as the law stands, to violate an oath is perjury, whereas to violate one's word is only a lie.

Judicial Mass, 'Missa Judicii.' An ordeal mass, in which a person charged with an offence appealed to the 'Judgment of God' in proof of his innocence. See 'Mass.'

Judicious (The). Richard Hooker, author of the 'Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity' (1554–1600).

Jugurtha (The Modern). Abd-el-Kader, bey of Mascara, afterwards sultan (1808–1883). He was no Jugurtha in his moral character, although there was some resemblance in his chivalry, bravery, and misfortunes. Jugurtha, taken captive by the Romans, was thrown into a dungeon at Rome and starved to death; Abd-el-Kader, taken captive by the French, was imprisoned first in the castle of Pau, then in the castle of Amboise; but, instead of being starved to death, he was released by Napoleon III. in 1852, retired to Damascus, and died in 1883 at the age of 76.

Jugurthan War (The). War between Jugurtha king of Numidia in Africa and the Romans (B.C. 111–104). Jugurtha, being taken prisoner, was sent to Rome and starved to death in the Mamertine prison, a horrible underground dungeon.

Julian Period (The). Commenced 1 Jan., 4713 B.C.

Julian Year (The). Began 1 Jan., B.C. 45.

Julien the Apostate. Simon Julien, a French painter, pupil of Carlo Vanloo, at Paris. Called the 'Apostate' because he forsook the French school of painting for the Italian.

The Emperor Julian is called the 'Apostate' because he abandoned Christianity for 'the old religion' (331, 361-363).

July Cross (The). 'Croix de Juillet,' 1830. Instituted to decorate those Frenchmen who distinguished themselves in chasing Charles X. from the throne. It is a star of three rays, with the legend '27, 28, 29 July, 1830,' and the motto 'Patrie et Liberté.' The ribbon is blue edged with red.

July 4 (American history). Declaration of Independence, 4 July, 1776. A national holiday.

July 14. Called, in French history, 'the great day,' in commemoration of 14 July, 1789, the day of the storming of the Bastille. This and June 20 (q.v.), the two great days of the Revolution, were made annual festivals.

The disturbed state of Paris since that 'great day,' the 14th of July, had suspended the activity of the National Assembly.—HOWITT, History of England (George III., p. 459).

 For 27, 28, 29 July, when Charles X. was driven from his throne (1830), see 'Days of July'

Jumpers, 1760. Welsh Methodists who jump during religious worship. They are the followers of Harris, Rowlands, Williams, and others. The sermon being over, the preacher begins to jump and the congregation joins in—sometimes for two or three hours. When quite exhausted, they take hold of hands, kneel down, and pray. See 'Jerusalem Jump.'

David danced before the ark, and the lame man, on being cured, leaped and praised God.

Jumping-cat School (The). Turncoats who run on the winning side. A. B. is 'one of the most notorious examples of the jumping-cat school . . . and is always on the winning side.' (Newspaper paragraph, March 1886).

June 1, 1774. I. In North American history, the day on which the Boston Port Bill (q.v.) was to take effect. Selected by the Virginians, Patrick Henry and Thomas Jefferson, as a day of fasting, humiliation, and prayer, 'that the evils of civil war might be averted, that the American colonists might be inspired with firmness in support of their rights, and that the hearts of the British king and parliament might be turned to moderation and justice.'

II. 'The Glorious First of June' is 1 June, 1794, when Lord Howe gained a signal victory over the French off Brest.

June 3 (Victory of), 1665. A great naval victory gained by James duke of York over Van Tromp, the Dutch admiral, near Lowestoft. The duke commanded the red, Prince Rupert commanded the white, and the Earl of Sandwich the blue. This was the greatest naval victory hitherto gained by the English. The Dutch lost four admirals, 7,000 men, and eighteen sail. The English only one ship and 600 men killed or wounded.

June 5, 6, A.D. 1832. An émeute in Paris by the republican faction at the funeral of General Lamarque, deputy of the opposition. Barricades were thrown up at St. Antoine, St. Martin, St. Denis (Sahn-dnee), and other parts of Paris. The troops were called out, and the combat was brought to a close on the 6th, after taking the church of St. Merry (or Méderic).

June 20. The anniversary of the foundation of the National Assembly. This and the anniversary of 14 July (q.v.) were the two great festivals of the French Republic.

June 23, 24, 25, 26, A.D. 1848. A bloody insurrection of the French republican faction called 'Démocratique et Sociale' against the constitution of 24 Feb. the same year. It made for its pretext the dissolution of the ateliers nationaux, and was most rife in the faubourgs St. Jacques, St. Marceau, and St. Antoine. The garde nationale and garde mobile were employed to suppress the insurrection under General Cavaignac. Seven generals were slain, two representatives, the Archbishop of Paris (Mgr. Affre), and an enormous number of citizens and soldiers. Those insurgents who were taken prisoners were transported.

June 26, and 10 April, 1846. The great Chartist festivals. On 10 April the monster petition was presented, and on 26 June the Corn-laws were repealed.

Junius (Letters of), 1769. A series of political letters signed 'Junius,' dissecting the conduct and characters of public men—the Duke of Grafton, the Duke of Bedford, Lord Mansfield, and others, not excepting the King himself. These letters caused the utmost consternation amongst the ministry, and were immensely popular for their caustic satire, just censure, clear reasoning, their great knowledge of the secret government movements, and the brilliancy of their style. It is not known who was the author of these letters, but perhaps the most weighty evidence points to Sir Philip Francis.

The 'North Briton,' under the auspices of Wilkes, and the commencement of the American War, increased the ferment. The letter, 18 March, 1769, to the Duke of Grafton on the 'murderers' of Clarke, and the 14th letter (against Blackstone) are most scathing.

Junto (The). I. 1694. A Whig ministry in the reign of William III., the chief members of which were Admiral Russell, the victor of the great battle of La Hogue; Somers, who successfully defended the 'Seven Bishops'; Lord Wharton; and Montague, the great financier. This was the first ministry ever made of one and the same party politics. It was the suggestion of Robert earl of Sunderland to William III., who shrewdly said, if all the ministers were of one party they would pull together, and if that party represented the majority they would be able to pass their measures.

II. 1727. A club formed by Benjamin Franklin for mutual improvement. Morals, politics, and natural philosophy, as well as the social well-being of man, were the main subjects discussed. It continued for about thirty years.

Jus Ælia'num. The law books of Sextus Ælius Catus. These law books explained the meaning of the mystic ciphers employed by the lawyers to conceal the laws from the ignoble common people. Much the same as medical prescriptions are still written, sometimes by symbols, sometimes by contractions, sometimes by a single arbitrary letter, or per siglas. Ælius wrote them out in full, so that all could read them.

Gibbon, chap. xliv., gives some of these symbols: Fire and water=married life; resignation of keys =divorce; casting a stone=prohibition; clenched fist=a deposit; broken straw=broken covenant, &c.

Jus Cyp'rium, 431. That each province is autocephalous and each diocese independent, no one except the metropolitan having any right to interfere. Called Jus Cyprium because the canon was laid down in the Council of Ephesus A.D. 431 in regard to the province of Cyprus, which was declared free and independent of the province of Antioch.

Jus Devolu'tum, 1712. An act which provided 'if a patron neglected for six months to fill up a vacant charge, the presbytery should fill it up' (Scotland).

Jus Honora'rium. The edicts of the Roman prætors; written in white ink. The imperial rescripts were in purple, and the Jus Civile in red ink.

Jus Ital'icum. All Italian land was tax free, all provincial land paid land-tax. Hence the exemption of land from taxation was called 'The Italian Right.'

Jus La'tii conferred on cities the right of electing their own magistrates. These magistrates took rank and enjoyed privileges next in degree to Roman citizens.

Jus Trium Libero'rum. Granting to those who had three children exemption from the trouble of guardianship, priority in bearing offices, and a treble proportion of corn.

Just (The). Louis XIII. was so called, but no one knows why. He was a good shot, and a wit said, 'Il étoit juste à tirer de l'arquebuse' (1601, 1610–1643).

Louis XII. was with more reason called 'Le Juste' as well as the 'Father of his People' (1462, 1498–1515).

Justice-airs. In Scotch history, were courts of justice held twice a year in each county by the Justiciar-general.

Air is eyre, French for tier a journey. Justice-airs are justiciares itinérantes, i.e. judges to travel from county to county.

Justices in eyre (air), 1176, i.e. in itinere, 'on journey.' Henry II. divided England into circuits, and justices went on these circuits once in seven years. The courts in which they sat were called 'assizes,' from a law-Latin word assisa a session, from the verb assideo to sit down (supine assisum). Magna Charta provided for annual visits (1215). In 1284 justices in eyre were superseded by judges of assize.

Justinian (The English). Edward I. (1239, 1272–1307). Sir Edward Coke says, 'The statutes passed in this reign were so numerous and so excellent that they deserve the name of establishments, being more durable than any made since.' And Sir Matthew Hale says, they were so 'excellent as scarcely to need revision or addition.'

Juvenal (The English). I. John Oldham (1653–1683).

II. Joseph Hall, bishop of Norwich. Pope affirms Hall's 'Satires' to be 'the best poetry and truest satires in the English language.'

Juvenal (The Young). Dr. Thomas Lodge (1555–1625). So called by Robert Green.

Juvenal des Ursins. A French magistrate born at Troyes (1350–1431), who enjoyed the confidence of Charles VI., and was prévot de marchands of Paris in 1388. He opposed the Duc de Bourbon; and, having saved the king from falling into the hands of the duke, was given the Hôtel des Ursins in reward of his services.

Juvenal of Painters (The). William Hogarth (1697–1794).

Juzail (Afghanistan). A very long rifle; those armed with the juzail are Juzailchees.

Jy-anian Dynasty (The). The second fabulous dynasty of Persia. Jy means pure, holy. The only two names known are Jy-Affram and Jy-Abad his son, who suddenly disappeared. It followed the Mahabadean, and was succeeded by the Kuleov dynasty.

K. 'The Three bad K's.' The Karians, Kappadokians, and Kilikians; generally spelt Carians, Cappadocians, and Cilicians.

Kaaba, or 'Caaba.' Was taken possession of by Cossai about 455, and was restored in 1630 by the sultan Mustapha. The word means 'the square house,' and it designates a stone building in the great mosque at Mecca. Next the silver door is the famous Black Stone, 'dropped from Paradise.' It was originally quite white, but the sin of the world has turned it black. In pilgrimages the devotee walks round the Kaaba seven times, and each time he passes the stone either kisses it or lays his hand thereon.

According to Arabian legend Adam, after his expulsion from the garden, worshipped Allah on this spot. A tent was then sent down from heaven, but Seth substituted a hut for the tent. After the flood Abraham and Ishmael rebuilt the Kaaba.

Kabyles (2 syl.). Another name for Berbers, a mountain tribe which dwell on the Atlas range of Algeria and Morocco. They are neither Arabs, Moors, nor Turks. They live in villages which they call 'gourbis,' and several of these villages would constitute a kabyle. Their government, like that of Switzerland, is a democratic confederation. They are a sober people, brave and hospitable, but vindictive and superstitious. As with the Swiss, love of independence is their dominant characteristic.

Kadjahs (Dynasty of the). A Turkoman dynasty, which now occupies the Persian throne. Founded in 1748 by Mohammed Hassan, son of the governor of Mazanderan. The word means 'fugitives' or 'deserters,' and was applied to those deserters of the Ottoman army to whom Abbas I. had in the 16th cent. given asylum.

The shahs of this line have been Mohammed Hassan, 1748; Futeh Ali Shah (his nephew), 1797; Mohammed Shah, 1834; Nasser Eddin Shah, 1848 (who visited London in 1873) and again in 1889.

The dynasty was interrupted by Kurem Khan Zend, the Walik, and restored in 1794.

Kaianides (The), or 'Kaianian dynasty.' The second dynasty of the Persians, called by the Greeks Achemenidês. It consisted of Kai-Kaous (Astyagês); Kai-Kosru (Cyrus), B.C. 536; Lohrasp (Cambyses, or Ahasuêrus of Scripture), B.C. 530; Gouchtasp (Darius), 521; Xerxes, 486; Ardechir Diraz Dest, or long-handed (Artaxerxes Longimanus), B.C. 471; Xerxes II. Sogdian and Darab (Darius Nothos), B.C. 424; Artaxerxes Mnemon, B.C. 404; Artaxerxes Ochos, B.C. 362; Arses, B.C. 338; Darab II. (Darius Codomanus), B.C. 336, dethroned by Alexander the Great in 331; and thus the dynasty ended after enduring 206 years. It succeeded the Pishdadian dynasty.

Achæmenês was an ancestor of Cyrus. Zoroaster or Zerdusht, who wrote the Avesta in the Zend tongue, lived in the reign of Cyrus (Kôpos). At the death of Alexander there was an interval from B.C. 323 to A.D. 226 filled by the Seleucidês and the Arsacidês. (Kaianides, 8 syl.)

Kaimacan. A deputy or governor in the Ottoman empire. There are generally two, one residing at Constantinople, and the other attending the grand vizier as his lieutenant.

Kainardji, or Kutchuk Kainardji (Treaty of), 21 July, 1774. A treaty of peace between Russia and Turkey, in which Turkey opened to Russia the Black Sea, ceded Azof and Taganrog, and assured the independence of the Crimea. In 1784 the sovereignty of the Crimea was confirmed to Russia (Catherine II).

The Treaty of Kutchuk Kainardji gave to Russia the protectorate of two chapels in Turkey, one in the Russian Legation, and one about to be built in Galata. It was on this treaty that, in 1853, Russia claimed the protectorate of the holy places in Turkey, against France, who rested her right on a treaty as far back as 1740. This contention was made the pretext of the Crimean War (q.v.).

Kaioma'rian Dynasty (The). Same as 'Pishdadian' (q.v.). Succeeded by the Kaianian dynasty. Kai-Omar was the first of the Pishdadides, and the Pishdadians were first of the mythic period of Persia, placed by some as far back as B.C. 2340, and by others as low down as B.C. 940. (Pishdadides, 3 syl.)

Omar was the hypothetical founder of the dynasty. Pishdad or Paishdad (just in w giver) was the title given to the third of the line, named Hûshung or Iran.

Kaffirs. So Mussulmans call unbelievers.

Kaiser = Cæsar. Used as a title. The Roman Empire in its decline was divided into east and west. The popes of Rome ignored the east, and assumed that the title of the old Roman emperor belonged exclusively to the west.

Charlemagne restored Leo III. to the papal chair, and out of gratitude Leo gave to Charlemagne the empty title of 'Carolus Cæsar Augustus,' or 'Karl Kaiser Augustus of the Romans.' Keyser is Low German for Cæsar, and the title given by Leo becomes in Low German 'Karl, Keyaer Wehzen desz Reichs.' So says Selden, 'Titles of Honour,' chap. v. p. 47 (1673).

This title was continued in the German successors of Charlemagne till the death of Charles le Gros, when it fell into abeyance for 74 years.

In 962 Pope John XII. restored the title with a slight alteration, and crowned Otto I. the Great (king of Germany) 'Kaiser of the Holy Roman Empire'; and till 1056 his successors went to Rome, after their coronation as kings of Germany, to receive the additional title of 'kaiser' [of the Holy Roman Empire, or of the West].

Heinrich III., just before his death, invented a new title, 'King of the Romans,' to be borne by the kings elect of Germany, and then the reigning king was kaiser or 'Emperor of the Romans,' and the king elect was 'King of the Romans.'

In 1338 the electors decreed that it was not needful for a king of Germany to undergo a second coronation at Rome; But inasmuch as from the moment of his election he was 'King of the Romans,' he became ex officio 'Emperor of the Romans' or kaiser the moment he was crowned. From that time till 1508 the king regnant was ex officio 'Emperor of the Romans,' and the crown prince or king elect was 'King of the Romans.'

In 1508 Maximilian intended to go to Rome to get crowned, but was prevented, and he assumed a somewhat new departure. Being king, he called himself 'Emperor-elect of the Romans,' and henceforth the crown prince was 'King of the Romans,' but after the death of his father he became 'Emperor-elect of the Romans,' and as soon as he was crowned he became King of Germany and Emperor of Rome.

In 1806 Napoleon, having mutilated the German empire, Francis II. was obliged to abandon the title of 'Emperor of the West,' and assumed instead the title of 'Emperor of Austria and King of Hungary,' and that dominion is now styled 'the Austro-Hungarian empire.'

Kalandos Society (The), 1518. An Hungarian league which met on the kalends or 1st of every month. The object of the league was to depose John Szapolyai from the office of treasurer, and restore Stephen Verboczy. It succeeded, and Szapolyai fled to Transylvania.

Kalapos King (The), the 'hatted king.' Kaiser Joseph II., son of Maria Theresa, was so called by the Hungarians because he refused to be crowned.

James V. of Scotland, in his famous gold coin, is represented as wearing a bonnet instead of a crown.

Kali'lah and Dimnah. A Sanscrit book of fables, extant in 500. It was translated into Pehlevi about 550. A copy was discovered in 1870 by Dr. Socin in the monastery at Mardin. See 'Academy,' 1 Aug., 1871.

Kali-yuga. The 4th and last of the Yugas or ages of Hindû chronology, corresponding to the 'Iron Age' of the Greeks and Romans.

It consists of 432,000 solar-sidereal years, and began B.C. 3102.

Kalpa. In Hindû chronology means a day and night of Brahma, equal 4½ billions of solar-sidereal years.

Some geologists seem to think 'the evening and the morning' of Genesis i. mean a 'Kalpa.'

Kant's Four Categories. Immanuel Kant generalises the fundamental modes of conception into—

1. Quantity, including unity, multeity, and totality;

2. Quality, divided into reality, negation, and limitation;

3. Relation, that is, substance and accident, cause and effect, action and reaction;

4. Modality, subdivided into possibility, existence, and necessity.

Regarding the outside world, he says our perception thereof is merely representative; and it is not possible for man to know what any object really is. All he can possibly know is what his senses represent them to be.

Of deity, immortality, &c., he says, human reason can decide nothing, because these subjects are not cognisable by the senses.

Revelation, or the exercise of man's moral nature, can alone cope with such subjects.

Ka'raites (3 syl.), A.D. 580. A sect of the Jews who rejected the traditions of the Taimud and adhered to the Kara (Aramaic word for 'Scripture'). There are many Karaites still in Poland, Crim Tartary, Egypt, and Persia. The Jews perform their public religious services in Hebrew, but the Karaites use the language of the state in which they live. The sect was founded by Anan ben David.

Kardis (Treaty of), 1661. A treaty of peace between Sweden and Russia, based on the conditions of the treaty of Stolbowa.

Karl III. the Fat of Germany is the same as Charles le Gros of France. He was the youngest of the sons of Ludwig the German; and as he survived his two brothers, he united the three kingdoms of Germany, Italy, and France in his own person (832, 881–888).

CHARLEMAGNE was the father of LOUIS I. le Débonnaire.
LOUIS le Débonnaire was the father of Lothaire (king of Italy), LUDWIG (the German), and KARL II. (called in French Charles le Chauve).
KARL II. was the father of Louis II. le Bègue; and LUDWIG the German was the father of KARL III.
* * Karl and Ludwig for German kings; Charles and Louis for French kings.
Contemporary with Alfred the Great.

Karl IV. of Luxemburg. One of the promiscuous kaiser-kings of Germany. Nominated to the throne by Pope Clement VI., without consulting the electors, and therefore called the 'Pope's kaiser' (1316, 1347–1378). He was son of that John of Bohemia who fell at Crécy in 1346, and grandson of Kaiser Heinrich VII.

Father, John king of Bohemia. Wives, (1) Anne princess palatine and (2) Anne Schweidwitz. Contemporary with Edward III.

No reign ever embraced so many interesting historical events in the same space of time.
1347. Rienzi was tribune of Rome; assassinated 1354.
1348. The plague referred to by Boccaccio in his 'Decamêron.'
1349. Edward III. of England instituted the order of the Garter.
1351. The Great Helvetic Confederation was instituted.
1354. Marino Faliері was elected doge of Venice at the age of 80.
1356. Karl IV. submitted to the Diet of Nürnberg the famous Golden Bull.
1356. Sept. 19 was fought the battle of Poitiers.
1357. David Bruce was set at liberty.
1363. Timur the Tartar began his wonderful career.
1371. The Stuart dynasty began in Scotland.
1374. The poet Petrarch died.
1376. Edward the Black Prince died.
1377. Edward III. of England died.

Karl V. (Charles V.), called by the French 'Charles Quint,' son of Philipp and grandson of Kaiser Maximilian I. the Pennyless. His son Philipp married Mary queen of England (born 1500, reigned 1519–1556, died 1558).

Father, Philipp. Mother, Juaña, daughter of Ferdinand and Isabella of Castile and Aragon. Wife, Isabella, daughter of Emmanuel king of Portugal. He died at the convent of St. Juste in Spain. Contemporary with Henry VIII., Edward VI., and Mary.
* * In this reign the reform under Luther occurred, and Magellan made the first voyage round the world.

Karl VI., kaiser-king of Germany (1683, 1711–1740). He was brother of Joseph I. his predecessor, and son of Leopold I. of the house of Austria. As he had no son he drew up the 'Pragmatic Sanction' in favour of his daughter Maria Theresa. The Duke of Bavaria objected, but Maria Theresa succeeded her father notwithstanding.

This was the last king of the house of Habsburg.
Father, Leopold I. Mother, Eleanor Anne. Wife, Elisabeth Christina, daughter of Rudolf of Brunswick-Wolfenbüttel. Contemporary with George I. and George II.

Karmathians. A Mohammedan sect which arose in Irak during the 9th cent. It took its name from Karmath, its founder, a poor labourer, who assumed the rank of a prophet. The Karmathians, who maintained bloody wars with the kalifs for nearly a century, advocated community of goods and wives, rejected all revelation, fasts, prayer, alms, and abstinence. Karmath died A.D. 900. The sect was stamped out in 982.

Katerfelto. A celebrated quack, and a generic name for a quack. He practised on the people of London in the influenza of 1782. In 1790 he visited Durham, and sent his coach round the town with trumpeters. His pièce de résistance was a solar microscope showing the animalcules in water, &c.

Katerfelto with his hair on end
At his own wonders wondering.
COWPER, The Task, bk. iv. (Winter Evening.)

Kaye Prize (The). For an essay connected with ecclesiastical history, biblical criticism, or the canon of scripture. Given once in four years to a graduate of the University of Cambridge of not more than ten years' standing. Value about 50*l.* Founded by subscribers to Bishop Kaye's memorial 1861. See 'Regius Professor of Divinity.'

Keble College, Oxford, 1870. Founded by subscription in memory of John Keble, professor of poetry in the university. The head-master is called the warden. There are no fellowships (1890).

Keel-hauling. A punishment practised at one time in the Dutch and English navies, but now never resorted to. The offender was let down by ropes on one side of the ship, and after being dragged under the keel, was hauled up on the other side.

Keening (A). An Irish word for that wild song of lamentation poured forth over a dead body during the 'wake ceremony' by certain mourners employed in Ireland for the purpose.

Keeper of the Forest (The). Chief warden of the forest, who has the superintendence over all the other forest servants (MANWOOD, 'Forest Law, part i. p. 156).

Keeper of the Great Seal (The). A judicial officer, who used to be appointed (5 Eliz. c. 18) in lieu of the lord chancellor. Abolished.

Keeper of the King's Conscience (The). The lord chancellor. The early chancellors being ecclesiastics were probably the 'father confessors' of the sovereign. The lord keeper is now the officer who presides in the court of chancery.

Keeper of the Privy Seal. Now called 'the Lord Privy Seal,' through whose hands all charters, &c., must pass before they come to the 'Great Seal.'

Keeper of the Signet. An officer in Scotland, appointed by the crown, who appoints one of the Writers of the Signet (q.v.), and presides at the meetings of the society.

Keeper of the Touch. The Master of the Assay in the Mint.

Keepers of the Liberties of England (The). Custodians of the new great seal after the abolition of royalty 1648. The first three keepers were Whitelock, Keble, and Lisle.

Kee-tan Dynasty (The). A Tartar dynasty which established a footing in the north of China during the 14th imperial dynasty. It gave nine kings and lasted 211 years (907–1118). Kao-tsu II. purchased peace of this troublesome horde by giving to it 16 cities in the province of Pecheli'.

Also called the Leao dynasty.

Kellgrenism, 1889. Curing diseases by manipulation. So called from J. Henrik Kellgren.

The idea is that disease arises from a surcharge of some gaseous matter, which passes into the operator, and thus relieves the patient. Sometimes the operator himself suffers, but for the most part the 'broach' passes through the operator, either into the air or into the earth. Of course, the cure of diseases by the laying on of hands is mentioned in the New Testament, but whether this was a 'special gift' pro tempore is beyond the scope of this Dictionary.

Kempenfelt, 1782. The 'Royal George' was the finest ship in the British service, carrying 108 guns, and was the flag-ship of Admiral Kempenfelt. It was lying off Portsmouth, crowded with its own crew and a vast number of visitors, before starting for Gibraltar. On 29 Aug. the carpenters were busy caulking the seams, and the ship was laid somewhat on her side. Kempenfelt was writing in his cabin, and the bulk of the people were between decks. A sudden squall plunged the open port-holes under water on the lowered side, and the ship went down in a minute. The admiral, the officers, and all between decks, to the number of 1,000 persons, perished. Cowper has a poem on the subject.

Kenilworth (Dictum of). See under 'Dictum.'

Kennicott Scholarship. Two for Hebrew. Value about 60*l.*, tenable for one year. Founded (1831) in the University of Oxford by Anne Kennicott, widow of Dr. Benjamin Kennicott, canon of Christ Church.

Kensington Martyr (The). Caroline, wife of George prince regent. She was spoken of by the friends of the regent as the 'Dreadful Woman.' Married 1795, separated soon after the birth of her child in 1796, died 1821. The regent and his friends called her the 'Kensington Megæra.' She resided at Kensington, and was certainly persecuted to death by her royal husband, but she was no 'martyr.'

Kent (Holy Maid of). See 'Holy Maid,' &c.

Kentish Fire. Vehement protracted cheering. So called from the cheering in Kent in the 'No popery' meetings, got up to oppose the Catholic Emancipation Bill of 1829.

Kentish Petition (The), 29 April, 1701. Signed at Maidstone and presented to the House of Commons 8 May. It prayed that the house would not waste their time in party quarrels, but attend to the public business. It was signed by grand jurors, magistrates, and freeholders. Those who presented it were sent to the Gate House, under the plea that the petition was 'scandalous, insolent, and seditious.' When parliament was prorogued they were liberated.

The Tories . . . accused Thomas Bliss and Thomas Culpepper, two of the gentlemen concerned in the Kentish petition, of having been guilty of corrupt and scandalous practices in a contested election at Maidstone.—HOWITT, Hist. of Eng. (William III. p. 166).

Kepler's Laws.

1. The planets revolve about the sun in ellipses, having the sun in one of the foci.

2. If a line is drawn from the centre of the sun to any planet, this line (as it is carried forward by the planet) will sweep over equal areas in equal portions of time.

3. The square of the periodic times of the planets are as the cubes of their mean distances from the sun.

The second law is 'the radius vector sweeps over equal areas in equal times.'

Keri-Chetib [Keri what is read, Chetib what is written]. There are some 1,000 passages in the Hebrew Bible where the 'Keri' differs from the 'Chetib.' Kennicott tells us in all these instances the false rendering is the one inserted in the text, or written [chetib], and the true one is that given in the margin. It is thought that Ezra made the marginal readings. 'Dissertatio Generalis.'

Kesteven. The south-west part of Lincolnshire. The north-east part is called Lindsey, and the south-east part is called Holland.

Kett (Robert). A tanner of Wymondham, near Norwich, and a man of substance, headed a rebellion in July 1549. His forces were dispersed by the Earl of Warwick, and Kett was hanged in Nov. the same year [1549]. See 'Reformation Tree.'

Wymondham, pronounce Win'-dum.

Kett's Rebellion, 1549. The suppression of monasteries had caused a great deal of temporary distress, and given birth to many insurrections, by far the most important of which was that of Norwich, headed by Robert Kett, a tanner, in the summer of 1549, who encamped on Mousehold Heath near the city. A petition of grievances was first sent to the king, praying that the bondmen might be set free, that the rabbits might be reduced in number, and that a uniform bushel measure might be established by law. Kett held his court under the 'Oak of Reformation,' and here a chaplain duly read the liturgy. The king promised to submit the petition to parliament in October, but the herald ordered Kett to be arrested. This was the signal for war, and Kett made himself master of Norwich, where he won several victories over the king's troops; but at length the Earl of Warwick defeated the insurgents at Dussinsdale, and Kett was hanged in chains on Norwich Castle.

Key of Russia (The). Smolensko. Taken by Svatoslas in 1232; taken by the Lithuanians in 1413; taken by Vassili in 1514; taken by the Poles in 1611; taken by the Russians in 1654; burnt by Napoleon in his Moscow expedition in 1812.

Key of Spain (The). Ciudad Rodri'go, taken by Lord Wellington (the Duke of Wellington), 19 Jan., 1812.

Key of the Mediterranean (The). The fortress of Gibraltar, which commands the entrance and exit of that sea. See 'Gates.'

Keys (The House of). In the Isle of Man. It consists of twenty-four persons, to whom all doubtful and important matters of law are referred. They are chosen from the chief landed proprietors of the island. If a vacancy occurs two names are sent to the governor, who nominates one of them. All freeholders, men and women, elect.

Keys (The Power of the), 'Potestas Clavium' (Matt. xvi. 19). The supreme power of church government vested in the pope of Rome as the professed successor of St. Peter.

Keystone State (The). Pennsylvania, one of the original thirteen states of North America. Called the Keystone State from its position and importance.

Khan. A noble, a gentleman; about equal to the Egyptian effendi and English esquire (Afghanistan).

Khariz'mians (The), 1213–1223. A people of Western Turkestan, which from 994 to 1231 formed an independent principality. In 1193 they invaded Persia, but their power was overthrown by Ghengis Khan in 1225.

A branch of the Kharizmians reigned at Delhi, Hindústan, from 1213, after having chased out the Ghorians; but in 1398 they were superseded by the Patans.

Khatta'bians (The). One of the numerous Shiite sects, disciples of Abdúl Khattáb. They maintain that the prophet meant by paradise 'the good things of this world.' So they indulge in wine, music, and other things forbidden by the imaums. They may be called the Epicurean Moslems. See 'Imaumians,' 'Zeyds.'

Khilji (The House of). The second Gaurian dynasty of Delhi, founded by Jelal-u-din in 1288. It continued to reign till 1321, when it was overthrown by Tóglak.

Khyber Pass (The), 1842. Has obtained great notoriety because a British army of 16,000 men was here annihilated in the month of January, during the retreat from Kaubul. The only persons who escaped were Dr. Brydon (a regimental surgeon) and a private soldier. In 1838 Lord Auckland, governor-general of India, declared war against the Afghanistans because their ruler, Dost Mohammed, had unlawfully attacked a British ally, and because Dost Mohammed had usurped the throne of Shah Sujah, who was under British protection. On 21 July Shah Sujah was restored to the throne of Kaubul, and the British thought the matter was ended. This was a grand mistake, for at the beginning of winter Akbah Khan, the son of Dost Mohammed, attacked the British army in Kaubul, and slew several of the officers. A capitulation was made, and when the British army were in the Khyber Pass on their way home they were cut to pieces. (With women, children, and camp followers 20,000 were slain in the Pass.)

Ki in Chinese history. There were ten of these races [Ki] before even the semi-historical period which began with Hia, B.C. 2205. The first Ki or fabulous age embraces a period of 300,000 years. The mythic period is the tenth Ki; the three emperors were Fo-hi, Chin-nōng, and Hoângti. These were followed by five kings.

The first Ki consisted of (1) Puon-ku (highest eternity); (2) Tiēn-hoâng (emperor of heaven); (3) Ti-hoâng (emperor of earth); and (4) Gine-hoâng (emperor of men). Evidently allegorical. The historical period begins B.C. 256 with the dynasty of Tsin.

Kidnapping. Entrapping children, either for reward or to serve some object of the kidnapper. Also entrapping slaves or men to serve aboard ship. It is now a felonious act (24, 25 Vict. c. 100).

Kiel, in Holstein (Treaty of), 14 Jan., 1814, between Great Britain, Sweden, and Denmark, for the transfer of Norway from Denmark to Sweden. The 'War of Liberation' in Germany ends with this treaty.

Kildare Insurrection (The), 23 May, 1798. The commencement of the great rebellion, not finally quelled till the following year.

On 23 May Lieutenant Gifford of Dublin and a number of other gentlemen were assassinated by the insurgents.

Kildare Place Society (The), 1833. See 'Society for Promoting the Education of the Poor.' In 1830 government withdrew its grant to this society, and the schools gradually declined.

Kileh-Shergat Cylinder (The). The earliest historical document pertaining to Assyria yet discovered in Mesopotamia. The characters are cuneiform, and the fifth king inscribed on the cylinder is the well-known name of Tiglath-pilēser [Tukulti-pal-zira], 'son of Asshur-rish-ili, who reduced the Magian world, grandson of Mutaggil-nebu, offspring of Asshur-dapal-il, who held the sceptre of Bel.'

Kileh-Shergat is the modern name of Asshur.

Kil'hamites (3 syl.), or 'New Connection Methodists,' 1797. Seceders from the Methodists, led by Alexander Kilham. Their doctrinal views are those of Wesley, but their polity is Presbyterian. The people choose their own officers, and send representatives to all the synodical meetings of the denomination.

Kilkenny (The Catholic Confederacy of), 1641. Never to lay down their arms till they had obtained an acknowledgment of the independence of the Irish; the repeal of all degrading disqualifications on the ground of religion; the free exercise of the Catholic worship; and the exclusion of all but natives from civil and military offices within the kingdom. See 'Irish Associations.'

If 'Home Rule' is effected, what would the Irish say if no office of Great Britain could be held by an Irishman?

Kilkenny (The Constitutions of). Certain privileges granted by Edward III. to the Irish in a parliament held at Kilkenny.

Kilkenny was the seat of several Irish parliaments.

Kilkenny (Convention of), 1342. A parliament held at Kilkenny to remonstrate with Edward III. against his threat of excluding in future from all share in the government of Ireland those who held estates in Ireland or had married Irish wives. It was thought that the allegiance of such persons would be weakened by their private interest in Ireland. See 'Irish Associations.'

Kilkenny (Statute of), 40 Edw. III. 1366. For the abolition of the Brehon or common law of Ireland. Lionel the second son of Edward III., who married the heiress of the Earl of Ulster, and thus became entitled to the lordships of Ulster and Connaught, was made by his father lord-lieutenant of Ireland. In 1366 he summoned a parliament at Kilkenny, in which this statute was passed.

The object of this statute, passed by Edward III., was to prevent the amalgamation of the English and Irish chiefs, which would render them too formidable to be controlled. It forbade any Englishman, on pain of imprisonment and forfeiture of his estates, to use an Irish name, to speak the Irish language, to adopt the Irish dress, or to permit the cattle of an Irishman to graze on his lands; and made it high treason to marry a native. Brehon is the Irish for a judge.

Killala (Battle of), 23 Sept., 1798. The French, being invited over by the Irish insurgents, landed under General Humbert (22 Aug., 1798) from three frigates. Several battles were fought, as those of Castlebar, Colooney, and Ballinamuck, but at Killàla the insurgents were defeated with great slaughter.

General Humbert surrendered to General Lake after the battle of Ballinamuck, 8 Sept. Some French frigates on their way to aid the Irish were captured, 12 Oct., by Sir J. B. Warren, and Wolfe Tone was among the prisoners.

'Killing no Murder,' 1657. A pamphlet printed in Holland, which caused an immense sensation at the time. After an address to Cromwell and another to the army, it divides itself into three parts: (1) Is the lord protector a tyrant? (Yes, because he has arrogated to himself regal power and state.) (2) Is it lawful to kill a tyrant? (Yes. Example: Brutus killed Cæsar and was deemed a patriot.) (3) Will the removal of Cromwell be for the well-being of the three nations? (Yes. For his misrule is full of mischief.) It then concludes by warning Cromwell that his life is not worth an hour's purchase. This book created quite a furore, and was distributed by thousands. Sexby avouched that he was the author of it, but Clarendon tells us that Sexby was an illiterate man. Evelyn and others think the author was Captain Titus, who resided in Holland at the time ('Diary,' ii. 210). Some ascribe it to Willan, and others to Allan.

There was a similar pamphlet published in France in 1658 entitled 'Tuer un tyran n'est pas un crime.' It was issued by Carpentier de Marigny, the avowed enemy of Mazarin.

Kilmainham Treaty (The), 1882 A supposed compact made by Mr. Gladstone, the prime minister, with Dillon, Parnell, and O'Kelly, when in April they were unexpectedly released from Kilmainham jail, where they had been confined for exciting the Irish to resist the payment of rent, and to prevent new tenants from taking the farms from which persons had been evicted. The tale is that the three gentlemen promised to exert themselves to pacify Ireland if they were set free, and so they were released; but most certainly they have done nothing since to pacify Ireland, but quite the contrary (1890).

Kin (The), or the Golden Race. So the Niu-tchin Tartars of China called themselves (1188–1235).

Kinconghish. A statute in Ireland which provides that every head of a sept is to be charged with any treason, felony, or heinous crime committed by any one of the sept.

King (The Black). Heinrich III. of Germany (1017, 1046–1056).

King (The Red). I. The king of Persia was so called from his red turban.

Credo ut Persam nunc propter rubea tegumenta capitis Rubeum Caput vocant, ita reges Moscovise propter alba tegumenta Albos Reges appellari.—SIGISMUND.

II. William II. was called Rufus, or the Red King, from the colour of his hair (1057, 1087–1100).

III. Otto II. kaiser of Germany was called the Red King for a similar reason (955, 973–983).

IV. Amadeus VII. count of Savoy was called 'The Red' also (1360, 1383–1391).

Kaiser Friedrich I. was called 'Barbarossa' from his red beard.

King (The Summer). Amadeus of Spain.

King (The White). The king of Muscovy was so called from his 'alba tegumenta.' See 'King (The Red)'.

Muscovy was called White Russia, and probably this was the reason why the Muscovite king was called the White king, or king of White Russia. Poland was Black Russia. See 'Russia.'

King (The Winter). Friedrich V., the rival of Ferdinand II. of Germany. He married Elizabeth daughter of James I. of England, and was king of Bohemia one winter, 1619–20. His wife was called the 'Winter Queen.'

King Becold. John of Leyden the tailor, who headed the Anabaptists of Germany, and arrogated to himself the name and title of 'King John of Leyden.' His name was John Becold (1510–1536).

His name is sometimes written Boccold and Bockholdt.

King Bomba. Nickname of Ferdinand II. of Naples, who bombarded Messina in 1848.

'Bomba' is the noise made when the cheeks are blown out and compressed by the fingers and thumb. Ferdinand II. of Naples was a great Vox et præterea nihil, and his son Francis II. was only a 'Bombalino,' or Vocicula et præterea nihil.

King Edward's Law. The laws enforced by Edward the Confessor, and the mode of government which then prevailed.

When the people clamoured for King Edward's laws, they meant that they wished to be governed in the same manner as Edward the Confessor governed the nation (1041–1065).

King Henri's King. Chicot the jester (1553–1591), who ruled Henri III.; but, to his honour be it spoken, he loved him and served him faithfully. It would be well if some wise ones took counsel from the 'fool.'

King Hob. Robert Bruce was so called by Edward I., meaning 'king churl.' Hob was a common name for a villager or half-serf, as Hodge still is for a farm-labourer. Du Cange (art. 'Huba') says Hovia means a village, German hof, and the following from 'Chron. Mortis S. Agnetis,' chap. xxvi.:—'Damnum magnum habuimus in hovia nostra ex inundatione aquarum.'

Perhaps 'Hob' is a mere variant of 'Rob,' or 'Bob,' i.e. Robert.

King Hulan. King Alfonso XII. of Spain was called 'Roi Hulan' in 1883, because he had recently accepted a colonelcy of a Uhlan regiment in Prussia.

King James's Bible. See 'King's Bible' and 'Bible.'

'King Jesus.' William Hacket, in the early part of Elizabeth's reign, gave himself out to be King Jesus. His two 'prophets' were Arthington and Coppinger. Hacket was executed in 1592, Coppinger starved himself to death in prison, and Arthington was subsequently pardoned.

King-Maker (The). Richard Neville earl of Warwick (1428–1471). When Henry VI. was king he defeated the Lancastrians, captured the king at Northampton (10 July, 1460), and proclaimed Edward IV. king (4 March, 1461).

Subsequently he quarrelled with Edward, made a compact with Margaret (wife of Henry VI.), married his daughter Anne to Prince Edward (son of Henry VI. and Margaret), landed at Dover (13 Sept., 1470), drove Edward IV. from the throne, and restored Henry VI. See next article.

Richard Neville was slain by Edward IV. at the battle of Barnet 14 April, 1471, when Edward became king again.

King-Maker (The Roman). Ricimer (*— A.D. 472). In 456 he deposed the Emperor Avĭtus, and made Majorian emperor. As Majorian proved too independent and virtuous for Ricimer's liking, the Suevian put him to death (A.D. 461), and raised Libius Severus to the purple. On the death of Libius Severus in 465 Ricimer kept the government for sixteen months in his own hands, but in 467 the emperor of the east appointed the western emperor, and Ricimer acquiesced in the appointment. In 472 the new emperor was slain in battle, and Ricimer appointed Olybrĭus emperor. This was the third emperor which the barbarian made.

King Matthias is dead. This Hungarian proverb is the greatest compliment ever paid to a crowned head. It means 'justice no longer holds the balance,' as it did when Matthias was king. It appears that Matthias son of Hunyadi was indeed a model king, who never had his equal on any throne (1443, 1458–1490).

King Robert's Bowl. Said to be the bowl which the wife of Mark Sprotte set before King Robert. It is still preserved in the family of the Sprottes of Urr. One day King Robert was attacked by a Southron on the banks of the Urr, near the cottage of Mark Sprotte a shepherd; the wife of the shepherd caught hold of the Southron, pulled him to the ground, and he was obliged to yield. She then set before the king a bowl of porridge. Bruce said he would give her for reward all the land she could run round while he ate it, and she ran round Sheeling Hill. The land was given her, she was called the heroic dame of Galloway, the hill was called the King's Mount, and the family has been called the Sprottes of Urr for about 500 years.

King Smith. Louis Philippe of France, who escaped from France in 1848 under the assumed name of Mr. Smith.

'Mr. Smith!' exclaimed the king, 'that is curious indeed; and it is very remarkable that the first to welcome me should be a Mr. Smith, since the assumed name by which I escaped from France was Smith. Look, this is my passport, made out in the name of Smith.'—The Times, 6 March, 1848.

King Tom. Sir Thomas Maitland, the first Lord High Commissioner of the United States of the Ionian Islands, so called from his arbitrary manners. He was an excellent governor, but ruled the islands as an autocrat, and left a full exchequer at his death.

King of Arms. The title dates from the reign of Henry IV., but Henry V. created the Garter King in 1417, and George IV. the Bath King in 1725. The Garter King of Arms now serves the Order of the Garter, and the Bath King of Arms the Order of the Bath. The two provincial kings for England are Clarenceux (named after Thomas duke of Clarence, brother of Henry V.), with jurisdiction over all parts of England south of the Trent; and Norroy [North roy], with jurisdiction over all parts north of the Trent.

The King of Arms for Scotland is called Lyon, and for Ireland Ulster.

King of Bath (The). King Richard [of Bath], Beau Nash, master of the ceremonies, or Social Premier of Bath (1674–1761).

King of Bourges. Charles VII. of France was so called by the English in France because he returned to Bourges when he fled from Paris.

On the death of Charles VI. the kingdom of France descended to Henry V. of England. Charles VII. refused to allow the claim, and for a time took refuge in Bourges. Jeanne d'Arc turned the scale, and the King of Bourges became Charles le Victorieux.

King of England. A title first assumed by Richard I. See 'King of the English.'

King of Fire (The), or Sultan Kebir. Napoleon was so called by the Orientals (1709, 1804–1814, 1821).

King of France (The). So the monarchs of France were called till Oct. 1789, when the National Assembly ordained that Louis XVI. should not be styled 'King of France,' but 'King of the French.' The royal title was abolished in France in 1792, but was restored in 1814. When Louis Philippe was invited in 1830 to take on himself the government he was styled 'King of the French.'

King of Ireland, 1541. A title assumed by Henry VIII. to combat a notion that the regal dominion of Ireland was vested ex officio in the pope, and that the king of England held from the pope his lordship of Ireland. In the reign of Mary and Philip, Paul IV formally raised the lordship of Ireland into a kingdom, 1557.

John was 'dominus Hiberniæ,' and from John to 1541 the kings of England were styled 'lords of Ireland.' The Irish Ard-righs were undoubtedly kings; and Henry VIII. had no effective sway beyond the English pale. James I. of England was in reality the first king of all Ireland, when in 1603 Hugh O'Neill submitted to Mountjoy.

King of Kent. Hengist, first of the kings of the Heptarchy, was king of Kent, A.D. 455. His dominion comprehended Kent, Norfolk, Suffolk, Essex, Middlesex, &c. In 526 the foundation of the kingdom of Essex diminished that of Kent.

King of Paris (The), 1588. So Henri duc de Guise was called by Henri III. after the day of the barricades (the 12th May), when the king fled disguised as a rustic to Chartres.

After the murder of Balafré Henri III. left the room and visited his mother, who was ill in bed. 'The King of Paris lives no longer, madam,' said he; 'henceforth I shall reign alone. I have now no rival.' 'It is a clean cut, my son,' replied Catherine, 'but it must be sewn up again.'—FÉLICE, Hist. of the Protestants of France, xvii.

King of Prussia (The First). FRIEDRICH I. son of the Great Elector (1657, 1701–1713). See 'Prussia,' &c.

King of Rome, 1811. A title given by Napoleon I. to his infant son at birth, when 'he associated the child in his empire.' Probably he meant to revive the title invented by Kaiser Heinrich III.; if so the title was a blunder; but if he only meant to imitate the kaiser, he was quite at liberty to adopt any title not already appropriated.

King of Sion (The). John Becold, Boccold, or Bockholdt, tailor, the Anabaptist (1510, 1534–1536). Better known as John of Leyden, the name he took after his 'coronation.' He was sensual, vain, and bloodthirsty, fond of regal pomp, and introduced polygamy. John was executed by lingering tortures in 1536, at the age of 26.

King of Slops. Louis XVIII. of France (1755, 1814–1824).

King of Suffolk. See 'Kings of Norfolk and Suffolk.'

King of Terror (The). Robespierre was the 'King of Terror,' and the Committee of Public Safety his executive for 420 days, from 31 May, 1793, to 27 July, 1794.

Death is poetically so called.

King of the Barricades (3 syl.). Louis Philippe of France (1773, reigned 1830–1848, died 1850), so called because he assisted in the revolution of 1830 to barricade Paris and resist the royal troops.

King of the Baso'cians (The). President of the clerks of the Basoche or Basilica of Paris—i.e. the judges, the barristers, the proctors, and other officials of the Palais de Justice. He had his court, his great officers, his coin, and his armorial bearings. Henri III. suppressed the title, and transferred to the chancellor all the rights and privileges of this 'king of the lawyers.'

King of the Butchers (The). The lad who at one time rode on the Bœuf Gras through the streets of Paris on Shrove Tuesday. He was a son of one of the three great butcher families (Gois, St. Yon, or Caboche), was dressed as an eastern monarch, carried a naked sword in one hand and a sceptre in the other, and rode on the back of the prize ox. He also enjoyed certain privileges in his year of office. The procession of Bœuf Gras had no king in my time—i.e. the middle of the 19th cent.

In New Orleans Rex is still (1890) the central figure of the Mardi Gras festivities.

Bœuf gras, pronounce Buh-grah'.

King of the English. A title assumed in 828 by Egbert.

Every king from William to Henry II. called himself 'king of the English' (rex Anglorum). Richard I. was the first to call himself 'king of England' (rex Angliæ).

King of the French. So Louis-Philippe entitled himself in 1830. Similarly, the two Napoleons called themselves 'emperors of the French,' and not 'emperors of France.'

Of course, the notion was that the land called France belonged to the people, and that the king or emperor disavowed all right to it. There seems now (1890) a radical notion that all the land of the nation should be vested in the sovereign and not be held by private landlords. Strange how radicals should wish to roll back the tide of history to the time of the Conquest! Funny advancement this!

King of the Hills. Vincent the Chartist, 1839. The hill district of Wales is about five miles from Newport, and abounds in coal and iron.

King of the Markets (The), or 'Le Roi des Halles.' François de Vendôme duc de Beaufort (1616–1669), natural son of Henri IV. and Gabrielle d'Estrées. So called because he was very popular with the French proletariat Lagrange-Chancel asserted, in the 'Année Littéraire,' 1759, that the duc was the 'Iron Mask,' but this has been fully disproved. He was slain in a sortie at the siege of Candia.

King of the Peak (The), 1515. Sir George Vernon of Haddon Hall was twice cited to appear in London for the murder of a pedlar hanged by his order on a tree. When in the court he was summoned as 'King of the Peak' he vouchsafed no reply, but on the third summons as 'Sir George Vernon' he instantly presented himself. The pedlar had committed murder and Sir George 'lynched' him. The case was dismissed.

King of the Poor. William Fitz-Osbert, called 'Longbeard,' from the length of his beard. Executed with great barbarity in 1199.

King of the Ribalds (The). 'Le Roi des Ribauds' [Re-bo]. The captain of the militia created by Philippe II. Auguste of France in 1189. Charles V. united the captaincy of the Ribalds to the 'provost of the hôtel.'

King of the Romans, 1056. Heinrich III. the Black King of Germany invented this title for the heir-elect of Germany, and the title was continued till he was crowned. Till 1339 the king of Germany went to Rome to receive from the pope the title of 'kaiser of the Holy Roman Empire,' but after that date the king at his coronation in Germany assumed the title ex-officio.

If a father made his son joint-king, the father was kaiser and the son King of the Romans. The successor of a kaiser was only 'King of the Romans' till he was actually crowned. In 1508 Maximilian, who failed to get himself crowned kaiser, called himself 'Emperor-elect of the Romans.'

King of the Sea. Edward III. A title given him in 1353.

He won the great naval battle of Sluys (2 syl.) over the French in 1340, and beat the Spanish squadron off Winchelsea in 1350.

King's and Queen's Counties (Ireland). The territory belonging to the septs of Leix and Offaly, who resisted the forfeiture of their lands and took up arms; but the septs were exterminated, and their territory formed into two counties named King's and Queen's, in honour of Philip and Mary, and the assize towns of the counties were called Philipstown and Maryborough after the names of the king and queen.

King's and Queen's Men, 1571. The factions of James VI. of Scotland and his mother Mary queen of Scots, a prisoner at the time in England. In 1573 the queen's faction was stamped out and the reign of Mary was virtually at an end.

King's [or Queen's] Bench. An English law court where the sovereign is supposed to occupy the lit de justice. It was originally the Aula Regia which followed the king in all his travels. By 1 Will. IV. c. 70 the number of judges was raised from four to five, viz. the chief justice and four puisné or younger judges. This court has control over all other law courts by a process technically called certiorāri, by virtue of which proceedings may be removed to it from inferior courts. It can also prohibit other courts from proceeding when it is thought that they are exceeding their jurisdiction. It has jurisdiction over every species of criminal offence committed in Middlesex.

King's (or) Queen's Plates. Purses of money for races, not all the gifts of the reigning sovereign. In the reign of Queen Anne a gentleman left 1300 guineas for 13 plates or purses to be run for at such places as the crown should appoint; the condition being that each horse shall carry 12 stone weight the best of three heats over a four-mile course.

King's Bible (The), 1611. The 'Authorised Version' is so called because it was undertaken by the command of James I., to whom also it was dedicated. King James disliked the 'Great Bible' (q.v.) because of its annotations. He also extremely disapproved of the Geneva Bible (q.v.). See 'Bibles.'

King's Bishop (The), 1317. William Sinclair bishop of Dunkeld. Edward II. sent a fleet to the Frith of Forth; and the sheriff, with 500 Scottish horse, seeing the fleet, retreated precipitately. On their road the bishop met them, and cried, 'Out on you for false knights, whose spurs should be knocked from your heels! Who loves Scotland follow me!' The bishop made a desperate charge against the English, who were driven to their ships with loss. When Bruce heard thereof, he said Sinclair should be his bishop, and the Bishop of Dunkeld was called 'The king's bishop' for many years.

King's Book (The). I 'Liber Regis,' A.D. 1534. A schedule of the valuation of all church property in England made after the separation of the English Church from the Church of Rome.

II. 1543. 'Necessary Doctrine and Erudition for any Christian man,' a book published by Henry VIII. as a substitute for the Bible, which he forbade the general public to read. Teachers of religion, nobles, and those of gentle birth might read it, but if any artificer, apprentice, journeyman, labourer, or servant read it, the punishment was a month's imprisonment. The 'King's Book' was far more Catholic than Protestant. Indeed Henry was a Catholic in all things except his own supremacy. See 'Bishops' Book.'

The 'King's Book' is quoted in brief as the 'Erudition.' It is in great measure copied from the 'Bishops' Book' (q.v.), but leans more to Romanism. It explains the Creed, the Seven Sacraments the Ten Commandments, the Lord's Prayer, the Ave Maria, and finishes with an exposition of Free-will, Justification Good Works, and Prayers for the Dead. It accepts the Apocrypha, and the first four ecumenical Councils. See p. 277.

King's Collection (The), 1823. The Royal Library of George III. given to the nation by George IV., and added to the library of the British Museum. The Royal Library consists of the library of Mr. Joseph Smith, British consul at Venice, bought by the king in 1762 for 10,000*l.*; a collection of books bought up when the order of Jesuits was suppressed; and the library of Charles II. The number of volumes added to the library by this royal gift is somewhat more than 50,000.

King's College. I. Aberdeen, 1494. Founded by King James IV.

II. Cambridge, 1441. Founded by King Henry VI. The chapel was finished in 1530. The head of the college is called the provost.

III. London. Incorporated 1828.

King's Confession (The). The Scotch Covenant of 1580. So called because signed by King James VI. (afterwards James I. of England). It abjured the tenets of the Church of Rome; bound the subscribers to defend the tenets of the Reformed Church of Scotland, and to guard with goods and lives the person and authority of the king.

King's Evil (The). Scrofula, so called because it was supposed to be cured by the king's touch. Touching for scrofula was practised by Edward the Confessor (1043–1066); by Louis IX. of France in 1480; by the kaiser-king Karl VIII. at Rome and Naples in 1495; by François I. in 1527; by Charles II., and Queen Anne.

It was attempted by Prince Charles Edward the Pretender, at Holyrood, in 1746; by Louis XVI. at Reims in 1775.

King's Hall, Cambridge, 1337. Founded by King Edward III. In 1546 this college was, with other foundations, consolidated into Trinity College.

King's Lieutenants (The). Noblemen commissioned by the three Lancastrian kings to put into military order their respective counties, and levy fines on those incapable of bearing arms. These gentlemen are now called 'Lords Lieutenants of Counties.'

King's Nominees (The). Thirty-six Irish noblemen and gentlemen, whose estates had been confiscated by Cromwell, named in the Declaration of Indulgence (1662) to be restored to their estates without further proof, by the special favour of the king [Charles II.]

King's Pamphlets (The). 30,000 tracts and pamphlets relative to the history of England during the civil wars, bound in 2,000 volumes, of which 100 were printed (but never published). The pamphlets were commenced for the use of Charles I. by a clergyman named Thomason, kept in the collector's warehouses, and at length lodged at Oxford under the care of Dr. Barlow. They were bought for Charles II. by Samuel Mearke, stationer, but Mrs. Mearke, the widow, tried to dispose of them by the desire of Charles II. George III. bought them, and in 1763 presented the whole to the British Museum.

King's Preachers. Six able divines appointed by Edward VI., four of whom were itinerant, publicly to maintain the doctrines of the Reformation.

King's Primer (The), 1546. Published by command of Henry VIII. It contained the Creed, the Lord's Prayer, the Ten Commandments, the Litany, the 'Venite,' and the 'Te Deum,' with some few collects. It was twice revised in the reign of Edward VI., and again in the reigns of Elizabeth and James I., being ultimately made into our present 'Book of Common Prayer.'

King's Quair, i.e. King's Book. A poem in six cantos (197 stanzas of seven lines each) by James I. of Scotland. It is the story of his courtship of Jane Beaufort, who became his wife.

King's Stone (The), 1513. An unhewn column erected on Flodden Field to mark the spot where King James IV. fell.

Kings. A Chinese word equivalent to books, but emphatically applied to five, as our word Bible (a book) is applied to our Sacred Scriptures. The five sacred books of the Chinese are: 1. Y-King (cosmogony); 2. Chi-Kinz (hymns); 3. Chou-King (annals); 4. Li-Ki (religious rites and ceremonies); and 5. Tchun-Tsieou (chronology of the kingdom of Lou, the country of Confucius). To these is sometimes added the Tao-te-King.

Kings. The average length of the reigns in the three countries of England, France, and Germany.

ENGLAND from the accession of the Conquest 23½ years.

FRANCE from the accession of Hugues Capet 20 years.

GERMANY from the accession of Charlemagne 18 years.

The long reign of Queen Victoria will considerably raise the average of the sovereigns of England.

The average length in Scotland from Malcolm I. to James VI. was 21 years.

Kings and Popes. The era of impious kings and impious popes. See 'Popes and Kings.'

Kings and Queens of England.

VICTORIA, who was the niece of WILLIAM IV., who was the brother of GEORGE IV., who was the son of GEORGE III., who was the grandson of GEORGE II., who was the son of GEORGE I., who was the cousin of ANNE, who was the sister-in-law of WILLIAM III., who was the son-in-law of JAMES II., who was the brother of CHARLES II., who was the son of CHARLES I., who was the son of JAMES I., who was the cousin of ELIZABETH, who was the half-sister of MARY, who was the half-sister of EDWARD VI., who was the son of HENRY VIII., who was the son of HENRY VII., who was the cousin of RICHARD III., who was the uncle of EDWARD V., who was the son of EDWARD IV., who was the cousin of HENRY VI., who was the son of HENRY V., who was the son of HENRY IV., who was the cousin of RICHARD II., who was the grandson of EDWARD III., who was the son of EDWARD II., who was the son of EDWARD I., who was the son of HENRY III., who was the son of JOHN, who was the brother of RICHARD I., who was the son of HENRY II., who was the cousin of STEPHEN, who was the cousin of HENRY I., who was the brother of WILLIAM RUFUS, who was the son of WILLIAM THE CONQUEROR, who was the son of his mother.

Kings Combatant (The). The kings of the Tsheu or Chou dynasty of China. The third Imperial dynasty, and the last of the semi-historic period. The 'fighting kings' were the feudatories who ruled over petty neighbouring states, and were continually at war with each other.

The most powerful of the kings combatant were the founders of the following states: Yen, Oey, Tchao, Hàn, Tsee, and Tsin.

Kings of Arms, 1483. There are four in England: Clarenceux (who has power over all parts of England south of the Trent); Norroy, i.e. North-roy (who has power over all parts north of the Trent), and two other kings, called Garter King of Arms and Bath King of Arms. See 'Heralds.'

Garter is the principal King of Arms, higher in rank than the others. He serves the Order of the Garter. Bath King of Arms serves the Order of the Bath.

Kings of France. Their residences.

CLOVIS resided in what is now called the Palais de Justice, which he built in the Ile du Paris, in the Seine.
PHILIPPE II., Auguste, removed to the old Louvre.
LOUIS IX. resided in the Bastille.
PHILIPPE VI. de Valois lived at Vincennes.
CHARLES V. le Sage lived in the Hotel de St. Paul.
CHARLES VI. le Bien Aimé lived in the Palais des Tournelles.
CHARLES IX. lived in the Tuileries.
LOUIS XIII. le Juste lived in the Palais de Luxembourg.
LOUIS XIV. le Grand Monarque lived at Versailles.
LOUIS XVI. le Martyr lived at the Palais Royal.
NAPOLEON I. and III. lived in the Tuileries.
The Presidents of the Republic have lived in the Palais de l'Elysée.

Kings of Leire. So the old Danish rulers were styled, because they resided at Leire, in Seeland.

Kings of Norfolk and Suffolk, 1381. So Lester and Westbroom styled themselves in the rebellion of Wat the Tyler and Jack Straw. They were both executed in June the same year.

Kingdom of Al Garb, or Algarve. Founded by Shahpoor about 1008; set aside in 1031 by the dynasty of the Aftasides (3 syl.), so called from Al Aftas.

Kingdom of Italy (The). I. Lombardy was so called in the reign of Charlemagne, and when Charlemagne and his successors are called 'kings of Italy,' the meaning is Lombardy.

II. 1806; the union by Napoleon Bonaparte of Lombardy and the Venetian territories. Though the title was so pretentious, the new state did not comprise above a third of the peninsula. After the battle of Waterloo (1815) this geographical arrangement was set aside.

The present kingdom of Italy was created in 1861, but Rome was not added till 1870.

Kingdom of Scone (The). Scotland was so called so long as the 'Lia Fail' (q.v.) remained in that city, and Scone was the Sedes Principalis of North Britain.

Kingdom of Sion (The), in Münster, set up by John of Leyden, and meant to be a theocracy. John appointed twelve judges over the 'tribes,' and Matthiesen the baker had before him sent out 'apostles' to preach the Anabaptist doctrines (1534–1536).

Kingdom of Westphalia (The), 1807. Carved by Napoleon out of Hesse Cassel and part of Hanover, and given to Jerome Bonaparte, his youngest brother. Abolished after the battle of Waterloo in 1815.

Kingston, in Surrey. So called because, in 901, Edward the Elder was crowned there.

Kingstown (Ireland). So named in honour of the visit made by George IV. to Ireland soon after his coronation in 1821. The town had been previously called Dunleary, then a mere fishing village on the coast of Dublin Bay, about seven miles from the city. 'Kingstown is now a large and beautiful town, with commodious quays, magnificent piers, railway to Dublin, mail boats, &c., and handsome villas all about the neighbourhood.

Kirillit'za. The Russian alphabet is so called because it was arranged by Bishop Cyril.

[The Bible] will soon be turned into Russ and put into a printed book which any poor man will be able to read if only he knows his kirillitza. The Czar, chap. xi.

Kirk (The). The Presbyterian Church of Scotland (1689).

Kirk of Field (The Tragedy of the). The murder of Henry Darnley, husband of Mary queen of Scots, who was blown up with gunpowder in a mansion called Kirk of Field, belonging to James Kennedy archbishop of St. Andrews.

On the Monday before his [Darnley's] murder the queen passed the evening with him till it was time to attend a masque which was to be given in the palace. . . . About two in the morning of Tuesday Bothwell, with a selected party of desperate men, opened the under apartments of the Kirk of Field by means of false keys, and laid a lighted match to a quantity of gunpowder which had been previously placed beneath the king's apartment.—Sir W. Scott, Hist. of Scotland, xxviii.

Kirk Session (The), 1689. The lowest judicatory in the Presbyterian Church of Scotland. It is composed of the parish minister and ruling elders, to assist in superintending the social, moral, and religious condition of the parish, judge of the fitness of those who wish to become members of the church, to exercise discipline on those guilty of scandalous offences, and to grant certificates to worthy members who remove to another parish. The other three courts are the Presbytery, the Synod, and the General Assembly. See 'Presbytery.'

Kirkland's Plot (Moses), 1776. Kirkland, a native of South Carolina, was employed by Stuart and other Royalists to concert measures with General Gage for a joint attack, by sea and land, on the southern states of N. America, while the savages fell on their rear. The plot was discovered, and the Americans endeavoured to win over the savages, but without success; so the Americans entered their country, laid waste the cornfields, and almost extirpated the Cherokees.

Kirkpatrick Crest and Motto. A bloody hand holding a dagger, and the motto 'I make sicker.' When Robert Bruce had stabbed Comyn in the cloisters of the Minorites, Dumfries (1305), Sir Roger Kirkpatrick asked if he was sure the traitor was slain. 'I doubt so,' replied Bruce. 'Aye? do you doubt?' exclaimed Kirkpatrick, 'then I'll make sicker.' So saying he thrust his dagger into Comyn's heart.

Kislar Aga. Chief of the black eunuchs. About equal in patronage to our lord chancellor. The revenues, &c.

of all religious foundations are at the disposal of the Kislar Aga.

Kissing the Pope's Foot. Kissing the foot of a Roman emperor was a method of adoration paid to him as a god, and Diocletian (284–305) had his shoes studded with gems to render the ceremony less obnoxious.

When popes assumed regal powers they adopted the same custom, and some had crucifixes wrought in their shoes as a salve to tender consciences. It is not possible to state with certainty when the custom began, but in the ritual ascribed to Pope Gelasius (492–496) mention is made of deacons 'kissing the pope's feet before they began reading the Gospel.'

Not only were the feet of the pope kissed, but so were the feet of the mule or ass on which he happened to be riding.

The Romans certainly kissed the feet of their idols, and thought it derogatory to touch their mouths. The Persian method of adoration, introduced by Cyrus, was falling on the face at a prince's feet and kissing the ground on which he stood. Conon refused to perform this ceremony to Artaxerxes, and Callisthĕnēs refused to prostrate himself before Alexander the Great.

Kissing the cheek was a Jewish, Greek, and Roman custom of salutation, still continued in France and some other modern nations of Europe. Kissing the hand of a liege lord was a ceremony of homage, and subsequently was adopted by sovereigns as a part of court etiquette.

'Kissing hands' or to 'Kiss-hands' is a synonym of being introduced to court in England, Spain, Russia, and Turkey. In Catholic cathedrals and other important churches on Holy Thursday the officiant who celebrates the mass washes and kisses the feet of thirteen old or thirteen young persons, in commemoration of the act of Christ mentioned in the Fourth Gospel.

Kitchen Cabinet (The). The private advisers of President Jackson, who used to summon Francis P. Blair and Amos Kendal (editor of the 'Globe') and others, to consultation by a back door, or the kitchen door, to avoid observation.

The members of Jackson's Cabinet were not high-caste statesmen, but they were too high-caste to be congenial counsellors of Jackson. Behind them he kept a 'Kitchen Cabinet,' of creatures selected for their servile devotion to his person, including a representative of the domesticated press.—The Nineteenth Century, Aug. 1888, p. 272.

Kit-Kat Club (The), or 'Kit-cat Club,' 1688–1720. Composed at first of thirty members, originated chiefly by Dr. Garth the poet, author of 'The Dispensary,' in imitation of Boileau's 'Lutrin,' to ridicule the apothecaries, who were at war with the physicians about the establishment of dispensaries. The apothecaries strenuously opposed the design. Garth was a Whig and Hanoverian, and the club, which was held in King Street, Westminster, was supplied with pastry by Christopher Kat, a pastrycook near by. Its toasts were engraved on the drinking-glasses, that no Jacobite sentiment might be insinuated. Dissolved in 1720.

Addison and Steele were members of the club.

Kit-Kat, or 'Kit-cat,' Pictures. Oil paintings of the members of the Kit-Kat Club, by Godfrey Kneller. They were the natural size, but only down to the knees. These and all similar 'three-quarter likenesses' are called Kit-Kat pictures.

Klephtes (1 syl.). Brigands of Thessaly, for a long time opposed to the Armatoles (3 syl.), but in the insurrection of 1821 they united against the Turks for the independence of Greece.

Knærod (Treaty of). A treaty of peace, after the war of Calmar, signed in 1613 at Knærod by Christian IV. king of Denmark and Gustavus Adolphus king of Sweden. Gustavus Adolphus consented to ransom the provinces which the Danes had taken, and to abandon his claim to the island of Oesel, and to the coasts of the Arctic Ocean as far as the Bay of Waranger.

Knife for the Academic Knots (The). Chrysippos the Stoic (B.C. 280–297). He was the keenest disputant of his age. It was said of him, 'If the gods make use of dialectics, it must be the logic of Chrysippos.'

Knight Bachelor (A). The lowest grade of knighthood; conferred on civilians as well as on military and naval officers. The recipient kneels before the sovereign, who says to him 'Sois chevalier au nom de dieu,' and then adds, 'Rise, Sir ——' (naming the Christian name).

Knight Baronet. An English order instituted 22 May, 1611, by James I. Instituted in Ireland 30 Sept., 1619; and in Scotland by Charles I. in 1625.

Knight-errantry. The practice of knights wandering from place to place to redress wrongs, and especially to release young women taken captive by the unruly barons of England, Spain, France, and Germany.

They engaged themselves to redress those wrongs which laws were too feeble to remedy, and for redressing which honour, plunder, or rich donations became usually their compensation.—TURNER, History of England during the Middle Ages, chap. xiii.

Probably there is a basis of truth in this statement; but, without doubt, the rules of knight errantry are gross exaggerations.

Knight Service, or 'Knights' Service.' Serving the king on horseback in his military expeditions. This service was paid in consideration of lands held under the crown, and was at one time considered the most honourable of all tenures.

Knight of Liddesdale (The famous). William Douglas (*—1353).

Knights. Anglo-Saxon cniht, a military attendant who paid service to some chieftain as a rent for land. Called in French Chevaliers, and in German Ritters, because they served on horseback. It was common to create knights before and after a battle. Thus 500 French knights were created before the battle of Agincourt; similar honours were conferred on great festivals, such as a coronation or royal marriage. The apprentice of a knight was called a squire, which means a shield-bearer (French écuyer). Not only kings could create knights, but knights themselves could dub others. The chief ceremony was for the knight to touch with his sword the neck of the person as he knelt before him, saying these words: 'Arise, Sir Knight.'

Alfred gave Athelstan a belt and robe, and girded him with a sword, A.D. 900.

The women who distinguished themselves by preserving Tortôsa from the Moors in 1149 were knighted.

Knights Baronets of Nova Scotia, 1621. A title conferred by James I. on a number of Scotch adventurers whose object was to colonise North America.

Knight's Fee, or 'Feodum Militare.' A portion of land held by a knight for military service. William the Conqueror had an army of 60,000 knights in virtue of such fees.

Knights Hospitallers. 'Knights of St. John of Jerusalem,' or 'Knights of Malta,' 1048. Organised to guard and entertain pilgrims to the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem, and hence called hospitallers. Their monastery at Jerusalem was dedicated to St. John the Baptist, hence their second name. When expelled from Judæa they were allowed by Karl V. (1530) to settle in Malta, and hence their third title. Suppressed in England 1540, in France 1792, and dispersed by Napoleon in 1798.

Knights Sword-bearers. Founded in 1201 by the bishop of Livonia for the defence of that see. They were originally called 'Knights of Livonia,' but received the name of sword-bearers from two cross-swords embroidered in red on the breast of their white mantles. These knights were masters of Livonia and Esthonia. Gothard Kettler, the 50th grand master, became a Lutheran, and in 1561 the sovereignty of the Knights Sword-bearers was split up into five parts: (1) One part went to Ivan Vassilievitch czar of Russia; (2) Esthonia and Revel swore fidelity to Eric XIV. king of Sweden; (3) Livonia was attached to Sigismund II., called Sigismund Augustus of Poland; (4) Arensberg and the isle of Oesel went to Magnus duke of Holstein; and (5) Gothard Kettler kept for himself the provinces of Courland and Semigaglia [Semigalia], of which he was created duke by the king of Poland.

Knights Templars (The), 1118. A military order of monks organised to protect pilgrims on their road to the Holy Land. Subsequently their chief office was to protect the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem against the Saracens. They followed the Benedictine rule and took the vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience; but they became immensely rich, worldly, and tyrannical. The order was suppressed in 1311–1314, and in England in 1322.

Called Knights Templars or Knights of the Temple because Baldwin II. king of Jerusalem gave them a house built on the site of Solomon's Temple. Their costume was a long white robe decorated with a red cross.

Knights of Glyn and Kerry (Ireland). The heads of two ancient families named Fitzgerald. The titles still continue.

Knights of Labour (The), 1884. United States. The trades union committee which regulates the amount of wages to be demanded by workmen, the degree of skill to be exacted from them, and the length of time they shall work for a master. It enjoins when a strike shall be made and when workmen of the union may resume labour.

THE KNIGHTS OF LABOUR.—Philadelphia, 17 Jan.—The 'Philadelphia Press' states that a gigantic scheme of general reorganisation, by which all coal miners and mine labourers in the United States will be placed under one banner, is being accomplished by the Knights of Labour, in order to secure concerted action in their interests. —Reuter.

Knights of our Lady of Mount Sion (The). Approved 1191 by Kaiser Heinrich VI. and Pope Celestine III. All of noble birth, bound to celibacy and to the defence of the Christian church. Their dress was a white mantle and black cross; their rule that of St. Augustine. Their original number was 24 lay members and 7 priests; subsequently increased to 40. Conrad regent of Poland gave them the territory of Culm and all the country between the Vistula and the Druentsa.

Knights of Rhodes (The), 1314. Villaret, grand-master of the Knights Hospitallers, removed from Jerusalem to Rhodes. Andronicus urged the Saracens to drive him out of the island, but Villaret, by a succession of conquests, made himself master of it, and then changed the name of his order into that of the 'Knights of Rhodes,' a title which was retained till 1530. The order was called that of

Knights of St. John of Jerusalem 1120–1134 (driven out).

Knights of Rhodes 1314–1530 (driven out).

Knights of Malta 1530–1798. The order still exists, and its flag still flies on some Mediterranean vessels (1890).

Knights of St. George in Ireland (1472–1494), or 'Brotherhood of St. George.' Thirteen gentlemen chosen from the four counties of the Pale (Kildare, Dublin, Meath, and Louth). They met annually to choose a captain, and maintained 120 mounted archers, 40 horsemen, and 40 pages for the protection of the English border (WALPOLE, 'Kingdom of Ireland,' 1882).

Knights of St. Margaret, 1786. The mayors knighted for congratulating George III. on his escape from assassination when Margaret Nicholson, a mad woman, attacked him as he descended from his carriage in St. James's Park.

Knights of the Dagger. See 'Chevaliers du Poignard.'

Knights of the Garter, 1346. An English military order founded by Edward III. It is under the patron saint of England, 'St. George,' an image of whom is attached to a blue ribbon, and the ribbon is passed over the left shoulder. Round the left leg is a blue garter containing the motto 'Honi soit qui mal y pense.' See 'Blue Thonge.'

Edward III. only 'perfyted substanegally what kynge Richarde had begunne at the sege of the cyte of Acres, wher, in his great necessyte, there were but 26 knyghtes that firmly and surely abode with the king; when he caused all them to wear thonges of blew leyther about the legges; and afterwarde they were called the knyghtes of the blew-thonge.'—RASTEL, Chronicle.

Knights of the Round Table. Asser in his 'Life of Alfred' says these knights were created by Arthur A.D. 528. The order was revived in 1344 by Edward III. at Windsor, on New Year's Day.

Knights of the Shire were gentlemen chosen by the freeholders of each county to represent them in parliament, now called county members. They were paid according to the Act 12 Rich. II. c. 12 (1388); but the payment of members has long been discontinued. By Act 9 Anne c. 5 (1710) no member whose income was under 600*l*. a year was eligible for election. This restriction was abolished in 1858 (21, 22 Vict. c. 26).

Knights of the Virgin Mary (The), 1190. The original name of the 'Teutonic Knights' (q.v.).

Knighten-gild (The). The chief of the London gilds, dating back to the reign of King Edgar. It stood at the head of all the gilds, and its alderman or master was the grand-master of all other gilds. It consisted of 19 knights, to whom the king gave a portion of void ground lying within the walls of the city, afterwards called Portsoken ward.

A soke is a lordship enfranchised by the king, with liberty of holding a court of the lord's seemen or socagers (i.e. tenants). 'Knighten-gild' also written 'Cnihtena-gild.'

Knot (The Cromwell), 1659. This term was given by the exiled Charles Stuart to a secret council of Royalists who were working in his cause in England against the government of Cromwell. The head of the Knot was Sir Richard Wallis, who was proved to be a traitor to both Charles and Cromwell.

Know-nothings (The), or 'Natives,' 1853. A political society in the United States of America who declared that the right of citizenship should be restricted to 'natives,' or those born of American parents in America. They were opposed to Catholicism, as inconsistent with the spirit of republicanism. When asked any question respecting their society, their only reply was 'I know nothing.' They split on the slave question and died out.

Knox's Blast. 'The First Blast of the Trumpet against the monstrous Regiment of Women' is the title of a tract published by John Knox in 1558 against Mary queen of England and Mary queen of Scots. The object was 'against the political government of women.'

The words 'Regiment of Women' we should now call the 'Regimen or Rule of Women.'

Knox's Liturgy, or 'The Book of Common Order,' 1562. In 1564 its use was enjoined on the Scotch Kirk by the General Assembly. It was based on the Genevan Formula (q.v.), but soon went out of use when the living influence of Knox declined.

Knoxians and Coxians (The), 1556. The followers of John Knox and Dr. Coxe dean of Christ Church, Oxford, who left England during the reign of Mary and retired to the Continent. Knox, backed by Calvin, objected to the English Liturgy, and insisted on the use of the Genevan service; but Dr. Coxe insisted on the English Liturgy, and made a point of repeating the responses aloud. The altercation became so noisy that the magistrates had to interfere. Knox retired to Geneva, and Coxe settled in Strasburg.

Kockbunds (The). The Thugs of Hyderabad. Also called 'Phanseegurs.'

Koh-i-noor (The), i.e. 'Mountain of Light,' one of the largest diamonds in the world. Came into the possession of Ala-u-din soon after 1300. It fell to Baber in 1526, and subsequently to Mahommed Shah, great-grandson of Aurengzebe, who kept it hidden in his turban; but when Nadir Shah took possession of Delhi, Mahommed had to give the diamond to the conqueror. It passed in succession to Shah Shuja, and when driven from Cabul he carried it to Lahore, when Runjeet Sing got possession of it and had it set in a bracelet, 1813. After the annexation of the Punjaub by the English the crown jewels of Lahore were confiscated, and the Koh-i-noor was presented to Queen Victoria by the East India Company and delivered into her hands 3 June, 1850. In 1889, in a most insolent letter, Runjeet Sing demanded its restitution. Its weight was 186½ carats. It was exhibited in the Great Exhibition of 1851, and valued at 140,000*l.* By order of the Queen it was cut into a brilliant by Herr Voorsanger, whereby the weight was reduced to 106$\frac{1}{16}$ carats. If this diamond is the 'Great Mogul' its previous history will be found under that name. See 'Diamonds.'

Konrad I. First king of Germany after the Karlovingian race. He was previously count of Franconia (911–918). Contemporary with our Edward the Elder.

Konrad II., founder of the second line of kings in Germany, was duke of Franconia. Heinrich III., IV., V. followed in regular descent. Konrad II. was crowned king of Germany 1024, and kaiser of the Holy Roman Empire 1027; he died 1039, at the age of 53. He was a descendant of Konrad the Wise, son-in-law of Otto I. the Great. However, the kings of Germany were elected or chosen, originally by the great nobles, and subsequently by a board called the 'Electors,' and were not kings by hereditary descent.

Father, Heinrich duke of Franconia. Wife, Gisela, a widow. Contemporary with Canute and Harold Harefoot.

Konrad III., founder of the House of Hohenstauffen, was grandson of Heinrich IV. (of the previous dynasty called the 'house of Franconia'). He was king of Germany from 1138 to 1152, but never kaiser or emperor of the Holy Roman Empire (1093, 1138–1152).

Konrad III. was the first of the kings of Germany who was elected by seven princes. In 1356 Karl IV. made seven the legal number of electors by what is called the 'Golden Bull.' In 1648 the number of electors was raised to eight; in 1692 it was nine; but in 1777 the number was again reduced to eight. In 1806 Napoleon swept away the whole system and introduced the law of inheritance.

Father, Friedrich Hohenstauffen nephew of Kaiser Heinrich V. Mother, Agnes daughter of Kaiser Heinrich IV. Contemporary with Henry I. and Stephen.

Konrad IV. Son of Friedrich II. and great-grandson of Barbarossa. He was king of Germany between 1250 and 1254, but never kaiser. Konrad IV. was a roi fainéant, and in him expired the royal house of Hohenstauffen.

The next dynasty was the house of Guelf or D'Este, which gives only one king, Otto IV., who abdicated.

Ko'raichites (3 syl.). An Arabian tribe and the principal one of Mecca up to the time of Mohammed. This tribe in A.D. 460 acquired the custody of the Kaaba, or Temple at Mecca, and, of course, most violently opposed the pretensions of Mohammed (613–622). In 623 they were defeated by him at Bedr and Ohud, and again in the 'Expedition of the Nations' in 625. They then concluded a truce, and in 629 surrendered to him the holy city of Mecca. The Koraichites professed to be the issue of Ishmael. Mohammed and his first wife (Kadijah) were Koraichites.

Koran' (Al). The Mohammedan Scriptures. The scattered leaves of it were collected into a volume A.D. 634 by Abubekr; it was revised and sanctioned by the calif Omar in 652; was first printed at Rome in 1530; and was burnt by order of Pope Clement VII. Sale's English translation with numerous notes was printed in 1734, and a French translation was made in 1783 by Savary.

The Koran is divided into 114 sections, and contains 3,000 paragraphs or verses.

Koreish (The Tribe of). See 'Koraichites.'

Körner of Italy (The)—that is, the Tyrtæus or war-poet, Godfredo Mameli. His great song was composed in 1848, the refrain of which is—

> Together we stand, or together we fall;
> We are ready for either at Italy's call!

The great war-song of Körner is 'The Sword Song' (1791-1813).

Kosciusko (Insurrection of), 1794. He was leader of the Poles in revolt against Russia, and won the battle of Wraclawice, near Cracovia; but (2 Oct.) four months later he was attacked at Maciejowice (about 50 miles from Warsaw) and was taken prisoner, exclaiming, 'Finis Poloniæ.' He remained prisoner at St. Petersburg for two years, when he was liberated by the czar Paul I. and died in Switzerland in 1817.

Kosciusko indignantly denied ever uttering the words popularly ascribed to him.

Kremlin, i.e. citadel. The palace and citadel of Moscow, at one time the residence of the czars. It was originally constructed of wood, but was rebuilt of stone by Dmitri Donskoï. In 1487 Pietro Antonio, an Italian, built the towers which flanked the enceinte. It was not set on fire by Rostopchin in 1812, and was occupied by the French. The Kremlin also contains the palace of the archbishop, the Cathedral of the Assumption where the czars were crowned, the belfry of Ivan Veliki with 32 bells, one of which is the biggest in Europe.

Kufic Coins. The earliest Mohammedan coins inscribed with Kufic (or ancient Arabic) characters. The first was struck A.D. 638 under Calif Omar.

Kufa, in the pashalic of Bagdad, contained the most expert writers of the Koran, and hence the term 'Kufic writing,' to express 'old Arabic.'

Ku-Klux Klan (The), 1868–1871. A secret society of ex-Confederate soldiers in North America. 'Ku-Klux' is meant to represent the click in cocking a rifle. The 'Klan' was an offset of the 'Loyal League,' and its ostensible object was to 'repress crime and preserve law in the disturbed Southern States.' In 1871 Congress, resolved to put down the association, suspended the Habeas Corpus Act (under what is generally called 'The Ku-Klux Law') in nine counties of South Carolina. This law and the employment of the military brought the 'Klan' to an end.

Kuleev Dynasty (The). The third fabulous dynasty of Persia, the second being the Jy-anian and the fourth the Yassanian dynasty. The only three names of the third dynasty known are Shah Kuleev the founder, with Shah Aboul and Shah Mah-aboul, the last two of the line.

Ku'risers. Irish refugees formed into two regiments, in the pay of the Duke of Savoy, to put down the Vaudois in Piedmont. The word is a corruption of cuirassiers (1655).

Kurucz-Labancz Era (The), 1672–1681. The period in Hungarian history of the contest between the Kuruczes (i.e. the insurgents) and the Labanczes or Austrians. This was in a measure a 'religious war,' the insurgents being the Protestant party and the Austrians the Catholic faction.

To cut tobacco on the bare back of the opposite faction, or to cut strips from his quivering skin, to drive iron spikes under the finger nails, and to bury an adversary in the ground up to the head and then fire at him, were everyday courtesies exchanged between these two belligerents. — VAMBÉRY, Hungary, ch. xiii.

Kuthans, or 'Kuthe'ans.' The Samaritans were so called by the Jews because they were carried captive by Salmanazar to Kutha, a town of Susiana, not far from Babylon. It is said that the inhabitants of Kutha went to Palestine and colonised Samaria.

L. The three L's, Lords, Levites, Lawyers. Hugh Peters said, It will never be well with England till the three fifties are abolished. L=50.

Labourers (The Statute of). I. In feudal times forbade a husbandman, whose land had been bought by another, leaving the estate. He was obliged to remain with his family as a villein regardant (q.v.) to cultivate the land.

II. 23 Edw. III. c. 1, A.D. 1349, for the regulation of wages, consequent upon the strife between labour and capital which resulted from the Black Death (q.v.). The act ordained that the wages of labourers shall be the same as they were 'two years before the plague began'; but, as the price of food had risen enormously, this law was a gross injustice, and led naturally to the 'Peasant Revolt' (q.v.). Repealed 1826.

III. Numerous acts of parliament from the reign of Edward IV. have been made to compel persons having no visible means of livelihood to go out to service either in husbandry or trade to gain an honest living.

Labyrinth of Egypt (The). This most magnificent edifice had 3,000 chambers; and the gallery containing the statues of the gods was entered by a flight of ninety marble steps. The porch was of Parian marble. It was destroyed by the people of Heracleopōlis, who worshipped the ichneumon or water-rat, the natural enemy of the crocodile, the great god of the Labyrinth. It was a theological war—the god water-rat against the god crocodile. The former prevailed, and the beautiful Labyrinth was levelled to the ground. It seems like a satire on other religious wars.

The Cretan and Samian labyrinths are also celebrated.

Laced Shoe (The), 1502. In German 'Bundschuh,' the peasants' rebellion in the Rhine countries. So called from its cognizance.

Lacedæmonian League (The), B.C. 431. The Lacedæmonian league, at the outbreak of the Peloponnesian war, comprised all the states of the peninsula except Argos and Achaia (which were neutral), and all northern Greece except Thessaly and Acarnania (which sided with Athens). See 'Athenian Confederacy.'

Lack-learning Parliament (The), 1404, from which all lawyers were excluded. See 'Parliament.'

The Unready Parliament would be a better phrase; that is, the parliament lacking counsel or advice (A.-S. rǽd, counsel, advice, as in 'Ethelred the Unready').

Laco'nia, the country of the Lacedæmonians. The ancient inhabitants were the Cynurians and Selēgēs, who were expelled by the Achæans. The Dorians subsequently invaded Peloponnesos, and became the ruling race.

Laconisers, B.C. 458, &c. Those Athenians who supported the power of Sparta, after Athens by the confederacy of Delos was declared the head of Greece.

Laconisms. When Philip of Macedon wrote to the Spartan magistrates, 'If I enter Laco'nia I will level Lacedæmon to the ground,' the ephors wrote back the single word 'If.'

In 1490 O'Neill wrote to O'Donnel, 'Send me the tribute, or else—;' to which O'Donnel returned answer, 'I owe none, and if—.'

Lacustrian Period (The). An extremely remote period when human habitations, for the sake of security, were built in the midst of lakes. Remains of such habitations exist in certain lakes of Switzerland, Scotland, Ireland, &c.

Ladan-Thora and Ladan Bareseid. The two readers of the Pentateuch on the eighth and last day of the Feast of Tabernacles. One reads the first half and the other the latter half.

Ladder of Acesius (The). Sectarian exclusiveness. Acesius was bishop of Constantinople and a Novatian. Constantine the Great excepted him from the tribe of 'heretics,' and invited him to attend the Council of Nice. Novatian taught that the lapsed (i.e. those who denied the faith through fear of persecution) can never be received again into the communion of the faithful. This exclusion he afterwards extended to all guilty of 'mortal sins.' Constantine said jocosely to Acesius, 'Take a ladder, Acesius, and climb to heaven by yourself.'

Ladder of St. John. Surnamed Climăcus, or rather Klimăkos, 526.

Ladislaus' Wagon (St.). A two-wheeled cart drawn by men. In the reign of Ladislaus IV. of Hungary (1272–1290) the country was so impoverished by domestic wars 'that the two-wheeled cart got the name of St. Ladislaus' wagon; for, owing to the universal plundering of draught-cattle, the people themselves were compelled to draw the carts.'—VAMBÉRY, 'Hungary,' chap. vii.

Lady (The). Castlemaine née Barbara Villiers, wife of Mr. Palmer, and mistress of Charles II., who created her duchess of Cleveland.

The Duke of Buckingham had a quarrel with 'the Lady,' and the Lady prejudiced the king against him: and the duke was determined to have his revenge by exposing 'the Lady.'—HOWITT, Hist. of Engl., Charles II., ch. xi. p. 443.

Lady Bountiful. So Joanna Baillie the poetess was called (1762–1851).

Lady Clares (The). An Irish association so called from the county of Clare, the nucleus being formed of Claresmen. They rose about the same time as the Terryalts (q.v.), and were especially conspicuous in the sanguinary tithe war (1830–1832). See 'Irish Associations.'

Lady Day. 25 March, the day of the Annunciation.

Lady Huntingdon's Connexion, 1770. A split from the Calvinistic Methodists, after the death of George Whitefield. It preserved substantially the liturgy of the Church of England. Half Presbyterian and half Independent.

Lady Selina countess of Huntingdon (1707-1791).

Lady Jane Grey. Grand-daughter of Mary youngest daughter of Henry VII. The Princess Mary and the Princess Elizabeth (though both illegitimated by their father Henry VIII.) were by his last will acknowledged, and would naturally succeed in turn their brother Edward VI., provided there was no issue to prevent it.

HENRY VII.—His son HENRY VIII. succeeded him. The youngest daughter was Mary.
HENRY VIII.—EDWARD VI., MARY, and ELIZABETH (all children of Henry VIII.).
Mary, daughter of Henry VII.) had a daughter named Frances, who married Henry Grey marquis of Dorset and duke of Suffolk.
Lady Jane Grey was the daughter of Frances and her husband Henry Grey.

The pedigree runs thus :—

HENRY VII.
Mary
Frances, wife of Henry Grey
Lady Jane Grey

Lady Margaret Preacher (The) in the University of Cambridge, 1504. Founded by Lady Margaret, mother of Henry VII., with a stipend of 8*l*. He has to preach one sermon on the first Sunday in Nov. in Great St. Mary's Church.

Lady Margaret Professorship of Divinity (The) in the University of Cambridge, 1502. Founded by Lady Margaret mother of Henry VII. Original stipend 20 marks a year. See 'Regius Professorship of Divinity.'

Lady of Christ College (The). John Milton, so called because he was fair and his features effeminate; his hair was fine, light brown, and flowing, his constitution delicate, and his health anything but robust. (1608–1674.)

Lady of England. Matilda or Maud, daughter of Henry I. of England. She married the kaiser-king Heinrich V. of Germany in 1114, but was left a widow 1125 (aged 23). She then married Geoffrey of Anjou in 1127, but was driven from Anjou by her husband in 1129. Her son Henry [II. of England] was born in 1133. After the death of her father, Matilda made war on Stephen the usurper, and having obtained some advantages was recognised as 'Lady of England' in 1141; but her imperious arrogance so disgusted the English that they drove her from London in five months, and her adherents were excommunicated. She died at Rouen in 1165, aged 63.

Lady of Mercia (The). Ethelflæda daughter of King Alfred. She married Ethelred, and after his death continued to reign (913–918). She conquered the 'Five Boroughs' (q.v.).

Ladies' Irish Land League, Ladies' Labour and Industrial Union (between 1879 and 1888), formed in affiliation with the Irish Land League, the Land League, and the Labour and Industrial Union (q.v.). Its nominal object was 'the relief and sustentation of Land League prisoners.' See 'Irish Associations.'

Ladies of the Queen's Household (The). They consist of the Mistress of the Robes, the Ladies of the Bedchamber, the Bedchamber Women, and the Maids of Honour. The Mistress of the Robes has the superintendence of the personal attendants on the queen.

Lady's Gown [Scotland]. A present made by the purchaser to the wife of the man who has sold to him his estate.

Lætare Sunday. The fourth Sunday in Lent. So called from the first word of the introît of the Mass (Isa. lxvi. 10), 'Rejoice ye with Jerusalem, and be glad with her, all ye that love her' [Lætare Hierusalem . . .]. As on this day the Pope blesses the golden rose, it is also called 'Dominica de Rosa.' It is a day of rejoicing in the middle of mournful Lent. See 'Sundays.'

The introît [introitus] is the passage of Scripture chanted while the priest is entering the chancel to celebrate mass.

Lagenians. The people of Leinster in Ireland.

Lagides (3 syl.). The Ptolemys of Egypt. See 'Lagos.'

Lagoon (The), Venice, or rather the marsh round the city. Strictly speaking, the Gulf between the Piave and the Adige. The lagunas are the canals, too deep for cavalry and too shallow for vessels.

In no place did the Inquisition obtain so little footing as in the Lagune.
The Lagune, which cannot justly be considered either sea or land, is navigable only by skiffs drawing a few inches of water.
The Rialto is the very centre of the Lagune.
After the capture of 100 ships he returned to the Lagune with his booty.
Petrarch had occasionally visited the Lagune, and was profoundly impressed with the singularity and beauty of Venice.—History of Venice (Murray, 1831).

Lagos. Ptolemy I. king of Egypt, the adopted son of Lagos the Macedonian. All his descendants on the Egyptian throne were called Lagîdês.

La Hire, i.e. the growler. So Etienne Vignoles [Vin-yole] was called on account of his deep baying voice [1387–1442]. One of the knaves on a pack of French cards is meant for La Hire [Here].

Lahore (Treaty of). (1) 26 June, 1838, between Great Britain, Runjeet Singh, and Shah Shuja.

(2) March 8, 1846, between Great Britain and Dhuleep Singh.

Laird of Cockpen (The). The Duke of Buccleuch.

Laish. While Othniel was judge (B.C. 1394–1354) the tribe of Dan, finding their mountain territory too small, made an incursion into the plain beyond Mount Ephraim, and seized the city of Laish. Here they established a priesthood of their own, because Shiloh was so far distant. This worship continued for nearly 300 years, i.e. till the capture of the ark by the Philistines in Samuel's time.

Lake Dwellings. Human habitations in the midst of lakes. Those in Switzerland were discovered in 1854. See 'Lacustrian Period.'

Lake Poets (The). Wordsworth, Coleridge, and Southey, who resided in the lake district of Cumberland and Westmoreland. They were so named by the 'Edinburgh Review.'

Lali'ta Vistara. One of the nine chief works of the Buddhists. It contains the life and doctrines of Sakyamuni (i.e. St. Sak'ya).

Lamaism. Buddhism corrupted by Sivanism (q.v.) or Shamaism or spirit worship. It prevails in Thibet and Mongolia. The essence of it is contained in three jewels, called 'the Buddha jewel,' 'the Doctrine jewel,' and the 'Priesthood jewel.' The first person of the triad is Buddha, the second is the incarnation of Buddha, and the third is the church.

Lambeth (Treaty of), 1217. By which Louis the dauphin consented to withdraw from England on payment of a sum of money which he claimed for expenses. He had been invited over by the English barons to assist them in resisting John; but as John was just dead, the services of Louis were no longer needed, and the barons had no intention of placing a Frenchman on the throne.

Lambeth Articles (The), 1594. Proposed by Archbishop Whitgift; suppressed by Queen Elizabeth in 1595; rejected in 1604 at the Hampton Court Conferences; adopted by the Irish Church in 1615. These articles were nine in number, and were designed to be added to the 39 Articles.

1. God hath from all eternity predestined some to life and reprobated others to damnation.

2. This election does not proceed from God's foreknowledge of the faith and good works of his elect, but solely from his own good will.

3. The number of the elect is fixed, and can be neither increased nor diminished.

4. Those not predestined to everlasting life will of necessity be damned.

5. True faith and holiness in the elect will never fail.

6. Justifying faith is certain of remission of sins and eternal salvation through Christ.

7. Saving grace is not conferred on all.

8. No man can come unto Christ except God the Father draws him.

9. It is not in the will or power of every man to be saved. See 'Nine Articles.'

Lambmas Brother and Sister (A). A lad and his lass at St. Olla's Fair at Kirkwall, associated together as long as the fair lasted.

> Ye gallanty Lambmas lads appear,
> And bring your Lambmas sisters here.
> Sir WALTER SCOTT, The Pirate, ch. xxxii.

Lame Peace (The), 20 March, 1568. The peace of Longjumeau between the Huguenots and French Catholics. It was called 'the lame and badly-seated peace,' because one of the queen's negotiators was lame, and the other was the lord of Malassise. But it was otherwise lame and badly seated, inasmuch as it left the Huguenots at the mercy of their enemies, with no surety except the word of an unprincipled Italian woman. It lasted only six months, and never existed except on paper. See 'Paix Boiteux.'

Lamian War (The), B.C. 323–322. The war between Antipäter and the allied Greeks after the death of Alexander the Great. So called because Antipater threw himself into Lamia, a strong fortress on the Malian Gulf, which was besieged by the allies. Antipater succeeded in breaking up the alliance, and Athens was left completely at his mercy.

Lammas-day, 1 Aug. The feast of St. Peter ad Vincula. The word is a corruption of loaf-mass, referring to the firstfruits of harvest offered on that day. (Aug.-Sax. hlafmæsse).

Lamourette's Kiss, 1792. A momentary reconcilement followed by greater hostility than ever, in the French revolution. When the Prussian army was on the move towards Paris Condorcet proposed to the Assembly a reconcilement of the Jacobins and Girondists. Lamourette (bishop of Lyons) seized on the idea and exclaimed: 'He who succeeds in reconciling you will be the real conqueror of Austria and Coblentz!' His words had a magic effect; the most hostile members threw themselves into each other's arms and kissed each other frantically; but ere sunset the emotion had effervesced, and Jacobins and Girondists were more bitter than ever against each other.

This is sometimes called the Judas Kiss, but most improperly so, as no betrayal was even dreamt of by the excitable Frenchmen.

Lamp of Lothian (The). The abbey church of Haddington was so called from the extreme beauty of its architecture. It was burnt down in 1356 on 'Burnt Candlemas' (q.v.).

Lamp of Wisdom (The). Aben Ezra, called by the Jews 'Hechachan.' They used to say, if knowledge had put out her candle it might be lighted again at the brain of Aben Ezra.

Lampeter (College of), 1822. Founded by Thomas Burgess bishop of St. David's, for the better and inexpensive education of Welsh candidates for ordination.

Lampeter Brethren (The), 1832. A society of young men, members of St. David's College, Lampeter, who met together as a praying and revival order. Henry James Prince was the most prominent of them, and he afterwards founded the Abode of Love, called Agapemonê (q.v.).

Lancaster (The Line of). Part of the Plantagenet dynasty of England, consisting of Henry IV., V., and VI. Henry IV. dethroned Richard II., but was a usurper, for (on the deposition of Richard) the rightful heir was Edmund Mortimer. See 'York.'

EDWARD III. His sons were (1) Edward the Black Prince, (2) William, (3) Lionel, (4) John of Gaunt. (5) Edmund Langley duke of York.

Son of Edward the Black Prince was RICHARD II. (no issue, and deposed).

Next comes Lionel (the third son), whose daughter Philippa married Edward Mortimer. Their son was Roger Mortimer, and the children of Roger were Edmund and Ann. Edmund was heir on the death of Richard II.

From Ann Mortimer proceeds the House of York Her son Richard duke of York was the White Rose He had two sons, both of whom reigned, viz. EDWARD IV. and RICHARD III.

The fourth son of EDWARD III. was John of Gaunt duke of Lancaster, whose son was HENRY IV., grandson HENRY V., and great-grandson HENRY VI., the Red Rose.

Lancaster Gun (The). A species of rifled cannon invented by Mr. Lancaster, who dispensed with grooves, and instead of a strictly circular bore adopted an elliptical one.

Lancaster Herald (The). One of the six heralds of England, and the second in point of seniority. See 'Heralds,' &c.

Lancasterian Schools, 1798. So called from Joseph Lancaster. Not much known in our islands till 1808, but in 1818 they became very numerous. The idea was to save expense by means of mutual instruction. Joseph Lancaster was indebted to Dr. Bell of Madras for the idea, and for a time Bell and Lancaster were rivals, the former being supported by churchmen and the latter by dissenters. Dr. Bell called his system 'Mutual Instruction,' Lancaster called his the 'Monitorial System.' See 'Mutual Instruction.'

Lancasterism, 1844. Destroying wheat-stacks in order to raise the price of wages. So called from Joseph Lancaster, who was arrested for firing corn-stacks, and pleaded in excuse that his object was to improve the rate of wages.

Land.

William the Conqueror nationalised the land, himself being the sole owner.

He let it out to king's or chief tenants, on certain conditions, and looked to these tenants only for the fulfilment thereof.

The chief tenants subdivided their holdings among mesne tenants on similar conditions.

The mesne tenants subdivided their holdings into manors, and the manors were parcelled into farms, with a certain portion called common.

Land Bank (The), 27 April, 1696. A bank of England chartered by William III. for the benefit of the landed gentry, according to a scheme projected by Hugh Chamberlayne. The Tonnage Bank (q.v.) lent William only a million, and that at 8 per cent. This new bank lent him double the sum at 7 per cent., but it proved to be a mere bubble.

Land-Grabber (A), between 1879 and 1890. In Irish history it means one who takes a plot of land from which a tenant has been evicted. See 'Irish Associations.'

Prior to the establishment of the Land League, 'land-grabbing' in Ireland was called 'Saintough' (covetousness), 'one of the seven deadly sins.'—Parnell Commission (Father Hewson, 27 June, 1889).

Land League (The), 1879–1881, Ireland. Michael Davitt's development of Mr. Butt's Home Rule policy, after the death of Mr. Butt, in May 1879. Ostensibly it aimed at 'the abolition of the monopoly of land,' by giving to tenants as a free gift part of the land belonging to the Irish landlords. It tried to carry out its object by defiance of the law and resistance to its execution. Suppressed in 1881, when the National League was established in its place.

The North American Land League (Ireland) was organised 11 March, 1880. The first meeting of the League was held in Philadelphia 25 April, 1883. See 'Irish Associations.'

In August 1879 Michael Davitt negotiated a small loan from the Fenian war-chest to start the constitutional movement. Patrick Ford was 'the honest broker' between the Fenian trustee and the Land League financier. That body held its first meeting 31 Oct., 1879, and Mr. Parnell was appointed president.—Cashman's Life, pp. 218, 219; Parnellism and Crime, p. 8.

'The objects of the Land League were to bring about a reduction of rack-rents; and to facilitate the ownership of the soil by the occupiers of the soil.—ALFRED HENRY RUEGG, counsel for O'Donnell, in the 'Parnellism and Crime' libel case, 2 July, 1888.

Land Purchase Bill (The), 1890. A bill projected by Mr. Balfour, chief secretary for Ireland, to enable Irish tenants to purchase their farms at the value of twenty years' rent, if they chose so to do. To enable them to make the purchase, thirty millions sterling was lent by Government at 2½ per cent. plus a fiftieth part of the principle, so that the purchase money and interest would all be paid off in fifty years. As ten millions had been hitherto advanced for the same purpose, the whole loan amounted to forty millions; and, as the money paid by tenants to the New Land Department was made eligible for the same purpose, the loan was virtually an 'endless band' available till every farmer in all Ireland had become his own landlord.

Land of Ireland (The). From 1280, for several centuries after, the district occupied by the English, and known at a later period as the Pale.

Edward I. in 1280 called upon the lords spiritual and temporal . . . in the 'Land of Ireland' to assemble and deliberate upon the prayer of the natives praying to be admitted to the privileges of English law.—MOORE, Hist. of Ireland, chap. xxxv.

Land of Storms (The). Tierra del Fuego, an island-group at the southern point of South America. It is separated by the Straits of Magellan. Few ships have ever passed it without observing the forked lightning playing on its cliffs, and hearing the most terrific thunders roll.

Land o' the Green. Ireland, also called the Emerald Isle, from the exquisite green colour of its meadows, &c.

Lands of the Sacred Crown (The). Hungary. Each of its nobles was 'Membrum Sacræ Coronæ.' The sacred crown was the crown given by the Pope to St. Stephen king of Hungary (979, 997–1038).

Landlord's Hypothec (The). In Scotch law. A lien on the tenant's goods as a security for his rent.

Landscape Gardening (Father of). Lenotre (1613–1700). He laid out the gardens of Versailles, the Tuileries, St. Cloud, St. Germain, Fontainebleau, Clagny, Chantilly, Meudon, and Sceaux.

Landseer (The Liverpool). William Huggins, animal painter (1821–1844).

Landseer of Sculpture (The). Alfred Gatley (1816–1863).

Landwehr and Landsturm, 1805. Land defence and land assault levies. German militia, called into service in times of war. The most complete organisation was that of Prussia in 1813. The landwehr consists of men from 26 to 40; the landsturm of men from 40 to 60. The former is part of the regular army, the latter is enrolled for home work.

Napoleon restricted the Prussian army to 42,000 men; so as soon as 42,000 men were well disciplined a new batch was brought to drill, and in this way all the people were trained for war, and the restriction was evaded.

Lane (The). Drury Lane Theatre.

Whenever the Lane tried Shakespeare,
I was one of the leading men.
SIMS, Ballads of Babylon ('Forgotten' &c.).

L'ang, or Le-ang' Dynasty (The). The tenth Imperial dynasty of China. Like the eighth, ninth, and eleventh dynasties, it had dominion only over the south of China, the court being at Nanking. It gave four kings, and lasted 55 years (502–557).

Language of Canaan (The). Bible phrases learnt by rote by the gay ladies in the suite of Catharine de Medicis, to be used in talking with consistorials, or Catholic malcontents who had joined the Huguenots. See 'Consistorial Phrases.'

Languages, A.D. 1890. It is estimated that there are 3,064 languages in the world; and above 1,000 different religions, including what are called 'sects.' English is spoken by above 130 millions of the human race; German by 100 millions; Russian by 70 millions; French by 45 millions; Spanish by 40 millions; Italian by 30 millions; and Portuguese by 13 millions.

English is spoken by 4 million Canadians; 3,700,000 West Indians; 3 million Australians; 1 million East Indians; 33 millions in the British Isles, and 57 millions in America: besides Africa, Jamaica, &c.

German is spoken by 3 millions in the United States and Canada; 2 millions in Switzerland; 40,000 Belgians; 46 millions in the German empire, and 10 millions in the Austro-Hungarian empire.

French is spoken by 2½ million Belgians; 1 million in the United States and Canada; 1½ million in Algiers, India, and Africa; 600,000 Swiss; 600,000 in Hayti; 200,000 in Alsace-Lorraine; and 38 millions in France.

Langue d'oc and Langue d'oil. When the Romans reduced Gaul to a province, the native language became imbued with Latin, and this mixed language was called 'Romance.' When the Franks and Germans poured into Gaul they also corrupted the language, and this mixed language was called 'Germanised Romance' or 'Walloon.' As far the larger number of Franks and other Germans settled north of the Loire, Walloon prevailed in the north, and was hardly known in the south of France, where Romance continued to prevail. Now the Romance or southern word for yes is 'oc,' but the Walloon or northern word was 'oil'—(i.e. 'o-e' now oui (pronounce we); hence the Langue d'oc means that south of the Loire, and the Langue d'oil that used the the river. The Troubadours north of Langue d'oc, and the Trouvères the Langue d'oil.

Lansdowne Collection of MSS. (The), 1807. Purchased by government, and added to the library of the British Museum. It is divided into two parts: (a) 121 volumes of state papers and correspondence of William lord Burghley, during the reign of Queen Elizabeth; (b) 50 volumes of the papers and letters of Sir Julius Cæsar, judge of the admiralty and master of the rolls; the correspondence of Henry Cromwell, as chief governor of Ireland; and numerous other historical, genealogical, and topographical MSS. of great importance. Collected by the first marquis of Lansdowne.

Lantern of Demosthenes (4 syl.). A shrine built by Lysicrătēs, the chorāgos, over the tripod which he received as a musical prize. It stood in the 'Street of Tripods' (q.v.), in Athens.

Laodiceans (The). Those of no party; 'neither hot nor cold' in religious matters; the laisser-aller or indifferent (Rev. iii. 16).

The rest were housed by Mr. Nesbitt and the local Laodiceans.—E. LYNN LINTON, Under Which Lord, ch. xxi.

Lapsed (The). Those Christians who, to avoid persecution, made a compromise with the heathen governors. They are divided into 3 classes: (1) The SACRIFICATI, who sacrificed at heathen altars; (2) the THURIFICATI, who burnt incense to heathen gods; and (3) the LIBELLATICI, who produced a libellus or certificate from a heathen magistrate of having abjured the Christian faith.

The number of the lapsed was immense, especially in Alexandria.

Larder Silver. A payment of money in lieu of provisions by the tenant farmer (14th cent.).

Lars. The leader or over-king of the 12 confederate Etrurian states. The under-king was called lucumo. Thus the sultan would be a lars and the khedive a lucumo. Similarly, the German emperor is lars and the king of Bavaria a lucumo (q.v.).

Lascars. Native East Indian and Chinese sailors employed in European ships. Also camp-followers. There are gun-lascars in the British service at Hong-Kong.

Lass of Richmond Hill (The). Miss Jansen. The song is by Leonard M'Nally.

Last of the Barons (The). Richard Neville earl of Warwick, called 'the kingmaker' (1428–1471).

Last of the Fathers (The). St. Bernard of Clairvaux in Champagne (1091–1153). He was the great promoter of the second crusade, as Peter the Hermit was of the first.

Last of the Greeks (The). Philopœmen, so called by Plutarch (B.C. 252–183).

Last of the Romans (The). Caius Cassius. At the battle of Philippi, B.C. 42, Cassius was defeated by Antony, and was killed by his freedman Pindărus. When Brutus was told of the death of his friend, he exclaimed, 'There lies the last of the Romans.'

This was preposterous praise. If Cassius was a type of the Roman character, then may we say with the Druid, in Cowper's 'Boadicea,'

> Rome shall perish, write that word
> In the blood that she hath spilt;
> Perish, hateful, and abhorred,
> Deep in ruin as in guilt.

Last of the Romans (The). Boethius (470–524).

Gibbon (ch. xxxix.) says, 'Boethius was the last of the Romans whom Cicero would have acknowledged as his countryman.'

Last of the Tribunes (The). Cola di Rienzi (1313–1354).

Lord Lytton wrote a novel, in 1835, so entitled.

Last of the Troubadours (The). Jacques Jasmin of Gascony (1798–1864).

Last Poet of Rome (The). Juvenal, the satirist, died A.D. 128, aged 80.

His Tenth Satire Bishop Burnet calls 'a storehouse of moral virtues.'

Later Fathers (The Fifteen), 4th cent. See 'Greek Fathers,' and 'Latin Fathers.'

Lateran (The). The palace of Plautius Laterānus confiscated by the Emperor Constantine, and assigned for Christian uses. The church of St. John (Lateran) is styled 'the Mother and Head of all the churches in the city and the world'; and the first act of a new pope is to take possession thereof. From the portico, on certain days, the pope blesses the entire world. The Church has been the site of five general councils (see below), and till the popes returned from Avignon they resided in the Lateran palace; but in 1378 the Vatican was made the pope's residence. In the piazza of St. John Lateran stands the Scala Santa, or staircase up which it is said that Jesus passed to Pilate's judgment hall.

Lateran Councils (The). Five general councils have been held at the Lateran in Rome.

I. In 1123. This was the first general council of the Western Church. Under Calixtus II.

II. In 1139. To restore the union of the Eastern and Western Churches. Under Innocent II.

III. In 1179. To vest the election of popes in the cardinals. War against the Albigenses authorised. Under Nicholas III.

IV. In 1215. To sanction confession. The Albigenses condemned. Under Innocent III.

V. In 1511–1517, convoked by Julius II., and continued by Leo X. Acts of the Council of Pisa declared void. The concordat with France confirmed. Dangerous books forbidden.

Lathy'ros. Ptolemy VIII. king of Egypt was so called from a wen on his nose (B.C. 80–36).

It is said that the name of 'Cicero' was given to an ancestor of the great orator for the same reason.

Laticlavian. A Roman senator, so called from the broad purple stripe (clavus latus) which every senator was permitted to wear on his toga. Equestrian knights wore a band of two narrow stripes called clavus angustus.

Latin (The Pronunciation of). See 'Ramists.'

Latin (Professorship of). In the University of Cambridge, 1869, founded by the pupils of Dr. Kennedy. It was intended to call it the Kennedy Professorship, but the doctor gave 500*l.* towards the fund, on the condition that his name was not attached to the foundation. Salary 300*l.* a year.

Latin Church (The). The 'Western Church,' after its separation from the Greek Church.

Latin Cross (The). 'Crux immissa.' A cross with the lower limb considerably longer than the other three. See 'Cross.'

Latin Empire (The). The name given to that portion of the Byzantine empire which, in 1204, was seized by the crusaders, who made Constantinople their capital. It was overthrown by the Greeks in 1261.

Latin Fathers (The Five). These with the ten 'Greek Fathers' (q.v.) constitute the fifteen 'Later Fathers': viz. Lactantius, Hilary, Ambrose, Jerome, and Augustine (4th cent.).

Latin Ulysses (The). Bohemond prince of Antioch, the crusader (died 1111).

The Latin Ulysses, the artful and ambitious Bohemond, employed the arms of cunning and deceit.—GIBBON, 58.

Latin Union (The), 1873, consisting of France, Switzerland, Italy, Belgium, and Greece, compelled by law to coin, at a fixed legal weight and fineness, all gold and silver brought to them.

Latin War (The). The peasants' rebellion in Salzburg, in 1523; it was aimed against a very unpopular archbishop.

Latin War (The Great), B.C. 340–338, between the Romans and Latins. By this war all Latium was joined to Roman territory.

Latitudinarians, 1660–1670. Followers of Jeremy Taylor, who insisted that a good life was better than an orthodox faith, and that a broad-hearted toleration was the most likely means of producing Christian unity. Far from believing that salvation was limited to the Church of England, they inclined to admit the equality of all professing Christians, and that even the heathen might be saved. Hales, Chillingworth, Whichcote, Tillotson, and Burnet were Latitudinarians; so was Hoadly bishop of Bangor.

Latrocinium. So the fourth council of Ephesus held A.D. 449 was called. It was packed by Eu'tychês the heresiarch, and condemned Theodoret, one of the Christian fathers, while it declared in favour of Eutyches, who maintained that the human nature of Christ was absorbed in his divine nature.

Spelman calls the charta of Henry I. of England 'Latrocinium' (jus gladii). St. Dionysius calls the charter of Louis VII., in 1144, 'Latronis Redditio.'

Latter-day Saints (The), or 'Mormons.' They have apostles, prophets, pastors, teachers, and evangelists; they believe in the gift of tongues, prophecy, revelation, and visions, in healing and in the interpretation of tongues. They believe the Bible to be the Word of God so far as it is correctly rendered; they also believe the Book of Mormon to be the Word of God. They believe in the literal gathering-in of Israel and restoration of the ten tribes; that Zion will be built on the American continent; that Christ will reign personally upon the earth; and that the earth will be renewed and receive paradisaic glory.

Lauder (William). A literary impostor, who published, in 1751, false quotations from Masenius, a Jesuit of Cologne, Taubmann a German, Staphorstius a learned Dutchman, and others, to 'prove Milton a gross plagiarist.' Dr. Douglas demonstrated that the citations were incorrect, and that often several lines had been foisted in to make good the parallelisms. Lauder confessed the fact afterwards, in 1754. See 'Literary Forgeries.'

Laudian Professorship of Arabic, in Oxford University. Stipend 300*l.* a year. Founded by William Laud archbishop of Canterbury in 1636.

Lauds. One of the eight daily services of the Catholic Church, and first of the four lesser ones. At dawn. See 'Canonical Hours.'

Laughing Philosopher (The). Democritos (469–361) of Milêtus. He laughed at the follies of man, whereby they were for ever involving themselves in difficulties. He was the originator of the atomic theory, taught the theory of gravitation, and that the milky way is a cluster of stars.

Laurentian System (The). A series of highly metamorphosed rocks (older than the Cambrian) covering the whole country north of the St. Lawrence.

Law of Admonition (The), 1323, in Florence, by means of which the Ghibellines were excluded from the government.

Law of Germinal (The). 18 Germinal Year X (7 April, 1802). The first consul (in order to secure authority over Protestants) suggested that Protestant pastors should be salaried like the Catholic clergy. This was made law, and is known by the name of the Law of Germinal. See 'Decree of 8 Ventôse.'

Law of 22nd Prairial (The), 10 June, 1794. Couthon, the second day after the Feast of the Supreme Being, proposed that the Law of the Suspects should be extended, and that there should be four revolutionary tribunals instead of one. Whereupon Robespierre with autocratic authority declared 'The Law of Prairial is law'; and 17 June a batch of 54 at once were sentenced to death. The guillotine was then shifted from the Place de la Révolution to the south-east.

The Feast of the Supreme Being was 8 June, 1794; the Law of Prairial was passed 10 June; and Robespierre was guillotined 28 July (9 Thermidor, An. II.).

Law of the Clan Macduff (The). Immunity for homicide anciently enjoyed by those who could claim kindred with Macduff earl of Fife within the ninth degree. Macduff's cross stood on the boundary between Fife and Strathearn, above Newburgh, and any homicide of the clan who could reach this cross was safe. He had, however, to give as a deodand nine cows and a young cow-calf to the lord of the clan.

Law of the Eric (The), in Ireland, A.D. 164. Compounding for murder by a money fine. Spenser gives this example: Suppose a man commits murder and is prosecuted; the murderer shall pay a fine to the friends of the murdered person, and this recompense is called an 'Eriach' ('Views of the State of Ireland').

Laws of the XII. Tables (The), B.C. 451. A famous body of laws drawn up by twelve Roman patricians at the instigation of Terentius Harsa the tribune. The commissioners were called the 'Decemviri,' appointed for one year, and during that year all other magistrates were suspended. The two consuls (Appius Claudius and Titus Genucius) were at the head of the commission. The original number of tables was only ten, but two new tables (respecting marriage and religious rites) were added by the second Decemvirate, and the whole, being engraved on tables of brass, was hung up in the Comitium or upper part of the Forum.

Table I., lawsuits; II., theft; III., loans; IV., rights of the paterfamilias; V., rights of guardians; VI., about property; VII., trespasses and damages; VIII., laws regarding estates; IX., the people's rights; X., funeral rites. The two new laws were XI., religious duties; and XII., marriage. Each law was most briefly expressed: as, A debtor shall be dissected by his creditors; No one shall be interred or cremated within the city walls; and so on.

Law of the 40 Sous (The), Aug. 1793. Danton induced the committee called the Salut Public to decree that there should be held in Paris two meetings of sections every week, and that the poorer citizens should be paid 40 sous each day for attending them. This was a great spur to sansculottism and the extravagance of the Red Republican party.

Law of the Suspect (The), Aug. 1793. Introduced by Merlin of Douai, subsequently called Merlin Suspect. 'All are suspect (he says) who by their actions, words, or writings, have become so.' Chaumette, in his 'Municipal Placards and Proclamations,' says a 'Suspect' may be recognised in the streets and should be at once apprehended.

Law of the White Waterlotus (The). A brotherhood in China, associated at the close of the 18th cent. against the emperor Kea-King. It lasted eight years, and spread disaffection in Shan-tung and three adjoining provinces.

Kea-king reigned 1796-1820.

Law Terms (The). All the year except term-time is called 'vacation.' By canon law certain seasons are set apart as holy—viz. Advent, Lent, Pentecost, and Harvest—and these seasons were to be kept free from forensic litigations. The original term-times were: (1) Hilary, from 23 Jan. to 12 Feb.; (2) Easter, from Wednesday after Easter Day to Monday three weeks afterwards; (3) Trinity, beginning the Friday after Trinity Sunday and ending Wednesday fortnight; and (4) Michaelmas, which began 6 Nov. and ended the 28th of the same month. Since 1873 the law sessions have been:—

a. HILARY, beginning 11 Jan. and ending the Wednesday before Easter.

b. EASTER, beginning the Tuesday after Easter Week and ending the Friday before Whitsunday.

c. TRINITY, beginning the Tuesday after Whitsun Week and ending 8 Aug.

d. MICHAELMAS, beginning 2 Nov. and ending 21 Dec.

Laws (Manx) up to 1417 were called 'breast laws,' because the Druids objected to have their laws, customs, and traditions reduced to writing.

Something of this still exists in Freemasonry.

Laws of Blood, B.C. 618. So the laws of Draco the Athenian legislator were denominated, because the same penalty—that of death—was awarded to every offence. This is quite in accordance with the Jewish axiom, 'Whosoever shall keep the whole law, and yet offend in one point, he is guilty of all' (James ii. 10).

Laws of 1790-1791 (The), in Hungarian history, mean those laws which confirmed the independence of Hungary and recognised it as a state. They declared Hungary to be subject to no other country, to possess her own constitution, and secured the liberty of the Greek and Protestant Churches.

Lawless Court (The). An ancient court at Raley or Raleigh, in the parish of Rochford, held on the Wednesday next after Michaelmas Day. It is 'lawless' because held at an unlawful hour at the 'King's Head.' The court was held at night and without any artificial light. The records were kept with coal and not in ink. Everything was carried on in the feeblest possible whispers. Philemon Holland states that the court owes its customs to a conspiracy held at the 'King's Head,' in the dark, and of course with bated breath. (Camden; and Dodsworth MSS., Bodleian Library).

Lay Impropriators (of tithes) date from the dissolution of monasteries in the reign of Henry VIII., when church property was given to laymen. The laymen retained the tithes and glebe land in their own possession, and appointed a clergyman to do the clerical duties at a small stipend. The person who presents is termed the patron, and the clergyman who represents him is called a 'vicar' (vicarius).

Lay Titulars. Lay impropriators. (Scotch history.)

Laybach, in Austria (Congress of), from 17 Dec. 1820 to 6 May, 1821, of the crowned heads of Austria, Russia, and Prussia, for stamping out the revolutionary movements.

Lazaretto (A). A hospital for quarantine or for infectious diseases. This word is not derived from Lazarus the Bible beggar, but from the isle of St. Lazarus in Venice, where such an hospital was first built in 1484.

Lazarists, or 'Fathers of St. Lazarus,' 1624. Instituted by De Gondi; placed under the direction of Vincent de Paul in 1625, and confirmed by Urban VIII. in 1631. They were called Lazarists because their chief abode was the priory of St. Lazarus in Paris, given to Vincent de Paul by the canons regular of St. Victor. Also called 'Priests of the Mission.'

Lazarus (Knights of St.), 12th cent. A religious and military order of Knights Hospitallers. Confirmed by Pope Alexander IV. in 1255. United with the order of St. John in 1490. Their special office was the defence of lepers, and their title was derived from Lazarus the beggar. Abolished in France in the first revolution.

In Italy it was united to the order of St. Maurice by Gregory XII. in 1572; and in France it was united with the order of Our Lady of Mount Carmel in 1608.

Lazic War (The), 549-556. A contest of Rome and Persia on the Phasis. It was a profitless war, but Colchis and its dependencies were added to Justinian's empire, while Rome agreed to pay to Persia a small annual tribute. (PROCOPIUS, 'Persic.' ii. 15-30, and 'Gothic,' iv. 7-16.) This war is also called the 'Colchian War.'

Called Lazic from the Lazi, a tribe which still subsists.

Lazzaroni (pl. of Lazzarone). The mob of Naples, like the Sansculottes of Paris. They were proverbial for laziness, poverty, and indifference; very few had a home; they lounged on benches about the streets all day, and slept on them at night. Those who did not live by begging were messengers, fishers, street-vendors of melons and pumpkins; they held horses, carried burdens, and so on. Every year one was chosen as their chief, called Capo Lazzaro. Masaniello was Capo in 1647. In 1798, stimulated by Cardinal Ruffo, and headed by Michele Sforza, they long resisted the French General Championnet. The race is now well-nigh extinct, but at the beginning of the 19th cent. they numbered at least 60,000.

So called either from the beggar Lazarus, or because they dressed like the inmates of the hospice of St. Lazare.

Lazzi. Those born to labour, those of a servile condition who could not depart from their service without their lord's leave. An old Saxon term.

The nobility were Edhillings; the middle class Frillings or free-born men.

Leaden Age (The), 814–987. Between the death of Charlemagne and the accession of Hugues Capet [pron. You Cap'-pay]; is so called from its worthlessness. Also called the 'Iron Age' from its incessant civil wars; and the 'Dark Age' from its barrenness of learned men.

Leads of Venice (The). A prison under the leaden roof of the ducal palace of St. Mark for political prisoners. Their sufferings from the heat were excruciating.

Leagh Mogha, or Mogha's share. In the reign of Conn Keadcahagh (i.e. Conn of the hundred fights) Ireland was divided into two parts by a rampart and fosse from Dublin to Galway. The southern part was allotted to Mogha Nuod king of Munster, and the northern part, called Leagh Cuin or Conn, was ruled over by Conn of the hundred fights.

League (The), and 'Leaguers,' i.e. the Anti-Corn Law League and its advocates (1838–1846).

League (The), or 'Sainte Union,' 1576. A union of the high Catholic party in defence of the 'Holy Catholic Church' against the encroachments of the reformers. It proposed to itself three objects: to exterminate the Calvinists; to shut up Henri III. in a monastery; and to crown the Duc de Guise king of France. It was projected by the Cardinal de Lorraine, and was sanctioned fully by the pope and Philip II. of Spain.

They proposed first to exterminate the Huguenots, then the Protestants of Holland, then to invade England, then to overrun Germany.

League against Charles VIII., 31 March, 1495. Between the pope, the kaiser, Venice, the duke of Milan, and the king of Castile. This powerful combination, which sent into the field 40,000 men, was dashed to pieces by Charles VIII. in the battle of Fornovo. The allies lost 15,000 men; the French, by their own account, not above 200.

League of Argos (The), B.C. 421. Formed between Argos, Corinth, Elēa, Mantinēa, and Chalcidicē, immediately after the peace of Niccas. This league was meant to be a combination of Greek states against Athens and Sparta. Athens joined the league in 420.

League of Augsburg (The), 1687. A confederation of Holland, Germany, Spain, Sweden, and Savoy against France, to compel Louis XIV. to abide by the terms of the treaties of Westphalia and Nimeguen. By the former the balance of power in Europe was established, and Protestants were placed on the same platform as Catholics. By the latter the boundaries of France were settled, and the integrity of Holland assured. England joined the league in 1688.

Nimeguen, pronounce Neem-gen, with g hard.

League of Cambray (The), 10 Dec., 1508. Between the pope (Julius II.), the kaiser Maximilian I., Louis XII., and Ferdinand the Catholic (king of Aragon) against the republic of Venice. The idea was to parcel out the republic amongst the allies; but when Louis won the battle of Agnadello, and Venice fell into his hands, the pope, seeing that he had made a false move, broke from the league, and formed the Holy Alliance, the object of which was to dispossess Louis of every inch of land in the peninsula of Italy.

League of God's House (The), 1401. First of the three leagues of the canton of the Grisons to resist domestic tyranny.

The other two were the Grisons League, or Ligue Grise, formed in 1424; and the League of the Ten Jurisdictions, formed in 1436. All three were admitted into the Helvetic Confederation in 1798.

League of Malines (The), 1513. Between Leo X., England, Germany, and Spain against Louis XII. of France. After the 'Battle of the Spurs' (q.v.) Louis made a treaty of peace.

League of Marbach (The), 1376. Formed between Würtemberg, Baden, and seventeen towns. It was a dead set against the Suabian league (q.v.). In 1404 the league was joined by France and Poland, but in 1499 Würtemberg joined the Suabian league.

League of Poor Conrad (The). A peasants' rebellion in Würtemberg in 1514.

League of Ratisbon (The), 1524. By the Catholic Powers of Germany to oppose the progress of the Reformation.

League of Smalkald (The), or 'The Smalkaldic League,' 1530. An alliance of all the Protestants of Germany after the imperial decree at the Diet of Augsburg. By this league the Protestants bound themselves not to help the kaiser against the Turks, who threatened invasion unless he revoked the Augsburg decree. Charles V. had gone back to Spain, and appointed his brother Ferdinand regent of Germany. There was no escape, so the decree was withdrawn, and the Protestants were allowed full liberty of worship till the next imperial diet. This is called 'The Peace of Nürnberg.' The League was dissolved in 1547 by the victory of the imperial army at Mühlberg.

League of Virtue (The), called in German 'Der Tugend-Bund,' was organised by German students in 1813, and had for its object the total expulsion of the French from German soil. It was joined by students and professors, patriots and fanatics, and embodied the seething hatred of Germany for France.

League of the Armed Neutrality (The). Between Russia, Denmark, and Sweden, ratified 16 Dec., 1800.

The first convention for this league was held 9 July, 1780; the next was held 1 Aug., 1780. The States-General joined the League 24 Dec., 1780; the king of Prussia, 8 May, 1781; and the kaiser 9 Oct., 1781.

League of the Lombard Cities (The), or 'Ligue Lombarde,' 1167, formed to resist the German emperors. The league was successful against Frederick Barbarossa (1175–1183), and against Frederick II. in 1225; but in the 14th cent. most of the cities submitted either to the dukes of Milan or to Venice.

League of the Public Evil (The), or 'Ligue du Mal Public,' 1465. Applied to the 'League of the Public Good,' because the people for whose benefit that league was ostensibly formed were entirely ignored in the treaty.

League of the Public Good (The), 'Ligue du Bien Public,' 1465. A league of the high feudatories of France against Louis XI. In this league were the dukes of Brittany, Burgundy, Alençon, and Nemours, St. Pol, Armagnac; and at the head was Charles duke of Berry, the king's brother. A battle was fought at Montlhéry, and though the victory was indecisive, it was sufficient to bring about the treaty of Conflans (1465). In this treaty Ponthieu was given as a bribe to the Duke of Burgundy, of which he was deprived by the States-General; Alençon was confirmed in his duchy, but it was confiscated from him by the States-General; St. Pol was made Constable of France, but deposed by the same states, and suffered death on the scaffold; Charles was made duke of Normandy, but was obliged to flee, and died, it is said of poison, at Guienne.

League of the Rhine (The), or 'Rhinbund,' 15 Aug., 1658. Between France, the electors of Mentz, Trèves, and Cologne, the king of Sweden, &c., for the maintenance of the peace of Westphalia.

League of the 3 Cantons (The), 14th cent. The Swiss cantons of Schwyz, Uri, and Unterwalden. After the battle of Morgarten in 1315 the league was joined by Lucerne, Berne, and other Helvetic cantons.

League of the 7 Catholic Cantons of Switzerland (The), called the Sonderbund. Formed 1846, to resist the federal diet, which had determined on the expulsion of the Jesuits, the Liguorians, and other religious congregations. Dissolved in Nov. 1847.

League of the 10 Jurisdictions (The), 1436. The third league of the Grisons to secure independence.

The first league was the Cadëan, 1401, and the second was the Grisons League, 1424. All three were admitted into the Helvetic Confederation in 1798.

League of the 16 (The), or 'Conseil des Seize.' A Protestant league formed by Henri de Bourbon [Henri IV.] against the Catholic League or 'Holy Union' of the Guise party. Henri III., who hated the Guises, joined the League of the Sixteen. Ultimately Henri de Bourbon prevailed and the Duc de Mayenne concluded peace with him in January 1596.

Holy (Louis XII.) league.
Smalkaldic league. See 'League of Smalkald.'
Sonderbund (The).

Leagues of the Grisons (The), or 'Ligues Grises.' They were three in number, viz. The Cadæan League, formed in 1401; the Grisons League (Ligue Grise), formed in 1424; and the League of the Ten Jurisdictions, formed in 1436. All three were admitted into the Helvetic Confederation in 1798.

Leaguers (The). Adherents and partisans of the Anti-Corn-law league (q.v.).

Learned Painter (The). Charles Lebrun of Paris (1619–1690), noted for the great accuracy of his costumes. His masterpieces are the 'Five Battles of Alexander.'

Learning, says Giordano Bruno:—

First it stood in Egypt; then, under Zoroaster, in Persia; then among the Gymnosophists of India; then under Orpheus, among the Thrakians; fifthly, among the Greeks at the time of their Sages; then, under Archytas, Empedocles, and Lucretius, in Italy; and seventhly, in Germany. . . . Who is comparable to Albertus Magnus? Who can be likened to Nicolaus the Cusan—had not the priestly cowl hidden and hemmed his [Cusan's] genius, I would acknowledge his having been not similar to, but greater than, Pythagoras.

Learning (Father of English). So Burke called the Venerable Bede (672–735). He was the founder of mediæval history, and the first English historian.

Leather Apron (The). The tradition is that Kavah, an intrepid patriot, headed a rebellion against Zohak, a cruel and impious tyrant; and that he displayed his leather apron as a banner. The apron set with jewels was adopted as the national banner of Persia from that day, till it fell into the hands of Kudsiah. Historically the tale is of no more value than an incident from Homer's epics. It is recorded in the historic romance ('Shah Nameh') of Abul Casim Firdusi (950–1039). See 'Homer of Khorasan.'

Le Bas Prize (The). For an essay on English literature. For graduates of the University of Cambridge, of not more than three years' standing. Value annually about 60*l*. Founded by subscribers to the memorial of the Rev. Charles Webb Le Bas of Trinity College in 1848.

Lectisternium. A religious ceremony observed by the ancient Romans. It consisted of a sumptuous banquet offered to certain gods, in which the images or statues of the said gods were placed on tricliniary couches (lecti), and were bidden to 'eat, drink, and be merry.' Livy speaks of these feasts, xxii. 10, v. 3.

In the terrible plague at Rome A.D. 390–393, the gods were bribed by such a feast to abate the pest.

Leda Bible (The). The folio Bishops' Bible of 1572 and 1585. See 'Bible.'

Lee (General Charles), 1731–1782. Second in command under Washington. He lived and died in all the honours of patriotism; but in 1860 came to light his papers detailing his plan for betraying the American army to General Howe. These historic papers were kept perdu for eighty years among those of the secretary of Lord Clive, who took an important part in the negotiations which ended with the independence of the United States of America.

Lee-Penny (The). A talisman, still in possession of the Laird of Lee. Sir Simon Lockhart of Lee brought it to this country from the East, and left it to his heirs. It is said to cure murrain and hydrophobia. It is a stone of a dark colour and triangular shape, about ½ an inch each side, set in silver like a coin of Edward I. This coin is to be dipped in water, and the water given to the diseased cattle or persons to drink. The water is still applied for. See 'The Talisman,' by Sir W. Scott (Introduction).

Leg of Mutton Maniacs. The founders of 'Punch,' the periodical, who held their meetings at the 'Crown' tavern. So called from the frequency of a leg of mutton being served for their repast.

The 'maniacs' were Henry Mayhew, Horace Mayhew, Gilbert A'Beckett Albert Smith, John Leech, Kenny Meadows, Ebenezer Landells, George Smith, Frederick Tomlins, Charles Tomkyns, and Joseph Allan. See 'Notes and Queries,' 25 May, 1888, p. 401.

Legal Tender Act (The), United States, 1862, making Treasury notes a legal tender. Proposed by Thaddeus Stevens.

Legantine Constitutions (The). In English history, 1237, 1268. Ecclesiastical laws enacted by the Council of London, held under Cardinal Otho, legate of Gregory IX.; and Cardinal Othobon, legate of Clement IV. in the reign of Henry III.

Legem Pone, ready money. The portion of Psalm cxix. for 25 March is entitled 'Legem Pone' (v. 33), and as Lady Day is the great pay-day, the words got applied to payment or ready cash, pone lay down, legem the legal due. It is, no doubt, a very free translation, but we have several similar perversions or adaptations. For example, 'Stir-up Sunday' (the first two words of the collect appointed for 25th Trinity) and applied by schoolboys to the rapidly approaching Christmas holidays.

In this there is nothing to be abated. All their speech is legem pone (ready money, cash down).—MINSHULL, Essayes in Prison, p. 26.

Legion, or 'The Legion Memorial,' May 1701. A memorial signed LEGION, 'for we are many,' delivered by a poor woman to Harley, speaker of the Commons, to read to the House, and professing to be from 200,000 Englishmen, demanding justice and complaining of the Partition of Spain (q.v.), the ill-treatment of the king (William III.) and the Dutch by the House of Commons, and threatening vengeance unless the Commons behaved better. Of course the memorial was voted scandalous and seditious.

The memorial excited at first a panic in the House, but when LEGION did not appear . . . the House began to recover its senses, and it began to dawn upon them that they had been hoaxed by some clever wag. This wag was universally believed to be Daniel Defoe . . . author of 'Robinson Crusoe,' and one of the shrewdest political writers of the time . . . he must have luxuriated in the terror into which he had thrown the Commons.—HOWITT, Hist. of Eng. (William III., p. 155).

Legion of Honour (The), 19 May, 1802. An order of merit, whether military, literary, commercial, scientific, or benevolent, instituted by Bonaparte when first consul. It contained 15 cohorts, each of which had 7 grand officers, 20 commandants, 30 ordinary officers, and 350 legionaries (total 6512 members). The decoration was a star of 5 rays, white enamel, surrounded with oak and laurel branches. In the centre of the star was the figure of Napoleon Bonaparte. On one side was the legend Honneur et Patrie and the device was an eagle holding thunderbolts. It was suspended to a red-watered ribbon. Remodelled by Napoleon III. (22 Jan., 1853).

Badge for a Chevalier, a bow of red ribbon in the buttonhole of the coat, with medal attached.

Badge for an Officer, a rosette of red ribbon in the buttonhole of the coat, with medal attached.

Badge for a Commander, a collar-ribbon.

Badge for a Grand Officer, a broad ribbon under the waistcoat.

Badge for a Grand Cross, a broad ribbon with a star on the breast, and jewel cross pendant.

In the reign of Louis XVIII. the figure of Napoleon was changed for that of Henri IV., and the eagle for 3 fleurs-de-lis. In 1830 the 3 fleurs-de-lis were changed for 2 tricolour flags. In 1848 the original device was restored.

Napoleon III. instituted a lower order than a chevalier, called a Médaille Militaire, distinguished by a yellow ribbon.

Legislative Assembly (The), 1 Oct., 1791. 'L'Assemblée Législative.' This assembly, consisting of 745 members, followed the Constituent Assembly. It sat till 21 Sept., 1792. It was specially appointed to alter the laws of France in conformity with the new constitution. No member of the Constituent Assembly was allowed to be appointed a member of the Legislative Assembly. The Legislative Assembly was elected by the people.

The right was occupied by the monarchy men chiefly Feuillants (q.v.), officers of the army, and some National Guardsmen. The left by Girondists and Jacobins. The centre by middle men.

Leicester's Parliament, June 1265. When the Commons were first summoned by him to parliament. This was in the reign of Henry III. Edward I. restored the practice. See 'Parliament.'

Leinster Declaration (The), 1838. So called from the Duke of Leinster, at that time the only duke of Ireland. It was the declaration of a medium party between the Catholic Association and the Brunswick clubs (q.v.). The declaration set forth that the 'disqualifying laws' were productive of endless mischief, and were ruining Ireland; and it prayed the government without further delay to adopt such measures as would restore peace, and unite the strength of the British Empire.

Leinster Tribute. See 'Boromé.'

Leipzig Conference (The), 1519. Between Luther, Eck, and Carlstadt. This famous conference tended greatly to the promotion of the Reformation.

Leipzig Interim (The). A provisionary arrangement made at Leipzig, by order of Charles V., 22 Dec., 1548, between the Lutherans and the Roman Catholics, till the questions could be definitely settled by a general council. The ad interim compromise agreed to in this diet caused a split in the Protestant party.

Leix, Ireland, now called Queen's County, and its chief town Maryborough, in honour of Queen Mary. At the same time Offaley was called King's County, and its chief town Philipstown, in honour of her husband Philip of Spain.

Leman's Act, 1867. After the great panic of 1866, to prevent gambling in bank shares. Before this act bank shares were mere names of speculative stock, existing or non-existing, and 'bears' by depressing the stock endangered the credit of the bank.

Lemuria. The supposed submerged equatorial continent which once covered the Indian Ocean.

Lent. The 1st Friday is dedicated to the spear and nails.
The 2nd to the holy winding-sheet.
The 3rd to the five wounds.
The 4th to the precious blood.
The 5th to the seven dolours.
The 6th is Good Friday.

The crown of thorns' is the Friday after Quinquagesima.

Leonard's College (St.). See 'Andrews (University of St.).'

Leonidas of Hungary (The). Nicholas count Zriny. When Solyman the Magnificent laid siegé to Szigeth, and had taken the outer circle, Zriny, with 600 men, retired to the inner circle A mine was sprung and opened a gap in this rampart. Zriny and his 600 stood in the breach, and only two survived.

Leonine City (The). Leopŏlis in Rome (on the right bank of the Tiber), built by Leo IV. and named after him A.D. 852.

It is after this pope that Pope Joan is placed.

Leonine Verses, hexameter and pentameter. Verses which rhyme at the middle and end; invented by Leonine or Leon, a canon of the church of St. Victor, Paris, in middle of 12th cent.

His replicans clare tres causas explico, quare
More Leonino dicere metra sino.

Let me explain to you, therefore, that there are three reasons wherefore
Verses constructed like mine are to be called Leonine.

Leonists. A branch of the Waldenses in Leon. See 'Waldenses.'

Leopold I. Son of the kaiser-king Ferdinand III. of the house of Austria (1640, 1658–1705); generally called 'the Little Man in Red Stockings.' He also wore a red feather.

Leper Kings of England. Henry III and Henry IV. Leprosy was in the Angevin family. Queen Marguerite of Anjou died of the disease.

Robert Bruce of Scotland was also a leper.

Lesbian or Æolian Poets (The). Terpander, a native of Lesbos (B.C. 700–650); only a few fragments now remain of this poet. Alcæos of Lesbos (B.C. 624–570); only a few fragments of his odes remain, but Horace has rendered several of them into Latin verse. Arion of Lesbos (B.C. 640–600); no specimen of this poet is extant. Sappho of Lesbos (B.C. 620–570); a few fragments of her poetry remain.

Horace, Book i. Ode ix., 'Vides ut alta,' is a translation of an ode by Alcæos: so is Book i. Ode xiv., 'O navis.'—Book i. Ode xxvii., 'Natis in usum,' and Book i. Ode xxxvii., 'Nunc est bibendum,' are either translations or imitations, &c.

Called Æolian poets because they wrote in the Æolic dialect. The other Greek dialects were Doric, Ionic, and Attic. Homer is in the Ionic dialect, and the best tragedies are in Attic Greek.

'L'Etat c'est moi.' So said Louis XIV. when requested to convene the States-General. This is the rule of an autocrat, but the constitution of France acknowledged at least three estates up to 1789.

L'État de la Justice, 1558. A fourth estate introduced in the States

General by Henri II. It consisted of the chief magistracy of the country.

Letter of Attorney (A), or 'Power of Attorney.' A deed authorising the person named to act in your stead. Whatever is done by your legal substitute on your behalf has the same authority as if done by yourself personally.

Qui facit per alium facit per se.

Letter of Credit (A). An authority from one bank to another to credit the person named to a stated amount. In this case the person who gives the letter is responsible up to the amount stated in the letter.

Letter of Licence. An instrament executed by creditors whereby one who cannot pay his debts is permitted to carry on his business under surveillance, in the hope of obtaining thus a better dividend.

Letters (Father of). I. 'Père des Lettres,' François I. of France (1494, 1515–1547).

II. Lorenzo de' Medici the Magnificent (1448–1492).

Letters Conform. In Scotch law. A writ issued by the supreme court enforcing the judgment of an inferior one.

Letters Missive. An order from the lord chancellor to a peer to put in an appearance to a bill filed in chancery.

Letters Patent. A writing under the Great Seal, authorising the party named to do some act or enjoy some privilege, or create some office mentioned in the letter. Inventors by letters patent have a monopoly in their invention for a stated term of years.

Letters of Administration. The legal instrument granted by the Probate Court to a person appointed administrator to one who has died intestate.

Letters of Exculpation. In Scotch law. A warrant obtained by a prisoner to subpœna witnesses in his defence.

Letters of Ganganelli (Clement XIV.). Though spurious, these letters are certainly very interesting. They are said to have been the productions of Caraccioli; but Caraccioli died protesting to the last that he was only the translator of them. (Ganganelli was born 1705, became pope in 1769, and died 1774.) See 'Literary Forgeries,' &c.

Letters of Horning. Warrants for charging a person in Scotland to pay or perform certain debts and duties. Wharton says they were so called because these warrants were originally proclaimed by sound of horn.

Letters of Intercommuning. By an old law in England a man accused of any crime, who did not appear to take his trial, might be intercommuned or outlawed.

These letters ran thus: 'We command and charge all our lieges and subjects that none presume to reset, supply, or intercommune with any of the aforesaid, our rebels, nor furnish them with meat, drink, house, harbour, or victuals, nor any other thing useful or comfortable to them; nor have any intelligence with them by word, writing, message, or otherwise, under pain of being repute and esteemed art and part with them in the crime foresaid.'—LAING, iv. 77.

This was like the old Roman Aquæ et Ignis Interdictio.

Letters of Junius (The). Author unknown. In 1768 appeared No. 45 of the 'North Briton,' conducted by Wilkes, member for Aylesbury. In this number the king (George III.) was charged with uttering a deliberate lie in his speech from the throne, and a 'general warrant' was issued by the home secretary for the seizure of the author, printers, and publishers. Junius supported Wilkes, and maintained that general warrants—that is, warrants in which no names are specified—are illegal; and generally pleading 'the people's cause' against royal prerogatives and autocracy.

The letters began to appear in the 'Public Advertiser,' 21 Jan., 1769, and continued to 21 Jan., 1772. John Taylor ascribed the authorship to Sir Philip Francis in 1816, and in 1871 the handwriting was investigated by Cabot, who confirmed the suggestion.

Letters of Mark and Reprisal. Commissions granted to individuals to fit out privateers in time of war, and to seize the bodies and goods of antagonists. Abandoned by the great powers at the Congress of Paris in 1856.

'Letters of Percy Bysshe Shelley' (The). Published in 1852. These forgeries were exposed in the 'Athenæum' in the months of February, March, and April, 1852. See 'Literary Forgeries,' &c.

'Letters of Phal'aris (The),' 1718 Published at Oxford. Bentley proved the letters to be forgeries. Phalăris was tyrant of Agrigentum in Sicily. Overthrown by Telemachus B.C. 550, and died B.C. 549. He is well known by the story of the brazen bull. It is said that Perillos showed the tyrant a brazen bull meant for the torture of criminals. It was an oven in which victims might be roasted alive, and tubes were so constructed as to render bellowing noises to drown the shrieks of those enclosed. Phalaris ordered the inventor to be enclosed to test the truth of what he said. See 'Literary Forgeries.'

Letters of Request. A writ which commences a suit in the Court of Arches against a clergyman, instead of proceeding, in the first instance, in the Consistory Court.

Letters of Safe Conduct. A writ under the Great Seal guaranteeing safety to and fro to the person named in the letter. In war, an enemy can travel to and fro without fear of molestation under such defence; and persons charged with crimes cannot legally be detained so long as they act under such authority.

Letters of Uriah. Similar to the classic 'Letters of Bellerophon'—that is, a treacherous letter of friendship, but in reality a death-warrant.

'And it came to pass in the morning that David wrote a letter to Joab, and sent it by the hand of Uriah. And he wrote in the letter, saying: Set ye Uriah in the forefront of the hottest battle, and retire ye from him, that he may be smitten and die.'—2 Sam. xi. 14, 15.

However, sir, here is a guarantee; look at its contents: I do not again carry the letters of Uriah.—Sir W. Scott, Redgauntlet, ch. xvi.

Letters of the Sepulchre. Two codes made by Godfrey and the patriarchs of the court of Jerusalem: one respecting the rights and duties of burghers, and the other respecting the privileges of the nobles. These two codes were laid up in a coffer with the treasures of the church of the Holy Sepulchre.

Lettre de Cachet (Un). A sealed letter, in virtue of which the obnoxious person named therein might be arrested and sent either to prison or into exile, without trial, or even being informed of the nature of his offence. This infamous tyranny was abolished by the revolution.

St. Florentin, a governor of the Bastille, used to boast that he had received 50,000 lettres de cachet. As the fortress would not hold above 70 or 80 at a time, and few were ever released, the deeds of death must have been pretty quick and numerous within those walls.

Lettres Provinciales (Les), 1656–1657. The famous letters of Blaise Pascal against the Jesuits and in defence of the Jansenists, written under the assumed name of 'Louis de Montalte.' The whole title is 'Lettres de Louis de Montalte à un provincial de ses amis, et aux RR. PP. Jésuites.' In these letters Pascal lashes the loose morals of the Jesuits with wonderful humour, vigour, and enthusiasm. Though condemned at Rome, they are models of their kind.

There are eighteen complete letters; the nineteenth is a fragment, and the twentieth is by Lemaistre. The first three are in defence of Arnauld, who had attacked the Jesuits in a work entitled 'Moral Theology of the Jesuits'; but it is on the subsequent fifteen letters that the fame of Pascal rests. He charges the Jesuits with loose morals, mental reservation, simony, equivocation, and want of holiness.

Levellers. I. April 1649. A body of men that first appeared in Surrey, and went about pulling down park palings and levelling hedges, especially those on crown property. They gave out that ever since William the Conqueror landed the native English have been oppressed. Colonel Lilburne was lodged in prison for favouring the Levellers.

II. 1647. A political party which made terms with Cromwell in November, and demanded the king's death in the November following (1648). Their platform was the perfect equality of man and the abolition of all ranks and degrees. The French Quixotic conceit of 'liberty, equality, and fraternity' well expresses the levellers' charter. Levellers were first called Rationalists.

III. In Irish history, 1760, Levellers were agrarian rebels, afterwards called Whiteboys. They were called Levellers from their levelling the hedges of enclosed commons, and began their work in Tipperary. Subsequently they enlarged their programme, and set up for the general redress of agrarian grievances connected with the letting, buying, and selling of land, hiring and eviction, tithes and rates. See 'Irish Associations.'

'Leviathan.' Hobbes's great work is an ideal Commonwealth, called by him 'the Matter, Form, and Power of a Commonwealth, Ecclesiastical and Civil.' It fearlessly attacks early scripture authorities, and has always been one of the strongholds of sceptics. Hobbes considered the philosopher Locke a supporter of his principles.

Lex Æmilia Sumptuaria. A law by Marcus Æmilius Lepidus, consul B.C 78, limiting both the quantity and kind of foods to be used at banquets and other entertainments. See 'Lex Licinia.'

Lex Carolina, 1532. A law of the German Empire passed in the reign of Charles V., whence the name. It regulated the criminal procedure, and put an end to the arbitrary processes which had hitherto prevailed. It furthermore enjoined the publicity of debates and the publication of all judicial sentences.

Lex Fabia de Plagiariis. A law against literary 'thieves' or plagiarists. The punishment was either a fine or being sent to the mines.

Lex Hortensia ordained that market days (nundinæ) should in future be fasti or court days, that country people might get their lawsuits determined when they came to town for market.

Non-court days were called by the old Romans nefasti; i.e. not fasti or court days.

Lex Licinia Sumptuaria, B.C. 55. A sumptuary law forbidding more than 3 lbs. of fresh meat and 1 lb. of salt meat to be served up at table on any one day.

The Fannian law, B.C. 168, forbade that more than one fowl should be served at any one table, and that not a fattened one, quæ non altilis esset.—Gel. ii. 24. See 'Lex Æmilia,' &c.

Lex non Scripta. Common law in contradistinction to statute law. It may be written or printed, but does not derive its authority thus. The written document is a mere description or memorial of the customs which have prevailed.

Lex Oppia, B.C. 213. That no woman should wear more than half an ounce of gold, nor wear a dress of two colours, nor ride in a carriage within half a mile of any city or town.

Lex Papia Poppæa, A.D. 9. To promote population. It gave rewards to marriage and imposed penalties on celibacy. Those who had three children had several privileges. See 'Jus Trium,' &c. Those who were bachelors could not succeed to any inheritance except of their nearest relations, and even then a part was forfeit to the state.

Lex Porcia prohibited the scourging of a Roman citizen. Paul refers to this prohibition, Acts xxii. 25.

Lex Regia of Denmark, 1665. A law to fix the order of succession in the royal house.

Lex Talionis. The law of retaliation, as an eye for an eye, and a tooth for a tooth. See 'Vendetta,' 'Rimbecco.'

Lexington (The glorious Victory in the Battle of), 19 April, 1775. This was no battle, but a mere skirmish, in which the Americans had the advantage. Its sole importance is that it was the first fight between the colonists and the British soldiers. Governor Gage had sent a detachment of 800 men to destroy a depôt of stores and arms at Concord, about twenty miles from Boston in Massachusetts. The British reached Lexington at five in the morning, but were resisted there, and at one of the bridges near Concord by the American minutemen (q.v.). Some 20,000 Americans came rushing to resist, and the British had to retire with the loss of 60 killed and 136 wounded. The Americans had 30 killed and about as many more wounded.

Lia Fail (The) of Ireland. The 'Fatale Marmor' or 'Stone of Destiny.' So called from the tradition that wherever this stone was the people would be the dominant power. Hence the Latin distich:

Ni fallat fatum, Scoti, quocunque locatum
Invenient lapidem, regnare tenentur ibidem.

It was brought to Ireland by the Tuatha na Danaan (q.v.) and set up in Tara, the capital of Bregia. Upon this stone the ancient Irish kings were installed. Fergus, the leader of the Dalraidic colony (q.v.) in Argyllshire, brought it over with him to Albany (West Scotland), but Kenneth II., the conqueror of the Picts, removed it from Argyll to Scone in 840, and Scotland was then called 'the Kingdom of Scone.' In 1296 Edward I. carried it to London, where ever since it has been in Westminster Abbey. Over it is a rude chair on which our monarchs sit to be crowned.

According to Keating ('History of Ireland'), 'Lia' means a stone, and 'Fail' is for Falias, the city whence the stone was removed to Tara in Ireland. The tradition is that this stone is the very one that Jacob used for his pillow when he had the vision about the ladder.

The Fatale Marmor does not seem to be the same stone as the Lia Fail. The Lia Fail we are told was a pillar nine feet high; but the Fatale Marmor was a syenite (like Pompey's pillar at Alexandria), 20 inches long, 10 inches thick, and about 17 broad.

Libellatici. Those Christians who had a libellus or certificate from a heathen magistrate to show that they had complied with the emperor's order in sacrificing or offering incense to idols.

Libellus Pacis, 3rd cent. A certificate of peace given by some confessor to a lapsed Christian procuring readmission into Christian communion. The form was as follows. 'Let * * be received into church communion, with all those who belong to him.'

Liber Albus, 1419. The White Book of the city of London compiled by John Carpenter, town clerk of the city of London, and one of the four executors of the famous 'Dick Whittington.' It contains the various ordinances regulating the internal trade of the city, its laws and customs. The book was edited by H. T. Riley, and printed in 1859 ('Monumenta Gildhallæ Londoniensis').

Liber Censualis Angliæ. The 'Rate-book of England.' So Doomsday Book (q.v.) was sometimes called.

Liber de Wintonia. The Book of Winchester. Doomsday Book was so called because it was anciently preserved under three locks and keys in the royal treasury of that city.

Liber Niger Scaccarii (The). A roll of military tenants made in the reign of Henry II. of England. The tenants enrolled in this book held single knight's fees of the crown. See p. 95.

Books of magic and necromancy were called 'Libri Nigri,' 'Libri sacra nigredine colorati'; or rather, Books of the Black Art.

Liber Regis. So Doomsday Book (q.v.) was called. See 'King's Book.'

Liber Vitæ, of the Middle Ages, was the Martyrology.

Liber Viventium, of the Middle Ages, was the book in which the allowances or 'commons' of the monks were registered.

Liberal Union (The), 1887. An association of Unionists of all shades of 'Liberal opinion' for the dissemination of Unionist principles, i.e. against the separation of Ireland from England by giving to Ireland 'Home Rule.' From 1886 they acted with Lord Salisbury's Conservative government and broke away from Mr. Gladstone's party, which advocated 'Home Rule' (q.v.).

Liberator (The). I. Daniel O'Connell, also called 'The Agitator' (1775–1847). He began to take a leading part in promoting the claims of Roman Catholics in 1803. Daniel O'Connell with Sheil founded the New Catholic Association in 1823; set up the Repeal Association in 1840; and held monster meetings in 1843.

II. Giuseppe Garibaldi (1807–1882). The finest character for manly independence, self-renunciation, military resources, and civil administration combined that ever existed. He liberated Sicily and Naples; and did much to unify the thirteen Italian states under the one sway of Victor Emmanuel.

Liberator Clubs, 1828. Clubs established by Daniel O'Connell in every part of Ireland, in connection with the Catholic Association (q.v.). Each branch had its own organisation and internal management; and all the clubs were so knit together as to insure at any time a simultaneous movement.

Liberators, 1828. A faction established in Ireland by Daniel O'Connell to prevent the formation of secret societies, and to conciliate all Ireland in one brotherhood, having in view the two great objects, Catholic Emancipation and equal civil rights for all. The Liberators were bound to prevent riots and faction fights, to protect voters from the vengeance of their landlords, to promote exclusive dealings with 'friends of religious and civil liberty,' and to use every effort to promote in Ireland the exclusive use of Irish growth, breeding, and manufacture. The force of O'Connell was moral force only.

Libertés Gallicanes. The Gallic Church insists that there are two distinct powers, one spiritual and the other temporal; that infallibility does not reside in the pope but in the church or whole body episcopal; and that the judgments of general councils are authoritative. In 1682 Bossuet reduced the Libertés Gallicanes into the following items: (1) The church must be ruled by the canons; (2) the power of St. Peter and his successors is only spiritual; (3) the laws and constitution of the kingdom are independent of the church; (4) the decrees and judgments of the pope may be reformed. Hincmar, Gerson, Bossuet, the Abbé Fleury, Cardinal La Luzerne, Bausset, Frayssinous, Guillon, Boyer, Affre, and others were great sticklers for this liberty of the Gallic Church.

Libertines. I. Acts vi. 9. Jews manumitted by the Romans, to whom probably were added those, like Paul, who were admitted to the Roman franchise. These Jews and proselytes had a synagogue of their own.

II. 1525. A religious sect in the reformed church founded by Quintin, a tailor of Picardy, and a man named Copin. Their disciples were at liberty to be either Calvinists or Lutherans. Their chief tenets were (a) that whatever is done, God is the doer of it; and (b) that nothing is sinful but what you think to be so.

III. Of Florence were those who cared neither for a republican form of government, such as Savonarola wanted to establish; nor yet an oligarchy; nor yet for a tyranny in the hands of one of the Medici; but only for a laissez-aller government where every one might do as he liked.

These political quidnuncs had evidently graduated in the Abbey of Thélème, over the door of which institution was inscribed 'FAIS CE QUE VOULDRAS.'

Liberty (The Feast of), B.C. 479. An annual festival held on the site of the battle of Platæa, to commemorate the victory won over the Persians in that famous battle.

Liberty of December (The). The Feast of Fools, 28 Dec., in honour of the slaughtered Innocents of Bethlehem. Monks joined in the supreme foolery of this festival (Du Tilliot, 'Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire de la Fête des Fous).

Liberty Tree (The), 1765. A tree in Boston, Massachusetts, on which the Boston insurgents hung the effigy of Mr. Oliver, the newly-appointed stamp-distributor of the British government. The effigy was subsequently burnt in a bonfire. This was the commencement of the American revolt for independence.

'Trees of Liberty' (q.v.) were quite different affairs.

Libiti'na. The Roman goddess in whose temple was kept all the paraphernalia required for funerals; whence the word was used for funeral apparatus generally, and libitinārius in Latin means an undertaker.

Libitinæ Ratio. The register of deaths. The name of every one who died was recorded by the Romans in a register so called. See above.

Librarian of the Republic of Letters. John Albert Fabricius of Leipsic, who died 1736, aged 68. So called from his intimate acquaintance with books.

'Libri Symbolici Ecclesiæ Evangelicæ.' Books of faith and discipline were so called by the Lutherans. They consisted of the three Catholic creeds (viz. the Apostles', the Nicene, and the Athanasian), the Augsburg Confession, the Apology for that confession by Melanchthon, the Articles of Smalkald drawn up by Luther, Luther's Catechisms, and the Formula of Concord, called the Book of Torgau. See each of these in loco.

Lichfield House Compact (The), 1834. A caucus opposed to the government of Sir Robert Peel and the tories generally. Lord John Russell met his chief supporters at Lichfield House to initiate them into his Reform measures; and, after the fall of the Whig ministry on the resignation of Lord Grey, it is there that he laid down the tactics which the Whigs should adopt.

Lichtmesse, or 'Festum Candelæ,' The festival of a founder.

Licinian Rogations (The), B.C. 376. Three bills brought in by Licinius the tribune of the plebs, (1) authorising that the interest paid on loans should be deducted from the principal; (2) limiting the amount of public land held by any individual to 500 jugera (320 acres); and (3) ordaining that one of the two consuls should be a plebeian.

By public lands was meant the lands of conquered people taken possession of by the conquerors. Thus William the Conqueror parcelled the land of England into fiefs among his barons.

Lieutenant-General of France. A temporary dignity conferred on the Duc de Guise in 1558 and 1560; on Prince de Condé in 1563; on the Duc d'Anjou in 1567; on the Duc de Mayenne in 1589; on the Duc d'Orléans in 1643; on Comte d'Artois in April 1814; and on Louis Philippe in July 1830.

Light of Greece (The). Corinth is called by Cicero 'lumen totius Græciæ,' yet it is somewhat remarkable that Corinth has not produced one single author whose name has come down to our knowledge. Bœotia, proverbially dull and stupid, was the birthplace of Pindar.

Light of the World (The). Sieg-mund (q.v.), or Sigismund, kaiser-king of Germany (1368, 1410–1437), master of six languages.

Jocosely called Supra Grammaticam, because on one occasion when he had blundered in his Latin he replied, 'Ego sum Imperator Romanorum, et supra grammaticam.'

Light-armed Troops. The British cavalry is subdivided into light, heavy, and medium. The light-armed are the Hussars; the heavy-armed are the 4th and 5th Dragoon Guards, and the 1st and 2nd Dragoons; the medium include the Lancers, and the rest of the Dragoon Guards and Dragoons.

Lightfoot Scholarship. For history. One every year for undergraduates of the University of Cambridge. Value 45*l.* a year, tenable for 3 years. Founded by the Rev. Joseph Barber Lightfoot, D.D., Hulsean Professor of Divinity 1870.

Lightning or Thunderbolt (The). I. Stephen II. of Hungary (1100, 1114–1131). So called from his impetuosity.

II. Bajazet I. sultan of the Turks was surnamed 'Ilderim' (the Lightning) for his fiery impetuosity (1347, 1389–1403).

Light-shot. A kind of Church rate.

When the Danes were overthrown at Ethandune Alfred allowed them to settle in a part of England assigned to them, on condition of their paying tithes, Rome-shot (Peter's pence), Light-shot, and plough-alms (rent-charge).

Liguorists (The), or 'Liguorians, 1732. Disciples of Alphonso Maria de Liguori of Naples. His followers are called 'Redemptorists,' and his Institute is the 'Very Holy Redeemer.' The object of this foundation is to supply preachers and teachers in rural districts.

St. Alphonso Maria Liguori (1696-1787). His institution received the sanction of Benedict XIV. and Clement XII.

Ligurian Republic (The), 1797. Established by Napoleon Bonaparte. Genoa was the principal territory of that part of Italy called by the Romans 'Liguria.'

Ligyan, i.e. 'Ligurian.'

Lilacs and the Blues (The). Two rival parties in the court of François I. The lilacs were the partisans of Madame d'Etampes; the blues were the partisans of Diane de Poitiers. Madame d'Etampes was the mistress of the king; Diane de Poitiers was the mistress of the dauphin, Henri II. Madame d'Etampes, to throw a flimsy veil over her amours, was 'married' to Jean de Brosse; and Diane de Poitiers was the young widow of Louis de Brézé. Both king and dauphin had a wife living at the time. Madame d'Etampes was 9 years the younger. She died at the age of 67; her rival died at the age of 68.

Lilburne Agreement (The), 1 May, 1649. Lilburne's reformed programme of 'The Agreement of the People' (q.v.). (1) It protested against the convocation of parliaments only for six months every two years, the council ruling without restraint the other eighteen months; (2) it insisted on an annual parliament, with a committee during the recess; (3) no member to be eligible for re-election; (4) no officer to be eligible, the term of every officer's commission in the army to be limited; (5) the high court of justice and council of state to be abolished; (6) all proceedings in the law-courts to be in English only; (7) the fees of lawyers to be reduced; (8) excise and customs to be abolished; (9) the religion to be reformed; (10) tithes to be abolished, and (11) the stipend of every minister to be fixed at 150*l.* a year, to be raised by the parish rates.

What would Dissenters say now to No. 11?

Lily (Knights of the), 1048. A military order of Navarre, founded by Garcia.

Limerick (Treaty of), 3 Oct. 1691. Concluded with the Irish by General Ginkell, in the reign of William III. By this treaty the Catholics of Ireland were granted freedom of worship; allowed the use of arms; the possession of their estates; the right to sit in parliament to vote at elections, to practise law and medicine, and to engage in trade and commerce. Those of the Irish soldiery who preferred it were allowed to accept service under some friendly foreign power.

The alleged violation of the treaty by the government has been the subject of frequent and acrimonious controversy by Irish demagogues.

Limitation (The Statute of). Came into operation 1 Jan., 1879. By this act twelve years' possession is a bar to any action for the recovery of real estate, unless the plaintiff during those years was an infant, in which case eighteen years is a bar.

For all ordinary debts the limitation is six years. After which time they are 'statute run.'

Limited Liabilities. In 1862 was passed the 'Joint Stock Limited Companies Act,' which authorised any seven persons or more to incorporate themselves with a stated nominal capital to carry on their concern; but limited the liability of a shareholder to the nominal value of the number of shares held by him.

Limited Liability. 18, 19 Vict. c. 133 (1855). An Act of Parliament limiting the liability of subscribers to a joint-stock company to the number of shares awarded to them by the directors of the company. Before the passing of this act each shareholder was liable to an unlimited extent for all the debts of the company, whether they held few or many shares.

Lincoln. Impeachment of Dr. King bishop of Lincoln, for 'ritualistic practices,' by the Church Evangelical Society in 1889. The case was tried before the Archbishop of Canterbury, assisted by the Bishops of London, Oxford, Hereford, and Salisbury. The verdict was not given in Aug. 1890, when this article was passing through the press.

Lincoln College, Oxford, 1427. Founded by Richard Fleming, bishop of Lincoln. The head-master is called the rector.

Lincoln Green. Lincoln at one time dyed the best green in all England, Coventry the best blue, and Yorkshire the best greys. Kendal was also noted for its green.

Lindsey. The north-east part of Lincolnshire, forming an insular district, and including the wolds or chalk hills. The other two parts are called Holland and Kesteven (q.v.).

Lindisfarne MS. (The). Otherwise known as the Durham Book, now in the Cottonian collection in the British Museum. It contains the four Gospels, in Latin, with various prefatory matter by St. Jerome, and was written about the year 700 A.D., in the island of Lindisfarne, by Eadfrith, who was bishop from A.D. 698 to 721. It is remarkable for the beauty of the characters in which it is written, the unusual stoutness of the parchment, and for the coloured geometrical patterns which adorn four of its pages. Besides this it contains a gloss in the old Northumbrian dialect, written by a priest named Aldred, after A.D. 950. The Lindisfarne MS. has been printed (inaccurately) for the Surtees Society, also (partially) by Bouterwek, and (fully) by Professor Skeat for the Pitt Press.

Supplied by Professor Skeat.

Lines of Boulair (The), 1854, in Gallipoli. Entrenchments thrown up by the united French and English army, extending from the Gulf of Saros to the Sea of Marmora.

Lines of Torres Vedras, in Portugal, 1809–1810. Lines of defence within which Wellington took refuge in 1810, when he found it impossible to defend the frontier of Portugal against the French armies. From these lines he issued in 1811, and drove the French out of the peninsula. The first line extended from Alhandra to the mouth of the Sizandro, and was twenty-nine miles long. The second stretched from Quintella to the mouth of the St. Lorenza, and was twenty-four miles long. The third line, at the mouth of the Tagus, was very short, but the entire ground thus fortified was 500 square miles.

Lingerer (The). Quintus Fabius Maximus, who was sent against Hannibal, refused battle, and harassed the invader by cutting off his supplies, intercepting his communications, falling on foraging parties, and watching opportunities of minor attacks. Ennius says 'Unus homo nobis cunctando restituit rem,' and the well-known English equivalent is, 'Win, like Fabius, by delay.'

Lingua Franca. A medley of Italian, French, and Teutonic.

Lion (The). I. Heinrich duke of Bavaria and Saxony, son of Heinrich the Proud (1129–1195).

II. Louis VIII. of France, who was born under the sign Leo (1187, 1223–1226).

III. William of Scotland, who chose a red lion rampant for his cognizance (*, 1165–1214).

Alp Arslan, son of Togrul Bey, the Perso-Turkish monarch, was called The Valiant Lion (*, 1063–1072).

Arioch al Asser was the 'Lion king of Assyria' (B.C. 1927–1897).

Lion-hearted (The). Cœur-de-lion. Richard I. of England was so called (1157, 1189–1199).

It is said that a lyon was put to kynge Richarde, beying in prison . . . to devour him, and when the lyon was gapynge he put his arme in his mouth, and pulled the lyon by the harte so hard that he slewe the lyon; and therefore . . . he is called Richarde Cure de Lyon.—RASTALL, Chronicle (1532).

Lion Rouge (Le). Marshal Ney, famous for his large crop of red hair and red whiskers (1769–1815).

Lion Sermon (The). Preached in October at St. Katherine Cree, London, in memory of Sir John Gayor's deliverance from a lion 'in the deserts of Araby,' during the reign of James I. or Charles I.

This was above 250 years ago. At present there are no lions in Arabia. Sir John Gayor was a London merchant, travelling about Asia, &c. He bequeathed 200*l.* for the relief of the poor on condition that a commemorative sermon on his escape was preached at the time appointed. We are told that Sir John was on his knees in prayer when the lion came up, smelt about him, prowled round and round him, and then ran off.

Lion of Bohemia (The). A lion with two tails.

Lion of England (The). Napoleon said, 'Let us chase these leopards into the sea,' and Bertrand du Guesclin said that men 'devoyent bien honorer la noble Fleur-de-lis, plus qu'ils ne faisaient le félon léopard.' The English lion is what is called a lion léopardé. The leopard was the crest of the dukes of Normandy—as Honoré Caille du Fourni (or Fourny) says, 'le léopard ayant été pris par ces princes et seigneurs normands qui étaient souvent sortis hors mariage . . . pour représenter leur naissance par le léopard, bâtard du lion'; and, continues the great antiquary, both displayed alike 'leur naturelle générosité, dont l'un et l'autre de ces animaux est le symbole.'

Lion of God (The). I. Ali, the cousin and son-in-law of Mohammed 'the prophet' (born 602, kalif 656–660). He married Fatima, the prophet's daughter, and left two sons, Hassan and Hosein or Hussein.

II. Hamza. Gabriel told Mohammed that his uncle Hamza was registered in heaven as The Lion of God and his prophet.

Lion of Janina (The). Ali Pasha, overthrown by Ibrahim Pasha (1741, 1788–1822).

Lion of Justice (The). Henry I. (Beauclerc), 1068, 1100–1135. So called from his efforts to abolish rapine, and to subject all to the government of law.

After two dragons, the Lion of Justice shall come, at whose roaring the Gallic towers and island serpents shall tremble.—Merlin's Prophecies.

Lion of Lucerne (The). Hewn out of the living sandstone rock; is 28 feet long and 18 high. It was designed by Thorwaldsen, and stands outside the city walls. This gigantic lion is in commemoration of the Swiss guards who fell at Paris in 1792, while defending the Tuileries.

Lion of St. Mark (The). A winged lion over the entrance to the Arsenal of Venice. Between its fore-paws is a book, with the words Pax tibi Marce Evangelista meus. When Napoleon Bonaparte took possession of Venice in 1797 he changed the inscription over the arsenal to these words: 'The Rights of Man and of Citizenship.'

In 1797, when Venice fell to the French, Bonaparte removed this lion to Paris. It was restored in 1815, but was injured in the transit. It has been carefully repaired.

Lion of Sweden (The). John von Banier (Bannier, or Baner), a Swedish general who distinguished himself in the Thirty Years' War (1595–1641).

Lion of the North (The). Gustavus Adolphus king of Sweden (1594, 1611–1632).

Lion's Den (The). The castle of Dalkeith, about six miles from Edinburgh, where Morton resided when deprived of the regency. Morton was the old lion much dreaded by the people of Scotland, and though retired into private life, everyone thought he was merely lurking in his den, waiting for a favourable opportunity.

Sir Walter Scott says of Morton, 'his ambition could hardly be gratified with power, nor his avarice with money; and he united a degree of selfish profligacy with great pretensions of religion.'

Lions' Mouths (The), Venice. Under the arcade at the top of the Giant's Stairs (q.v.) are pillar boxes formed like gaping lions, into the mouths of which it was customary to deposit anonymous charges.

Lions in Europe. Shakespeare has been blamed for introducing a lion into Greece in his 'Midsummer Night's Dream,' but Buffon says there were lions in Thrace, Macedonia, and Thessaly, even in the days of Aristotle. Herodotus says, when Xerxes led his army through Pæonia lions came and devoured his camels.

Lions of Venice (The), 1684. The two marble lions which sentinel the gates of the Arsenal at Venice were trophies found in the Piræus when Athens was bombarded by Francesco Moroceno, the doge, surnamed 'Peloponnesiacus.'

The inscription runs thus: Franciscus Mauroc enus Peloponnesiacus expugnatis Athenis, marmorea leonum simulacra triumphali manu e Piræo direpta in patriam transtulit, futura Veneti Leonis quæ fuerant Minervæ Atticæ ornamenta.'

 In St. Mark's Square are two pillars of oriental granite, one surmounted with a statue of St. Theodore, and the other with the brazen lion of St. Mark. The brazen lion must not be confounded with the two marble lions before the arsenal.

Lions of the Punjab (The). The Sikhs or Singhs (i.e. lions); unrivalled in India for comeliness, courage, and the powers of endurance.

Lionne (La). Mdlle. Paulet, the lady whom Henri IV. (after he had called on Sully) was going to visit. It was in this visit that he was assassinated by Ravaillac.

Liquidated Damage. A certain fixed and ascertained sum, in contradistinction to a penalty which is both uncertain, dubious, and unascertained.

Lis (St.), or 'Liz,' is Simon Senlis, son of Landry de Senlis lord of Chantilly and Ermenonville. He was rewarded by the Conqueror with the earldom of Northampton, and the hand of Maud daughter of Judith and Waltheof.

Listerise. A verb derived from the name of Sir Joseph Lister of Edinburgh, and meaning 'to sterilise by antiseptics.' All instruments used in any surgical operation are bathed in a carbolised bath, and so are the fingers of the operator, in order to sterilise them—that is, to sterilise any germs of disease which may happen to be on them. This is done to prevent pyæmia or blood-poisoning. See 'Pasteurise.'

Somewhere between 1880 and 1886.

Lit de Justice (Le). On désignait ainsi les séances solennelles du roi (of France) au parlement. It originally meant the throne on which the king sat in these sessions. The first lit de justice was held in 1318 under Philippe le Long, and the last was held at Marseilles by Louis XVI. in 1788. In a lit de justice the king's word was enough to constitute a law, and insist on its being registered by the Paris parlement.

Any 'solemn séance' over which the king of France presided was loosely called a lit de justice.

Litany. A prayer of supplication, each petition of which is announced by the officiating priest and then taken up by the congregation. A 'liturgy' is a Common Prayer-book containing the Litany and many other prayers. The Litany of the Anglican Church is very similar to that of the Catholic ritual, omitting all invocations to saints and the Virgin Mary.

The first litany is ascribed to St. Mamert bishop of Vienne, 469.

Litany (The Greater), 'Litania Major,' was instituted in 590 by Gregory the Great. Also called 'Litania Septiformis.'

Litany (The Minor), 'Litania Minor.' The Gallic Litany is so called.

That part of the Anglican Litany which follows 'O Christ, hear us' is called the Lesser Litany.

Litany of the Blessed Virgin (The), or the Litany of Our Lady of Loretto. The prayers are, for the most part, addressed to the Virgin Mary. The Litany of Aquileia was sung at St. Mark's, 'in officio hebdomadæ majoris basilicæ S. Marci.' Both were specially sung on Saturdays, Saturday being peculiarly sacred to the Virgin Mary. This litany forms no part of the ordinary ritual of the Church.

Every Dominican friar was ordered to say daily after matins seven psalms and litanies of the Virgin.—LEA, History of the Inquisition, vol. i. p. 283

Litany of the Name of Jesus (The). One of the three litanies of the Catholic Church. It consists of prayers and addresses to Jesus under his several relations to men, with references to his sufferings. Date supposed to be the 15th cent.

The litany forms no part of the ordinary ritual of the Catholic Church.

Litany of the Saints (The). The most ancient of the three Catholic litanies, and the only one contained in the common service books of the church. It is used on Rogation days, in the ordination service, the consecration services, and so on.

The other two were 'The Litany of the name of Jesus' and the 'Litany of Our Lady of Loretto.'

Literary Club (The). From 1764 a certain number of literary friends used to meet together pretty constantly at the Turk's Head, Garrick being one of the party. On the death of Garrick in 1779, nine of the party formed themselves into a Literary Club. Dr. Johnson, Dr. Oliver Goldsmith, Dr. Robert Nugent, Sir Joshua Reynolds, Sir John Hawkins, Edmund Burke, Anthony Chamier, M.P., Topham Beauclerk, and Mr. Langton. In 1791 the number of members was increased to thirty-nine, and the club was transferred to the Thatched House, St. James's Street, and in 1845 it had amongst its members the Earl of Aberdeen, Lord Brougham, Bishop Copleston, Bishop Blomfield, Dr. Burney, &c.

Boswell and Gibbon belonged to the club, but were not of the original nine.

Literary Forgeries and Impostors.

Acts of Pilate (Acta Pilâti). 1. The account said to have been written by Pilate to the Emperor Tiberius about the character and miracles of Jesus. 2. An account full of slanders against Jesus, accusing Him of 'blasphemy.' Mentioned by 'Eusebius,' book ix. 5.

Neither of these acts can be depended on. Origen tells us there were numberless other acts 'fabricated by Christians.'—Against Celsus.

 Jean Hardouin, a French Jesuit (1696—1729), says that not only all the writings of the Christian Fathers, but nearly all the Greek and Latin classics, are monkish forgeries. Ad censuram Scriptorum veterum Prolegomena. This probably is a gross exaggeration, but no doubt the text was often interpolated in order to give colour to some religious dogma or tradition.

The 'Squire Letters' deceived Thomas Carlyle. The 'Shapira MSS.' deceived several very clever Egyptologists and other antiquaries. The 'Vrain Lucas Letters' deceived M. Michel Chasles, the eminent French mathematician. The 'Shelley Forgeries' deceived Robert Browning. The stupid 'Shakespearian Forgeries' of Henry Ireland deceived Dr. Parr the great scholar, Pye the Poet Laureate, and a host of others. The 'Surtees Ballad' deceived Sir Walter Scott. The 'Amber Witch' deceived the ripest scholars of Germany. The 'Inscription of the Phœnician Stone' deceived the learned Raoul Rochette, professor of archæology, Paris. The 'Christian Forgeries of Brahmanic Writings' imposed on Voltaire, &c. So that the verdict even of great scholars can in no wise be depended on.

However, some authentic writings have been pronounced spurious by scholars. Thus Henry Hallam, when he reviewed Payne Knight's book ('An Analytical Enquiry into the Principles of Taste') in the 'Edinburgh Review,' lashed most unmercifully some Greek verses inserted therein. But, alas for the critic, the verses were Pindar's! and the discovery was made too late to prevent the publication of the learned criticism.

Literature (Father of Modern French). Seyssel (1450–1520), author of 'The Singular History of Louis XII.' and 'The Great Monarchy of France.'

Lithography (Inventor of). Senefelder (1771–1832).

Lithuania. Unclassical Latin for a dependency of Poland, divided into Wilna and eight other palatinates.

Litteræ Humaniores. A phrase introduced in the renaissance period to signify the literature which mainly humanises the world, or, as Ovid says, 'Emollit mores nec sinit esse feros.'

Little Battle of Châlons (The), May 1274. On the return of Edward I.

from the Crusade the Count of Châlons requested the honour of breaking a lance with the crusader. Edward accepted the challenge; but, fearing treachery, he took with him 1,000 men. The count entered, accompanied with 2,000 men, and Edward saw at once he was in a trap. A furious fight ensued, in which the count's party was put to flight, and a large number of his men were left dead.

Little Captain (The). George II. He was at the battles of Oudenarde and Dettingen, and when he came to the throne delighted in a sort of military precision. He was also very fond of soldiers. It was the Jacobites who nicknamed him 'The Little Captain.'

Little Corporal (The). Napoleon Bonaparte (1769, emp. 1804–1814, died 1821).

Little Daughter of St. Mark (The). Brescia, which was the Venetians' stronghold in Lombardy. 'Histoire du Ch. Bayard,' xlviii.

Little Doomsday Book (The). See the lesser of the two volumes. It consists of 450 double pages of vellum, in single column, and contains the counties of Essex, Norfolk, Suffolk, part of Rutland, part of Lancashire, York, and Chester. It seems to be a transcript of the original rolls; and sets forth the number of horses, oxen, sheep, goats, and pigs in each manor, which details are left out in the great volume.

Little Douglas. Cousin of George Douglas, a lad of sixteen years of age, who (2 May, 1568), while the family were at supper, stole the keys of the castle where Queen Mary of Scotland was confined under the charge of Sir William Douglas. The lad let Mary and her attendant out of the tower when all the household had gone to bed, locked the gates to prevent pursuit, placed the queen and her waiting-woman in a skiff, and rowed them with muffled oars to the opposite shore, throwing the keys into the castle lake. Here Lord Seaton and a party of the Hamiltons were in waiting, who placed the queen on a swift horse, hurried off to Niddry in West Lothian, and next day to Hamilton.

Little Ease. I. A cell in Newgate into which prisoners were thrust who either could not or would not pay extra 'garnish,' i.e. entrance money.

There is the Little Ease, for common fees of the crown, rather dark, and the common sewer runs below it. Some gentlemen object to the company, chiefly padders [footpads] and nichers [skulkers, sneaks].—Sir W. Scott, Peveril of the Peak, chap. xxxiii.

II. A kind of cage, too small for the person confined therein to sit, stand, or lie in. It is in the Tower of London. I have seen a similar one in the Castle of Loches, in which Cardinal Balue was confined for ten years by Louis XI.

Little England beyond Wales. South Pembrokeshire, colonised by Flemings in the reign of Henry I. Welsh is not spoken in this district.

Little Gentleman in Black Velvet (The). The mole which threw up the hillock against which Sorrel, the horse of William III., stumbled, an accident which ultimately caused the king's death. This was a Jacobite toast in the reign of Queen Anne.

Little John. John Nailor was so called by antiphrasis, because he was above seven feet high. He was the chief of Robin Hood's band, and is said to have lived between 1160 and 1220.

Little Man in Red Stockings (The). Leopold I. kaiser-king of Germany, of the house of Austria, son of Ferdinand III. (1640, 1658–1705).

Little Parliament (The). From 14 July to 12 Dec., 1653, the same as the Barebone Parliament (q.v.). It consisted of 140 or (as some say) of 156 members, six being for Wales, six for Ireland, and five for Scotland, all selected by Cromwell's privy council. Three months before its expiry, which was fixed for 3 Sept., 1654, they were to nominate their successors; but the house was dissolved because its reforms were too rapid and radical even for Cromwell and his friends. See 'Parliament.'

Cromwell said: 'The Long Parliament brought their dissolution upon themselves by despotism: the Little Parliament by imbecility.'—Lingard, History of England, viii. 6.

Little Rome. Montague House, Southwark. The cloisters of St. Mary Overy fell to the Montagues at the Dissolution, and took the name of 'Montague Close.' Their house became the refuge of persecuted Catholics, and gained hence the name of Little Rome.

Liturgi, λειτουργοί. According to Papias, Christian ministers were so called. St. Basil says they were the deacons, but that priests and bishops were called λειτουργοὶ τοῦ Θεοῦ.

Liturgies, λειτουργίαι. The duties of the liturgi of Athens. These liturgi, λειτουργοί, were public officers selected from the most opulent citizens, who had to bear, at their own cost, the chief charges of public festivals, shows, and banquets. Every state elected 120. The expenses, B.C. 271, were transferred to the state.

Liturgies (The Six Oriental). All in the Syriac tongue.

1. The Liturgy of Jerusalem (q.v.).
2. „ of Antioch (q.v.).
3. „ of Alexandria (q.v.).
4. „ of Constantinople (q.v.).
5. The Armenian Liturgy (q.v.).
6. The Nestorian Liturgy (q.v.).

Liturgies (Western).

I. Of the Catholic Church.

1. The Roman, traditionally attributed to St. Peter. It received its final form from Gregory the Great.
2. The Milanese or Ambrosian, attributed to St. Ambrose.
3. The Gallican, supposed to have been derived from the Oriental Church.
4. The Spanish or Mozarabic, derived from the Greek liturgy by Isidore of Seville.

II. Of the English Protestant Church, the 'Book of Common Prayer.'

Liturgies of the Greek Church (The). The two chief are the liturgy of St. Chrysostom, said to be apostolic; and the liturgy of St. Basil, used on saints' days, Christmas Day, Epiphany, the four Sundays of Lent, and Good Friday.

Liturgy and 'Book of Common Prayer.'

The first compilation of a liturgy was by St. Basil in the 4th cent.

For many centuries each bishop had the right of arranging a liturgy for his own diocese.

The first liturgy of the Reformed Anglican Church was entitled 'The Godly and Pious Institution of a Christian Man.' It contained the Lord's Prayer, the Ten Commandments, several 'Godly Lessons,' and Prayers for the Dead.

1545. Appeared 'The King's Primer,' containing the Lord's Prayer, the Ave Maria, the Creed, the Ten Commandments, Graces, Matins, Seven Psalms, Collects, &c.

1548. The second year of Edward VI. was introduced 'The Order of Common Prayer,' drawn up by Cranmer archbishop of Canterbury, Goodrich bishop of Ely, Holbech bishop of Lincoln, Day bishop of Chichester, Skyp bishop of Hereford, Thirlby bishop of Westminster, Ridley then bishop of Rochester, May dean of St. Paul's, Taylor (afterwards bishop of Lincoln), Haynes master of Queens (Cambridge), Redman master of Trinity (Cambridge), Cox dean of Christ Church, and Robinson archdeacon of Leicester (thirteen altogether). This Prayer Book was based on the books called the Use of Sarum, the Use of Hereford, the Use of Bangor, the Use of York, and the Use of Lincoln, and is known as the FIRST BOOK of EDWARD VI.

1549. All Antiphonals, Missals, Grails, Processionals, Manuals, Primers, Cowchers, Journals or Diurnals, and Ordinals hitherto in use were abolished.

1552. The SECOND BOOK of EDWARD VI. was introduced, and ordered to be read in all churches of the kingdom. It contained the following additions:—The Exhortation, the Confession and Absolution, the Morning and Evening Services, the Communion Service, &c., and left out 'the Mixing of Water with the Wine and the Prayer of Oblation.'

The same year was published the Forty-two Articles (reduced in the reign of Elizabeth to thirty-nine).

1559. (1 Eliz.). The Second Book of Edward VI. (revised) was restored. The rubric against the real presence was omitted, prayers for the Queen and clergy were added, and the vestments forbidden in 1552 were restored (?).

1604. (1 James I.). Some few alterations were introduced, such as the Collects for Morning and Evening, and Intercession for the Royal Family in the Litany.

1662. After the Restoration were added the Prayer for all Sorts and Conditions of Men, the General Thanksgiving, the Prayers for Ember Weeks, for Burial Service, the Office of Baptism of those of Riper Years, and the last translation of the Bible was adopted in the Gospels and Epistles (the old version of the Psalms, however, was retained). The Collects for Easter Eve, the Sixth Sunday after Epiphany, and the Third Sunday in Advent were also inserted.

1837. Was introduced a Form of Prayer to be used June 20, the day of Queen Victoria's accession to the crown.

1859. The services for 5 Nov. [Gunpowder Plot], 30 Jan. [the execution of Charles I.], and 29 May [the restoration of Charles II.] were abolished.

Liturgy (The Ambrosian). A Catholic missal, popularly ascribed to St. Ambrose, and used in the diocese of Milan. It is much like the Roman liturgy (q.v.), but is especially interesting for its allusions to ancient Christian church customs.

Liturgy (The Armenian). Dates from the introduction of Christianity into Armenia under Gregory the Illuminator. It is derived, for the most part, from the Liturgy of St. Chrysostom (q.v.).

Liturgy (The Gallic). Of Oriental origin, probably introduced by the Greek colony which settled in Marseilles, &c it is not the missal now used in the French dioceses, which is the Roman missal, varied only in slight details.

Liturgy (The Gothic, or Mozarabic). Used in the chapel of Toledo, founded by Cardinal Ximenes. It is the old liturgy of the Gothic church of Spain, and is of Oriental origin.

Liturgy (The Nestorian). The Nestorians have three liturgies: (1) the Liturgy of the Apostles; (2) the Liturgy of Theodore of Mopsuestia; and (3) the Liturgy of Nestorius. The language of all is Syriac, and the three are merely parts of one liturgy used and adapted to different occasions.

Liturgy (The Roman). The oldest forms of this liturgy are to be found in the three sacramentaries of Leo, Gelasius, and Gregory the Great. The last of these is most conspicuous in the modern missal shaped by the Council of Trent (15th cent.). Revised under Pius V., again under Urban VIII., and a third time under Clement VIII.

Liturgy of Alexandria (The). Ascribed to St. Mark; but the existing liturgy has received numberless additions and alterations, and has been modified by both the great sects of the Alexandrine patriarchate.

Liturgy of Antioch (The). Exists in Syriac, but it is evidently a free translation of the 'Liturgy of Jerusalem' (q.v.).

Liturgy of Constantinople (The). On some occasions the Liturgy of St. Basil is used in the Church of Constantinople, and on other occasions the Liturgy of St. Chrysostom; but what is called the 'Liturgy of Constantinople' is the Slavonic Liturgy used in the Russian and Russo-Greek Church.

Liturgy of Ireland (The). Assimilated to the Catholic liturgy of England by the Council of Cashel in 1172. The reformed liturgy was introduced on Easter Day 1550.

Liturgy of Jerusalem (The), ascribed to St. James, is of uncertain origin, and it is not known whether it first appeared in the Syriac or Greek language. It is now known only in the Greek, and it closely resembles the text of St. Cyril of Jerusalem in his 'Mystagogical Lectures.'

Liturgy of Jesus Christ (The). One of the twelve liturgies of the ancient Coptic Christians, but not countenanced by the patriarchs.

Liturgy of Osmund (The). The Sarum Missal compiled by Osmund bishop of Salisbury, and adopted generally throughout England. It is in Latin, and our Book of Common Prayer is almost a translation of it.

Liturgy of St. Basil (The), i.e. Basil of Cæsarea. One of the liturgies of the Greek Church. It is the longest and holds pre-eminence in solemnity and antiquity. The Liturgy of St. Basil is used on the great festivals, such as Christmas Day, Epiphany, Lent, and Good Friday.

The other chief liturgy of the Greek Church is that of St. Chrysostom. The 'Liturgy of St. Basil' is also one of the twelve used by the ancient Coptic Christians.

Liturgy of St. Chrysostom (The). One of the three liturgies of the Greek Church. It bears the name of St. Chrysostom, but is of much later date. It is used on all days of the year except Christmas Day, Epiphany, Lent, and Good Friday, when St. Basil's Liturgy is used. See note above.

Liturgy of St. Cyriac (The). One of the twelve liturgies of the ancient Coptic Christians, but not countenanced by the patriarchs.

Liturgy of St. Cyril (The). One of the twelve liturgies used by the ancient Coptic Christians; but the only three sanctioned by the patriarchs are those of Basil, Cyril, and Gregory.

Liturgy of St. Epiphanius (The). One of the twelve liturgies of the ancient Coptic Christians, but not now countenanced by the patriarch.

Liturgy of St. Gregory (The). One of the three liturgies of the Coptic Christians countenanced by the patriarchs. The other two are the 'Liturgy of St. Basil' and the 'Liturgy of St. Cyril.'

Liturgy of St. James (The). One of the twelve liturgies of the ancient Coptic Christians.

Liturgy of St. John the Evangelist (The). One of the twelve liturgies of the ancient Coptic Christians, but not sanctioned by the patriarchs.

Liturgy of Theodore of Mopsuestia (The). One of the three Nestorian liturgies (q.v.).

Liturgy of the Anglican Church (The), 1548, in the reign of Edward VI. The Common Prayer Book, revised edition 1551. The introduction of it into Scotland caused a riot in Edinburgh 23 July, 1637; withdrawn 9 Sept., 1638. See 'Liturgy.'

Liturgy of the Apostles (The). One of the twelve liturgies of the ancient Coptic Christians, but not countenanced by the patriarchs. It is also one of the three Nestorian liturgies (q.v.).

Liturgy of the Fathers of the Council of Nice (The). One of the twelve liturgies of the ancient Coptic Christians, but not countenanced by the patriarchs.

Liturgy of the Nestorians (The). The Nestorians have three liturgies, viz. that of the Apostles, that of Theodore of Mopsuestia, and that of Nestorius. These, however, are combined into the Liturgy of the Nestorians and used on different occasions. They are all in Syriac.

Liturgy of the Patriarch Dioscorus (The). One of the twelve liturgies of the ancient Coptic Christians, but discountenanced by the patriarchs.

Liturgy of the Præsanctified (The), 7th or 8th cent. One of the three liturgies of the Greek Church. It is used on certain days in Lent. See 'Missa Præsanctificatorum.'

The other two liturgies are the 'Liturgy of St. Basil' and the 'Liturgy of St. Chrysostom.'

Livery (The Statute of). A statute to regulate and restrict the wearing of livery or the badge of the lord. In the 15th cent. these liveries became political badges—different factions being known by their livery. In 1377 the Commons petitioned against 'the giving of hats by way of livery for maintenance,' and it was forbidden by 1 Rich. II. In 1389 a royal ordinance forbade any servant to wear the lord's badge. In 1 Hen. IV. c. 7, A.D. 1399, it was enacted that only the king should give either sign or livery to a company. In 1401, 1406, 1411 concessions were made to the Prince of Wales, guilds, and fraternities. By 8 Hen. VI. c. 4, A.D. 1429, allowances were accorded to the lord mayors and sheriffs of London, the serjeant-at-law, and the two Universities. In 1408 the giving of liveries involved a penalty of 5*l.* a month; but 3 Car. I. c. 4 repeals all the Statutes of Livery.

Livy (The Greek). Flavius Josephus the historian (37–95) is so called by St. Jerome.

Livy (The Protestant). John Sleidan of Cologne, who wrote a history of the Reformation in Germany (1506–1556).

Livy (The Russian). Nicholas Michaelovitch Karamzin (1765–1826).

Livy of Portugal (The). João de Barros (1496–1570), author of 'Asia Portugueza.'

Livy of Spain (The).

I. Juan Mariana, a Jesuit, born at Talavēra (1537–1624). He wrote a 'History of Spain' in Latin, and a treatise entitled 'De Rege et Regis Institutione.'

II. J. Ginez de Sepulvēda (1490–1572), who wrote the 'History of Charles Quint,' the 'History of Felipe II.,' the 'History of the War in India,' &c.

Lloyd's, 1772. A set of rooms on the first floor of the Royal Exchange, London, frequented by merchants, shipowners, underwriters, &c., for the purpose of obtaining shipping intelligence and transacting marine insurances. Two enormous ledgers lie constantly open, one containing a list of vessels arrived, and the other a record of disasters at sea.

Lloyd's (Austrian), 1833. Founded in Trieste by Baron Bruck, to supply the want felt by maritime insurance companies of that port of a central administration to attend to their common interests. Their 'list' is called the 'Giornale del Lloyd Austriaco.'

Lloyd's List. Shipping intelligence published every afternoon at Lloyd's in the Royal Exchange, London. First published in 1716, and daily since 1800.

Lloyd's Register of British and Foreign Shipping. A volume published annually, and containing information respecting vessels—their age, their mate rials, their repairs, their owners, captains, and so on. This information is supplied by salaried agents at the different ports. The office of the 'Register' is quite distinct from Lloyd's rooms in the Royal Exchange.

Local Government Act (The), 1888. Prepared by Charles Thomson Ritchie, president of the Local Government Board, whereby London was constituted a separate county. The council hold office for three years, but the aldermen for six years (half to retire every third year). The County Council controls the borrowing of money, pays the county treasurer, and all the expenses of judges' lodging, assize courts, and county halls; licenses music and dancing halls, racecourses, lunatic asylums, reformatories, and industrial schools; has supreme power over bridges and roads, the appointment of coroners, &c. &c.

Local Taxation Bill, 1890. For increasing the duties on beer and spirits.

Lochlans, or Lochlanders (lakedwellers). So the Irish called the Danes who in 787 first invaded the island.

Locke King's Bill, 1859. See 'Qualification (Property).'

Loco-focos. Ultra-radicals in the United States of America. So called because in a grand meeting in Tammany Hall, New York, in 1834, the chairman left his seat, and the lights were put out under the hope of dispersing the disorderly assembly. But no: some of the radicals, expecting this movement, drew candles from their pockets, and lighted them by loco-focos (i.e. lucifer matches), and the hall being relighted, the business of the meeting went on.

'Loco-foco' is said to be from the Latin loco-foci, in lieu of fire.

Locus Pœnitentiæ. The time allowed in Scotch law for withdrawing from a bargain. Till the contract is finally settled either party may retract.

Lodbrog, i.e. 'Shaggy Breeches.' So Regner of Denmark was called, 'because, when he went forth to conquer an enormous serpent, he arrayed himself in lodbrogs.'

Spite of the terrors of a groaning world at the sound of 'Shaggy Breeches' name, his kingdom could hardly be called other than the harbouring-place of freebooters and pirates.—PRINCE, Parallel History, vol. i. p. 403.

Lodging-money. An allowance, in the British army, granted to officers and others for whom suitable quarters cannot be provided in the barracks. It is about 8*s.* a week.

Lodi (The House of). Founded in Delhi by Behlol Lodi in 1450. Ala-eddyn, last king of the 'government of the Seiads,' abdicated in favour of Lodi.

Lodovico Sforza, duke of Milan (1479–1500), called 'Il Moro' because he adopted the mulberry tree for his device. He prided himself on his prudence; and Pliny calls the mulberry the most prudent of all trees, because it waits till winter is well over before it puts forth its leaves.

Logos (The). According to the school of Alexandria the Logos was a being begotten by God, and intermediate between Deity and man. This primary Logos was the first-born (ὁ πρεσβύτερος υἱός) of Deity, and from this first-born proceeded a second Logos (λόγος προφορικός) which acted at the creation of the world.

Of course the Logos of the Fourth Gospel is not suited to this dictionary.

Logothete (A). A keeper of accounts in the Eastern empire. He put in order the despatches of the emperor, and was keeper of the seals. There was an ecclesiastical Logothete also, keeper of the seals of the patriarch. Even to the present day such an officer exists in the Greek Church. Nicephŏrus I. emperor of the East was 'Logothĕta,' when he assumed the purple in 802.

Loi Gombette (La), 502. The Burgundian Code, published at Lyons by Gundibald or Gombaud, the third king of Burgundy. It was based on the Theodosian Code (q.v.). In 519 a second part was published by Sigismund, son and successor of Gombaud. By this code one-third of the conquered land was left to the conquered people, and it accorded to the Romans the same rights as to the conquering people.

Loi Salique (La), 1340. The exclusion of women from the throne because they are unable to be the leaders of armies in battle.

Edward III. by a pun called the 'gabelle' or tax on salt, the Sal-ic law of France.

Loi des Suspects (La), 17 Sept., 1793. A law made by the Convention of France enabling the committees to seize and condemn anyone they suspected of being averse to the republican constitution, or whose death would be beneficial thereto.

Loi du Sacrilège, 20 April, 1825. Public profanation of the consecrated elements, which was made a capital offence.

Lola Montes (2 syl.). An Irish girl, native of Wexford, brought home from school to marry an old man whom she detested. She mentioned the circumstances to Captain James, who ran away with her and married her in India; but one morning Captain James eloped with the young wife of an old gentleman in whose house he and Mrs. James resided. Mrs. James returned to Europe, changed her name to Lola Montes, and went on the stage. Here Charles Louis king of Bavaria, an old man in his dotage, became captivated with her, took her for his mistress, and made her a countess of Lansfeldt in 1848. He abdicated the same year. Lola Montes went to the United States in 1859, and died in New York 17 Jan., 1861.

Lollard (Walter). Burnt to death at Cologne 1322. He was born in England, and was called the Morning Star of the Reformation in Germany. Lollard declaimed against the intercession of saints, the seven sacraments, the church ceremonies, and the evil lives of the clergy.

Wyclif lived 1324-1384; and John Huss 1376-1415.

Lollards. Religious reformers. The society was formed at Antwerp for ministering to the sick, in 1300. The name was probably taken from Walter Lollard the reformer, who was burnt at Cologne in 1322. In England the preachers were arrested by 5 Rich. II. c. 5 (1381), and the burning of them was enjoined by 2 Hen. IV. c. 15 (De hæretico comburendo). A party of them were executed by order of Henry V. in Jan. 1414. The statutes against Lollardism were repealed by 1 Edw. VI. c. 12 (1547). Wyclif was head of the Lollards in England (1324–1384) and was protected and supported by John of Gaunt.

Some derive the word from the Low German lollen, to sing slowly. Blunt, in his 'Reformation,' p. 81, derives it from lolium, a tare, and reminds us that Eusebius calls heretics tares.—Ecc. Hist. iv. c. 24, p. 137.

Lombard League (The). I. 1175-1183. A league formed by several of the petty republics of Lombardy, such as Milan, Pavia, Cremona, and so on, under the sanction of Pope Alexander III.), against Frederick Barbarossa. The league succeeded in driving Barbarossa out of Italy, and making him recognise the independence of the cities of Lombardy.

II. A second league was formed in 1225 against Kaiser Friedrich II. This league also was supported by the popes of the time being, and after many victories and defeats was at length successful in 1249. Milan was the chief power and strength in both these leagues.

The league defeated Barbarossa at Legnano in 1167. Friedrich II. defeated the league at Corte nuova in 1237.

London has several sobriquets, as 'The Little Village' (a lucus a non lucendo); 'the Modern Babylon'; 'the City of Masts.'

Aberdeen is the Granite City; Bath, the Queen of the West; Birmingham, the Midland Capital; Bradford is Worstedopolis; Brighton, the Queen of Watering Places, or London-super-Mer [mare]; Edinburgh, the Modern Athens; Liverpool, the Modern Tyre; Manchester, Cottonopolis; Worcester, the Faithful City.

London (Treaties of). I. 29 Oct., 1516. Between the kaiser elect and the kings of England and Spain.

II. 6 July, 1829. Between England, France, and Russia, regulating the government of the kingdom of Greece. This treaty really created the modern kingdom of Greece.

III. 22 April, 1834. Between England, France, Spain, and Portugal, for the pacification of the peninsula, expulsion of Don Carlos and Dom Miguel, &c.

IV. 15 July, 1840. Between England, France, Austria, Russia, Prussia, and Turkey, for the settlement of the dispute between the sultan and Mehemet Ali.

V. 8 May, 1852. Between Denmark and the five Great Powers, respecting the duchies of Schleswig and Holstein.

VI. 13 March, 1871. Between the five Great Powers, for the demeutralisation of the Black Sea.

London Adventurers, or 'South Virginia Company.' By the charter of James I. the London Adventurers were empowered to plant the east from the 34th to the 41st deg. This includes what we now call Maryland, Virginia, and the two Carolinas.

London Conference. 1st in 1826 &c. for the regulation of the affairs of Greece.

2nd in 1830 to arrange for the separation of Belgium and Holland. To this the Dutch withheld their assent till 21 May, 1833.

3rd in 1840 on the Turko-Egyptian question. France refused to join.

London County Council (The), 1889. London, having been erected into a separate county, has its County Council, which takes on itself the powers of the old Board of Works, and certain magisterial duties. To the County Council are consigned all questions relating to metropolitan improvements, the price to be paid for property bought or sold in the metropolis, and compensation to be given for injury during disturbances. Its magisterial work includes the three lunatic asylums; the Industrial School at Feltham; licences granted to music and dancing halls; appointment of coroners, public analysts, inspectors of weights and measures, &c., with all such miscellaneous work as relates to the Sessions House at Clerkenwell, the Guildhall at Westminster, the militia barracks at Dalston and Bethnal Green, three county bridges, and petty sessional courts. See 'Metropolitan Board of Works.'

London University. In the reign of Edward III., between the City and Westminster, and called the 'Third University.' Edward III. built and founded St. Stephen at Westminster for a divinity college; it was dissolved by Henry VIII. Archbishop Bradwardine founded a theological lecture in St. Paul's Church. John of Gaunt founded a divinity college in St. Paul's Churchyard. Sir John Fortescue tells us the Inns of Court were law colleges; and that there were ten called at the time inns of chancery, in each of which there were at least 100 students.

The present London University was incorporated by royal charter in 1836, and the building was opened in 1870 by Queen Victoria.

Long Brothers (The), i.e. 'tall,' viz. Dioscorus, Ammonius, Eusebius, and Euthymius (5th cent.). They were monks supposed to be tainted with Origenism (Robertson, 'Hist. of the Christian Church,' vol. ii. p. 106).

Long Knives (The Plot or Treachery of the). This was a treacherous conference to which Geoffrey of Monmouth tells us the chief Britons were invited by Hengist at Ambresbury; others say by Vortigern. Beside each Briton a Saxon was seated, armed with a long knife; and, at a given signal, each Saxon slew the Briton seated by his side. Geoffrey tells us the signal was the utterance of these words: Nemet oure Saxas, and that the number massacred was 460 (book vi. 15).

Of course Geoffrey's Chronicle is only Geoffrey's Chronicle.

Long Parliament (The). Met 3 Nov., 1640, and was dissolved by Cromwell, 20 April, 1653, but it was not legally dissolved till the Restoration in 1660. This parliament, therefore, existed all through the civil war, and all through the protectorate; but in 1659 only a fag end remained, which was called 'the Rump.' The Long Parliament voted the House of Lords to be useless, and passed a bill that even the king should be unable to dissolve or prorogue a parliament without the parliament's consent. See 'Parliaments.'

Long Parliament of France. The Permanent Committee, 1789.

Longbeard. William Fitz-Osbert, who assumed to be a Saxon, and was popularly called 'The Saviour of the People' and 'King of the Poor.' He was executed with great cruelty in 1196.

Long-haired Kings (The). The successors of Clodion are called in French history 'Les rois chevelures.' Clodion introduced this fashion into Gaul from Germany. See 'Hair.'

It will be remembered that Homer calls the magnates of the confederate Greek army 'the long-haired Greeks.'

Longiman'us. So Artaxerxes was called, because his right arm was longer than his left. His proper name was Bahăman; his regal name in Persia was Kai-Ardeshir.

Kai means mighty, 'Ard' flour, and 'Shir' milk. Bahaman was so called from an offering of flour and milk made to him in his cradle. Artaxerxes is 'Arta-Ksathra,' honoured king.

Lonsdale's Ninepins (Lord). The nine members sent to parliament to represent nine pocket boroughs in the extensive estates of Lord Lonsdale.

Looking-glass Drops (The). A celebrated poison found hidden on removing the wooden lining of a looking-glass which belonged to Lucrezia Borgia.

Loose-girt Boy (The). Julius Cæsar. (Supplied by A. Oldham.)

Lord Almoner's Professorship of Arabic. Founded 1724, in the University of Cambridge, by the lord almoner. Original stipend 50*l.* a year paid out of the Almonry bounty. The professor must give at least one lecture a year on Arabic history or literature.

Lord Chamberlain (The). The officer who has the management of the chambers; the sixth high officer of the crown. He has the government of the palace at Westminster; disposes of the sword of state in royal processions, and on such occasions sits on the sovereign's right hand. The black rod and yeoman usher are under him.

The Lord Chamberlain of the Household is quite another person. This officer has the direction of all matters pertaining to the chambers of the sovereign (except the queen's bed-chamber).

Lord Chancellor (The). The highest temporal lord, but his office is bound up with the ministry of the time being. He reads the royal speech for the prorogation of parliament and opening of parliament when the sovereign is not present, and stands on the right-hand side of the throne. He appoints all justices of the peace; is patron of all crown livings; is guardian of infants, idiots, and lunatics; and has a retiring pension of 5,000*l.* a year.

Lord Gawkey. Richard Grenville lord Temple (1711–1779).

Lord High Admiral (The). First appointed 1405.

Lord-Lieutenants of Counties, 1545. The first permanent lord-lieutenants were the Duke of Norfolk, for arming the counties of Essex, &c.; the Duke of Suffolk, for arming Surrey, Sussex, &c.; and Lord Russell, for arming Dorset, &c. The commissions sent to these nobles were to be acted upon, not pro re nata, but perpetually for keeping a due supply of militia in the several districts named in the commission. The main duty of lord-lieutenants is raising and organising the militia.

Prior to 1545 the three Lancastrian kings sent commissions occasionally to experienced nobles to put into military order their respective counties, and these noblemen were called 'The King's Lieutenants.'

Lord-Lyon (The). Lyon king-of-arms, Scotland, head of Lyon Court, the Scotch office of arms. His appointment is for life. The office of Lyon runs back into very remote times, but the officer was not called lord-lyon till 1663. One of his pursuivants is called Unicorn.

The lord-lion who brought her [the queen-regent's] message was requested to wait for an answer.—HOWITT, Hist. of Eng. vol. ii. p. 407.

* * As this was in 1559, it is an anachronism to called him lord-lion [lord-lyon].

Lord Mahon's Act, 1842 (5, 6 Vict. c. 45). Gives to an author and his assigns the copyright of his books during life and for seven years afterwards. Whether alive or dead, the author or his assigns has a right for forty-two years from the time of publication. If the author lives for forty-two years after publication, then his right continues during his life and seven years after his death. If he dies before the expiration of forty-two years, his assigns may claim a right for the residue of forty-two years or for seven years, whichever is the longer period.

A copy of the book must be sent gratuitously to five libraries: viz. that of the British Museum, the Public Library at Cambridge, the Bodleian Library at Oxford, the Library of the Faculty of Advocates at Edinburgh, and the Library of Trinity College, Dublin.

Lord Mayors. There are three lord mayors in the British Isles, viz. the mayors of London, York, and Dublin.

I. LONDON. At the time of the Conquest the chief magistrate of London was called port-reeve (i.e. governor of the harbour). He is called Geoffrey, port-reeve, in the charter granted by William to the city.

In Stephen's reign Gilbert Becket, father of the archbishop, was port-reeve of London.

In the reign of Henry II. the Norman term maire was introduced, Anglicised into mayor. The first mayor of London was Henry Fitz-Ailwin [son of Æthelwine]. He was a descendant of Æthelwine, cousin of King Edgar, and one of the hereditary aldermen.

Richard I. granted the citizens the right of electing their own mayor, 1189.

John granted them the right of electing a mayor annually.

Henry III. permitted the corporation to use a common seal.

In the reign of Richard II. the mayor of London took the rank of an earl.

The prefix of 'lord,' and the style of 'right honourable,' was granted by Edward III. in 1354.

Sir William Walworth (in the reign of Richard II.) was the first mayor who had an official seal (1381).

Sir John Norman (1458) was the first lord mayor who went in procession by water to be sworn in at Westminster, and then began the Lord Mayor's Show.

The original seal of the corporation had Thomas Becket on the reverse, and St. Paul on the obverse; but at the Reformation (1539) the reverse of the seal was changed for the present device, the obverse remaining as before.

II. York. York received its charter from Richard II., and the mayor was made a 'lord' in 1389. The ex officio title is 'the right honourable.'

III. Dublin. The mayor of Dublin first appointed 1409. Styled 'lord mayor' in 1665 by Charles II.

Lord Shaftesbury. Anthony Ashley Cooper, 1st earl Shaftesbury, Lord Chancellor of England (1621–1683). He began life an aristocrat; 1644 he went over to the parliamentary side, was commander-in-chief of their forces, and sat in the Barebone parliament; in 1654 he severed himself from Cromwell's party, joined the Remonstrants, and was arrested as a royalist, but acquitted; in 1660 he was one of the commissioners who sat on the trial of the regicides; in 1670 he was a member of the Cabal; in 1680 he presented the Duke of York as a popish recusant in the court of King's Bench, was imprisoned for treason in 1682, and died at Amsterdam in 1683.

> In friendship false, implacable in hate,
> Resolved to ruin or to rule the state,
> To compass this the triple bond he broke.
> Dryden, Absalom and Achitophel.

Lord of all under Heaven (The). The Emperor of China.

One and all come to pay their respects and offer their tribute to the 'Lord of all under Heaven.'—J. N. Jordan, Modern China ('Nineteenth Century,' July 1886, p. 49).

Lord of Ireland, 1177. John, son of Henry II. of England. On the death of Strongbow the government of Ireland was committed to William Fitz-Adelm, allied by blood to the king; but his administration was so bad that he was recalled, and Henry made his youngest and favourite son John 'lord of Ireland,' though only twelve years old at the time. The boy-governor was so insolent that he was recalled, and the government entrusted to De Lacy; but John retained the title of lord of Ireland to his death. Henry VIII., in 1541, raised Ireland from a lordship to a kingdom, styling himself 'King of England, France, and Ireland, Defender of the Faith.' The same style was adopted by his son Edward VI.

Lord of Misrule (The). Called by the Scotch 'The Master of Unreason,' and by the French 'L'abbé de Liesse.' A person elected to superintend the diversions of Christmas. Discontinued since 1641.

In the feast of Christmas there was in the king's house, wheresoever he lodged, a 'Lord of Misrule,' or 'Master of Merry Disports'; and the like had ye in the house of every nobleman of honour or good worship, were he spiritual or temporal. The Mayor of London and either of the sheriffs had their several Lords of Misrule, ever contending, without quarrel or offence, who should make the rarest pastime to delight the beholders. These lords, beginning the rule at Allhallows Eve, continued the same till the morrow after the Feast of Purification, commonly called Candlemas Day.—Stow.

Lord of Regality (A). A nobleman in Scotland who held a regality, or sort of palatinate, where he exercised all the rights of a sovereign. Abolished by 20 Geo. II. c. 50.

Lord of his Age (The), or Sahibi Kiran, Solyman I. the Magnificent, Ottoman sultan (1493, 1520–1566).

Lord of the Golden Foot. The boa or king of Burmah.

In 1826 the state carriage of the boa, which fell into the hands of the English, was valued at 12,500*l.*

Lord of the Manor (The). The owner of a manor having copyhold tenants.

Lord of the Taps. An officer at Stourbridge fair appointed to taste the ale in the booths. This officer was characteristically dressed in a crimson coat decorated with taps, and provided at the time for the occasion.

Lords Appellants (The), 1386. Partisans of the Duke of Gloucester, whose object was to dethrone Richard II. They appealed of high treason a large number of magnates who opposed their authority, and constituted themselves into a permanent council to set in order the kingdom and the royal household. In 1389 the king, who was twenty-two years of age, took on his own shoulders the government, and all the lords appellants, except Norfolk and Hereford, either died or were cut off. Norfolk and Hereford were banished in 1397.

Lords Justices of the Court of Appeal in Chancery (The). Appointed by Act 14, 15 Vict. c. 83 (1871).

Lords Lieutenant of Ireland. The first, appointed in 1361, was Lionel earl of Ulster. The second was Edmund earl of March, 1379. Richard II. was lord lieutenant in 1394, and again in 1399; Henry [VIII.], when duke of York, 1501; and Oliver Cromwell in 1640.

Lords Marchers (The). The knights and barons of the 140 lordships of Wales; the rest of Wales was subject to the English crown. These lordships were detached parcels which had been conquered by certain knights and barons, who ruled somewhat like county palatines, each having his own laws, his own courts, and his own judges. Henry VIII., in 1536, abolished this separate jurisdiction, and placed all Wales under the English crown.

Lords Ordainers, 1310, 1311. A standing committee of 7 bishops, 8 earls, and 13 barons (28 altogether), appointed in full parliament in the reign of Edward II. to reform the government and king's household. They presented to the king a list of what they called the 'Articles of Reform,' amongst which were these: Parliaments shall be held at least once a year; no war shall be declared without the consent of the Lords Ordainers; the king shall never leave the realm without the lords' consent; the choice of all the great officers of the crown and wardens of the casties shall be made by the Lords Ordainers; the selection of sheriffs shall be left to the Continual Council. The Earl of Lancaster (a grandson of Henry III.) and the Earls of Lincoln, Leicester, Salisbury, and Derby were on the committee. The king's infatuation for Piers Gaveston was the rock of offence.

Lords of Erection. Laymen of Scotland, to whom the church lands claimed at the Reformation by the crown were given.

These lords, who received a third part of the benefices, were nominally charged with the support of the poor, and were bound to provide competent stipends for the reformed clergy. When James VI. came to his majority the duties of these lords were abolished, and the lands were annexed to the crown. The Lords of Erection were also called 'Titulars of Tithes.'

As a Tulchan bishop was one who received only a part of his revenue, the rest going to the person who presented him, so these Scotch titulars were only Tulchan lords, sharing their lands with the crown.

Lords of the Articles (The). A kind of caucus begun in Scotland in the parliaments of 1868 and 1369. They were a kind of parliamentary grand jury who prepared and arranged in secret meetings what measures should be submitted to parliament and what should be abandoned. Suppressed in 1690.

In Scotland there was only one house for the three estates.

Lords of the Congregation (The), Dec. 1557. The leading Protestants of Scotland who pledged themselves to carry out the 'Solemn League and Covenant' (q.v.) even to the knife. The chief were the Earls of Glencairn, Argyll, and Morton, Lord Lorn, and Erskine of Dun. The reformers were called the 'Congregation.'

They agreed that all matters in debate between the government and Lords of the Congregation should be left to the consideration of the parliament [of Scotland].—Sir W. Scott, History of Scotland, xxiv.

Lords of the Justiciary. The judges of the court of justiciary, or criminal court of Scotland.

Lords of the Masso'rah (The). Learned Jews who decided what parts of the vast pile of annotations called the Massōrah (q.v.) should be accepted. They fixed by canon the verses, words, letters, and vowel-points of the Jewish scriptures. The scholia approved of by these rabbis were printed (along with the Hebrew text) in the year A.D. 1526.

There were two schools of Massoretic Lords from the 11th cent.; that of Tiberias and that of Babylon. The principal of the former was Aaron ben Asher and of the latter Jacob ben Naphthali.

 There were originally no vowels in Hebrew writings. As the Massorites introduced vowel-points, Hebrew vowels are called 'Massoretic points.'

Lost Tribes (The). The ten tribes which formed the kingdom of Israel.

The Rev. Dr. Joseph Wolff (1831) says they are in China.

The Rev. J. Samuels says they are in the regions of the Caspian Sea.

Dr. Grant says the Nestorians are the lost tribes.

Sir William Jones says they are the Afghans.

Mrs. Dixon thinks they are the Mexicans and Peruvians.

Dr. Claudius Buchanan thinks they are still where they were taken captive, i.e. in 'Halak, Habo, Hara, and Gozan, cities of the Medes.'

W. H. Poole, D.D., maintains that we of Great Britain and Ireland are the lost tribes.

And some think the North American Indians, and others that the Gipsies, are the lost tribes.

Lostic, or 'Loktek' (a cubit). So Vladislaus III. of Poland was called on account of his small stature (1260, 1296–1333).

Lotharingia, or Lorraine, was the country over which Lothaire reigned. It included the south of Holland, all Belgium, and the north-east corner of France up to the river Meuse. In 1044 this vast province was divided into Lower and Upper Lorraine, the former containing half Belgium, and the provinces of Brabant and Gelderland (in Holland); the rest forming Upper Lorraine.

Louis (Knights of St.), 1693. A French military order instituted by Louis XIV.

Louis I. le Débonnaire, emperor of the West and king of France (778, 814–840).

Father, Charlemagne; Mother, Hildegarde; Wives (1), Hermengarda, by whom he had three sons—Lothaire, Pepin, and Louis, to whom he gave parts of his empire; (2) Judith of Bavaria, the mother of Charles le Chauve. Contemporary with Egbert.

Louis I. was called le Pieux as well as le Débonnaire. He was the last surviving son of Charlemagne.

Louis II. le Bègue, king of France (846, 877–879); he was son of Charles II. le Chauve, grandson of Louis I. le Débonnaire, and great-grandson of Charlemagne. His sister Judith was the second wife of Ethelwulf, Anglo-Saxon king of England. Louis le Bègue had three sons, all of whom reigned, viz. LOUIS III., CARLOMAN, and CHARLES III. le Simple. Contemporary with Alfred the Great.

Louis III. (879–882). Son of Louis II. le Bègue (q.v.); his brother was joint king with him, and died 884. He was succeeded by Charles II. le Gros, who acted as regent during the minority of Charles III. le Simple, posthumous son of Louis II. le Bègue. Contemporary with Alfred the Great.

Louis IV. (d'Outremer) of France (921, 936–954). Son of Charles III. le Simple, who married a sister of Athelstan. On the dethronement of her husband, in 922, she fled to England with her infant son, and remained there fourteen years.

He was the fifth remove from Charlemagne. (1) Louis I. le Débonnaire, son of Charlemagne; (2) Charles II. le Chauve, son of Louis I.; (3) Louis II. le Bègue, son of Charles II.; (4) two brothers, Louis III. and Charles III. le Simple, sons of Louis II.; (5) Louis IV., son of Charles III.

Louis V. le Fainéant. Son of Lothaire, and grandson of Louis IV. d'Outremer (978, 986–987). The last of the Carlovingian kings.

Lothaire, son of Louis IV. d'Outremer, died 986, a little before his father.

Louis VI. le Gros, king of France (1078, 1108–1137).

Father, Philippe I. l'Amoureux; Mother, Bertha; Wives, (1) a sister of Hugues de Créçy, divorced; (2) Adelaïde daughter of Hubert count of Savoy. Contemporary with Henry I. and Stephen.

His eldest son Philippe died before his father, leaving his succession to Louis VII. his brother. This was from the stem of HUGUES Capet, who was succeeded regularly by (1) Robert, (2) Henri I., (3) Philippe I., (4) Louis VI., (5) Louis VII., (6) Philippe II. Auguste, (7) Louis VIII. All sons of the respective preceding king.

Louis VII. le Jeune (1137–1180). Not the young, but the impolitic or unready (i.e. unwise) son of Louis VI. (1) His leaving his kingdom to conduct an expedition to the Holy Land was puerile; (2) his divorcing Eléonore and giving up the two provinces of Poitou and Aquitaine was most impolitic; (3) his going to Palestine by land rather than by sea, contrary to the advice of his best counsellors, was most imprudent; (4) his wars with Henry II. of England were short-sighted, and he failed in every instance. Louis VII. was amiable enough, but 'what is mere good-nature but a fool'?

Father, Louis VI. le Gros; Mother, Adelaïde of Savoy; Wives, (1) Eléonore of Aquitaine, (2) Constance of Castile, (3) Alice, daughter of Thibaud comte de Champagne, mother of his successor. Contemporary with Stephen and Henry II.

Louis VIII. (le Lion) of France (1187, 1223–1226). So called because he chose a lion for his device.

Father, Philippe II. Auguste; Mother, Isabelle of Hainault; Wife, Blanche, daughter of Alfonso of Castile, niece of Richard Cœur de Lion. Contemporary with Henry III. See 'Louis VI.'

Louis IX. (Saint Louis) king of France (1215, 1226–1270).

Father, Louis VIII.; Mother, Blanche of Castile; Wife, Marguerite daughter of Comte de Provence. Contemporary with Henry III.

Before the Revolution the French Academy used to pronounce annually on 25 Aug. a panegyric on this king.

Louis X. (Le Hutin) of France (1289, 1314–1316). Called Hutin because he was sent by his father against the Hutins, a seditious set of people in Navarre and Lyons. Similar to Africanus, the name given to Scipio, &c.

Father, Philippe IV. le Bel; Mother, Jeanne of Navarre; Wives, (1) Marguerite of Burgundy, and (2) Clementia of Hungary. Contemporary with Edward II.

Louis IX. le Saint was followed by his son PHILIPPE III., whose son was PHILIPPE IV. le Bel, whose son was LOUIS X.; and Louis X. was the oldest of three brothers who succeeded each other. See 'Fatal Three.'

Louis XI. 'Louis Onze,' king of France (1423, 1461–1483). Sixth of the Valois branch.

Father, Charles VII.; Mother, Marie d'Anjou, daughter of Louis II. of Naples; Wives, (1) Margaret daughter of James I. of Scotland, who died broken-hearted, and (2) Charlotte of Savoy, mother of his successor Charles VIII. Contemporary with Edward IV.

His chief residences were Plessis-les-Tours, the Palais des Tournelles, and the Louvre.

Louis X. was succeeded by his brothers PHILIPPE V. and CHARLES IV.

PHILIPPE VI., first of the Valois branch, was the son of Charles de Valois (son of Philippe III. and brother of Philippe IV.).

From Philippe VI. came in regular succession JEAN le Bon, CHARLES V., CHARLES VI., CHARLES VII., and LOUIS XI.

'.' The maxim of Louis XI. was 'Qui ne sait pas dissimuler, ne sait pas régner.'

His physician was Coitier, who kept the king on tenter hooks of hope and fear, and received from him in five months 54,000 écus (7,000*l.*). The king once asked him how long he had to live. 'I cannot tell exactly (said the wily doctor), but an astrologer told me I should die a few weeks before your majesty.' From this moment Louis watched over the health of Coitier with the utmost concern, and submitted to all his humours.

The hermit he sent for was Francis of Paola, in Calabria, afterwards canonised. Louis would kneel before him in abject terror, imploring him to prolong his life even for a few days or hours.

His astrologer was Galletti Martivalle, a native of Narni in Italy. All his instruments were of gold or silver, and his dress was a rich robe of Genoa velvet.

His gossip was Tristan l'Ermite, generally called the 'provost Tristan,' and his barber was Olivier le Daln, born in Flanders.

Louis XII. le Père du Peuple, first of the Valois-Orléans branch of France (1462, 1498–1515). So called on account of his wise regulations for the administration of justice, and his prudent expenditure of the public money. One day when a courtier represented to him that his economical habits were called parsimonious, he replied, 'Far better my courtiers should laugh at my parsimony than that my people should mourn for my extravagance.'

Father, Charles duc d'Orléans, grandson of Charles V.; Mother, Bona daughter of Comte d'Armagnac; Wives, (1) Jeanne de France, daughter of Louis XI., divorced, (2) Anne de Bretagne, widow of Charles VIII., (3) Mary daughter of Henry VII. of England. His successor, François I., was the husband of his daughter Claude (by his second wife). Contemporary with Henry VII., VIII.

Charles duc d'Orléans and Jean comte d'Angoulême were sons of Louis duc d'Orléans. LOUIS XII. was the son of Charles the elder brother, and FRANÇOIS I. was the grandson of Jean the younger brother.

Louis XIII. le Juste, second of the Bourbon dynasty of France (1601, 1610–1643). Why he was called 'the Just' it would be difficult to say, as he was the mere tool of his ministers. First Concini domineered over him, then De Luynes, and then Richelieu. At last he gave up all show of royalty, and retired to Chantilly, where he spent his time in hunting, fowling, and falconry, with a little music and painting.

Father, Henri IV. Mother, Maria de' Medici; Wife, Anne of Austria. His successor, Louis XIV., was not born till after he had been married twenty-three years. Contemporary with James I. and Charles I. See 'Henri IV.' for pedigree.

It is said he was called le Juste because he was born under the zodiacal sign of Libra, the balance.

Louis XIV. le Grand Monarque, third of the Bourbon line, and grandson of Henri IV. (1638, 1643–1714).

Father, Louis XIII.; Mother, Anne of Austria—she had been married twenty-three years before her first child was born; Wives, (1) Maria-Luisa-Teresa of Austria, infanta of Spain, and (2) Mdme. de Maintenon [Françoise d'Aubigné, marquise de Maintenon], widow of Scarron the poet and cripple; Mistresses (1), Mdlle. de la Vallière [Louise-Françoise de la Baume le Blanc de la Vallière], 1644–1661, (2) Mdme. de Montespan [Athénaïs marquise de Montespan, daughter of Gabriel de Rochechouart, duc de Montemart], 1668–1687. She had several children, as the Duc de Maine, the Comte de Toulouse, &c. Contemporary with Charles I., Cromwell, Charles II., James II., William III., and Anne.

His wife, Maria-Luisa, was well-nigh imbecile, but was the mother of Louis the Dauphin, who died before his father, leaving a son named Louis (duke of Burgundy), the father of LOUIS XV.

La Vallière retired to a nunnery in 1674, and died in 1710. In her retirement she was called 'Sœur Louise de la Miséricorde.'

⁂ Louis XIV. was called 'the Great' on concluding the Peace of Nimeguen. Signed by Holland 10 Aug., 1678; by Spain 17 Sept., 1678; and by Germany 5 Feb., 1679. This treaty put an end to the European war against France. By this treaty Franche-Comté, and a part of Flanders, was added to France. This was the apogee of the fortunes of the grand monarque.

The princess palatine in her 'Correspondence' says: 'I have often seen the king [Louis XIV.] consume at one meal four full plates of various soups, a whole pheasant, a partridge, a large plate of salad, two large rashers of ham, mutton roast and pickled, a plate of pastry, and then fruit and hard-boiled eggs.'

Louis XV. le Bien Aimé, the fourth of the French Bourbon dynasty, great grandson of Louis XIV. (1710, 1715–1774). How such a sensual, heartless voluptuary, who boasted that the 'crazy old machine would last out his time, and he cared not what became of it afterwards,' could be well-beloved, is past understanding.

Father, Louis the little dauphin, son of Louis the great dauphin, and grandson of Louis XIV.; Mother, Adelaïde; Wives, (1) the Infanta of Spain, arranged but broken off, (2) Maria-Charlotte Leczinska; Mistresses, (1) Mdme. de Mailly, (2) the Countess de Vintimille her sister, (3) the Duchess of Lauragais, another sister, (4) Mdme. de la Tournelle duchesse de Châteauroux, another sister, (5) Mdme. de Pompadour, and (6) Mdme Dubarry. Regent, Philippe duc d'Orléans. Contemporary with George I., II., III.; Daughters, he nicknamed his three daughters Loque, Chiffe, and Graille.

Louis XIV. died 1715; his son Louis, the great dauphin, died before his father, 1711; and the son of the dauphin, called Louis the little dauphin (duc de Bourgogne), died 1712, before his grandfather, leaving a son, LOUIS XV.

Again: Louis XV. died 1774; his son Louis the dauphin died before his father, 1768, leaving three sons, all of whom were crowned, viz. LOUIS XVI., LOUIS XVIII., and CHARLES X. See 'Fatal Three.'

Louis XVII. son of Louis XVI. outlived his father, but was never crowned. Like Napoleon II. he was vox et præterea nihil in kingship.

Louis XVI. was guillotined 21 Jan., 1793. Charles I. was executed 30 Jan., 1649. It is somewhat strange—

1. That Louis XVI. and Charles I. both contain eight letters.

2. That the sum of 21 + 1793 = the sums of 30 + 1649 (day of the month and fatal year).

3. That the month in each case was January.

Father, Louis the dauphin, and grandson of Louis XV.; Mother, Marie-Josephe of Saxony; Wife, Marie-Antoinette archduchess of Austria, guillotined 1793. Contemporary with George III.

His son Louis XVII. never reigned. Three brothers succeeded to the crown, LOUIS XVI., LOUIS XVIII., and CHARLES X. See 'Fatal Three.'

⁂ Louis XVI. was called 'Louis the Last' by the red republicans of France; but they were no true prophets.

Louis XVI. (son of sixty kings). He died Monday, 21 Jan., 1793, aged 30 yrs. 4 m. 28 d. His executioner was Samson. Six men were employed to seize the struggling king and bind him to the plank. His dress was a puce coat, grey breeches, and white stockings. When his coat was pulled off it disclosed a sleeved waistcoat of white flannel.

The whitesmith that instructed Louis XVI. in lockmaking, &c. was François Gamain of Versailles. It is said that the artisan often scolded the king roundly for his work. When Louis was a prisoner, this Gamain traitorously told the Convention committee of an iron press which he and the king had made and inserted in a wall of the royal chamber of the Tuileries. When this press was examined it was found to contain damnatory correspondence from Talleyrand, Mirabeau, and others. Gamain asserted that Louis tried to poison him, and the committee granted him a pension of 1,200 francs (about 48*l.*).

His father confessor, while he was a prisoner in the Temple, was the Abbé Edgeworth de Firmont, of Irish extraction.

His valet was Cléry.

Place of execution the Place de la Révolution, once called the Place de Louis-Quinze.

The brutal delegates who conveyed him to the guillotine were Jacques Leroux and Gorbeau.

Louis XVII., son of Louis XVI. and Marie-Antoinette. According to a tradition, the prince was rescued by the Chevalier de l'Œillet, and a half-witted lad (both deaf and dumb, a relative of Mdme. Richard the gaoler's wife) was substituted in his place. The lad was of a similar age and stature to the dauphin, and sufficiently like him not to excite suspicion. The bribe for this substitution was 300,000 francs (12,000*l.*). It is said that the young prince made his escape in an English cutter, and married Ida Caraccioli.

William Pitt did not think the tradition of the 'Lost Prince' a mere romance; and the Allied Powers, when framing the Treaty of 1814, allowed for the possibility of the prince's appearance. Charette, Pichegru (2 syl.), and George Cadoudal all firmly asserted that he escaped from the Temple, and numerous proclamations refer to it. In 1812 a document was signed in which Louis XVIII. calls himself regent, not king of France. Certainly the document signed Drs. Pelletan, Dumangin, and Lassus is most unsatisfactory. It runs thus: 'We proceeded to examine the corpse of a youth shown to us by the Commission, and stated by them to be the son of Louis Capet.' This document is preserved in the Imperial Library of Paris.

 The general tale is much more sad. It is this: The young prince, only eight years old, was sent by the Convention to be brought up by a vulgar brute named Simon, a cobbler, who stripped him of his suit of mourning, and dressed him like a pauper in coarse jacket and red cap, forced him to drink intoxicating liquors, and repeat revolutionary ballads. In a few months the delicate boy became half-consumptive and half-idiot. January, 1794, the wretch locked him in an upper room, and here, without fire, without candle, and well-nigh without food, he lingered till June, 1795, when he died.

Louis XVIII. le Désiré, sixth of the French Bourbon kings, brother of Louis XVI. and of Charles X. It is absurd to call him Le Désiré, seeing he was thrust on the nation by the allies, and was never 'the desired' of the people (1755, 1814–1824).

Father, Louis the Dauphin, and grandson of Louis XV.; Mother, Marie Josephe of Saxony; Wife, Marie-Josephine of Savoy; no issue. Called Monsieur and the Comte de Provence till 1795; in exile he went as le Comte Delille. In England he lived at Hartwell, a seat of the Duke of Buckingham, where his wife died. Contemporary with George III., IV.

The Bourbons: (1) Henri IV.; (2) Louis XIII.; (3) Louis XIV.; (4) Louis XV., great-grandson of Louis XIV.; (5) Louis XVI., grandson of Louis XV.; Louis XVIII., brother of Louis XVI.

 Louis XVII. and Napoleon II. were regal fictions, so called simply because they outlived their respective fathers. Similarly the date of the reign of Charles II. is absurdly thrown back to the death of Charles I., ignoring the Cromwellian interim, and implying a legal right of succession; but in England the succession has been most irregular, and depends on the parliament. Thus William I., William II., Henry I., Stephen, Henry IV. V. VI., Richard III., Henry VII., William III., &c., had not the slightest legal right to the throne of England, and their invalidity invalidates the entire succession. The whole right is sufferance or parliamentary sanction.

Louis-Philippe. Citizen-king of the French (born 1773, reigned 1830–1848, died 1850).

Father, Louis-Philippe, Mons. Égalité [Duc d'Orléans]; Mother, Adelaïde de Bourbon-Penthièvre; Wife, Marie-Amélie, niece of Marie-Antoinette. Assumed names: 1793, M. Chabaud Latour, under which name he was a teacher in M. Jost's school in Switzerland; in 1794 M. Corby; in 1795 Herr Müller, under which name he travelled in the north of Europe; 1848 Mr. William Smith, under which name his passport to England was made out at Honfleur; but he and his wife fled from Paris under the name of M. and Mdme. Lebrun.

Louis XIII. had for sons Louis XIV. and Philippe de France duc d Orléans. Philippe's son was Philippe the Regent, the Regent's son was Louis, whose son was Louis-Philippe. Louis-Philippe's son was Philippe Egalité, and Egalité's son was King Louis-Philippe.

Louis de Male, Louis II. of Flanders. So called from Male, Marle, or Malain, in France, where he delighted to dwell. He succeeded his father in 1346, and died 1384.

Louis the German. See Ludwig, &c.

Louisiana (U.S. America). So called by M. de la Sale in 1682, in honour of Louis XIV. In the minority of Louis XV. it was given to the Compagnie du Mississippi. The inhabitants are nicknamed Creoles.

Louisville, a city of Kentucky, in the United States of North America, on the Falls of Ohio. It was named, in 1780, in honour of Louis XVI. of France, whose troops were at the time assisting the Americans in the War of Independence.

Loup-Garou, a lyc'anthrope. A sort of hypochondriac who fancies himself to be a wolf, and under this impression goes about howling and attacking children. This mania occurred in Germany in the early part of the 17th cent.

The celebrated Nicolle tells us of a convent where all the nuns fancied they were cats, and at a certain hour every day ran about mewing and caterwauling. It was cured by threatening to quarter a regiment of soldiers in the nunnery. Nebuchadnezzar's madness, in which he fancied himself to be an ox, is supposed to have been a species of lycanthropy.

Louvestein (Dutch, Loevestein; pronounce 'Loovestine,' 3 syl.). A political or state prison during the time of the Dutch Republic. It is a castle at the confluence of the Meuse (Dutch, Maas) and the Waal (Rhine), and is opposite the town of Gorkum (Gorichem), about ten miles above Dort (Dutch, Dortrecht). Here Grotius was kept; he made his escape in a box which had been employed to bring him books. Here, too, De Witt and some other republican leaders had been imprisoned, and hence the republican party was called the 'Louvestein.' They were discharged from the castle at the death of William II. the stadtholder.

Louvestein Faction (The). The republican party of Holland, led by Jan and Cornelius de Witt, in opposition to the Orange policy, which was to uphold the office of stadtholder. The Louvestein faction succeeded for several years in excluding the house of Orange from the stadtholdership in the person of William III. (afterwards king of England), but in 1672 both the brothers De Witt were murdered by an infuriated crowd.

Louis [XIV.] sent Caillières to Holland to tamper with the Louvestein faction, which had always been hostile to William [III. of Holland and of England].—Howitt, Hist. of Eng. (William and Mary, 106).

Love-feasts, or Agapæ. Held in the early ages of Christianity after receiving the eucharist. The rich brought provisions, but the poor were not expected to contribute. They continued to be held for three centuries, and were ultimately forbidden by the Council of Carthage, A.D. 397.

The 'kiss of peace' was changed for a symbolical ceremony. An ivory tablet was first kissed by the minister and then circulated through the congregation for each one to kiss.

Low Mass, 'Missa bassa.' A mass without singing, 'quæ submissa voce celebratur.' See 'Mass.'

Low St. James. 'From low St. James's up to high St. Paul's' (Pope, 'Satires'). The allusion is to the Bangorian controversy (q.v.). Bishop Hoadly, the favourite of Queen Anne, was the exponent of the low church party at St. James, but his opponent, Dr. Francis Hare, dean of St. Paul's, was the leader of the high church party. We should now say 'from Charles Simeon to Dr. Pusey,' or (1890) from 'John Charles Ryle of Liverpool to Edward King of Lincoln.'

Lowndean Professor of Astronomy and Geometry. Value 450*l.* a year. Founded in the University of Cambridge by Thomas Lowndes, 1749.

If the professor superintends the observatory he receives an extra 250*l.* a year.

Loyal Association (The), 1792. Formed in London by John Reeves, favouring the British constitution, in opposition to the favourers of the French revolutionary spirit.

Loyal Irish Brotherhood (The), 1880. A group of the Land League organisation. See 'Irish Associations.'

Loyal National Repeal Association (The), 1859. Organised by Daniel O'Connell to procure for Ireland 'perfect equality with England,' and bring about the repeal of the union. See 'Irish Associations.'

Loyalty Loan (The), 1796. Subscribed in December to prepare against the threatened invasion of the French.

Lubbock's Day (St.). The August Bank-holiday. So called from Sir John Lubbock, who brought it about.

A Bank holiday is called 'A feast of St. Lubbock.'

Lübeck (Peace of), May 22, 1629. Between Kaiser Ferdinand II. and Christian IV. of Denmark. This treaty brought to a close the first part of the Thirty Years' War.

Lucanian Oxen. Elephants. The Romans had never seen elephants till Pyrrhus invaded Rome. In their ignorance they called them 'Lucanian oxen,' supposing them to be herds from the fertile meadows of Lucania. The swine of Lucania were also famous, and the Romans delighted in the sausages, which they called Lucanica.

Lucasian Professor of mathematics. Stipend 850*l*. Founded in the University of Cambridge by Henry Lucas, M.P. for the university, 1663. See 'Mathematics,' &c.

Luciferians, 4th cent. An 'heretical' religious sect founded by Lucifer bishop of Cagliari. They taught that the soul is transmitted to the children from their parents.

Lucilius (The French). Béranger the poet. Lucilius was either the first or one of the first Roman satirists, followed by Horace, Persius, and Juvenal. Béranger is the French Horace rather than the French Lucilius.

Lu'cumo and Lars. A Lucŭmo was an independent king of any one of the twelve confederate states of ancient Etruria. His kingdom was called a 'Lucumy.' In time of war one of these Lucumos was appointed leader, and was called Lars (generally the over-king), as Lars Porsĕna. Similarly, the leader of the Gauls was called Brenn [Latin Brennus], and the leader of the Britons was called Dragon, or Pendragon.

> And plainly and more plainly
> Now might the burghers know,
> By port and vest, by horse and crest,
> Each warlike Lucumo.
> * * * * *
> Lars Porsĕna of Clusium
> Sat in his ivory car.
> MACAULAY, Lays of Ancient Rome (Horatius).

Luddites, 1811–1813, and again 1816. Rioters, so named from their leader, who called himself 'General Lud.' The great year of riots was 1812–1813. There had been recently introduced machines for finishing woollen goods, formerly done by men called 'Croppers.' By these machines the croppers were thrown out of work, and formed themselves into rioters, who went about Derbyshire, Lancashire, Cheshire, Nottinghamshire, and the south-western districts of Yorkshire, breaking the machines, and threatening the owners of them. Sixty-four of the rioters were executed in 1812, and nine in the following January.

Miss Martineau says the Luddites were so called from Edward or Ned Lud of Leicestershire, who, being chased by some boys, took refuge in a factory, where he broke two stocking-frames. The chief of the Luddites was a man named Meller.

Ludgate. Ludgate was originally built in 1215 by the barons, who entered London, destroyed the houses of the Jews, and erected this gate with the ruins thereof. It was first used as a prison in 1373, being then a free prison, but it soon lost that privilege. Sir Stephen Forster, who was lord mayor in 1454, had been a prisoner at Ludgate, and begged at the grate, where he was seen by a rich widow, who bought his liberty, took him into her service, and ultimately married him. To commemorate this eventful incident, Sir Stephen enlarged the accommodation for the prisoners, and added a chapel. The old gate was taken down and rebuilt in 1586. This new gate was destroyed in the Great Fire. Another gate was subsequently built and also used as a prison for debtors, but was pulled down in 1760, and the prisoners removed, first to the workhouse, and afterwards to the Giltspur Street Compter (Professor MORLEY, note to No. 82 of the 'Spectator').

Ludi-magister. A schoolmaster. Ludus means a school as well as a game of sports. Hence, 'ducere filium in ludum,' to take one's son to school. 'Noluit in . . . ludum me mittere' (Horace, "Sat." I. vi. 72).

Sir Walter Scott makes Erasmus Holiday say, 'He was inclined to think he bore the name of Holiday. . . because he gave such a few holidays to his school. Hence, the schoolmaster is termed classically ludi-magister, because he deprives boys of their play' ('Kenilworth,' chap. ix.).

Ludovico Sforza, the More, duke of Milan (died 1510). Ludovico adopted as his bearing a white mulberry tree (moro), the 'wisest of all plants,' in that it buds late, and does not flower till all hazard from winter frosts and winds has passed away. He was not named the Moor as most people write the name. (PAULUS JOVIUS, 'Vitæ Illustrorum Virorum,' iv.).

Ludwig I. The same as Louis le Débonnaire (778, 814–840). He was son of Charlemagne, and king both of France and Germany.

Ludwig, Clovis, and Louis are mere varieties of the same name. Clovis='lovis=louis; and Ludwig=Luwig=Louis.

Ludwig II. the Young, i.e. the Greenhorn (822, 855–874), son of Lothaire

He was 33 when he succeeded his father, and 54 when he died, so he was not called the young on account of youthful age; but like Louis le Jeune of France (1120–1180), he was 'green' as a politician. Ludwig II. ceded part of his dominion to his brother Karl, and at the death of Karl, in 863, gave up part of Provence to his brother Lothaire.

So Louis VII. le Jeune by repudiating his wife Eléonore lost several provinces of France, which fell into the hands of Henry II. of England, who married her.

Ludwig III. the Blind (880, 890–903, died 923). He was grandson of Ludwig II., and had his eyes put out by Berenger, on whom he made war unsuccessfully, and by whom he was deposed in 903.

Ludwig IV. the Infant (893, 899–911). Not recognised by some. Last of the Karlovingian race in Germany. He was son of Arnulf of Carinthia. Too feeble to resist the Huns and oppose Otto (duke of Saxony), he fled to Ratisbon, and the throne was given to Konrad I. duke or count of Franconia.

Ludwig V. (of Bavaria). One of the promiscuous kaiser-kings of Germany (1314–1347). In 1338 the pragmatic sanction of Rense decreed that the elected king of Germany was ex officio kaiser, or emperor of the Holy Roman Empire.

Ludwig V. placed two black eagles on the imperial seal, but Karl IV. changed the device into a black eagle with two heads. He was the last of the emperors of Germany excommunicated by a pope.

Ludwig, called 'Louis the German,' third son of Louis I. le Débonnaire, and grandson of Charlemagne. On the division of Charlemagne's empire, by the Treaty of Verdun (843), Bavaria and the whole country to the east of France (called Germany) fell to his lot.

Louis le Débonnaire had four sons: Lothaire, Pepin, Ludwig, and Charles. Pepin died before his father.

Ludwig the Child. See above, 'Louis the Infant.'

Ludwig the Saxon, second son of Ludwig the German. He died 882.

CHARLEMAGNE, Karl I., or Charles I.

Louis I. le Débonnaire, son of Charlemagne.

LUDWIG the German, third son of Louis I. le Débonnaire. (His two brothers were Lothaire of Italy and Pepin, who died before he did.)

KARL III. the Fat, third son of Ludwig the German. (His two brothers were Karlman of Italy and Ludwig the Saxon.)

Arnulf (who reigned 888–899) was son of Karlman or Carloman of Italy, and nephew of Karl III. the Fat. As he died before his uncle, his kingdom was joined to the dominions of Karl III. the Fat. Arnulf's son was Ludwig the Child or Infant.

Lugdunensis. That part of Gaul which lay between the Loire and the Seine.

Luke's Iron Crown, referred to by Goldsmith in 'The Traveller,' should be 'Zeck's iron crown,' as it was not Luke but George Dosza who was tormented in the way described A.D. 1514. He was a Szekler, or peasant of Szekelyföld, a district of Transylvania. The Jack Cade of Hungary was punished by being seated on an iron throne with a fire under it, crowned with a red-hot crown, and having his flesh torn off his bones by hot pincers.

Hujusmodi libertatem propter seditionem et tumultuariam adversus universam nobilitatem, sub nomine cruciatæ, ductu cujusdam scelerati Georgii Szekelii, insurrectionem, amiserunt. — VERBOCZI, Jus Consuetudinarium Regni Hungariæ, 1514.

Lumley Exhibition, in the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, 1657. The Right Hon. Elizabeth viscountess Lumley founded ten scholarships of 4*l.* per annum each for poor scholars. In 1820 the number of scholars was reduced to five, and the value of the exhibition increased to 15*l.* a year, to be held till they become graduates.

Lunéville (Treaty of), 9 Feb., 1801. Between France and Austria. By this treaty Belgium and the Rhenish provinces were ceded to France, and the states of Venice were given to Austria; the pope was re-established, and the Cisalpine, Ligurian, Helvetian, and Batavian republics were duly recognised.

Lurdane. A rich idle man; a corruption of 'Lord-Dane.' So the Danes who remained in England after the restoration of Danegeld by Ethelred the Unready were called by the servile English, who stood in awe of them.

More likely to be old French lourdan, modern French lourdaud, a loggerhead.

Lusitania, Portugal. The country of the Lusitāni.

It included Portugal and Estremadūra.

Lutatius says so, and 'therefore it must be true.' Hoc verum est; dixit enim Lutatius (Cicero, 'De Oratore,' ii. 40). Quintus Lutatius Catŭlus was the colleague of Marĭus in his fourth consulate. The character of Catulus stood so high in Rome that no one disputed or doubted what he said.

Lutestring Administration (The), 1765. That of Lord Rockingham, which followed the Grenville administration. Marquis of Rockingham premier and lord of the treasury; Grafton and General Conway secretaries of state; Earl of Northington chancellor; the old Duke of Newcastle privy seal; the old Lord Winchilsea president of the council; and Charles Townshend paymaster of the forces. As the ministry could not last, Charles Townshend himself said, 'It is a mere lutestring administration.' (Lutestring is a summer silk, unfit for winter wear.)

'Lutestring,' a corruption of lustrin, from the Italian lustrino, French lustre, a shining silk fabric, much worn at the time by ladies.

Luther (Martin). Born at Eislēben in Saxony 10 Nov., 1483; entered the Augustine monastery at Erfurt in 1505; professor of philosophy at Wittenberg in 1508; Leo X. issued a bull against him 24 June, 1520; Luther burnt the bull at Wittenberg 10 Dec., 1520; he appeared before the Diet of Worms April 1521; was seized on his journey and carried to Wartburg, where he began his version of the Bible; he returned to Wittenberg in March 1522; discarded the dress of a monk in 1524; married Catherine de Bora, an ex-nun, 27 June, 1525 [he was 42 years old at the time]; and died at Eisleben 18 Feb., 1546.

A monument was erected to him at Wittenberg in 1821, and one at Worms in 1868.

Luther (The Danish). Hans Tausen. There is a stone in Viborg called 'Tausensminde,' with this inscription: 'Upon this stone, in 1528, Hans Tausen first preached Luther's doctrine in Viborg.'

Luther of England (The). Archbishop Cranmer (1489–1556). He did the work of Luther, but was very unlike the rough German in character.

Luther's Catechisms. Luther published two catechisms, the shorter one in 1520 and the larger one in 1529. These religious catechisms found a place among the symbolical books of the Lutheran churches.

Lutheranism. The platform of those Protestants who, like Luther, believe in consubstantiation, the use of images as aids to devotion, private confession, the form of exorcism in baptism, and some other semi-Catholic doctrines and practices.

Luther said that Christ, in the sacrament, is present with the bread and wine, as fire is present with iron when the metal is red-hot.

Luxemburg (House of). Furnished Germany with four kaisers, but other rulers intervened; as Heinrich VII. (1308–1313); Karl IV. (1347–1378); Wenceslaus (1378–1400); and Siegmund or Sigismund (1411–1437).

Lydford Law. Lydford is a village of Devonshire where we are told offenders were summarily punished.

First hang and draw,
Then hear the cause by Lydford law.

There are many similar expressions; as 'Bradford law,' 'Halifax law,' 'Cupar justice,' 'Jedburgh justice,' 'Buralem club-law,' 'Mob law,' 'Abingdon law,' &c.

Lydian Stone. So touchstone was called by the Romans, because it was found in Lydia of Asia Minor.

Lying Dick Talbot. Richard Talbot duke of Tyrconnel, lord lieutenant of Ireland (*–1691).

Lynch Law. The law of self-constituted magistrates. James Lynch was a Virginian farmer who in 1688 took upon himself to enforce better order by trying thieves, vagabonds, and other disorderly persons. This he did because there were then no magistrates or law courts in the neighbourhood. Lynch seems to have acted pretty fairly in his self-constituted office, insomuch that he was supported by his neighbours.

Lyonists. The followers of Peter Waldo of Lyons, who died 1197. Peter Waldo had the four gospels translated into French, and found the prevailing religion so different to that taught in the gospels that he became a preacher, and soon gathered round him a large following. The Lyonists rejected the dogma of apostolic succession; accepted only two sacraments; maintained the sufficiency of scripture; believed in only one Mediator, and therefore rejected the advocacy of Virgin Mary and the saints; denied papal supremacy and purgatory; rejected masses for the dead, the adoration of images and relics, indulgences, and other innovations.

The Lyonists, Waldenses, Cathari, and Albigenses had so much in common, they are very frequently confounded one with another.

Lyric Poets (The Prince of). Pindar (B.C. 529–435), a Bœotian.

Franz Peter Schubert, the musical composer, is called 'the Prince of Lyrists' (1797–1828).

Lysippus (The English). Grinling Gibbons, the carver and sculptor in the reign of Charles II. (1648–1721). His favourite wood was lime or linden. Lysippus was a Greek sculptor in the time of Alexander the Great, whose most famous works were statues of Alexander, the chariot of the sun at Rhodes, and the colossus of Tarentum.

Mabinogion (The). Welsh fairy tales. The MS. is of the 14th cent., and is included in the 'Red Book of Hergest' (q.v.). Lady Charlotte Guest published a translation of it in 1838–1849. 'Mabinogi means 'instruction for youth,' from Maban, a young child.

Macabre (La Danse). An allegory representing all ages and conditions of men engaged in dancing, with Death presiding. Very popular from the 13th to the 15th cent., and found in a large number of churches and cemeteries. The most ancient goes back to the year 1485, and the most famous are those of Minden, Lucerne, Lübeck, Dresden, and Basle. The painting in the convent of the Dominicans is attributed to Holbein.

Macadam (John Loudon) introduced two improvements in roads: (1) Instead of making the centre of the road the lowest part, he made it the highest, so that the centre is the crown from which the road on both sides gradually lowers; (2) his other improvement was to employ stones broken small instead of entire stones of various sizes. By the first improvement the roads are better drained; by the second they are smoother and more firm (1756–1836).

Macaroni Club (The), 1770. A club of dandies, first in Paris and then in London, in the latter half of the 17th cent. Their hair was dressed in an enormous toupee, with huge curls at the sides, and tied behind into a pigtail with a knot. A very small hat was perched on the top, and was lifted from the head by a small cane. Round the neck was a full white cravat tied in an enormous bow. Frills from the shirt-front projected from the top of the waistcoat. The coat and waistcoat were both short, reaching only to the hips. The breeches were tight, of spotted or striped silk, with enormous bunches of strings at the knees. A watch was carried in two breeches pockets, from which dangled huge bunches of seals. The shoes were small, with diamond buckles; and a walking-stick with long tassels completed the costume. It was the delight of the exquisites to be as rude as possible to modest women, and to bully all the weak and timid.

Macaroni is an Italian cake. The slang expression 'What a cake (oaf) you are!' may have risen from these empty-headed fops, or 'toffs,' called in 1888 'mashers' or 'dudes,' which words are still (1890) in vogue; indeed have been appropriated by the lighter order of feminines, who talk of 'mashing' the male sex when they are persuaded their appearance is particularly effective.

A kind of animal, neither male nor female, lately started up amongst us. It is called a Macaroni. It talks without meaning, it smiles without pleasantry, it eats without appetite, it rides without exercise.—Oxford Magazine (June 1770, vol. iv. p. 228).

Macbeth. Lady Macbeth's maiden name was Graoch. Macbeth did not murder Duncan in his castle of Inverness, but attacked and slew him at a place called Bothgowan or the Smith's House, near Elgin, in 1040. The claim of Macbeth, as grandson of Malcolm II., was (according to the rule of Scottish succession) much better than that of Duncan.

Lady Macbeth was the granddaughter of Kenneth IV., killed in 1008 fighting against Malcolm II.

MacBriar (Ephraim), introduced by Sir Walter Scott in 'Old Mortality,' is the young preacher Maccail, so hideously tortured in the reign of Charles II. He died in a rapture. See Howitt, 'Hist. of Eng.' (Charles II. p. 442).

Maccabæan Martyrs (Feast of the), 1 Aug. A mother and her seven sons were put to death by Antiochus Epiphănês. These were not Christian martyrs, but the festival was instituted by Christians.

Maccabæus (The French). Simon de Montfort, entrusted by Philippe II. Auguste with the first crusade against the Albigenses. He cut down 20,000 of them with the sword and burnt 450 to death (1150–1218).

Maccabees (The). The Asmonæan princes of Judæa were so called from Jehu'dah or Judah, surnamed 'Maccaby,' who succeeded his father Mattathias as leader of the Jews who revolted from Antiŏchos Epiphănês. See 'Asmonæans.'

The Maccabees continued to be rulers of the Jews till the appointment of Herod the Great. Mattathias had five sons, and was succeeded by Judah 'Maccaby,' his third son; after whom followed Jonathan, the youngest of the five; and then came Simon, who transmitted the succession.

Mattathias (B.C. 167-166) was father of Jochanas, Simon (142-136), Judah 'Maccaby' (166-161), Eleazar, and Jonathan the high priest (161-142).

Simon was the father of Joannes Hyrcănus (B.C. 136-107), the third son.

Joannes Hyrcănus was the father of Aristobūlus (who assumed the title of 'king' B.C. 107-106), and Alexander Jannæus (also called 'king,' 106-79).

Alexander Jannæus was the father of Hyrcănus II. (B.C. 79, deposed B.C. 40, and put to death by Herod B.C. 30),—and of Aristobūlus II. (dethroned by Hyrcănus II.).

Aristobūlus was the father of Mariamne, who married Herod the Great.

 Maccaby is probably the inscription of the Maccabæan banner, M.C.C.B.Y. (Mi Camo-Co Beelohim Yehovah—i.e. 'Who is like unto thee, O Lord, among the gods?' Exod. xv. 11). After the same manner the Romans inscribed on their banners the acrostic S.P.Q.R. (i.e. Senātus Populusque Romanus). See the Austrian A.E.I.O.U.

MacCulloch (Cutlar). A corsair who made repeated incursions on the northern shores of the Isle of Man, carrying off all that was not 'too hot or too heavy' (16th cent.).

God keep the good corn, the sheep, and the bullock,
From Satan, from sin, and from Cutlar MacCulloch.

MacDonald (Half-hanged), 1772. MacDonald, a lad of 19 years, in the 42nd Royal Highlanders, being irritated in a public-house in Bigg Market, seized one Parker and slapped his face soundly. Parker and one or two others rushed from the public, and MacDonald, rushing after the fugitives, caught the wrong man, struck him, and he died. Being tried, he was condemned and executed. The body was handed over for dissection, and left on the table while the students went to dinner. A young surgeon came into the dissecting-room and saw MacDonald sitting up. He begged for life, but the surgeon struck him with a heavy mallet and effectually dispatched the half-hanged man.

Macedonian War (The). The First, B.C. 211–205. Between Rome and Macedonia. Philip V. king of Macedon not Alexander's father), thinking the disastrous battle of Cannæ had established the Carthaginian supremacy, formed in B.C. 213 an alliance with Hannibal; but both Rome and Carthage were for the time being too busy with their own affairs to attend to other matters, and left the war to allies. In this war Philip had the advantage.

In the first Macedonian war the Ætolians, Athenians, Rhodians, and Egyptians, together with Attalus king of Pergamus, took part with the Romans.

The Macedonians, Carthaginians, Acarnanians, with Antiochus king of Syria, sided with Philip of Macedon.

The Second Macedonian war, B.C. 200–197. Also between Rome and Macedonia. Philip of Macedon laid siege to Athens B.C. 200; but as Athens was an ally of the Romans, the Romans declared war against him, and entrusted the conduct of the war to Quintus Flamininus, who met the army of Philip in Thessaly, and gained a signal victory at Kynoskeph'alæ (the Dogshead Hills) in 197. The terms of peace were these: (1) Philip was to restore all the Greek towns to independence; (2) he was to give up his fleet, and pay a tribute to Rome for ten years; and (3) he was to give his son among the hostages for the fulfilment of these terms.

The Third Macedonian war, B.C. 172–168, was between the son of Philip, named Perseus, and the Romans. About twenty-six years after the second war, Philip being dead, his son Perseus (2 syl.), hoping to throw off the Roman yoke, made war with partial success for three years, but was at length utterly defeated by Æmilius Paullus, at Pydna in Macedonia, B.C. 168. Perseus was led captive to Rome, and the kingdom of Macedonia was converted into a Roman province.

The avarice of Perseus estranged from him all his allies, and though he behaved in the most abject manner to Æmilius Paullus, he was cast into a dungeon at Rome, and died of starvation and grief. His son Alexander gained his bread in Alba Longa as a turner.

Macedon'ians, or 'Pneumat'ics,' 4th cent. The followers of Macedon'ius patriarch of Constantinople (343–360), who denied the divinity of the Holy Ghost. He was condemned by the Second General Council, held at Constantinople in 381.

The First General Council—that of Nice, 325—condemned Arius, who denied the divinity of Christ; and the Second General Council condemned Macedonius, who denied the divinity of the Holy Ghost.

MacFarlane's Lantern. The moon. The clan of MacFarlane occupied the fastnesses of the western side of Loch Lomond, and were great depredators on the low country. As their excursions were made by night, the moon was proverbially called their lantern.

Machiavelism. Crooked, perfidious policy, in which expediency is the ruling principle and chicanery the chief instrument. So called from Niccolò Machiavelli of Florence, whose system is set forth in his 'Del Principe.' Cesare Borgia is his model of a perfect ruler (1469–1527).

Both Tiberius of Rome and Louis XI. of France are credited with the maxim, 'He who knows not how to deceive, knows not how to rule.'

Maclean's People. Scotch Baptists.

Macmillanites (4 syl.). Members of the 'Reformed Presbyterian Church' (q.v.); so called from Mr. Macmillan, one of their most distinguished preachers.

Macrea (Jenny), 1777. Abducted and murdered by Indians in the army of General Burgoyne. Miss Macrea was residing with Mrs. Macneil, a widow, close to Fort Edward, and her lover, Jones, was in Burgoyne's army. She was about 20 years of age, intelligent and charming. On 27th July a party of Indians assailed Mrs. Macneil's house, and carried her off with Miss Macrea. Being pursued by some American soldiers, Miss Macrea was fastened to a tree, tomahawked, and scalped. The elder lady seems to have escaped.

The burning houses, the scalped and murdered Americans, and the innocent blood of Miss Macrea made the names of the Six Nations terrible in Europe.—HOWITT, Hist. of Eng. (Geo. III.), p. 190.

150	Arganthonius	—	a Spaniard
	Consir (Francis)	1768	of Burythorpe, Malton, in Yorkshire. From the age of 60 he was on the parish.
152.	Bowles (James)	1656	of Killingworth, Warwickshire.
	Newman (Thomas)	1542
	Parr (Thomas) ... 16 Dec.,	1635	of Alberbury, in Shropshire. He was an agricultural labourer, and worked at his calling up to the age of 130, even as a thresher. At the age of 122 he married his second wife. His food was chiefly bread and cheese, and he drank milk. He was buried in Westminster Abbey. Old Parr lived in the reign of ten sovereigns.
	West (Henry)	—
154.	Damme (Thomas)	1648
155.	Obst	1825	a villager of Zwronegoschutz, in Silesia. She worked in the fields to the day of her death. She was a large eater, and drank daily two glasses of brandy.
157.	Some say Epimenidês the Cretan poet died at the age of 157, B.C. 450.
160.	Surrington (Joseph)	1797	of Bergen, in Norway. He left a son of 9 and one of 108 behind him.
168.	Edwards (William)...	1668
169.	Jenkins (Henry)	1670	Ufland, Professor of Medicine in the University of Jena, searched into this, and tells us that Jenkins lived chiefly on charity, but sometimes went out to sea fishing.
172.	Rowin (John)...	1740	of Temeswar. His wife at his death was 164, and his youngest son was 90.
175.	Tuisco	—	a German prince, mentioned by Tacitus.
179.	Truxo (Louisa)	1785	a negress, who died at Tucuman, in South America.
185.	Zorten (Peter)	1724	he was a vegetarian, and his portrait used to hang in the library of Prince Charles, Brussels. Claude Nicolas le Cat mentions him.
307.	Carn (Thomas)	1588	according to the parish register of St. Leonard's, Shoreditch, he was born in the reign of Richard II., and died in the reign of Elizabeth.

These are the most noted of the Macrobiots. Some of the names are not worthy of credit, such as Rowin, whose wife was 164; Surrington, whose son was 108; Keit, whose youngest daughter was 109. However, the list is a long one, and it is well to have it handy.

 Of the antediluvian Macrobiots two solutions have been suggested: (1) that the years were not solar but lunar years; thus in Ecclesiasticus (xliii. 6, 7,) we read: 'He [God] made the moon to serve in her season for a declaration of times, and from the moon is the sign of feasts.' It is also quite certain that six months is sometimes called a year; but neither of these suggestions relieves the main difficulty. Another solution is this: the first date (Genesis, chap. v.) gives the age of the sheik himself, and the next the duration of his dynasty or race. Thus: Adam lived 100 years and he begat Seth. He died aged 100, but his dynasty continued altogether 930 years. Seth was also a sheik, who lived 105 years, but his race continued sheiks for 807 years. Enos lived 90 years, but his race continued 815 years; and so on.

McWilliam (A). An Irish dress, the dress of an Irishman, significant of being thorough Irish, and therefore hating the English. In 1586 the Burkes said, 'they would have a McWilliam or else go to Spain'—i.e. they would assume the Irishman and throw off their English manners and allegiance, or else leave the country. In the 14th cent. the Burkes adopted the Irish dress and assumed the name of McWilliam.

Mad King of Lacedæmon (The). Cleomênês, who killed himself in a fit of madness, B.C. 494.

Mad Parliament (The). The parliament assembled at Oxford in 1258, which provided three things: (1) The confirmation of Magna Charta; (2) the virtual deposition of Henry III.; and (3) the appointment of twenty-four councillors, with Simon de Montfort at the head, in whom the government of the nation was to be vested. See 'Chambre Introuvable,' 'Parliaments.'

This parliament ordered that three parliaments a year should in future be called in the months of Feb., June, and Oct.; that a new sheriff should be annually chosen by the votes of the freeholders in each county; that no English heirs shall be under the wardship of a foreigner; that no new warrens or forests shall be created in the nation; and that the revenues of no county shall be let to farm.

Mad Parson (The). Dean Swift, 1667—1783

Mad Priest of Kent (The). John Ball, a Wyclifite, executed in 1381. He was a leader in the 'peasant revolt,' and preached to the people the equality of man. 'If (said he) we be all come from Adam and Eve, how can our oppressors show they are better than we? When Adam delved and Eve span, who was then the gentleman?'

Let Mr. Ball first tell us what is meant by 'better' before we answer. Abel was better than Cain in one sense.

Mad Queen (The). Juana, the wife and afterwards the widow of Philip of Flanders, generally called Philip the Fair of Austria. As she was queen of Castile and very rich, Henry VII. proposed to marry her in 1506, but this proposal was rejected, and Henry died in 1509.

The wife of Henry VII. died in Feb. 1503; therefore he was free to marry again.

Madame (without a name following) meant, in the reign of Louis XIV., the wife of Philippe duc d'Orléans, the king's brother (who was entitled Monsieur). The son of Philippe was entitled Petit-fils de la France, and their daughter Mademoiselle.

Amazing as the affectation may now appear, it is well known that in the reign of the Grand Monarque the title of Madame was limited to certain duly qualified bourgeoises, such as the wives of provosts, magistrates, sheriffs, and so on. Hence we read of the 'widow Mademoiselle Molière,' &c.

Madame l'Ange. Madame Du Barry, mistress of Louis XV., was so called from her extreme beauty. She succeeded Madame de Pompadour.

Madame la Duchesse (without a proper name) meant, in the reign of Louis XIV., the wife of Henri Jules de Bourbon, eldest son of the Prince de Condé. Mdme. la Duchesse was grandchild of the king by his natural daughter from La Vallière. Henri Jules de Bourbon was entitled Monsieur le Duc.

Madame la Princesse (without a proper name) meant, in the reign of Louis XIV., the wife of the Prince de Condé (a natural daughter of the king by La Vallière). The Prince de Condé was entitled Monsieur le Prince. Their eldest son was entitled Monsieur le Duc, and their eldest daughter Madame la Duchesse.

Madame Solidité. The pet name given by Louis XIV. to Madame de Maintenon (1635–1719).

Madame Veto. Marie Antoinette, wife of Louis XVI. (1755–1793). The constitution of 1791 accorded to the king of France the right of veto, but this veto was merely suspensive. Louis XVI. availed himself of this right from the 17 to the 29 Nov., and was nicknamed Monsieur Veto, his wife being Madame Veto.

Madame Veto avait promis
De faire égorger tout Paris;
Mais son coup a manqué,
Grâce à nos canonnié.
Revolutionary Song.

Madam Veto swore one day
All Parisians she would slay;
But the cannoneers of France,
Never gave her three t the chance.

Madeleine (La), Paris. Napoleon I. in 1815 commenced this beautiful building over the spot where the body of Louis XVI. was buried. It was founded after the battle of Jena, and its name was to be the Temple of Glory. The Bourbons finished it, and called it 'The Madeleine.' It is a truly splendid shrine for a most ill-used king.

Louis XVI. was the 65th of the kings of France.

Madelonnettes (Les), 1618. A religious house in Paris in the Rue des Fontaines designed for repentant women, and founded by Robert de Montry. The direction of this penitentiary is under the Sœurs de la Visitation de St. Antoine. In the revolution it was turned into a political prison, and at the present day it is a house of detention for les filles de mauvaise vie.

Mademoiselle (without a proper name), the title of the eldest daughter of the king of France. Thus, in the reign of Louis XIII., the Duchesse de Montpensier, the eldest daughter of Gaston duc d'Orléans (the king's brother) was Mademoiselle; but in the reign of Louis XIV. she became la grande Mademoiselle, because the king's brother Philippe duc d'Orléans had a daughter who was Mademoiselle.

In the reign of Louis XIV. the king's son was Monseigneur; his brother (Philippe) was Monsieur, his wife Madame, and their daughter Mademoiselle.

Madman (The). Apollodōrus the Athenian painter, who was so irascible that he destroyed his own pictures upo the slightest provocation (died B.C. 440).

Shelley (in his preface to the translation of Plato's 'Symposium') says, 'To borrow an image from Italian painters, he [Apollodorus] seems to have been the St. John of the Socratic group,' in allusion to his impassioned and enthusiastic disposition.

Madman of the North (The). Carl XII. of Sweden (1682, 1697–1718). In 1700, with 8,000 men he overthrew 80,000 Russians at Narva, a success which made him madder than he was before.

Madonna Bianca. The Italian 'White Lady' (Rogers, 'Italy').

Madras College. See 'Andrews (University of St.).'

Madras System of Education (The), 1795. On the mutual instruction system. In 1807 Dr. Andrew Bell introduced his system among the poor in London. By this plan the more advanced pupils instruct the less advanced. The system was very popular for a time, and pupil teachers are still employed in our parish schools.

Madrid (Treaty of), 1526. Consequent on the battle of Pavía in the year previous. By this treaty François agreed to renounce all claim to the duchy of Milan; to yield to the Emperor Karl V. Flanders, Artois, and Burgundy; to restore Bourbon to all his titles and possessions; and to send his two sons as hostages till these several conditions were fulfilled.

Mæcenas of France (The). François I. (1494, 1515–1547). Also called Père des Lettres, being a most munificent patron of literature and art.

Mænad (A). A bacchant. From the Greek μαίνομαι, to be mad or furious; because the gestures and shouts of these worshippers of Bacchus were like the ravings of mad women (pl. Mænădês).

Turning the current of her youth from the sweet modesty of maidenhood to the self-destroying violence of a Mænad.—E. LYNN LINTON, Under which Lord? chap. xxiii.

Magazine, 1731. The name first applied in England to a periodical ('The Gentleman's Magazine').

Magdalen College, Oxford, 1458. Founded by William Patten bishop of Winchester. The headmaster is called the president. [Pronounce Maudlen.]

William Patten is generally called William of Waynflete, from the place of his birth.

Magdalen Hall, Oxford, 1456. Founded as a preparatory school to the college, but in 1602 it became independent, and in 1822 was removed to the seat of the former Hertford College. In 1874 Magdalen Hall was dissolved, and the college was incorporated, under the title of 'the Principal, Fellows, and Scholars of Hertford College,' in the University of Oxford.

Magdalene College, in Cambridge University. Founded by Thomas baron Audley of Walden in 1519. Familiarly called Maudlen.

Magdeburg Hemispheres (The), 1650. Two small brass cups (about two inches in diameter), each furnished with a brass handle. The two cups fit each other, and form a sphere. The object of this pneumatic toy is to show the pressure of air, for when the air has been pumped out of them two strong men cannot pull them asunder, but the moment air is admitted they can be parted without the slightest effort. Invented by Otto von Guericke of Magdeburg.

Maggy Lauder. This is a scurrilous song, in the time of the reformation, on the Catholic Church.

Magi of Cappadocia (The). These were accounted heretics by the Parsees. They worshipped in temples, and had many material symbols of their fire-god. They also offered up human victims. The high priest of the Cappadocian Magi wore a mitre. Unlike the Parsees, they bury their dead.

The Parsees neither burn nor bury their dead, but place them in circular towers where birds of prey may devour them.

Ma'gianism. The religious system of the Magi. The Magi believed in one god, or rather that the sky was all one god. No temples were built to this god, but those who wished to worship him went to the top of a mountain and prostrated themselves. The seven planets were supposed to be his seven chief ministers. At death the soul had to pass through seven gates before it reached the heaven of heavens. Brotherly love was a moral law of the Magi, and so was tenderness to dumb animals. Zoroaster reformed Magianism (B.C. 589–513).

Magians (The), or 'Magi.' Part of the old Persian empire. Herodotus calls them 'one of the six Median tribes.' 'The Wise Men of the East' spoken of in St Matthew's Gospel were Magians.

Simon who deceived the people of Samaria (Acts viii.) and Elymas the sorcerer were both Magians. As a religious order they were organised by Zoroaster, who divided them into (1) learners, (2) masters, and (3) perfect scholars. They had three methods of divination, (1) by calling up the dead, (2) by cups and dishes, and (3) by water. Their learning was so great, and their 'tricks' so wonderful, that magic or Magianism became a synonym of sorcery.

Magician of the North (The). So Hamann (1730–1788) called himself. He was a Prussian philosopher who defended revelation against the attacks of the Rationalists.

Magister ad Faculta'tes (4 syl.). The chief officer of the Court of Faculties (q.v.).

Magister Glomeriæ. A non-academic functionary in the University of Cambridge, the superintendent of the masters of grammar, of which there were a dozen or more attached to different schools where youths were taught the elements of the Latin language. These schools were nurseries for the university. Glomeria, a corruption of Gramery, skill in grammar.

There were probably a dozen or more separate schools, each presided over by a master of grammar, while the Magister Glomeriæ represented the supreme authority.—MULLINGER, University of Cambridge, 1873, pp. 139, 340.

Magna Charta, 15 June, 1215. Based on the laws of Henry I., which embraced those of Edward the Confessor and the 'ancient customs of England,' derived mainly from the free institutions of the Saxons and Danes. Drawn up at Edmundsbury by Stephen Langton (archbishop of Canterbury) and the barons or free tenants of the king, 20 Nov., 1214, and signed by King John at Runnymede in the seventeenth year of his reign. It contains sixty-one clauses. Twenty-five of the barons were elected to see it carried out, and if any article was infringed four of the number were to lodge a complaint; and if immediate redress was not granted, the twenty-five barons were empowered to take possession of the royal castles till redress was fully obtained. A copy of the charter was sent to every cathedral. The facsimile engraved by the Board of Commissions on the public records was from the copy in Lincoln Cathedral, supposed to be the most accurate. The following clauses will show the nature of the charter:—

The English Church is to enjoy all its rights and liberties, and all elections to benefices are to be free.

General Provisions:—
All towns to enjoy their charters.
All forests afforested in the present reign [i.e. John's] to be disafforested.
No officer of the crown to take corn, timber, or other goods without payment, or to borrow any man's horse or cart without the owner's consent.
No scutage to be exacted except by order of the national council.
Assises to be held by justices in eyre four times a year, and the Court of Common Pleas to be fixed at Westminster.
No man to be condemned on suspicion, but only after a fair trial on the evidence of witnesses.
No freeman to be outlawed, except according to law.
All men to have equal justice.
Guardians to keep up the estate of their respective wards, and to deliver it over well stocked and provided.
Chattels to be seized for debt before lands or rents.
If a minor has borrowed money, and dies before he comes of age, only the principal (without interest) shall be paid to the lender.
All weights and measures in the realm shall be uniform.

Personal Provisions:—
No one to be distrained to perform more service to his lord than is due.
No vil or person but those bound to do so to be distrained for making bridges, &c.
No lord, except to ransom his person, shall levy aid on his freemen, either under pretence of making his heir a knight, or of dowering his eldest daughter at marriage.
Foreign merchants to be free to trade in the land, and all natives to go and come as they choose.
Widows to remain widows if they like, but if they marry they must give legal notice of their intention.
Every man to be at liberty to bequeath his personal property as he likes, but his real estates to descend to his widow and children.

The Four new Clauses added by Edward I., 5 Nov., 1297:—
1. No taxes to be levied without consent of parliament.
2. No provisions to be taken for the king's service without the owner's consent.
3. No levy, under the name of custom, to be levied on wool.
4. All liberties, laws, and customs hitherto enjoyed to remain in force.

See also the 'Dictum of Kenilworth,' 15 Oct., 1266.

Magna Charta of Hungary See 'Golden Bull of Hungary.'

Magna Charta of Manx (The), 1704. The Act of Settlement is so called. By this act the purchaser of a farm or other real property is allowed to sell, alienate, or devise his estate; and as soon as it passes into the new hands, the former possessor loses all rights therein for ever. The land not revertable, as it was among the Jews in the year of jubilee.

Magna Charta of Ottoman Liberty (The). or Imperial Edict of Gulhaneh, granted by Abdul Medjid sultan of Turkey (1823, 1839–1861). This edict equalised taxation and regulated the administration of justice in Turkey.

Magna Charta of Turkey (The), 21 Feb., 1856. A firman granted by the Sultan after the Crimean war. It confirmed to Christians in the sultanate full civil and religious liberty; it abolished all class distinctions, leaving every office open to every subject irrespective of birth, race, religion, or language; all subjects admissible to the civil or military schools; flogging and torture made penal; all classes to pay their proper ratio of taxes according to a money scale; the items of national expenditure to be published; a council of delegates to meet annually; all subjects to have an equal right of holding land; trade to be free.

Magna Charta of the Gallican Church (The), 1438. The Pragmatic Sanction of Bourges enacted by Charles VII. It declared a general council of superior authority to the pope; it freed all elections to church preferments from the control of the pope; it abolished mandats and first-fruits; and, in fact, did for France what the Constitutions of Clarendon had done for England; that is, reserved the ecclesiastical preferments of the nation to natives, and prevented the imperium in imperio or collision of Italian interests with those of the kings and his subjects.

Magna Charta of the Protestants of Ireland (The), 1662. The Act of Settlement and the Act of Explanation. The two together form the tenure under which most of the land of Ireland is held. The act was framed by the Duke of Ormond, lord-lieutenant of Ireland, to confirm Protestants in the estates confiscated from Irish Catholics after the 'Great Rebellion.'

By the Act of Explanation some few alterations were made in the most obnoxious of the clauses of the Act of Settlement (q.v.). Before the outbreak of the civil war the estates of Ormond brought him in an income of 7,000*l.* a year. After the Magna Charta they brought him in an income of 80,000*l.* a year.

Magna Græcia. Modern Calabria.

Magnanimous (The). Philippe II. Auguste of France (1165, 1180–1223). Called 'Auguste' because he was born in the month of August (21st of the month).

Magnum Decreto'rum, seu Canonum, Volumen. A famous collection of canons by Burchard bishop of Worms, a Benedictine, who died 1027 at the age of 72.

Magnus Saga (The). The history and miracles of Earl Magnus, patron saint of Kirkwall Cathedral. It was printed for the Master of the Rolls in 1887, with other Sagas. It is in Icelandic and not translated.

Mag'ophon'ia, B.C. 522. An annual ceremony observed by the Magi in remembrance of the massacre of their tribe by Darius Hystaspês, because a pretender usurped the throne of Persia while Cambyses was absent in Egypt. Cambyses heard of the plot, but died on his way back, and Darius, his successor, made a general massacre of the Magi. During the Magophonia no Magian appeared in public.

Magyarised (pron. Mard'-yer-ised), 1830. Made to use the language of the Magyars [Mard-yers] or native Hungarians, instead of the Latin tongue as hitherto. The Croats and Sclaves said Nolumus Magyarizari when the Hungarian diet proposed this change.

Mahabad'ian Dynasty (The). An antediluvian and fabulous Persian dynasty, so called from Mah'ab'ad, said to be the first king that ever reigned. He divided the people into four classes, viz. the religious, the military, the commercial, and the servile.

According to Sir W. Jones, this dynasty was established ages before the accession of Cayûmers or Kayomurs, great-grandson of Noah, some nine centuries B.C. The Pishdadian dynasty (q.v.) is called the first Persian dynasty by those who fear to extend the chronology of history much above 2,000 years B.C. The Mah-abad-ian dynasty was followed by the Jy-anian or Holy Dynasty. Of course Mah-abad means Great King. All the fourteen hypothetical kings of this dynasty are called Abad, and all were said to be prophets.

Mah'di (The). Supreme pontiff of the Shiites. Only twelve of these imams have really appeared, viz. Ali, Hassan, Hosein, and the nine lineal descendants of Hosein. Mahommed, the last Mah'di, we are told, is not really dead, but sleeps in a cavern near Bagdad, and will return to active life before the Judgment-day to overthrow Dejal or Antichrist. In the royal stables of Persia two horses are always kept saddled, in readiness for the Mah'di and his lieutenant Jesus the son of Mary. The Sunnites or 'orthodox' Moslems called the sultan the true imam [e-maum'].

Mahomed Achmet or Mohammed Ahmed of Dongôla was born about 1840. He was a carpenter, and became Mahdi in 1882. The Mahdi of the Soudan in 1881 was only a 'false prophet,' who pretended to be the sleeping imam come back to active life to overthrow the enemies of the faith and restore all things. Mahdi means the guided one.

 It must be remembered that the Sunnites are the 'orthodox' Moslems, and the Sultan of Turkey is the calif or head thereof. The Shiites are the Persian Moslems, hated by the orthodox party. The Mahdi and his party which are now (1890) disturbing Egypt are hated by the official Egyptians, who are Sunnites (2 syl.), like the Turks. Latterly even the Sunnites have been expecting a Mahdi, who is to stamp out 'the infidels.' In fact, the expectation is almost universal among Moslems.

Mahometanism. The belief that Mahomet was a prophet sent by God, and that the Koran is a revelation made to him by Gabriel in the cave Hoïâ. Mahomet or Mohammed lived 571–631.

Of course Mahometans are deists. The sultan is the calif of the orthodox Moslems or Sunnites (2 syl.), and the Mahdi is the head of the unorthodox Moslems or Shiites (3 syl.). The Turks and Egyptians are Sunnites (or 'orthodox'), the Persians and some Indians are Shiites (3 syl.) or heterodox Moslems.

Mahon's Act. See 'Lord Mahon's Act.'

Mahratta War (The), 1804–1818. The British declared war against Holkar 16 April, 1804; won the battle of Deig 13 Nov., 1804; of Bhurtpoor 2 April, 1805; of Mehudpoor 21 Dec.; and concluded peace with Holkar 6 Jan., 1818.

Mai (A), or 'Arbre de Mai.' A tree, bush, or branch planted before a house on May-day by those who wish to pay a compliment to the inmates thereof. In some villages of France the custom still lingers, and sometimes the 'tree' is decorated with ribbons and flowers. The clercs de la basoche used always to plant and dress such a tree every May-day in the grand cour du Palais. In the revolution trees of liberty were called Mais.

Meanwhile the 20th June is nigh, anniversary of that world-famous oath of the Tennis-court, on which day certain citizens have in view to plant a Mai or Tree of Liberty on the Tuileries Terrace of the Feuillants.—CARLYLE, French Revolution, vol. ii. book v. 13.

Mai'atæ (The). An ancient Scottish tribe.

The Caledonians and Maiatæ, resuming courage, took up arms to recover the possessions they had lost. The enraged emperor (Severus), commanded his army to march into their country and to destroy it with fire and sword.—Æra of Ossian.

Maid (The). Joan of Arc (1412–1431). Also called 'The Holy Maid.' In French 'La Pucelle.'

Maid of Brittany (The). Eleanor sister of Prince Arthur, and niece of Richard Cœur-de-Lion.

Maid of Kent (The). Joan Bocher, who maintained that Jesus Christ was not truly incarnate of the Virgin Mary, or he would have been born in sin. For this opinion Cranmer condemned her to be burnt to death, but Edward VI. absolutely refused to sign the warrant for her execution. Cranmer insisted, and the young king reluctantly gave way. She was martyred in 1549.

Some time after a Dutchman was burnt to death by Cranmer for holding incorrect views of the divinity of Christ.

Maid of Norway (The). Margaret daughter of Eric and Margaret of Norway, and grandchild of Alexander III. of Scotland. At the death of her grandfather she was the acknowledged queen of Scotland, and had been betrothed to Edward, son and heir of Edward I. king of England. Margaret died on her passage from Norway, and consequently was neither wedded nor crowned. At her death thirteen claimants to the crown arose, but John Balliol was ultimately elected as the king.

The claim was really between Robert Bruce and John Balliol, and according to English law that of Balliol was undoubtedly the superior. He was great-grandson of David earl of Huntingdon by Margaret, the elder daughter; whereas Bruce was the son of David's younger daughter Isabella. It was the grandson of this Bruce who was the great Scotch hero.

Maid of Orléans (The). 'La Pucelle d'Orléans.' Joan of Arc [Jeanne d'Arc], born at Domrémy 1412. According to one account she was burnt as a witch at Rouen 30 May, 1431. According to M. Octave Delepierre she was married to Robert des Armoises in 1438, and died in 1444. Called the Maid of Orléans because she compelled the English to raise the siege of Orléans.

In regard to the burning of Jeanne d'Arc it must be remembered that the French had every motive to represent the English in France in the blackest colours. So Richard III. was represented as deformed in body and mind to flatter Elisabeth.

 M. Delepierre cites a document discovered in the archives of Metz by Father Vignier in the 17th cent. in proof of the marriage of Robert sieur des Armoises with Jeanne d'Arcy, surnamed the Maid of Orléans.

Maids of the Cross, 1265. A community of young women who made vows of poverty, chastity, and obedience.

Maiden (The). A rude sort of guillotine, introduced into Scotland from Halifax by Morton the regent. Morton himself was beheaded by this machine as an accessory to the murder of Henry Darnley, husband of Mary queen of Scots (1566–1681).

Maiden Castle (The). Edinburgh or Dunedin.

In the engagement which ensued at Camelon (now Abernethy) in Perthshire, Druskenus the Pictish king was slain with the flower of his nobility. His chief fortress, the Maiden Castle, now that of Edinburgh, surrendered, and the main body of the Pictish people fled beyond sea (A.D. 824).—PRINCE, Parallel History, vol. i. p. 401.

Maiden Violin (The). A Stradivārius (1709) called La Pucelle. It was exhibited at the South Kensington Exhibition in 1872 among 'antique musical instruments.'

Maillotins (Les), 1382. Insurgents of Paris to resist the new tax on bread levied by the Duc d'Anjou, regent of France in the minority of Charles VI. So called because they armed themselves with maillets de fer when they attacked the arsenal, put to death the officers, and set at large the prisoners. After the battle of Rosebecque, the same year, this sedition was put down. See 'French Brigands.'

Pronounce Lay May-o-tah'n.

Mails. Mail coaches began to run 8 Aug., 1784; but 14 Aug., 1838 provision was made for the conveyance of mails, &c. by railways (2 Vict. c. 98).

Main Conspiracy (The), 1603. Set on foot by Sir Walter Raleigh out of hatred to Lord Cecil, the chief minister of James I. The object was to depose Cecil, and induce James to ally himself with Spain instead of with France. Sir Walter Raleigh, with Lord Cobham and Lord Grey, were brought to trial and condemned to death, but they were all reprieved. It was called the 'Main' conspiracy because it was simultaneous with another conspiracy called the 'Bye' (q.v.). Sir Walter Raleigh, Grey, and Cobham were charged with participation in the 'Bye,' but they utterly denied that they ever contemplated the elevation of Arabella Stuart to the throne and the deposition of James. See 'Bye Plot.'

Grey, after his reprieve, was kept in the Tower eleven years, Cobham was sent back to prison, and Raleigh was sent back for twelve years.

Maine (U.S. America). Said to have been so called from Maine, in France (1638), of which Henrietta Maria, wife of Charles I., was the proprietor. The inhabitants are nicknamed Foxes.

Maine Law (The), 1846. United States of N. America. The prohibition of the sale of intoxicating liquors in Maine. The original law was made more stringent in 1851, and is still in force as then amended.

Maintainers. Bands of banditti in the reign of Richard II. who subsisted or maintained themselves by robbery. They assembled in great bands, seized people for their ransoms, and carried off the daughters of men of property. They abounded in Cheshire and Lancashire in about 1380.

Maintenance. I. In History. The association of numbers of persons under some chief, whose badge or livery they wore, and to whom they were bound by oath to support him in his private quarrels against all other noblemen. Henry VII., after the conspiracy of Simnel (1487), insisted that the law against maintenance should be rigorously enforced.

II. In Law. Intermeddling in suits of law, prohibited in 1540 (32 Hen. VIII. c. 9).

Intermeddling by assisting either party with money, or otherwise, to prosecute or defend a suit. If such intermeddling is to assist another to obtain or retain land it is called Ruralis; if it is to assist a suit in any law-court it is called Curialis.

Maires du Palais. 'Majóres domus,' officers of the crown who had at one time charge of the administration of the privy purse of the king and the general government of the palace. Subsequently they became a very great political power. From 575 Gogon maire of Austrasia was charged with the government of the country. In 614 Warnachaire maire of Burgundy compelled Clotaire II. to grant that the maires should no longer be nominated by the crown at pleasure, but by the great vassals for life. From 677 there were no longer any kings in Austrasia, but the maires under the title of dukes or princes of France reigned supreme. After the triumph of Pépin d'Héristal over the Neustrians, at Testry, in 687, the maires became hereditary. And in 752 Pépin le Bref deposed Childéric III., and proclaimed himself king of the whole kingdom, with the sanction of Pope Zacharias I. The office was abolished by Hugues Capet [U Cap-pay].

Maison de Dieu means a monastic hospital or almshouse. The second league of the Grisons was called La Ligue de la Maison de Dieu or La Ligue Caddée, 1401.

Maitland Prize (The). For an essay connected with the propagation of the gospel in India. Given once in three years to graduates of not more than ten years' standing. Value about 80*l.* Founded by the friends of Sir Peregrine Maitland, commander of the forces in South India, 1844.

Majesty, as a royal title, was assumed in England in 1527 by Henry VIII., and in France in 1559 by Henri II. Before then the king or queen was addressed as 'Your Grace' or 'Your Highness.' Louis XI. and his successors were styled 'Most Christian Majesty' by a papal bull.

Ferdinand and Isabella of Spain were entitled by Pope Alexander VI., in 1491, 'Most Catholic Majesty.'

The King of Portugal is entitled his 'Most Faithful Majesty,' a style of address bestowed by Benedict XIV., in 1748.

Stephen duke of Hungary and Maria Theresa were styled 'Apostolic Majesty.'

The Emperor of Austria is now styled 'His Imperial Royal Majesty' ('K. K. Majestät,' i.e. Kaiserliche. Königliche).

The Sultan of Turkey is still 'Your Highness.'

Henry IV. addressed as			Your 'Grace.'
Henry VI.	,,	,,	Your 'Excellent Grace.'
Edward IV.	,,	,,	'High and Mighty Prince.'
Henry VII.	,,	,,	Your 'Grace' or 'Highness.'
Henry VIII.	,,	,,	Your 'Highness' till 1527.
The Stuarts	,,	,,	Your 'Most Sacred Majesty.'

Majorats [Mah-zjo-rah], 1806. Entail of property created by Napoleon. A majorat was annexed to the title of nobility and passed with it to the next heir.

Major's or Major Oak (The), in Birkland. A part of Sherwood Forest near Edwinstowe in the possession of the Earl Manvers. So called from Major Rooke the antiquary. It was formerly called the 'Cock-pen Tree' (q.v.). An effort has been made by Lady Manvers to call it the 'Queen Oak,' but it is called generally 'The Major Oak' still. Its branches cover a space of 240 feet in circumference. It has an opening into its hollow trunk through which a man can pass and fifteen persons can be packed inside the trunk.

Inside the trunk are the letters J. R., and it is a fond belief of some that they stand for John Rex.

Mal de Siam, or 'La Maladie de Siam.' The yellow fever was so called when from 1694 to 1705 it desolated the Antilles (2 syl.).

Maladie Diplomatique (La). A feigned or exaggerated illness from motives of policy—as when a member of the existing cabinet is invited to address a public meeting on a subject which the cabinet does not wish to be ventilated, he sends word that he is bidden by his medical advisers to eschew speaking for the present.

Malakoff (The). Malakoff was the name of a man who once kept a tavern on the memorable spot which bears his name. He was a purser in the Russian navy, but, being kicked out of the service for drunkenness, swindling, and smuggling, he started a drinkshop outside Sebastopol. As he sold drink cheaper than other men, his place was greatly frequented by Russian sailors, and, after a while, the stony hill where his shebeen stood became the Malakoff Redoubt.

Mal'andrins (The), or 'The Grand Companies,' a band of 40,000 adventurers who, towards the end of the 14th cent., pillaged Altkirch and other parts of Alsatia. The English word is 'Mallenders' ('Acta Sanctorum,' Life of St. Morandus).

Malcontents (The), or 'Politiques' of French history in the reigns of Charles IX. and Henri III., when the nation was divided into Catholics, Protestants, and a third party called Malcontents who were in accord with neither of the other two. They advocated mutual tolerance, and tried to find means of uniting the two communions. On the death of Henri III. they sided with Henri IV. against Philip II., a claimant of the throne of France.

The chief of the Malcontents were François d'Alençon (the king's brother), the King of Navarre (afterwards Henri IV.), the Prince de Condé, and the Montmorencys.

Malefammi (The Baron). Corso Donāti was so nicknamed.

The Baron Malefammi, or Do-me-harm, was Corso's nickname among the populace.—Mrs. OLIPHANT, Makers of Florence. p. 87.

Malherbe's Canons, i.e. of French poetry. (1) Every word employed must be French; (2) a word ending with a vowel must be followed by a consonant; (3) no one line may run into another; (4) the rhymes must be alternately male and female; and the cæsura of every line must be rigidly maintained.

Malignants. In English history a royalist, or adherent of Charles I., so called by the Roundheads or opponents of the king.

Cromwell retorted on them [the Scotch] that, though they pretended to covenant and fight against malignants, they had entered into agreement with the head and centre of the malignants himself [Charles II.].—HOWITT, Hist. of England (Commonwealth, p. 317).

Malignity. The political tenets of the malignants or cavaliers in the time of Charles I. and II. Namely, the divine right of kings, the supremacy of royal prerogatives, the obligation of passive obedience, and the sinfulness of treason.

Malleteers, 1381. See Maillotins.

No doubt the terrors of the democrats of Flanders now again in full action, of the horrible Jacquerie and the ruthless Malleteers, at this time paralysing Paris, were present to the minds of the royal party.—HOWITT, Hist. of England (vol. i. p. 412).

Malleus Ariano'rum. St. Hilary, bishop of Poitiers from 350 to 367.

Mal'leus Hæretico'rum. I. Pierre d'Ailly; in Latin Petrus de Alliaco (1350–1425).

II. John Faber (1470–1541), so called from the title of one of his works.

St. Augustine is called by Hakewell 'that renowned pillar of truth and hammer of heresies' (395–430).

Malleus Scoto'rum. Edward I. On his tomb in Westminster Abbey is the inscription: Edwardus longus Scotorum malleus hic est.

Malt Silver. A payment of money instead of malt by the tenant farmer (14th cent.).

Malta (Knights of), 1523. See 'John of Jerusalem.'

Malthu'sianism. The doctrine of the Rev. Thomas Robert Malthus: That as population rapidly increases, but land is a fixed quantity, the time must come when the population will outgrow the means of food supply, and therefore government should make laws to restrict marriages and check the increase of man (1766–1834).

Mam'ertine Prison (The). So called from Mamers, the Oscan god of war. It was constructed of unhewn stone, underground, and had no door. It consisted of two chambers, the lower one 27 ft. by 20 ft. and 14 ft. high; the upper one 20 ft. by 10 ft. and 7 ft. high. The lower one was entered by a small hole in the ceiling, and the other one by a similar hole in the roof. Here Jugurtha was confined, and perished with cold and hunger; and here, according to church chroniclers, both Peter and Paul were confined, A.D. 68, the last year of the reign of Nero.

The Tullianum, in which Catiline was confined and put to death, was probably the lower dungeon of the Carcer Mam'ertinus.

Mam'ertines (3 syl.) A sort of free-lances or condottieri about 300 years B.C. These sons of Mamers or Mars were Campanian adventurers of Samnite origin, who took military service with any government which would pay them.

Man in the Iron Mask (The), 'Masque de Fer.' A state prisoner who went by the name of L'Estang. In 1662 he was confined in the Château Pignerol. In 1686 he was removed to the Ile Saint Marguerite, and in 1698 to the Bastille, where he died in 1703. So that he was a state prisoner above 40 years. He was buried under the name of Marchiali.

Voltaire says he was a twin brother of Louis XIV.; some think he was the Comte de Vermandois, a natural son of Louis XIV. and Mdlle. de la Vallière, who was thus punished for boxing the ears of the dauphin; others think he was the Duke of Beaufort, who disappeared in 1669 at the siege of Candia; or the Duke of Monmouth, nephew of James II.; or the Count Girolamo Matthioli, minister of the Duke of Mantua, who overreached Louis in a treaty for the purchase of Casal; or John of Gonzaque, Matthioli's secretary; or an adulterous son of Anne of Austria (the king's mother) either by the Duke of Buckingham or the Cardinal Mazarin.

Man of Blood (The). Charles I was so called by the puritans because he made war on his parliament. The allusion is to 2 Sam. xvi. 7.

Prince Bismarck of Prussia, born 1815, is sometimes called the 'Man of Blood and Iron.'

Man of Chios (The). Homer. Chios [Ki-oss] was one of the seven cities which claimed to be the place of his birth (10th cent. B.C.).

Smyrna, Rhodos, Colophon, Salamis, Chios, Argos, Athenæ.—VARRO.

Man of December (The). Napoleon III. So called because he was made president 11 Dec., 1848; he made his coup d'état 2 Dec., 1851; and he was made emperor 2 Dec., 1852.

Man of Destiny (The). Napoleon I., who looked on himself as an instrument in the hands of destiny, and that all his acts were predestined.

The Man of Destiny . . . had power for a time to bind kings with chains, and nobles with fetters of iron.—Sir W. SCOTT.

Man of Ghent (The). M. Guizot, who joined Louis XVIII. at Ghent in May 1815. This was looked on by the Liberals as political treason, and called forth much controversy.

John of Gaunt was John of Ghent. The pronunciation is nearly Gahn'.

Man of Ross (The). John Kyrle, of Ross, in Herefordshire, noted for his benevolence and public spirit (1637–1754).

Man of Sedan' (The). Napoleon III. who, after his defeat at Sedan, 2 Sept., 1870, surrendered his sword to William king of Prussia, and was sent to Wilhelmshohe.

Also called 'The Man of Silence,' and 'The Man of December.' No man was honoured with more nicknames than Napoleon III.

Man of Sedition (The). So Madame de Maintenon called Jean Claude, the last of the eminent pastors of Charenton, who was born in 1619. At the Revocation he was ordered to leave France within twenty-four hours.

Man of Silence (The). Napoleon III. (born 1808, reigned 1852–1870, died at Chislehurst 1873).

France? You must know better than I your position with the Man of Silence.—For Sceptre and Crown, chap. i.

Man of the People (The). Charles James Fox, the Whig statesman (1705–1774).

Man without a Skin (The). Richard Cumberland (1732–1811) so called by Garrick from his irritable temper and dread of criticism. Sheridan satirised him as 'Sir Fretful Plagiary.'

Manchester (The American). Lowell, in Massachusetts, is so called from its numerous cotton-mills.

Manchester Martyrs (The). An utterly absurd political term applied to a man named Larkin a tailor, Allen, and O'Brien, who murdered a policeman, named Brett, and after trial were duly hanged, 22 Nov., 1867. It was the Irish Fenians who canonised these three felons.

Manchester Massacre (The), 16 Aug., 1819. A most extravagant phrase to express the injuries received by the crowd which met in St. Peter's Field, Manchester, in defiance of the magistrate's orders, to hear 'Orator' Hunt, on parliamentary reform. About 80,000 persons assembled, and the military was sent to disperse them. They used the flat of their swords, but about 100 persons were injured, either being knocked down in their flight or cut accidentally. It is said that six persons died or were killed—a very small number indeed in such a stampede. See 'Peterloo.'

Hunt was arrested, tried, and imprisoned for three years. After his liberation he started in the blacking trade. Hunt wore a white beaver hat, and his admirers followed the fashion.

Manchester Regiment (The), 1745. A miserable squad which joined Charles Edward in his halt at Manchester. 'The mere scum and ragamuffinism of the place.' The Duke of Perth said of them 'If the devil would offer a shilling more than the prince, they would desert at once.'

Manchester of Austria (The). Brünn.

Manchester of Belgium (The). Ghent.

Manchester of France (The). Rouen. It is said to have contained 200,000 inhabitants when it was besieged by Henry V. in 1418. It does not now contain above 89,000.

Manchester of Negroland (The). Kano, which exports annually 1,500 camel-loads of blue cotton cloth.

Manchester of Prussia (The). Elberfeld in Westphalia, one of the greatest centres of industry in all Germany. Velvets, lace, silk fabrics, ribbons, bed-ticking, cotton-goods, &c., are here manufactured in large quantities. Krupp's enormous works are at Essen.

Manchü Dynasty (The). The 22nd imperial dynasty of China, also called Tae-tsing. Began to reign 1644, deposing the Ming sovereign (Tsang-ching), and placing Shun-chi on the Chinese throne, with Peking for the capital. This dynasty still rules.

Mandarins. From the Latin mandāre, to command; a Portuguese word given in Europe to the governors of provinces in China and chief magistrates. The Chinese call them ko-hans. There are civil mandarins and military mandarins.

Man'dates (2 syl.) or 'Expectatives.' Letters of request from the pope praying that the benefices named in the letters may be conferred on the persons nominated therein.

Mandats, 1796. A sort of paper money issued by the French Directory for the redemption of their 'Assignats,' q.v. An assignat of the nominal value of 300 francs could be redeemed for a mandat of the value of 100 francs. A mandat, like an assignat, was a 'promise to pay' in land, with this difference: an assignat was a promise to pay, but a mandat enabled the holder to take possession at once of public lands to the value of his mandat or mandats. As these mandats soon fell to a seventieth part of their nominal value, but might be given to government in payment of taxes, they were called in. They were called 'Mandats Territoriaux.'

Mandrites (2 syl.) or Hegumĕni. Superiors of convents in the Greek Church. General abbots are archimandrites.

Manichæans (The), 3rd cent. Followers of Manês or Mani (215–276), who gave himself out to be the Paraclete or Comforter that Christ promised to send; and maintained there were two souls or spirits in man, one good and the other bad. He taught that the soul at death went first to the moon, then to the sun, and then to God. His creed was a mixture of the Persian Parseeism and Christianity. The Manichæans took for food neither eggs, cheese, milk, nor wine. Mani was put to death by Varanês or Bahăram.

In fact Manes or Mani tried to weld together the doctrines of Zoroaster, the metempsychosis of the Hindûs, and the tenets of Christianity. He was put to death by Baharam I., called by the Greeks Varanês. Manichæism is also called dualism. A vast number of sects which believe in the two principles, one good and one evil, are called Manichæans.

Manifestation (The Writ of). The Habeas Corpus writ of Aragon (13th cent.), which provided that no person should be secretly incarcerated, as in France, nor smuggled out of the way, but that the body of every prisoner should be 'manifested' and publicly detained, till brought to trial publicly in a court free to all.

Man'ikin (The). The man so mercilessly satirised by 'Junius,' under the name of Manikin and Grildig, was Welbore Ellis, 'a pigmy in mind and body' who succeeded George Germaine, in 1782, in Lord North's ministry.

Man-rent (Scotch history). A bond between chief and vassal, in which the lord stipulated to give protection, and the vassal agreed to give personal service and fidelity.

The lords Sanquhar, Drumlanrigg, and others, finding him [Maxwell] thus indifferent, proposed to him that they should agree to grant him bonds of man-rent, and engage to follow him in his quarrels, provided he would effectually protect them by discharging his duty as warden.—Sir W. Scott, History of Scotland, xxxviii.

Mansard Ornament (The). Stone fretted like coral. So called from François Mansard, the French architect (1598–1666).

Mansard Roof (The). The roof broken into an elbow on each side, like the Tuileries, and not thus Λ.

Mansfield College, Oxford 1889. The first Nonconformist college at Oxford; for the education of young men for the Presbyterian ministry.

Manx Bible (The). Translated by Dr. John Kelly in 1772.

Map of Religion. A Christian society has published a map divided into squares, and the squares coloured differently so as to catch the eye. It calculates the present number of the earth's inhabitants at 1,500 millions. The heathen are represented by black squares, Christians by white ones, and each square represents a million people. Of the 1,500 squares, only one and less than a quarter [=1,200,000] represents the entire Protestant community, including all its multitudinous 'sects' (1890).

Mar'abuts (The). A corruption of marbûth (a Cenobite), of the Musulman faith. They still exercise spiritual power in Barbary and Guinea, in some parts of which 'The Great Marabût' ranks next to the king.

Marais (The Marsh), 1794. So the 'Plain,' or floor of the Convention, occupied by the Moderate party, was called in the 'Reign of Terror,' and its occupants were nicknamed Grenouilles and Crapauds, or frogs and toads. The Red Republicans occupied the elevated seats, and were called the Mountain party (Montagnards); the Girondists sat on the right hand of the ministerial benches.

Pronounce Mah'ray, Gruh-noo'-yee, Kra'-po.

Mar'athon of Switzerland (The). The battle of Morgarten, 1315, in which a few Swiss utterly discomfited their Austrian assailants, and confirmed the independence of the three cantons of Schwytz, Uri, and Unterwalden.

Marave'di (The). See 'Almoravides' (4 syl.).

Marbach (The League of), 1404. Formed by the electors of Mentz and Saxony, the duke of Bavaria, and the markgraf of Meissen, against the kaiser Rupert. Later on the king of France and the king of Poland joined the league.

Marcel's Revolt. French history, 1357–1358. When Jean was in captivity, his son Charles acted as regent, and wanting money convoked a States-General. Etienne Marcel, the city provost, said supplies should be granted if the regent promised to use them only for state purposes, and neither gave office nor pardoned crime for money. The regent made the promise, but refused to fulfil the conditions as soon as he received the subsidy. Civil war was the consequence, and the partisans of Marcel wore as their badge a chaperon or hood half red and half green. The revolters seized the regent, who escaped injury by adopting the provost's badge. No sooner, however, did he feel himself free than he collected an army together to avenge himself on the provost. Marcel proclaimed the king of Navarre 'king of France,' and when the regent, at the head of an army, came to the city gates and promised to come to terms, Marcel went to open the gates, and was treacherously struck dead with a battle-axe by one of the regent's immediate suite. This ended the revolt; and the dauphin, entering the city on horseback, signalised his victory by a host of executions.

Marcellus of Spain (The). John son of Ferdinand and Isabella.

March and June Bills. Exchequer bills were so called till 1861, because they were payable, together with principal, in March and June; but in 1861 the method of payment was changed, interest being calculated half-yearly, and paid on March bills on 10 March and 10 Sept., and on June bills on 10 June and 10 Dec.

March-treason. The treason of passing the marches or boundaries of a country as freebooters or for loot.

March, pronounce Marsh, not like the month of March.

He knew how many of his ancestors had fallen by the sword of the English, how many in domestic brawl, how many by the hand of the executioner for march-treason.—Sir W. Scott, The Monastery (Int.).

Marche's Rebellion, 1242. The Comte de la Marche refused to pay homage to Louis IX. (St. Louis), and Louis declared war against him. He routed the insurgents in two battles on one day, one at the bridge of Taillebourg in the Lower Charente, and the other near the city of Saintes (1 syl.). The count was pardoned.

Marches. Boundaries between two neighbouring kingdoms. The Spanish Marches were from the Pyrenees to the Ebro. The boundaries between England and Wales, as well as those between England and Scotland, were called marches from the Saxon mearc, a boundary. 'Beating the bounds' of a parish is called in Scotland 'riding the marches.'

Our Marchion-ess, the wife of a marchion (marquis), preserves the word. The marchion or marquis was the officer set to guard a march or frontier.

Marchetta, or 'Marchet.' A money tribute paid to a feudal lord by a tenant on the marriage of his daughter. It prevailed in England, Wales and Scotland. Sometimes called gwahr-merched (maid's fee). Earl Brant, one of the earls of Crawford, was the last who claimed the droit de jambage (16th cent.).

Marching Watch. 'In 1547 Sir John Gresham, being lord mayor of London,' revived this picturesque and splendid pageant on Midsummer's Eve. It had been put down by proclamation in 1528 on account of the sweating sickness; and again in 1539. Henry VIII. took his wife Jane Seymour to Mercers' Hall to see the pageant. Stow says it was finally discontinued in 1549. The marching watch in London consisted of 2,000 men decorated with flowers, wreaths, and ribbons. Kings, peers, and knights on horseback joined the procession. Cresset lights and bonfires turned night into day, and banquets in the streets were liberally supplied. The march began at sunset and continued till sunrise next morning.

Mar'cionites (4 syl.), 2nd cent. An heretical sect founded by Marcion of Sinōpē, in Paphlagonia, son of the bishop of that city. His system is very imperfectly known, but he taught that there are two principles, one the author of good and the other the author of evil. The soul, he said, emanates from the former, and the body from the latter. He rejected the Old Testament, and retained only a few of the Epistles and a part of the third gospel in the New. Marcion had a large following, which subsisted as a distinct party till the 7th cent.

Origen affirms that Marcion postulated three gods, viz. a God of the Jews, a God of Christians, and a God of the Gentiles. Tertullian makes him to have postulated nine Gods, and adds that the heresiarch denied the resurrection of the body, condemned marriage, and maintained that the living might be baptized for the dead.

 What is said by the Fathers about 'heretics' must be received with great caution. Like the Church historians, they much distorted their lives and doctrines, looking at them only from their own standpoint.

Marcus Aure'lius of the Base Empire (The). John II. (Comnēnus), also called Calojoan'nes, i.e. John the handsome. Reigned 1118–1143.

The Base Empire, i.e. the Eastern Empire after Theodosius.

Mardi Gras [Mah'-de-grah'], or 'Fat Tuesday.' The last day of the carnival, when the prize ox of Paris is paraded in mock procession through the principal streets, and stops at the chief houses to gather contributions. The horns and hoofs of the ox are gilt, and the beast is decorated with ribbons; beside it walk on each side men in mockery imitation of the Romish priests, and a long procession, representing in similar caricature a Roman triumph, follow with bands of music, the more grotesque the better. We are told that the procession represents a Roman saturnalia, but it seems very like those semi-religious processions of the middle ages, the Feast of Fools, the Fête of the Ass, the Fête of the Bottle, and the Fête of the Cornards or Cuckolds. In Venice for many centuries there was a similar procession of a fat ox and twelve hogs on the last Thursday of Carnival; and there is still such a celebration at New Orleans, U.S.A. See 'Zobia-grassa.'

Marfo'rio. An antique marble statue of colossal size, found in the Martis foro, and at one time placed near the Braschi palace. As all sorts of placards, handbills, squibs, and satires used to be affixed to the statue, it was removed in 1784 to the Capitoline museum.

Margaret Professorship of Divinity (Lady), 1502. Founded in each of our two universities by Margaret countess of Richmond, mother of Henry VII. The professor must be a graduate in divinity, or an M.A. of at least seven years' standing in priest's orders. In Oxford all graduates in divinity and all members of the congregation (in deacon's orders) are electors. In Cambridge the office is nominally for two years, but as the professor is eligible for re-election, it is virtually for life. The electors (in Cambridge) are the vice-chancellor, all doctors, inceptors, and bachelors in divinity who have been regents in arts.

Margaret's Knights (The), 2 Aug. 1786. An attempt was made by a mad woman, Margaret Nicholson, to assassinate George III. as he was alighting from his carriage at St. James's Palace. Addresses of congratulation on his escape came from all parts of the kingdom, and a very large number of mayors and other functionaries, deputed to present the addresses, were knighted. These were called 'Margaret's knights,' or 'Peg Nicholson's knights.'

Margaret's Shift. The main standard of Margaret's army in the battle of Falkoping, 1397, in which Albert king of Sweden was defeated by Margaret queen-regent of Denmark and Norway. There is still preserved in the cathedral of Upsâla a ragged strip of linen fastened to a staff which tradition says was carried at this battle, to animate the troops by reminding them of the martial spirit of their leader.

Margaret of Calais, 1347. The daughter of Edward III. and Philippa, born in Calais, just after the termination of the siege.

Margîtês. Demosthenês called Alexander the Great 'another Margîtês,' meaning a conceited superficial dolt. Margîtês was a man against whom Homer wrote a satire to ridicule his superficial knowledge and affectations.

I'll take to writing poetry, a mock epic in 72 books . . . and take Homer's 'Margites' for my model.—KINGSLEY, Hypatia, ch. xiii.

Mar'grave or 'Mark-graf.' A German reeve or chief officer of a mark or march, i.e. a frontier; like our marquis. The original function of this reeve was to defend a borderland from incursions. See 'Graf,' 'Pfalz-graf.'

Marguerite des Marguerites (pearl of pearls). Marguerite de Valois queen of Navarre, sister of François I., born 1492, died 1549. It was her brother François who called her La Marguerite des Marguerites.

It was not Marguerite the wife of Henri IV. who was so called.

Maria There'sa, 'mother of her country,' married Francis Stephan duke of Lorraine in 1736. Born 1717, succeeded her father Kaiser Karl VI. in 1740; her husband was crowned Kaiser Franz I. 1745, and died 1765; the widow died 1780, aged 63, mother of three sons and six daughters. On the death of Franz I. the eldest son Joseph II. was made 'king of the Romans,' and associated with his mother as ruler of Germany; and at her death became kaiser-king.

It was the daughter of Maria Theresa (named Marie Antoinette) who married Louis XVI. of France, and was guillotined.

Marian Persecutions of the Protestants began in January 1555. Instigated chiefly by Philip, the Spanish husband of Mary. In this persecution fell the Archbishop Cranmer, Hooper (bishop of Gloucester), Latimer (bishop of Worcester), Ridley (bishop of London), Ferrar (bishop of St. David's), and about 800 more. Hundreds of others were banished, imprisoned, and heavily fined.

It is much to be feared that religion and politics were so mixed up together that it was often morally impossible to separate 'heresy' from treason.

Marie-Jeanne (Mah'-re Zjahn'). A 12-pounder of fine workmanship which the republican party (the blues) took in the Vendêan war from the Château de Richelieu, where it had been placed by the famous cardinal. It was heroically retaken by the Vendeans (1794).

Mariotte's Law. The elastic force of gases and vapours increase directly with the pressure.

Maristes (2 syl.), 1818. A religious congregation at Bordeaux founded by the Abbé Cheminade, docteur de Sorbonne, the object being the education of the young. It has ramified into all parts of France, and into Switzerland, Germany, and the United States.

Marischal College (New Aberdeen), 1593. Founded by George Keith, Earl Marischal, and united in 1858 to the University of Aberdeen. The motto of the college—'They say. Qvhat say they? Let them say'—is that of the founder.

Market Crosses. Places under cover for the sale of country produce on market days. Chichester Market Cross stands at the point where North and South streets, East and West streets meet. There are several market crosses still standing besides that of Chichester, such as Winchester Market Cross, Malmesbury Market Cross, Aberdeen Market Cross, &c.

Marlbridge (Statute of), 52 Hen. III. c. 10 (1267), whereby all prelates, clergymen, peers, and women are discharged from attending court lects. The statute incorporated many of the 'Provisions of Oxford' (q.v.).

Mar'onites (3 syl.) of Syria, 5th cent. Disciples of John Maron. A very large number of them live a monastic life. Since 1445 they have been united to the Church of Rome, but have some peculiar doctrines and church customs. The patriarch is always called Peter. Married men may become priests, but no priest may marry after he is in orders. The priests wear a blue scarf about their caps, but no surplice. They were massacred by the Druses in June 1860, but their present number is about 100,000. Since 1588 the Maronites have been tributary to the Porte.

Maroon Insurrection (The), 1795. The Maroons were the runaway slaves of Jamaica and Cuba, who congregated in the woods on the north side of Jamaica, and lived a predatory life. In 1795 two of them were punished with thirty-nine lashes for stealing pigs, and this drove the Maroons into insurrection. A bloody and successful war was waged by them, till the Assembly sent to Cuba for 100 bloodhounds. The Maroons then craved mercy, and all of them who would not promise to abandon their predatory habits were banished to Halifax, in Nova Scotia, whence in 1800 they were deported to Sierra Leone. The descendants of others have been peaceful occupants of a few towns built by themselves in the forests of Jamaica.

There are also many Maroons in Guiana.

Marprelate Tracts (The), 1588. Tracts written by one who signed himself 'Martin Marprelate and his sons.' The object of these tracts was to vilify the Established Church. Penry, one of the five Independents put to death by Queen Elizabeth, was supposed to have been the author of some of these tracts. See 'Martin Marprelate.'

The Anglican Church is called 'old rotten stuff . . . abstracted of [from] the pope's blasphemous mass book' . . . the liturgy is 'stinking patchery.' Churchmen are 'blasphemous wretches, the subjects of the kingdom of the Beast'; while the Puritans are called 'the great learned preachers,' 'the good men, but with counterfeit discipline and perjured elders, in fact, 'Pharisees.'

Marquis. From the Saxon and Norman marchio, a military officer whose duty was to protect the frontier where he was placed, and prevent inroads and invasions. A march means a frontier.

Marquis Duke of Cadiz (The). Ponce de Leon, marquis of Cadiz, was created by Isabella a duke; but, unwilling to resign the title under which he had won his laurels, he ever afterwards subscribed himself and was called by others the 'Marquis Duke.'

Marrani. Renegade Moors.

Marriage of the Adriatic (The). Instituted in commemoration of a naval victory won by Sebastian Ziani, doge of Venice, over Otto son of Frederick Barbarossa, 1174. In consequence of this victory Pope Alexander III., who had been driven to take refuge in Venice, gave to the doge the sovereignty of the sea, and every year the doge used to go in grand procession in his state barge, and threw a gold ring into the Adriatic, saying 'With this ring I thee wed.'

The Signoria leaves the palace amid a countless throng and ascends the Bucentaur. The rowers of this state barge sit below the deck. The doge sits on the deck under a magnificent canopy, having the pope's nuncio on his right hand, and the French ambassador on his left. All the magnates of Venice sit according to their rank, and arrayed in their official costumes. The great banner of St. Mark and the standard proper of the barge are displayed, and a band of trumpeters and hautboy players assist in the ceremony. When the Bucentaur reaches the mouth of the sea, the musicians begin a certain motet, and the doge drops into the sea a gold wedding-ring, saying: 'Desponsamus te Mare nostrum in signum veri perpetuique domitii.' Flowers are then thrown into the sea, and the procession returns.—VILLAMONT, Peregrinatio Sacra, ch. xxxiv. d. 3.

Marriages (Close Times of). 1. 'Ab Adventu usque ad Epiphaniam; (2) a Septuagesima usque ad octavas Pasche inclusive; (3) a secunda feria in Rogationibus usque ad primam dominicam post Pentecosten exclusive.'—Liber Sacerdotalis . . . secundum Ritum Sanctæ Romanæ et Apostolicæ Ecclesiæ (1537).

Married Women's Property Act. Came into operation 1 Jan., 1883, enabling married women to acquire, hold, and dispose of property as their own separate estate, just as if they were single. They may also enter into contracts to the extent of their own separate property. By this act, a wife who robs her husband, or a husband who robs his wife, may be proceeded against as if they were strangers.

The first Act was 3, 4 Will. IV. c. 74 (1833); the next was 20, 21 Vict. c. 57 (1857), amended in 1870.

Marrow Controversy (The), in the Church of Scotland, 1614. So called from a book entitled 'The Marrow of Modern Divinity,' written by a Puritan soldier in the time of the Commonwealth. The book was highly 'evangelical,' especially on the subject of free grace. The General Assembly condemned the book in 1720, and forbade the Scotch to read it. Twelve of the Evangelical clergy remonstrated, but, being called before the Assembly, were severely rebuked. Here the matter ended; but eleven years afterwards the Evangelical party seceded.

Marrow-men (The), 1721. The twelve Evangelical ministers who protested against the condemnation of the book entitled 'The Marrow of Modern Divinity.' Their names are James Hog or Hogg, Thomas Boston, John Bonner, James Kid or Kidd, Gabriel Wilson, Ebenezer Erskine, Ralph Erskine, James Wardlaw, James Bathgate, Henry Davidson, William Hunter, and John Williamson. They were called 'The Twelve Brethren,' and were held by the Evangelical party of Scotland in great veneration. See above.

Mars and Mahomet of Scandinavia (The). Odin. His true name was Sigge, son of Fridulph, but he assumed the name of Odin, chief god of the Scythians, of whom he was chief priest (B.C. 70–40).

Mars of China (The). Quâng-yoo, general of the Emperor Heou-tchao (who reigned 223–265). Quâng-yoo died A.D. 265, and Heou-tchao was compelled to abdicate.

Marseillais (Les), 30 July, 1792. So the battalion of federates from Marseilles, invited by the Jacobins to Paris, was called. They went chanting a revolutionary song composed by Rouget de Lisle, a young officer at Strasburg. The song was called 'La Marseillaise,' meaning the song of the battalion from Marseilles.

Marseilles (Plague of), 1720–1726. A dreadful plague brought from Syria in a merchant ship. It first appeared in Marseilles, whence it spread to Arles, Aix, and Toulon. More than 80,000 persons fell victims to it. See below.

Marseilles' Good Bishop. Henri François Xavier de Belsunce (1671–1755). Immortalised by the eminent services which he rendered to the city of Marseilles during the plague of 1720. He is commemorated in the town-hall of Marseilles by a painting in which he is represented in his episcopal robes, attended by his almoners, giving relief and benediction to those stricken with the plague—

Intrepido vadens per strata cadavera passu.

Marsh (The), 1792. The 'Centre' of the Convention which assembled in the Hall of the Hundred Swiss. The Girondins occupied the Right, the Left was nicknamed the Mountain, and the Centre (nicknamed the Plain or Marsh) was composed of the peaceably inclined and moderate party.

Marshal (Earl) of England. Hereditary in the duke of Norfolk, the sole judge in questions of honour and arms. He is president of the English College of Arms, and appoints the kings-of-arms, the heralds, and the pursuivants.

There is also a knight-marshal or marshal of the royal household, and a marshal (or provost-marshal) of the Admiralty, who acts under the Court of Admiralty. The Marshal of the King's Bench was abolished in 1849.

Marshal Forwards. 'Marschall Vorwärts,' Gebhard Lebrecht von Blücher (1742–1819). So called from his familiar exhortation to his hussars, Vorwärts. 'Forwards! my children, forwards!' in the famous campaign of 1814. So again 18 June, 1815, the war-cry was 'Vorwärts!' always 'Vorwärts!'

He crossed the Rhine 1-3 Jan., 1814; defeated Napoleon at Laon, 9-10 March; commanded the centre of the allies in the attack on Paris 30 March; entered Paris 31 March; resigned 2 April, but resumed command the following April, and contributed to the victory of Waterloo.

Marshal of France, 1185. A dignity which originated with Philippe II. Auguste; in 1627, when the office of constable was suppressed, 'marshal' was the highest dignity in the state. Suppressed in 1752, but revived by Napoleon in 1804.

Marshal of the Army of God and Holy Church. So was Robert Fitz-Walter called when he led the English barons to demand of John the Great Charter.

Marshall Prize for political economy, value 15*l.*, to be spent in books. Founded for five years in the University of Cambridge by A. Marshall, M.A., of St. John's College. First awarded in 1887.

Marshalsea (The). I. The Knight Marshal's Court, commonly called the 'Palace Court,' created by Charles I., with jurisdiction within twelve miles round Whitehall. Abolished in 1849.

II. King's Bench Prison, in Southwark, where the marshal of the king's house was wont to sit, or keep his prison. Also abolished in 1849.

'Little Dorrit' was born in the Marshalsea prison, and the tale so called gives a full and graphic account of the prison and its inmates.—CHARLES DICKENS.

Marshalsea Court (The), or 'Board of Green Cloth' (q.v.), abolished with the Marshalsea Prison in 1849 (12, 13 Vict. c. 101).

Marshal is the German marschalk through the French, and means Master of the Horse.

Martel. A surname given to Karl or Charles, natural son of Pepin d'Héristal, after his great victory over Abd-el-Rahman, the Saracen invader, on the plains of Poitiers, A.D. 732.

Dès lors tous commencèrent à le surnommer 'Martel,' parce que, comme le martel [a hammer] brise toute espèce de fer, ainsi Karle, avec l'aide du Seigneur, brisait ses ennemis dans toutes les batailles.—MOISSAC, Chronique.

Similarly Judas Asmonæus was called 'Maccabæus' (the hammerer).

Martello Towers. 'Torri da Martello,' erected on the coasts of Sardinia and Corsica, 1530–1550, to defend the coast. Warning was given by striking a bell with a martello or hammer. Similar towers were erected on the Kent and Sussex coasts in 1795–1800; but coast-guardsmen have superseded their utility.

Similar towers, not now in use, have been found in Canada and in the United States.

Martin Marprelate Controversy (The), 1585. A controversy consequent on the dogmatism and tyranny of the Ecclesiastical Commission appointed by Queen Elizabeth to settle all disputes of doctrine and practice in the Church of England. Archbishop Whitgift tried to gag the press. Printing was restricted to London, and the two Universities, and all candidates for a license to print were placed under the supervision of the Company of Stationers. A series of anonymous pamphlets, signed 'Martin Marprelate,' had an enormous sale; but the press was seized, John Penry (a young Welshman) died in prison, and Udal, a minister, was put to death on the scaffold. But the mischief was done, synods and classes were organised, spread into the reign of James I., and led to the Civil War. See 'Marprelate Tracts.'

Martin's Act, for the 'better treatment of poor horses, dogs, and donkeys.' Introduced by Richard Martin, M.P., of Cro Martin, Ireland. See 'Humanity Martin.'

Martinalia. A goose-feast. After the Gauls were foiled in their attack on the Capitol by the cackling of the sacred geese, B.C. 390, they annually sacrificed a goose to their war-god. They were converted by St. Martin, and the goose-feast was changed to honour the saint. Hence Naorgeorgus—

Altera Martinus dein Bacchanalia præbet:
Quem colit anseribus populus, multoque Lyæo.

In regard to Queen Elizabeth, it is said she was dining on 9 Aug., 1588, with Sir Nevile Umfreville at Tilbury Fort when the news was brought her of the discomfiture of the Spanish Armada. There happened to be a roast goose on the table, and the queen resolved, as long as she lived, to commemorate the day with a roast goose. St. Martin's day is 11 Nov., the Armada day was 9 Aug., but the great goose-feast is on Michaelmas day, 29 Sept.

Martinière (La). There are three schools so called—one in Calcutta, one in Lucknow, and one at Lyons in France. They were built and endowed by money left for the purpose by Major-General Claude Martin (1732–1800). He was the son of a Lyons manufacturer, and entered the English army of the Indian Company, where he rose from a private to become a major-general, and accumulated 396,000*l.* sterling. He died in Lucknow.

Martinists. I. Calvinists were so called from M. Martin, president of the consistory of Geneva.

II. Disciples of Martinez Pasqualis (1710–1779). He was a Portuguese Jew, and established a cabalistic rite called Cohens, which he introduced into certain masonic lodges of Marseilles, Toulouse, and Bordeaux.

Cohen is a Hebrew word meaning priest.

Martyr City (The). Moscow, burnt in 1812 (15–18 Sept.) by the inhabitants to prevent its giving harbourage and spoil to the invading army of Napoleon. It was a magnificent holocaust, the grandest the world has ever seen.

Martyr King (The). I. Henry VI. of England (1421, 1422–1461, died 1471). The crown was claimed by Edward duke of York 16 Oct., 1460, and he was de-cared king 3 March, 1461. Henry was declared a usurper by 1 Edw. IV. c. 1 (1461); placed in Hardlough Castle, Merionethshire, 1462–1464; taken to the Tower 1466; released by Warwick, and again imprisoned by Edward IV. in April 1471; and found dead 22 May, 1471.

Here o'er the Martyr King [Hen. VI.] the marble weeps,
And fast beside him once-feared Edward [IV.] sleeps;
The grave unites where e'en the grave finds rest,
And mingled lie th' oppressor and oppressed.
POPE.

II. Charles I. of England (1600, 1625–1649).

After the Restoration January 30 was observed in the Church of England with a special religious service, 'Being the day of the Martyrdom of the Blessed King Charles I.,' &c. This service, with one or two others equally objectionable, were abolished by Act of Parliament in 1859.

III. Louis XVI. of France (1754, 1774–1793). He has as great a right to be called a 'Martyr' as Charles I., and in both cases the word is a misnomer. Both were executed by their indignant subjects, who believed that kings were made for the people, and not the people for kings. And in both cases the bolt of vengeance fell on the heads of amiable men.

Martyr means one who suffers death for the sincerity of his belief. Henry VI. believed he was lawful king; Charles I. believed he had a right divine to the crown; and Louis XVI. believed that he was right and the republicans wrong. They died 'martyrs' to their creed. Whether that creed was right or wrong is beside the question. The orthodoxy of one age may be the heterodoxy of another, and v.v. The Bollandists call Edwin king of Northumbria 'Saint and Martyr.'

Martyrs. See 'Manchester Martyrs.'

Martyrs' Era (The), A.D. 303, &c. The tenth and last persecution. It began in February, at the Roman Terminalia, or festival of the god Terminus. In this persecution fell, as it is said, St. George of Cappadocia, St. Januarius (patron saint of Naples), Quirinus bishop of Siscia, &c.

It is very doubtful whether these names, and those of many other 'martyrs,' are not apocryphal.

Martyrs' Fund (The), 1883. This was a fund organised in New York at the suggestion of Patrick Egan, 'for the families of such convicted assassins as neither pleaded guilty nor confessed their crime.'

The relatives of Caffrey, 'who apologised' for what he had done and tried to explain it away, were excluded from its benefits by the lady distributors, Miss Ellen Ford and Miss M. Doherty, 10 Nov., 1883.

Martyrs' Meeting (The), 2 July, 1883. Held at New York to do homage to the twenty-one assassins who took part in the Phœnix Park (Ireland) murders of Mr. Burke and Lord Frederick Cavendish.

Of all perversions of the word martyr this is the very worst. But Ireland has done no little to degrade the term 'martyr' into a byword and a hissing.

Marvellous Boy (The). Thomas Chatterton (1752–1770). So called by the poet Wordsworth.

Marvellous Year (The), 1588. The year of the Spanish Armada's destruction.

The first number of the 'English Mercurie' (q.v.) is supposed to have appeared this year (10 Aug.) to announce the destruction of the Armada.

Mary Queen of England, born at Greenwich (1516, 1553–1558).

Father, Henry VIII.; Mother, Katharine of Aragon; Husband, Don Filippo [Philip II.] son of Karl V. of Spain. He was a widower, aged 27, and had a son named Don Carlos. Mary was eleven years his senior.

Her style and title: 'Mary, D.G. of England, France, and Ireland, queen: Defender of the Faith, and Supreme Head of the Anglican and Hibernian Church.' After her marriage her husband was associated with her and called King Philip.

After the death of Mary Philip married Isabella of France in 1559. She died in 1568, and he married the Archduchess Anna Maria in 1570.

Philip left England in 1555, his father abdicated 5 Oct. the same year; Mary died in 1558, his father Karl V. in Sept. 1558; he married his third wife in 1559, sent the Armada against England in 1588; his ministers tried to assassinate Elizabeth in 1594, and he died in Sept. 1598.

Mary Queen of Scots. Married François [II.] of France; and, on the death of Mary queen of England in 1558, they assumed the title of king and queen of Scotland, England, and Ireland. The arms of England were also emboidered or painted on their equipage, furniture, and plate.

Father, James V. of Scotland; Mother, Mary of Lorraine; Husbands, (1) François [II.] of France; (2) Henry Lord Darnley, her cousin; (3) Bothwell.

Issue by Darnley, James VI. of Scotland and I. of England. Executed by Queen Elizabeth.

The claim of Mary Stuart was through her grandmother, a daughter of Henry VII. Elizabeth, the queen of England de facto, was daughter of Henry VIII., but had been bastardised by him.

Mary and Darnley.

HENRY VII. (Tudor) was the father of Henry VIII., and Margaret Tudor, who married twice, first James IV., and then Archibald Douglas.

HENRY VIII. was the father of Elizabeth; his sister Margaret (as wife of James IV.) was the mother of James V. Thus Elizabeth and James V. were cousins. James V. was the father of Mary queen of Scots, who was second cousin to Elizabeth.

By her second husband, Archibald Douglas, Margaret was the mother of Margaret Douglas, who married Lord Lennox, and their son was Lord Darnley (the husband of Mary queen of Scots). So Darnley was half cousin to Mary his wife.

 Both Mary and Darnley were second cousins of Elizabeth.

Mary Hall (St.), Oxford, 1333. Founded by Oriel College, to which St. Mary's Church belonged. The head of the hall is called the principal.

Maryland (U.S. America). So called in 1633 by Lord Baltimore in compliment to Henrietta Maria wife of Charles I. of England. The nickname of the Marylanders is Craw- thumpers.

Masaniello [Ma-san-yel'-lo]. A contraction of Tommaso Aniello, a fish salesman of Amalfi who in 1647 raised a revolt in Naples against the Spanish viceroy, the Duke of Arcos, in consequence of a tax levied by him on fruits and vegetables. The insurgents were successful, and for seven days Masaniello was master of Naples, when he was assassinated and his body thrown into a ditch. The seven-days' king held Naples from 10 July to 17 July, 1647.

Mason Prize for Biblical Hebrew. Value about 24*l.* a year, given to the best of the Tyrwhitt Scholars. Founded in the University of Cambridge by the friends of the Rev. Peter Hamnett Mason, M.A., Fellow of St. John's, 1883. See 'Tyrwhitt Scholarship.'

Maso'rah (The). A collection of traditionary observations (orthographical, critical, grammatical, and exegetical) which had been made by Jewish rabbins during a period of 300 years, on the Old Testament. They began to be made by a college of Jews at Tiberias, in Palestine, and were originally written on the margins of manuscripts, but were ultimately collected into separate books. Constant additions were made from the 6th to 11th cent. A.D.

There was the Great and the Little Masôrah. The Great Masorah means the entire mass given in full; also called final, because these annotations were added to the end of the Scriptures as a supplement. The Little Masorah is an abridgment, called the marginal Masorah, because it was inserted on the margins of the MSS.

Masque de Fer (Le). The Man in the Iron Mask. In the MS. memoirs of M. de la Reinterie we are told that while he was in command of the fortress of Pignerol, the Masque de Fer attempted to escape, but was recaptured. The officer who conducted him back drew his sword, when the Mask cried out in a very commanding voice: 'Songez à ce que vous faites, Monsieur! Respectez le sang de vos souverains.' M. de la Reinterie adds that he told this to several persons about the court, and gives a list of the names to whom he told it.

'Détenu prisonnier en France plus de 40 ans, il portait sans cesse sur la figure un masque noir, qui était en fer selon les uns, en velours noir selon les autres. Mis sous la garde de St.-Mars, il fut conduit au château de Pignerol en 1666, puis transféré en 1686 à l'île Ste-Marguerite, et en 1698 à la Bastille, où il mourut en 1703. Il fut enterré sous le nom de Marchiali. On a dit que c'était un frère jumeau de Louis XIV (qui est l'opinion de Voltaire, et la plus vraisemblable), qu'on aurait fait disparaître pour prévenir la rivalité des deux frères.

2. Le comte de Vermandois, fils naturel de Louis XIV et de Mlle de Vallière, qui fut enfermé pour avoir donné un soufflet au grand dauphin;

3. Le duc de Beaufort, qui disparut au siège de Candie en 1669;

4. Le duc de Monmouth, neveu de Jacques II, que la France aurait soustrait au supplice;

5. Le comte Girolamo Matthioli, ministre du duc de Mantoue, qui aurait été enlevé de Turin pour avoir empêché son maître de vendre Casal au roi de France; ou (6) Jean de Gonzague, secrétaire de Matthioli; ou (7) un fils adultérin d'Anne d'Autriche [the king's mother] et de Buckingham ou de Mazarin. La 1e hypothèse est la plus vraisemblable; mais il y a aussi des probabilités pour la 2e hypothèse.—BOUILLET, Dict. Universel (p. 1205 col. 2).

Mass. The celebration of the eucharist in the Catholic Church. The service-book, called a 'missal,' contains four parts: the Introïtus, the Consecration, the Communion, and the Post-Communio. The Canon of the Mass was compiled by Gregory the Great in 599.

The prayers of the mass are not generally in the vulgar tongue. In the Roman Church they are in Latin; in the Greek Church they are in ancient Greek; among the Maronites and Jacobites they are in Syriac. In some Eastern churches, however, and even in some Roman Catholic churches of the Eastern rites, the vulgar tongue is now used. Thus the Roumanians use the Roumanian language, and the (Roman Catholic) Melchites of Syria use the Arabic. This, however, is by a kind of toleration, and not by official sanction.

 Prohibited in England in 1548 (2, 3 Edw. VI. c. 1); in Scotland it was prohibited in 1560 under penalty of death!!

Low mass is when a single priest simply reads the service in a low voice; high mass is chanted, and several ministers assist the officiating priest. In the celebration of the mass the priest wears five special garments, two of linen and three of silk. The colour varies according to the occasions. They are white, red, green, purple, and black.

Pope Celestine introduced the Introit and the Gloria in excelsis;
Gregory the Great ordained to say the Kyrie Eleison nine times;
Gelasius ordained the Epistle and the Gospel;
Damasus ordained the Credo;
Alexander introduced this clause into the canon, qui pridie quam paterctur;
Sixtus introduced the Sanctus;
Innocent introduced the Pax;
Leo introduced the Orate Fratres, and the words in the canon, Sanctum Sacrificium et Immaculatum Hostiam.

EDWARD KINESMAN, Lives of the Saints, 1623, p. 187 (an extremely rare old book).

Derivation of the word. Du Cange says (vol. iv. p. 698):—

De vocabuli origine [Mass] variæ sunt scriptorum sententiæ. Hanc enim quidam, ut idem Baronius, ab Hebræo Missah, i.e. 'oblatio,' arcessunt;

Alii a mittendo, quod nos mittat ad Deum, ut est apud Alcuinum de Divinis Officiis. . . . Bk i. c. 2;

Alii rursum a missa, quæ vox est sacrificiorum, ut scholiastes Bedanæ Historiæ Saxonicæ, p. 4;

Verum missis ejusmodi et similibus conjecturis, constans est et receptæ ab omnibus viris eruditis sententia scribentium missam dictam a missa catechumenorum, ea scilicet parte sacræ Liturgiæ, in qua finita concione, et Epistolæ ac Evangelii lectione, catechumeni exire jubebantur, diacono dicente, Ite, Missa est.

Mass for the Dead. 'Missa Animarum.' High mass for the repose of departed souls. See 'Missa.'

Mass of Lances (The). So Igor (913–945) son of Rurik called his massacre of the priests in Paphlagonia, Pontus, and Bithynia. He compelled them to don their richest robes, and then pierced them to death in their churches with long lances.

Mass of the Catechumens (The). 'Missa Cat'echumeno'rum.' All the Communion service up to the introïtus, at which point of the service the catechumens were dismissed by the deacon with these words, 'Si quis non communiat, det locum.' See 'Mass of the Faithful.'

Mass of the Faithful (The). The communion service, from the consecration of the elements to the close. See 'Mass of the Catechumens.'

Mass of the Presanctified (The), 'Missa Præsanc'tificato'rum,' celebrated on Good Friday. No consecration of the elements takes place on that day, but the priest distributes to communicants the 'host' which was consecrated on the previous day. See 'Missa.'

In the Greek Church all through Lent a 'Presanctified Mass' is administered every day except on Saturdays and Sundays.

Massachusetts (U.S. America). An Indian word meaning the 'Blue Hills.' The 'Blue Hills' referred to are those at Milton, near Boston.

Massachusetts was the name of one of the Indian tribes.

Massacre of Amboyna (one of the Moluccas), 17 Feb., 1623. The British establishment was destroyed, and the English of the island massacred, several of them being tortured first and executed afterwards. Satisfaction for this outrage was obtained by treaty between Cromwell and the United Provinces, Aug. 30, 1654.

Massacre of Antwerp (The), 4 Aug., 1788. Troops were drawn up and cannon planted in the public square of Antwerp to keep down the populace, which had risen in insurrection because Kaiser Joseph II. had resolved to break up the university of Antwerp as that of Louvain had been broken up. The professors were turned out of doors, and the doors of the college locked. An assault was made on the soldiery; Dalton ordered the soldiers to fire on the people, and thirty or forty persons were killed, many more being wounded. All Netherlands was indignant, and Europe heard with horror of this wanton massacre.

Massacre of Athenry, in Ireland, 1599. In which the Irish put to the sword all the inhabitants because they were adopting English customs.

Massacre of Avignon, 30 Aug., 1792. Jourdan Coupe-tête and his accomplices closed the gates of Avignon, broke into the houses of the citizens, and massacred men, women, and children, on the pretence of taking vengeance on the enemies of the revolution.

Avignon, pronounce A-vi-nyŏn, with final n nasal.

Massacre of Belgrade (The), 1095. When Peter the Hermit with his rabble rout of crusaders reached Hungary a rumour was circulated that the Hungarians intended to attack them on one side of the river and the Bulgarians on the other. Some clothes belonging to crusaders were found suspended on the walls of Semlin. Peter instantly commanded the crusaders under him to attack Belgrade, and above 4,000 of the inhabitants were barbarously massacred. The dead bodies floating down the river brought the first intelligence of this shameful outrage.

Massacre of Berwick (The), Good Friday, 1296. When Edward I. entered the town of Berwick he mowed down 8,000 of the inhabitants, and burnt alive the Flemish traders who held the town-hall against him. Berwick was then the chief merchant city of the north, but sank into a petty seaport.

Some say the number massacred was 17,000.

Massacre of Chataigneraie [Shah-tain-ye-ray], 1595. This was a repetition of the massacre at Vassy. The Duc de Mercœur fell suddenly on a congregation of Huguenots, and butchered 200 men, women, and children, wholly defenceless, and guilty of no offence.

Massacre of Corcy'ra (The), B.C. 425. In the Corcyrēan sedition (q.v.) about 500 fugitives fortified themselves on the hill Itōnē, and made a compact that 'they would abide the arbitration of the Athenians.' The terms were accepted, with this proviso, 'if any one of them attempted to escape, the compact should be void.' Now follows the villanous part. The men of Corcyra sent messages to these appellants advising them to flee, as the Athenians were ill-disposed towards them. They took the bait, and fled. The truce being thus broken, the fugitives were delivered up to the Corcyreans, who imprisoned them in a large edifice. Some 60 were marched out and slain; the rest refused to quit the building, so the Corcyreans unroofed it, and massacred them all with arrows and other missiles.

Massacre of Crowland (The), A.D. 870. When the Danes marched to Crowland, the old abbot, with all the inmates of the abbey either too old or too young to save themselves by flight, assembled in the choir, with the hope of disarming by their feebleness the cruelty of the invaders. Soon a furious swarm of the barbarians rushed howling into the choir, and massacred all without mercy, except only a child of ten, which Jarl Sidroc took a fancy to and saved from death. Having put all others to the sword, the spoilers broke down the tombs and monuments, and then committed the abbey to the flames.

Massacre of Drogheda [Dro'-e-dah], 13 Aug., 1649. One of the most savage butcheries ever perpetrated. Cromwell gave orders to his soldiers to give no quarter and to spare no one. At least 2,000 men, women, and children were butchered. Some 1,000 of the people took refuge in the church, but it was set fire to, and all the inmates were burnt alive. Those who escaped both fire and sword were shipped off to Barbadoes.

Massacre of Glencoe (2 syl.), 13 Feb., 1692—i.e. the Massacre of the McDonalds of Glencoe in Argyllshire. The English government issued a proclamation that every Scotch rebel who did not come in and take the oaths of allegiance to William and Mary before 1 Jan., 1692, should be deemed a traitor and be treated accordingly. MacIan deferred doing so till 31 Dec., 1691, when he presented himself at Fort William to take the oaths. Colonel Hill said he was not a magistrate, and that MacIan must go to Inverary and swear before the sheriff. This was wholly impossible before the days of grace expired, and MacIan did not reach Inverary before 6 Jan., 1692. William signed a warrant for the extirpation of the 'rebels,' and an order was sent to Governor Hill to 'kill every man, woman, and child in the whole glen.' Colonel Hamilton was sent on the errand, and ordered Captain Campbell (better known as Glenlyon) to reconnoitre the place. Glenlyon and his men lived at Glencoe on apparently friendly terms for about a fortnight, and Lieutenant Lindsay used to play cards every night with MacIan and his sons. Having made himself fully acquainted with the glen and its inhabitants, a total slaughter was to be made on 13 Feb., early in the morning. Fortunately the treachery was discovered, and many of the glenmen escaped; but above thirty were butchered, and many of those who fled perished in the snow. In all history nothing more treacherous and brutal than this slaughter is recorded, and the names of Breadalbane, Stair, and Glenlyon are held in abhorrence for the part they took in the massacre.

Massacre of Ispahan' (The), 1721, by Mahmoud the Afghan invader. Mahmoud, having made himself master of Ispahan, resolved to reduce the whole male population to an insignificant number, and for fifteen days slaughter followed slaughter. He began with the massacre of 300 nobles and their children; then followed the slaughter of 3,000 of the shah's guard taken into his pay; then every person in the pay of the late shah, and then an indiscriminate butchery of the meaner sort.

Massacre of Magdeburg (The), 1631. In the Thirty Years' War. As many as 30,000 were killed, and upwards of 6,400 corpses were thrown into the Elbe. Tilly, by a stratagem, succeeded in forcing his way into Magdeburg, when his soldiers committed outrages which have no parallel in history except in the Sepoy insurrection in India.

Massacre of Magh-Cru, in Connaught, A.D. 90. The lower orders and old Celtic population of Ireland concerted together to cut off all the princes and chiefs while assembled at Magh-Cru for public business. The massacre succeeded, and the legitimate monarchy was overthrown. The insurgents put Carbre Catcan on the throne. He reigned five years, during all which time there was 'no grain on the stalk, no fruitfulness in the waters, the herds were barren, and but one acorn on the oak.'

Massacre of Mahmoud (The). This is the Massacre of Ispahan' (q.v.).

This Mahmoud usurped the throne of Persia, where he reigned for three years (1722-1725), when he died raving mad.

Massacre of Mérindol (The). Mérindol, in Vaucluse, was laid in ruins by the Président d'Oppède because it was the abode of Vaudois. The entire population was exterminated. It has since recovered, and is still a stronghold of Protestants.

Massacre of Mithrida'tês (The), B.C. 88. During the marriage festival of Mithridātês VI. king of Pontus with a young Greek woman of Stratonicēa, he sent forth an edict to every city in the province of Asia to massacre every Italian within its borders. In one day as many as 80,000 Italians were slaughtered in compliance with this edict.

This cannot but call to mind the Massacre of St. Bartholomew's Eve, during the marriage festivities of Henri [Henri IV.] and the Princess Marguerite.

Massacre of Muscovites by the Poles (The), 1611. While Vladislaus son of Sigismund III. was fighting his way to the throne of Russia, the Poles fell upon Moscow and massacred above 100,000 defenceless women, old men, and children.

Massacre of Nancy [Nahn-see'], Aug. 1790. The inhabitants of Nancy, having risen in rebellion, were attacked by Bouillé, commander of the royal army, who marched from Metz upon the insurgents. A fearful slaughter of rebels ensued, known in French history as the Massacre of Nancy. This was only a month after the supposed settlement of the differences between king and people by the famous 'civil oath' taken in the Champ de Mars 13 July, 1790.

Champ de Mars, pronounce Sharnd Mar.

Massacre of Nishapûr (The), 1269. We are told by several historians that the slaughter at Nishapûr by Gengis Khan was 1,747,000 human beings, and that it took twelve days to count the dead (Petit la Croix and Habeeb al Seyer).

Massacre of Nismes [Neem], 1 April, 1703 (Palm Sunday). Marshal de Montreuil, being informed that some 300 Camisards were assembled in a mill near Nismes for religious worship, hastened with a troop of soldiers to the place, burst open the doors, and put to the sword those assembled. The process being too slow, he set fire to the mill, and only one, a young girl, escaped, and she was hanged the next day.

In 1791 and 1815 were bloody religious and political massacres at Nismes.

Massacre of Otranto (The), 1480. The slaughter of 800 ecclesiastics by Mahomet II., when he took Otranto. We are told that the corpses of these martyrs, though left unburied for thirteen months, showed no signs of corruption, and were never violated by bird or beast. They were ultimately interred at Naples; but when Solyman the Magnificent, in 1537, threatened Otranto with assault, the ghosts of these ecclesiastics, with a host of angels, appeared on the ramparts and saved the city. Again, in 1644, the same ghostly army averted another Turkish assault, and those who professed that they could not see the army of martyrs were put to death.

Massacre of Pa'via (The), Aug., A.D. 408. As the Emperor Honorius was passing through Bologna, a mutiny of the guards gave Olympius a pretext for cutting off the friends of Stilicho, whom he sought to supplant. Accordingly, two prætorian prefects of Gaul and Italy, two generals of cavalry and infantry, the master of offices, the quæstor, the treasurer, and the count of the domestics were massacred. The lives of many others were lost also; many houses were plundered, and on the 23rd Stilicho himself was basely put to death.

The death of Eucherius the son of Stilicho followed; the Emperor Honorius had divorced his wife Thermantia daughter of Stilicho, and all the friends of Stilicho who had escaped the massacre were persecuted with relentless acrimony by Olympius. Even his wife Serēna (niece of Theodosius the Great and foster-mother of Honorius) did not escape, being absurdly accused of purloining the magnificent necklace of the statue of Vesta. When Alaric invested Rome she was strangled.

Massacre of Peterborough (The), A.D. 870. The monastery of Peterborough was the glory of the age, and its library unequalled; but the Danes, having destroyed Crowland Abbey, marched to Peterborough bent on its destruction also. They assailed the monastery gates, they attacked the walls, they forced their way in, slew the old abbot and all the monks. Every other inmate of the place was massacred. The much-admired monastery and its valuable treasures were ruthlessly set on fire, and the conflagration continued for fifteen days.

Massacre of Rathlin (The), 22, 23 July, 1575. The island being taken by Essex, the Scotch were massacred.

Massacre of St. George's Fields (The), 1768. Six men shot and fifteen wounded by the soldiers in the Wilkes riots. Wilkes had been cast into the King's Bench, and the mob, demanding his release, assembled tumultuously in St. George's Fields. The soldiers being called out were violently assailed, and gave chase to a man with a red waistcoat. They shot a man with a red waistcoat, but it was not the right man. The mob became frantic, and the soldiers, being ordered to fire on them, killed six and wounded fifteen.

Massacre of Savenay [Sahvenay], 22 Dec., 1793. Here the Vendéans were massacred by the republicans under Kléber and Marceau. The Vendéans had fled to Brittany, but most of them returned, and on their route were attacked by the republicans. They retreated to Mons, where they were defeated, and they then crossed the Loire; but the republicans wedged them in at Savenay, between the Loire, the Vilaine, and the sea, overwhelmed them with artillery, and literally cut to pieces every man, woman, and child with merciless fury. Kléber wrote to the Convention, 'The Vendéans are not only quieted, they are no more.'

This dispatch was an exaggeration, for they were in arms up to 19 Feb., 1795, when they submitted.

Massacre of Scullabogue Barn (The), 1798. In the Great Irish Rebellion. This massacre by the rebels, and that at Wexford Bridge, were the most fearful of all the outrages in this terrible insurrection.

Wexford was the head-quarters of the rebels.

Massacre of September (The). 2, 3, 4, 5 Sept., 1792, when 300 assassins were sent by Danton, the 'minister of justice' in Paris, to the different prisons to massacre all the prisoners 'suspected of being averse to the revolution.' The prisons they were sent to were Les Carmes, the Abbaye, the Force, the Bernardins, and Bicêtre; and the number of persons massacred was about 10,000, chiefly ecclesiastics or gentry. Amongst the assassinated was the Princesse de Lamballe, the queen's friend, and superintendent of her household.

Ecclesiastics were confined in Les Carmes (a Carmelite convent). Aristocrats were confined in L'Abbaye. Among the ecclesiastics who fell were the Archbishop of Arles and the Bishop of Saintes. If the 'judge' said to the warder 'Convey the prisoner hence to some other prison,' which he named, it was a sentence of death.

Massacre of Siniga'glia (The), 1502. Paolo Orsini, Francesco Orsini, Vitellozzo Vitelli, Oliverotto da Fermo, and some other of the great magnates of Italy conspired to assassinate Cesare Borgia; but Cesare by craft contrived to assemble them, apart from their troops, in the castle of Sinigaglia, and there every one of them was strangled.

Massacre of Smerwick (The), 1579. In the reign of Queen Elizabeth Felipe of Spain sent an army of 700 men to Kerry, thinking that all Ireland would flock to his standard. They entrenched themselves in the fort of Smerwick; but the fort was obliged to surrender to the queen's troops, and Lord Grey, the lord deputy, ordered the whole garrison to be massacred.

Massacre of Stockholm (The). Sten Sture, the administrator of Sweden, consented to the elevation of Gustavus Trolle to the see of Upsala. Gustavus was a tool of Christian II. king of Denmark, and promised to do his best to betray Sweden into his hands. His treason being found out, he was compelled to resign, and his castle was razed to the ground. Leo X. placed Sweden under an interdict, and confided to Christian king of Denmark the task of punishing the schismatics. Accordingly, the Danish king invaded Sweden and, having effected a landing, was publicly crowned at Stockholm. During the coronation festival, Gustavus Trolle demanded of the king 'justice and revenge'; and on 8 Nov., 1520, at dawn, all the gates of the city being closed, 94 of the leading men of the city opposed to the invader were massacred. The victims consisted of ecclesiastics, senators, knights, and burgomasters. In this slaughter fell the father of Gustavus Vasa.

Massacre of Thessaloni'ca (The), A.D. 390. The Thessalonians, being goaded into insurrection by being deprived of their favourite charioteer, Circus, slew Botheric, the Roman governor, and several of his officers. Theodosius sent word to his ministers to avenge the death of his lieutenant, and they proclaimed a grand show in the circus, given by the emperor. When the amphitheatre was full, and the trumpet sounded for the sports to begin, a number of soldiers rushed on the assembly, and put them indiscriminately to death. The massacre was estimated to be between 7,000 and 15,000 persons (Gibbon, chap. xxvii.).

Massacre of Vassy (The), 1 March, 1562. A massacre of the Huguenots by the Guises. This was the beginning of that religious war which desolated France in the latter half of the 16th cent.

About 1,200 Huguenots had assembled in a large barn, and were celebrating their worship under the protection of the edict of January (q.v.), when the Duke de Guise with a large escort rode by shouting 'Huguenots! dogs! rebels!' Some of the Huguenots shut the doors, when the Duke's escort cried aloud, 'Kill! kill! mort dieu! Kill the rebels!' Stones were thrown, and Guise received a blow on his forehead. The fray became serious, 60 were slain and 200 wounded. Morel the minister was seized, but subsequently escaped. (See FELICE, 'Hist. of the Protestants of France,' v.)

Massacre of Wyo'ming (The). In Pennsylvania, June and July 1778. The whole colony was either butchered or driven into exile by the British and Indians under Colonel John Butler, during the American War of Independence. Campbell has a poem on the subject, entitled 'Gertrude of Wyoming.'

Massacre of 1641 (The). Ireland. The Catholics of Ulster whose estates had been confiscated entered into a general conspiracy to extirpate the English settled in Ireland. Roger More headed the insurgents, and Richelieu promised him a supply of French troops. The plot was discovered and frustrated, but O'Neale and his confederates were in arms and seized the houses, cattle, and goods of the English in Ulster. A general massacre followed; public buildings were burnt to the ground, private houses destroyed, the rebellion spread, and 40,000 persons perished before the onslaught could be stayed. It was ten years before the rebellion was stamped out, because Charles I. was too much occupied with his own affairs to attend to those of Ireland.

Massacre of the Albigenses (The). 1208–1224 (Philippe II. Auguste); 1227 (Louis VIII. le Lion); 1545–1547 (François I.). The Albigenses were religious reformers, and the first massacre was entrusted by Philippe Auguste to Simon de Montfort, 'the French Maccabæus.' He massacred 20,000 of them at Beziers, and burnt 450 to death at Carcassone (3 syl.). The second massacre was urged on by Pope Honorius III., who commanded Louis le Lion to 'purge his land of heretics.' The third massacre was in the reign of François I., who commissioned John of Oppido to root out the accursed heretics, and the baron but too faithfully executed this horrible commission. All the inhabitants of 22 towns and villages were put to the sword or burnt to death at midnight in their own houses.

How Catholics can declaim against the persecutions of the Roman emperors is past understanding. Oh! for the beam and the mote!

Massacre of the Arabian Brigands, 1802. The emirs, the kadis, and fakirs' contrived a plot to extirpate the Arabian brigands. Having got together four companies of men, they fell on the brigands north, south, east, and west simultaneously. 'And,' we are told, 'from the province of Djized on the west to that of Atfih on the east, every Arab, old or young, male or female, was ruthlessly massacred. Of these 16,000 were ripped up; and if a fugitive Arab took refuge in a town, the word dakik was put to him as a shibboleth, and if the Arabic word kaf was heard, instant death followed' (Taki-Eddin Ahmad Makrizi, 'History of the Mamlook Sultans,' translated by M. Quatremère).

Massacre of the Armagnacs [Ar-ma-nyak], 11, 12, 13 June, 1418, by the Paris mob. The Parisians had been driven to madness by the Burgundian and Armagnac factions, increased by the invasions of Henry V., the scandalous conduct of Queen Isabella, and the imbecility of the king. In their fury they fell on the Orléanists and Armagnacs, hoping to extirpate them, under the belief that they were in alliance with the English. We are told that 14,000 were slaughtered in three days, beginning with Sunday, 12 June. The constable, the chancellor, six bishops, 3,500 persons of rank, besides the common people, fell in this dreadful massacre at Paris.

Massacre of the Benjamites (3 syl.). Judges xx. A Levite having lodged a complaint against the Benjamites respecting a concubine, 400,000 Israelites took up arms to punish the offending tribe. The Benjamites in self-defence flew to arms, and brought to the field 26,000 men of war, and 700 men of Gibeah (v. 15). In the first day's conflict the Benjamites slew 22,000 Israelites, and on the second day 18,000 more (a total of 40,000). Finding they had no chance in open fight, the Israelites laid an ambush in the meadows of Gibeah, and pretending to flee, inveigled the Benjamites to the meadow, when the ambush fell on them and slew 25,100 of them (v. 35).

It is quite beyond the scope of this dictionary to reconcile these statements, which seem to require some amendment. All that is here set down is the fact that the Benjamites were almost extirpated in this massacre.

Massacre of the Ben-Ouffias, by the French, 6 April, 1833. The whole subjugation of Algeria by the French is marked by treachery; but none of their acts was more disgraceful than the massacre of the Ben-Ouffias by General Savary duc de Rovigo. On 6 April, 1833, he sent a battalion of the foreign legion and a squadron of chasseurs to fall on these unsuspecting victims in the dark hours of the night, and at daybreak they were all dead men, who had been massacred in their sleep. Savary returned to Paris death-stricken, and died the June following.

This calls to mind the narrative of Lactantius in his 'De Mortibus Persecutorum.'

Massacre of the Blues. All Constantinople in the 6th cent. was divided into two factions, the Greens and the Blues. Anastăsius the emperor was a Green (491–518), and the Greens, having concealed daggers, entered the hippodrome, and massacred 3000 of the Blues.

Justinian the Great was a Blue (527-565), and then the Blues were the nuisance of the streets, molesting, robbing, brawling, and even murdering those found in the streets after sunset.

Massacre of the Burgundians in Soissons [Swossŏng], 1414. When the Armagnacs drove the Burgundians out of Paris they marched to Compiègne and laid siege to Soissons. When the gates were opened the Armagnacs rushed in and perpetrated one of the most frightful massacres in history. Men, women, and children were slaughtered without mercy; the churches and monasteries were pillaged; the sacred vestments and ornaments were scattered; the relics and images demolished; the heads of the governor and his chief officers were cut off, and 200 Englishmen were hanged.

Massacre of the Champ de Mars, 17 July, 1791. When La Fayette and the mayor Bailly dispersed the mob assembled in the Champ de Mars to petition for the abolition of royalty. Brissot had prepared the petition, and the people were called upon to sign it on Sunday 17 July, at the wooden altar in the Champ de Mars. Brissot did not put in an appearance, and the mob, tired of waiting, drew up their own petition, still preserved in the archives of Paris. At 6 p.m. Bailly the mayor and La Fayette with his national guards arrived to disperse the crowd. The mob assailed them, and La Fayette commanded the guards to fire. Several were killed and more wounded; some say thousands; Desmoulins put the number at 400, but probably between 80 and 40 was the real number. A terrible panic ensued, and all the 'patriots' hid themselves till the panic had passed away.

Massacre of the Danes (The). St. Bryce's day, 13 Nov., 1002. On this night Ethelred the Unready caused all the Danes in the kingdom to be secretly murdered. This massacre was accompanied with circumstances of shocking barbarity. Among other cruelties, the Danish women were placed in holes in the earth as deep as their waists, and then mastiff dogs were set on them. The sister of Sweyn was not spared. Her name was Gunilda, and she is said to have been married to a noble Dane settled in England, and named Paleng. Her children were first murdered in her presence, and she herself afterwards.

Her brother Sweyn (or Sueno) Fork-Beard (q.v.) in revenge subjugated all England, and was crowned king in 1013.

Massacre of the Gothic Youths (The), A.D. 378. After the battle of Hadrianople, so disastrous to the Romans, and the death of Valens, Julius master-general of the troops proposed to the senate a general massacre of all the Gothic youths distributed for purposes of education through the different cities of the East. Having concerted his plans, the Gothic youths were invited to assemble on a given day in the forum 'for the purpose of receiving a grant of land.' They assembled according to the proclamation, and being assembled were all indiscriminately slaughtered.

Massacre of the Greens, A.D. 532. Justinian (527–565) was a Blue, his predecessor Anastasius (491–518) had been a Green. The two factions united for a few days in the 'Nika Sedition' (q.v.), but the Blues separated again, and the two factions were as fierce as ever. The place of general assembly was the hippodrome; and one day Belisarius with his veteran troops entered the place to quell a disturbance. The Blues left in a body, and 'more than 30,000 Greens were massacred.'

Massacre of the Helots, B.C. 424. The eighth year of the Peloponnesian War was notorious for the massacre of 2,000 Helots by the Lacedæmonians. Alarmed lest these slaves should turn against them, the ephors proclaimed that all Helots who had distinguished themselves during the war should come forward and claim their liberty. A large body appeared, out of whom 2,000 were selected as worthy of emancipation. Crowned with garlands, these unhappy Helots were secretly massacred by the ephors, to rid the state of what might prove a future danger.

Massacre of the Innocents (The). At the birth of Jesus, Herod the Great, in order to destroy 'the future king of the Jews,' massacred all the infant children of Bethlehem from two years old and under.

Micah v. 2 tells us that Bethlehem was a little place; it was a suburban village. Suppose it contained a thousand inhabitants, the male infants under two years of age would be about half a dozen.

Massacre of the Italians (The), by Mithridātēs, B.C. 88. Mithridātēs king of Pontus, during the solemnities of his marriage with a Greek woman of Stratonicēa, sent forth an edict to every city in the province of Asia to put to death every Italian within its borders. In one day as many as 80,000 Italians were massacred in compliance with this edict.

This reminds us of the massacre of St. Bartholow's Eve, which was also executed during the marriage festivities of Henri [Henri IV.] and the Princess Marguerite.

Massacre of the Jan'izaries (The), 15 June, 1826. The janizaries were organised (1326–1359) into the sultan's body-guard by Orchan sultan of Turkey. In 1800 they were increased to 115,000 men, but became, like the Roman prætorian guard, too powerful, and Mahmoud II., who owed his throne to them, resolved to suppress such a dangerous power. A mutiny being excited, the sultan unfurled the sacred standard, and the soldiers cut down the janizaries with grapeshot in the narrow streets of Constantinople. At least 20,000 fell, and the rest were disbanded.

The Janisaries deposed Bajazet II. in 1512, and raised Selim to the throne; in 1585 they compassed the death of Amurath II.; in 1622 they deposed and slew Othman II.; the same year they elevated and deposed Mustapha; in 1649 they deposed Ibrahim; in 1703 they deposed Mustapha II.; in 1730 they procured the death of the grand vizier, imprisoned Achmet III., and elevated Mohammed: in 1806 they slew Selim III.; and in 1826 they rebelled against Mahmoud, and were stamped out.

Massacre of the Ma'gians (The), B.C. 522. On the death of Cambyses king of Persia, the Magians, one of the six tribes of the Medes, put forward one of their number, named Patizithês, to assume the name of Smerdis son of Cyrus, who had been put to death by his brother Cambÿsês. Darius Hystaspês discovered the conspiracy and made a general massacre of the Magi.

Massacre of the Mameluke Beys, 1811. At Cairo Egypt was governed by 300 Mameluke beys, but Mehemet Ali, pacha of Egypt, supplanted these 300, and kept the government in his own hands. Fearful of a rising, the pacha invited all the beys to a splendid procession in honour of his son Tossun being created general-in-chief. They came in all their pomp, but being within the palace court, were fired on by the pacha's soldiery and killed. Mehemet then sent to the governors of his several provinces to send the respective beys in chains to Cairo, where they were put to death. The entire number of beys thus massacred was from 600 to 700.

Massacre of the Mar'onites (3 syl.) or Christians of Syria by the Drusês. It began 28 May, 1860; massacre at Hasbeyd 5 June, 1860; massacre at Deir-el-Kammer, 21 June; massacre at Damasus 9 and 10 July, 1860.

The Druses inhabit the range of Mount Lebanon, and divide possession of some 200 towns with the Maronites. Their religion is a mixture of the Jewish, Christian, and Mohammedan. The Maronites, since 1445, have been united to the Church of Rome. See 'Druses.'

Massacre of the Mitylenæans (The), B.C. 427. A large number of prisoners fell into the hands of the Athenians in the Mitylenæan war. It was discussed by the conquerors how these prisoners should be disposed of, and Cleon advocated their instant massacre. After more than 2,000 had been put to death, the Athenians sickened with the wholesale slaughter, and the massacre was stopped.

Massacre of the Monks of Bangor, A.D. 607. Ethelfrith king of Northumbria attacked Chester. Hard by the city 2,000 monks assembled in the monastery of Bangor, and after a three days' fast, followed the British army to the field. Ethelfrith watched the wild gestures and outstretched arms of these monks as they stood apart invoking the vengeance of heaven on the foe. He took them for enchanters, and cried aloud, 'Bear they arms or no arms, they cry against us to their gods,' and as he spoke his soldiers rushed upon them, and put them all to the sword.

These monks were praying for the success of Brocmail king of Powys, but when his army saw the massacre, it fled, and the victory of Ethelfrith was complete.

Massacre of the Paulicians (The). The Paulicians were the Huguenots of the 8th and 9th cents., and Theodora was the Catharine de Medicis who 'hated them with a perfect hatred.' In a few years this zealous empress put to death by gibbet, stake, or sword 100,000 of these Christians. See 'Slaughter,' 'Persecutions,' &c.

This is a long and sickening list, but by no means exhaustive. No mention, for example, is here made of the many massacres of the Jews, in which Russia of modern states stands sadly pre-eminent.

Massil'ianism. The same as 'Semi-pela'gianism' (q.v.): so called from Massilia, the Latin for Marseille, whence the 'heresy' arose.

The doctrine was this: Man can go to the palace door, but must be ushered into the presence-chamber. In other words, man can repent, forsake sin, and wish to be a Christian, but having thus come to the door, God's grace must then lead him all the rest of the way till he enters into the presence-chamber of God.

Massoretes (3 syl.). Jews who helped to fix the vowel points of the Hebrew Scriptures on the authority of tradition (massōra). The vowels added by these doctors are called the Massoretic points.

The main authority for these points is the school of Tiberius in the 5th cent.

Master. In Oxford University, the title held by the head of three of the colleges, Balliol, Pembroke, and University College. In Cambridge University the head of King's College is called the provost and of Queen's president, but of all the other colleges he is called the master.

Master of Gray (The). Son of Lord Gray, employed by Queen Elizabeth to undermine the influence of Stuart earl of Arran in Scotland. In 1585 Arran was driven from the royal presence and his estates were confiscated.

Master of Sentences (The), 'Magister Sententiarum.' Peter Lombard the Schoolman, who died 1164. So called from his book entitled 'Sententiarum Libri IV.,' a collection of quotations or sentences from St. Augustine and other Fathers on sundry points of Christian doctrine, with objections and replies. It was a manual for the scholastic disputants of the middle ages.

Master of the Buckhounds. Who has control of all matters relating to the royal hunts, with a salary of 1,700*l.* a year, but he goes out of office with a change of ministry.

Master of the Ceremonies, 1603. Instituted for the more ceremonious reception of ambassadors and persons of distinction.

Beau Nash was called 'Master of the Ceremonies,' but all that this designation signified was that he arranged dictatorially the amusements at Bath, or was president of the Bath entertainments.

Master of the Horse. The third great officer of the court, having the superintendence of the royal stables. He is master of the equerries, pages, grooms, coachmen, saddlers, farriers, and all artificers working in the royal stables. He is responsible for the disbursements in his department, but his accounts are audited. On state occasions he rides next to the sovereign. The salary is 2,500*l.* a year.

Master of the Household. An officer in the lord steward's department whose duty it is to superintend the choice of servants. Salary 1,158*l.* a year.

Master of the Rolls, in Chancery, 1286. A judge of the Court of Chancery, who ranks next to the lord chancellor. Since 1838 he has been keeper of the public records; his salary is 7,000*l.* a year.

He has a deputy-keeper, with several assistants and senior clerks.

Master-singers, 1850–1570. The highest degree of the Guild of Rhetoric in Germany. The three degrees were apprentices, companions, and masters. The guild consisted of poets and musicians; the former were, strictly speaking, master-poets, and the latter master-singers. These literary guilds were first established in Mainz, Nürnberg, and Strasburg. They held their guild every Sunday in the cathedral of the city, and Karl IV. gave them corporate rights and a corporate seal. By far the most eminent of these master-singers was Hans Sachs (1494–1578), a cobbler by trade, but a true genius, and prince of satirists.

Sachs, pronounce Sax.

Master's Side (The), for murderers and other capital offenders.

When Newgate was used as the chief convict prison, the 'Master's side' was the part so appropriated.

Masters (The Four): 1. Michael O'Clerighe, who died 1643; 2. Cucoirighe O'Clerighe; 3. Maurice Conry; 4. Fearfeassa Conry; authors of 'Annals of Donegal.'

O'Clerighe is sometimes Anglicised into Clerkson and Cucoirighe into Peregrine.

Masters and Fraternity of the Passion and Resurrection (The), 13th to 15th cents. A company of monks incorporated by Charles VI. of France to represent dramatically in churches religious mysteries. The most famous of their dramas were 'The Passion,' 'The Resurrection,' 'The Incarnation,' and 'St. Catherine.' The first two were performed before the king on his marriage with Isabeau of Bavaria See 'Ober-Ammergau.'

Masters in Chancery. Chief officers under the judges in the Court of Chancery, whose duty it was to take minutes of the proceedings, and tax the bills of cost. Abolished 1852.

Masters of Court. The chief officers under the judges. Their duties are to attend the sittings of the courts during term, make minutes of the proceedings, and to tax bills of costs.

Matemans. So the Lollards were called from their frugal lives and the poverty of their appearance. Also called 'Alexians' (q.v.), 'Brethren and Sisters of Alexius,' and 'Cellites' (q.v.). They rose in Antwerp about 1300, and were admitted by Sixtus IV. amongst the religious orders in 1472.

Materialists. Those who believe that man has only a material nature, and that thought, conscience, intelligence, &c. are works of the brain. They deny the existence of soul or spirit, and deny also all that is supernatural, as the spirit god, miracles, and the resurrection.

Mathematicians (2nd cent.). Astrologers, magicians, and diviners. In Justinian's code is a chapter headed De Maleficis et Mathematicis; and the Theodosian code enjoins the banishment of mathematicians from all Roman cities and the burning of their books.

Mathematics (Professorship of). In the University of Cambridge, 1663, founded by Henry Lucas, and endowed with an estate in Bedfordshire worth 150*l.*; but the present stipend is 850*l.* See 'Sadlerian Professorship, &c.,' 'Smith's Prizes,' 'Lucasian Professor,' 'Adams' Prize.'

Mathi'as, brother of Rudolf II., and son of Maximilian II.; kaiser-king of Germany of the House of Austria (1556, 1612–1619). Having no child, he adopted his cousin Ferdinand, in whose reign was the Thirty Years' War against the Protestants. Contemporary with James I.

Father, Maximilian II. [his brother Rudolf II. preceded him on the throne]; Mother, Mary, daughter of Kaiser Karl V.; Wife, Anne of Austria, no issue. Contemporary with James I.

Mathurins (The), or 'Maturins,' 1199. A religious order instituted by St. Jean de Matha and Félix de Valois for the redemption of Christian slaves in Barbary. They were originally called Trinitaires, or Les Religieux de la Sainte Trinité. The name 'Mathurins' was given to them in France, because in 1226 they occupied a church built in Paris in honour of St. Mathurin. The order was suppressed in 1790.

St. Mathurin (Maturinus) lived in the 4th and 5th cent. He was a confessor born in Sens and buried at Larchant, in the Gâtinais, where a church was erected to his honour. Another was built in Paris, which was given to the Trinitarians. His relics are preserved in the parish church of Moncontour, in Brittany, and many pilgrims during Pentecost flock to the church every year.

Matilda the Good, cousin and first wife of Henry I. of England, daughter of Malcolm king of Scotland. Married 1100. died 1118.

Matins, or 'Nocturns.' One of the eight daily services of the Catholic Church, and the first of the four great ones at daybreak. See 'Canonical Hours.'

Matronalia, 1 March. The festival of the Roman matrons to commemorate the reconciliation of the Sabine women with their fathers and brothers after the 'Rape of the Sabines.'

Matthew Parker's Bible, 1572. The second folio edition of the 'Great Bible' (q.v.), with corrections and several prolegomena under the supervision of Archbishop Parker. See 'Bibles.'

Matthews' Bible, 1537. A version of the Bible in English edited by John Rogers, superintendent of an English church in Germany, and published by him under the fictitious name of Thomas Matthews. It was based on the translations of Tyndale and Miles Coverdale. 'Cranmer's Great Bible' was a corrected edition of Matthews' Bible. See 'Bibles.'

Mat'urins (The). See 'Mathurins.'

Matutinal Mass. 'Missa Matutinalis,' a mass 'quæ post exactas matutinas dicitur.' The matutinæ follow the nocturns. See 'Mass.'

Matutinæ in profestis et dominicis, quibus tardius nocturnæ preces persolvebantur. — Du Cange, vol. iv. p. 607, col. 1.

Matuti'nus Pater, i.e. 'Father of the Morning'; so Janus was called by the ancient Romans, and prayers were addressed to him by pious Romans every morning.

Our word January is derived from this mythological deity.

Mausole'um (The), B.C. 351, or Sepulchre of Mausōlus of Caria, built by his widow Artemis'ia, and considered one of the seven wonders of the world. A.D. 1500 the sculptures of this marvellous mausoleum were actually employed by the knights of Rhodes in fortifying Halicarnassos! Some of the sculptures have been rescued, and in 1846 were placed in the British Museum, as the 'Budrum Marbles.'

Max O'Rell. The pen-name of Paul Blouet, author of 'John Bull and his Island,' &c. His grandfather was Max Blouet, an officer in the French army. Being taken prisoner he was sent to England, and fell in love with an Irish girl, named O'Rell, whom he married.

Maxima Cæsariensis. One of the five provinces into which Britain was divided in the reign of the Emperor Sevērus. It included the northern part of England extending to the Wall of Sevērus, between the Tyne and the Solway. It had its own ruler, but that ruler was subject to the præfect or governor-general of the island.

Maximilian I., 'the Pennyless' and 'Taciturn.' Second monarch of the house of Austria (or Habsburg). Like his father, he died from a surfeit of melons (1459, 1486–1519).

Father, Kaiser Friedrich III. the Pacific; Mother, Elenore of Portugal; Wives, (1) Mary of Burgundy, only child of Charles le Téméraire, and heiress of 17 provinces; (2) Bianca Maria [Sforza] niece of Ludovico Sforza Il Moro. Contemporary with Henry VII. and VIII.

His eldest son was Philippe the Handsome, who married the Infanta Juaña of Spain (daughter of Ferdinand and Isabella), by which marriage Spain became united to the house of Austria. Philippe died leaving issue the famous Karl V. (Charles-quint) afterwards King of Spain, Austria, and America (the Golden Age of Spain). It was the son of Karl V. who married Mary queen of England.

'' It was a magnificent period of European history—the period of Luther, the Humanists, printing, and Columbus. The popes were Alexander VI., Pius III., Julius II., and Leo X. The first of these was the patron of Michael Angelo and Raphael. In Spain were Ferdinand and Isabella; in Portugal Emmanuel the Great, founder of the Portuguese navy, the Mœcenas of Arts and Sciences, and the friend of Vasco da Gama. In England were Henry VIII. and Cardinal Wolsey; and in Turkey was Bajaset II., the conqueror of Constantinople.

Maximilian II. Kaiser-king of Germany (1525, 1564–1576), nephew of Karl V. (Charles-quint), and of the house of Austria. He had fifteen children.

Father, Ferdinand I.; Mother, Anne; Wife, Mary his cousin, daughter of Karl V. Contemporary with Elizabeth.

May (The Maids'). There were four historic Mays in the eventful life of 'the Maid' (Jeanne d'Arc).

1. At Vaucouleurs the Maid announced her mission to De Baudricourt, governor of Vaucouleurs, in May 1428.

2. At Orléans she compelled the English to raise the siege, 8 May, 1429.

3. At Compiègne she was besieged by the Duke of Burgundy and the English, May 1430; captured in a sortie against the Burgundian quarters, 24 May; given up to the English; and condemned to be burnt as a heretic by the University of Paris, 24 May, 1431.

4. At Rouen she was burned to death, 30 May, 1431.

Some say she was not burnt, but married to Robert des Armoises about 1438; that she was living in 1444; and that her sentence was reversed by the pope 7 July, 1456.

May Meetings (The). The great annual religious meetings held in Exeter Hall, Strand, London, during the month of May.

May 31 (The Day of), 1793. In the French Revolution, the commencement of the Reign of Terror, when the people of Paris, conducted by Henriot, invaded the Convention, compelled them to set Hébert at liberty, and to arrest the Girondins (q.v.).

The Reign of Terror was from 31 May, 1793, to 27 July, 1794 (the fall of Robespierre).

Maynooth [The Royal College of St. Patrick], in Ireland, 1795. Founded by Act of the Irish Parliament for the education of students designed for the Catholic priesthood. It was incorporated and endowed in 1845 by Acts 8, 9 Vict. c. xxv.; but in 1869 these acts were repealed, and the college received a large endowment in lieu of its previous annual subvention.

Mayor (In England). The title of Bailiff was changed to that of 'Mayor of London' in the reign of Henry II. Richard I., in 1189, granted the citizens the right of choosing their own mayor; and the title was changed to Lord Mayor in 1354 by Edward III.

The chief magistrate of York was made Lord Mayor in 1389.

The first mayor of Dublin was appointed in 1409, and he was styled Lord Mayor in 1665 by Charles II.

The Mayor of the Palace, in France, existed as far back as 560, but merged into royalty on the accession of Pepin le Bref in 752.

The title of 'Right Honourable' was conferred on the Lord Mayor of London by Edward III. His salary is 8,000*l.* for the year of office.

The first Lord Mayor's Show was in 1454, when Sir John Norman went by water to be sworn in at Westminster.

Mayor (The). Elected since the 'Municipal Corporations Act' (q.v.) in 1835, from the councillors. If any councillor so elected does not choose to serve, he must pay a fine of 100*l.* The qualification of a mayor is the fact that he is a councillor, and if any other person serves in the office the fine is 50*l.* The mayor presides at all meetings of the council, and has (during his year of office) precedence in all places within the borough. He revises, with his two assessors, the burgess list, which he must sign in open court. He presides at the election of councillors, and is magistrate for the borough both during his official year and for the year following, when he is deputy mayor. He is also the returning officer at the election of members of Parliament.

Mayor of Garrett (The), 1741. Garrett is a hamlet between Tooting and Wandsworth in Surrey. The first mayor was the chairman of a club organised to prevent encroachments on the common. An encroachment took place not long afterwards, and the villagers won their suit, with costs, during a general election after Walpole's resignation. The event was celebrated by the election of a 'Mayor of Garrett,' who held office so long as the parliament sat, and with every new parliament a new mayor was elected, whose inauguration was celebrated with a village feast. Foote wrote a farce entitled 'The Mayor of Garrett.'

There have been several such 'mockery mayors.' As the Seaside Mayor of Newcastle-under-Lyme; the mock mayor of Bandwick in Gloucestershire; the mock mayor of Weston near Bath, &c.

Mayor of the Palace (The). 'Major domus'; in French 'Maire du Palais,' keeper of the privy purse and superintendent of the royal household in France. The Mayor of the Palace became the head of the aristocracy, and was the virtual ruler of France during the reigns of the Rois Fainéants (638–742). The office was curtailed by the Carlovingian kings and abolished by Hugues Capet.

Mazarin of Letters (The). D'Alembert (1717–1783), French mathematician, philosopher, and encyclopædist.

Maz'arinades (4 syl.), 1649–1652. Political squibs during the Fronde war. 'Près de quatre mille écrits satiriques, la plupart dirigés contre Mazarin, et dictés par la haine la plus âcre.' Motteville says, 'Never man of equal authority pardoned so many of his enemies, and never man committed so few to prison.'

Mazarine Bible (The). The Gutenberg (? Schöffer) Bible, the earliest book printed in movable metal type. It contains no date, but a copy in the 'Bibliothèque Mazarine,' formed in 1648 for the Cardinal Mazarin by G. Naudé, and given to the public in 1688, contains the date of the illuminator Cremer, 1456, so that the Bible must have been printed before that date. Only seven copies in vellum exist, but there are known to be twenty-two copies on paper, some of them very imperfect. In 1855 Mr. Quaritch, bookseller, of Piccadilly (according to the 'Methodist Recorder'), gave 3,900*l.* for a copy at Sir J. Thorold's; certainly in 1887 he gave 2,650*l.* for the copy in the library of the late Earl of Crawford. One was sold in 1873 for 3,400*l.*, and a copy was sold in 1889 for 2,000*l.* See 'Bibles.'

A good vellum copy is worth 4,000*l.*

Of course it was called the Mazarine Bible because the copy in the Mazarine Library, Paris, gives the approximate date. There is another Bible called the Mazarine Bible, printed before 1466 by Eggestein.

 A Psalmorum Codex (Sir J. Thorold's sale) was sold for the unprecedented sum of 4,500*l.*

Mazarin, a proper name; Mazarine, the adjective.

Mazarin'ians. Those who sided with Cardinal Mazarin in the Fronde War (1648–1653). The opponents were called the Frondeurs. The cause of this contention was Mazarin's prohibition of the Act of Union (q.v.), the 27 articles of demand by the Paris lawyers.

Such as the abolition of monopolies; the reduction of imposts; the prohibition to levy taxes without the authority of the States-General, or of arrest without assigning the cause; the obligation of bringing prisoners to trial within a given time, &c. Mazarin and the court party pronounced these demands an encroachment on royal privileges, and subversive to the government.

Maz'daas'nanism or 'Mazdaism.' The ancient Persian religion. So called from Ahura Mazdao, the all-wise spirit or supreme god of the Persians. This supreme god was supposed to be creator of the world, god of light and truth, without beginning of days or end of years. Mazdaism was reformed by Zoroaster or Zerdusht, whose disciples were called Guebres or Parsees.

Mazdaasnan means worshippers of Ormuzd. Parsees mean people of Pars or Fars (i.e. of Persia); and Guebre is a proper name = Cheber or Jebah. The Persian gawr means an infidel.

Mazzulo, 1503. A plague which desolated Italy It carried off Philip of Burgos in 1506. Machiavel tells us in his 'Political Correspondences' that it especially attacked the head and chest, and was accompanied by a cough. It appeared in Padua in 1558, 1568, and 1580, and was most disastrous. See 'Plagues,' &c.

It appeared in France, and went there by the name of Coqueluche.

M.C. Master of the ceremonies [in court]; in the U.S.A. it means 'Member of Congress.'

Meagher of the Sword. Thomas Meagher, son of a Waterford merchant, the orator of the Young Irelanders. He emigrated to America, and became General Meagher. He obtained his sobriquet because his speeches were warlike harangues, and he himself was a dashing cavalier.

Meal-tub Plot (The), 1680. A supposed Presbyterian plot to seize the crown and prevent a popish succession. Revealed first to the Duke of York by a young man named Dangerfield. When the whole affair was proved to be false, and Dangerfield was committed to Newgate, he said with great seeming penitence that what he had told the duke was undoubtedly a forgery to cover a real plot. The real plot he said was a popish one, and the notes of the sham one would be found in a meal tub in the house of Mrs. Cellier, a Roman Catholic midwife. The papers were found there, and the plot was called the Meal-tub Plot.

This was the second of three plots. The first was the popish plot revealed by Titus Oates, and the third was the Ryehouse plot.

Mediator of the Helvet'ic League, 1803. A title and office assumed by Napoleon. By the treaty of Lunéville it was stipulated that the independence of Switzerland should be respected; but the French troops not being withdrawn, perpetual feuds were fomented by their instigation between one canton and another. Napoleon declared that this state of things must cease; and assuming to himself the right of arbitration, he reduced Switzerland to a kind of dependency under the military yoke of France. For this 'service' the Swiss were ordered to supply 16,000 men to the French army.

Medical Rose (The), or 'Rosa Anglica,' about 1492. The medical work of John Gaddesden. Gaddesden was educated at Merton College, Oxford, and was thought to be the grand luminary of physic; but his prescriptions are a wonderful compound of superstitions, theological injunctions, charms, and quackery.

Medice'an Stars (The). Jupiter's satellites were so called by Galileo, who discovered them, but the term has not come into general use. Galileo's celebrated work, 'The Sidereal Messenger,' is dedicated to Cosmo de' Medici II. fourth duke of Tuscany.

Med'icis (A). A huge standing collar propped up by a wire frame, and inclosing the whole back of the head. This ugliness superseded the ruff, and was introduced by Marie de Medicis, wife of Henri IV. of France.

Mediæval History closes with the invention of printing and the discovery of America, and modern history begins with the Lutheran reformation. All these three events occurred about 1500. So that mediæval history closes with the 15th cent., and modern history begins with the 16th cent.

Printing made generally known	1460
Columbus set sail for America	1492
Reformation begun in Germany by Luther	1517

Mediæval Schoolmen. For those bearing complementary titles see p. 261.

Medjidie, 1852. An order of honour instituted in Turkey by the Sultan Abdûl-Medjid for foreigners as well as natives.

Medmenham Club (The), 18th cent. It was held in Medmenham Abbey. The club consisted of wild spirits, called euphemistically 'wits and humourists,' who assumed the name of 'Monks of St. Francis.' The inscription over the door was 'Fais ce que tu voudras.' Langley gives an account of it, and significantly suggests that it is wise to draw a curtain over it.

Rabelais says the motto over the door of the Abbey of Thélême was FAIS CE QUE VOULDRAS.—Gargantua i. 52-57.

Medon'tidæ. The thirteen archons of Athens, so called from Medon son of Kodros the first archon.

Meerut Massacre (The), 10 May, 1857. The native troops or Sepoys revolted, shooting their European officers, firing the bungalows, and massacring the European inmates without respect to age or sex. See 'Indian Mutiny' and 'Massacre.'

Megaclëan (A). A pertinacious and obnoxious political opponent, so called from Megaclês the Athenian archon. In the time of Cylon and Pittacos Megaclês and his adherents were for ever striving to upset the government, and restore it to an archonate.

Megale'sian Games (The), B.C. 206. In honour of Cybêlê, the great [megalê] goddess. They commenced 4 April, and lasted a week. During the Second Punic War an oracle had declared that the Romans would conquer the Carthaginians if they carried off their palladium, a great aerolith, sacred to Idêa or Cybêlê. The senate sent an ambassador to demand it, and it was transported to Rome in grand procession. A temple was erected and games instituted in its honour.

Meister-sänger, 14th cent. A corporation of German poets and musicians which succeeded the Minnesängers. They were for the most part artisans, by far the most celebrated being Hans Sachs [Sax]. In 1378 Karl IV. gave them a charter and a seal. See 'Mastersingers.'

Mek'hitarists. So called from Peter Mekhitar (1676–1749) of Cappadocia. While in Constantinople (1700) he joined the Armenians, and afterwards the Catholics. Being driven from Constantinople by religious persecution, Mekhitar took refuge in Smyrna, then in the Morēa. To Mekhitar we owe an Armenian Bible (1733), an Armenian grammar, and an Armenian dictionary.

His disciples, the Mekhitarists of St. Lazzaro (degli Armeni) are learned Benedictines whose publications have a European reputation.

Melancholy Isle (The). Tobago, in which an English colony was planted in 1737. So called because, viewed from the north, it seems only a mass of lofty and gloomy mountains, with black precipices descending abruptly to the sea. It is under a lieutenant-governor, a council of nine, and a house of assembly of sixteen members.

Melancholy Jacques (The). Jean Jacques Rousseau (1712–1777). He was a misanthrope and a recluse, of morbid sensibilities and unhappy spirit. The phrase is from Shakespeare's 'As You Like It.'

Melancholy Magyars (The), 955. The Hungarian fugitives in the great battle of Augsburg, on the river Lech. They were condemned by their countrymen to servitude.

Magyars, pronounce Mard'-yars.

Melbourne Ministry (The), 1835–1841. Called by Sir George Trevelyan 'that melancholy period.' Mr. Torrens says that Lord Melbourne was neither an orator, nor jurist, nor financier, nor great legislator, nor great leader, nor consistent politician. This is true, but he was a man of most wonderful tact. Of the Melbourne Ministry Praed says their policy was

> To promise, pause, prepare, postpone,
> And end by letting things alone;
> In short, to earn the people's pay
> By doing nothing every day.

Melbourne's Six Acts, 1835–1841.

Corporation Reform (England), 1835.
Corporation Reform (Scotland), 1836.
New Marriage Law (by registration, &c.), 1836, 1837, 1840.
Tithe Commutation, 1836, 1837, 1839.
Poor Law Reform (Ireland), 1838.
Municipal Corporation Reform (Ireland), 1840.

Melchites (2 syl.), or 'Imperialists.' Syriac, Egyptian, and Levantine Christians generally so called in reproach on account of their implicit submission to the edict of the Emperor Marcian for the publication and reception of the doctrines and ceremonies of the Greek Church, and for submission to the decisions of the Council of Chalcēdon. Their head is called the Patriarch of Antioch, and dwells at Damascus.

They are Roman Catholics of the Eastern rite, and have a service in Arabic. The Copts of the Greek Church are called Melchites by their monophysitic brethren.

Mele'tian Schism (The), 4th cent. Caused by Meletius bishop of Lycopōlis, who had been deposed for offering sacrifice to idols to avoid persecution. When Peter of Alexandra died Meletius took on himself the power of ordination, and was most relentless in rejecting the lapsed. The Council of Nice, A.D. 325, decreed him to be schismatic.

Mele'tians, 300–400. Followers of Meletius bishop of Lycopolis, in Egypt. See above.

Melitine (The). A legion, also called the Thundering or Fulminant Legion from its dash and courage. It was composed of Christians, and it is said that the army of Marcus Aurelius was saved by its prayers in 174, when on the point of perishing in the desert.

Mellifluous Doctor (The). St. Bernard, abbot of Clairvaux (1091–1153, canonised by Alexander III. in 1174). It was this St. Bernard who preached up the second crusade in 1146, and was the founder of the Bernardins (q.v.). Called the 'Last of the Fathers' and the 'Oracle of the Church.'

St. Bernard procured the condemnation of Abelard at the Council of Sens, in 1140; was mainly instrumental in the death at the stake of Pierre de Bruys and Arnaud de Brescia, two religious reformers, who declaimed against the ill lives of the clergy, and vehemently opposed Gilbert de la Porree, bishop of Poitiers, who had attacked the Nominalists (q.v.). However, when the monk Raoul proposed to massacre all the Jews, St. Bernard resolutely opposed the suggestion.

 The St. Bernard who founded the hospice was St. Bernard of Menthon, and lived about a century earlier (930-1008).

Melon Colic. The first three kaiser-kings of the house of Austria or Habsburg died from dysentery brought on by eating melons: Albert [Albrecht] II., Friedrich III., and Maximilian I.

Melton Mowbray Hunt (The), established 1759. The four chief members used to form a sort of authorised court in all matters connected with the chase in England. The three original packs were (1) the Duke of Rutland's; (2) Mr. Osbaldeston's, or the Quorn hounds, Leicester; and (4) the Earl of Lonsdale's, or the Cottesmore hounds, of Rutlandshire. There has been no such 'hunt' for many years, but the Leicestershire hounds are still celebrated, and the Duke of Rutland's hounds, the Quorn, and the Cottesmore hounds are well known (1890).

Member of the Sacred Crown (A). A nobleman of Hungary. Hungary was the Land of the Sacred Crown. The Sacred Crown was the crown given by the pope to St. Stephen, king of Hungary (979, 997–1038).

Members' Prizes (The). Of the University of Cambridge. Two prizes of thirty guineas each, one for a Latin essay and one for an English essay, on a subject connected with English history. Founded 1752, when there were four prizes, which in 1870 were reduced to two. Any student below the degree of M.A. may be a candidate.

Memmia or Remmia (Lex), ordained that an accusation should not be admitted against those who were absent on the public service; and if anyone was convicted of false accusation, he was to be branded on the forehead with the letter K (kalumnia).

As for those who have calumniated you by leasing-making, I protest to heaven I think they have justly incurred the penalty of the Memmonia Lex, also called Lex Rhemmia.—Sir W. Scott, Waverley, chap. xli. (Abbotsford edition).

Memnon. The same as Proteus, and either of these is the same as Rameses V. Proteus is not a proper name at all, but a Greek word equivalent to 'Egyptian king,' or Pharaoh. Rameses V. lied B.C. 1165.

Memorable 2,000 (The), 1661. The 2,000 ministers who refused to comply with the Uniformity Act passed in the reign of Charles II., and threw up their preferments. See 'Seven Bishops.'

The health of 'the Protestant dissenting ministers, the worthy successors of the memorable 2,000,' was proposed by the Chairman, the Duke of Essex.

Dinner given at the Freemasons' Hall to commemorate the Repeal of the Test Act, 1828.

Memorial Crosses. Raised sometimes where the bier of an eminent person stopped for a time, on its way to the place of burial, as the memorial crosses of Eleanor of Castile, called 'Eleanor Crosses,' as those of Waltham, Northampton, and Geddington. Charing cross was destroyed in 1647, but a model of it stands in front of the South-Eastern Railway station, Strand, London.

Memphitic Version of the Scriptures in the dialect of Lower Egypt. Also called the 'Coptic.' Supposed to be of the 3rd cent. See 'Scriptures.'

The version in the dialect of Upper Egypt, called the 'Sahidic' or 'Thebaidic,' is supposed to be the older of the two.

Men of '89 (The). The leaders of the French revolution, such as Mirabeau, Danton, Robespierre, Marat, St. Just, &c.

Men of the 14th of July. Red republicans of France. The reference is to the taking of the Bastille, 14 July, 1789.

A letter was handed in by Santerre to the president, stating that the petitioners wanted to be admitted to . . . prove themselves still the Men of the 14th July.—Howitt, Hist. of Eng. Geo. III. p. 617).

Menageries (Les). The reunions of Mme. de Tencin in the regency of Louis XV. In these reunions one met with Montesquieu, author of the 'Persian Letters'; Helvetius, author of 'L'Esprit'; Fontenelle and Lamotte, Rollin, Vertot, the two Daciers, Voltaire, and Lord Bolingbroke. They were the nursery of the encyclopædists.

Menander, the Samaritan, who succeeded Simon Magus, gave himself out to be one of the Æons, and that no one could be saved who was not of his baptism; but that all who were so baptized should be subject neither to death nor to the infirmities of old age (Eusebius, bk. iii. chap. 26).

Mendicants or Begging Friars (The). Numerous orders which truly infested the church in the 13th cent. They broke in everywhere upon the parochial clergy, usurped their office, set up altars of their own, withdrew the people from communion with their parish priests, and became so rich that they raised stately palaces, and became the most famous and most contemptible of all the clergy. In 1274 the Council of Lyons restricted them to the four orders of Franciscans, Dominicans, Carmelites, and Augustines.

Menippean Satire (The). A political pamphlet, partly in verse and partly in prose. The object of the satire was to show up the perfidious intentions of Spain in regard to France, and the criminal ambition of the Guise family. The chief writers were Leroy (died 1593), Pithou (1544–1596), Rapin the poet (1540–1609), and Passerat (1534–1602).

Called Menippean from Menippus, a cynic philosopher of the 1st cent.

Men'nonites (3 syl.). Followers of Menno (called Simōnis, i.e. 'Son of Simon') of Holland (1496–1561). He was the founder of the reformed Anabaptist school, after the death of John of Leyden. Menno was a man of most gentle, earnest, modest, and spiritual nature, wholly unlike the wild fanatics known as Anabaptists. Like the Quakers the Mennonites will take no oath, nor will they hold office, employ force, or sanction capital punishment. They baptize by sprinkling, but only after a confession of faith. The New Testament is their only rule of faith; they object to the word 'person' as applied to the Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, and disbelieve in original sin.

In 1683 a following was established in America, where they number at least 250,000, and they are abundant in Southern Russia. They are divided into Mild and Strict Mennonites.

Mensal Lands (The). A grant of land from each of the provinces of Ireland to enlarge the county of Meath. Exacted by Tuathal, son of Feredach the Just, A.D. 136.

Merca'tor (Isidore). A Cenobite of the 8th cent. for many years supposed to be the author of the 'False Decretals' (q.v.), now generally assigned to Benedict Levita of Mentz, or to Riculfe archbishop of Mentz, who introduced them into France in 811.

Mercator's Projection. Maps so constructed that the lines of longitude are straight and not curved. This device of representing a globe in perspective on a flat surface is due to Edward Wright, an Englishman; but the chart so arranged by Wright was printed and published by Gerard Mercātor, a printer of maps in Flanders, who died at the age of 82, in 1594.

Mercator's real name was Kauffmann, but a foolish fashion prevailed of adopting Greek or Latin names, generally translations of the German. Thus Melanchthon's real name was Schwarzerdt; Desiderius Erasmus is a classical form of Gheraerd Gheraerd; Œcolampadius is a Greek form of Hausschein. Nostradamus is a Latinised form of Notre-Dame (Michel de Notre-Dame); Joannes Stobæus is John Stubbs.

Other names not classical are Jacopo Robusti, known as Jacopo Tintoretto; François-Marie Arouet, known as Voltaire; Molière was the assumed name of Jean-Baptiste Poquelin, &c.

Merchant Adventurers (The), or 'Brotherhood of Sir Thomas à Becket,' 1296. A society established by John duke of Brabant, and sanctioned by Edward I., to promote woollen manufactures. Foreign merchants were allowed trial by jury, half the jury being foreigners, and they had a justiciary [consul] in London for their protection. See 'Merchants of the Steelyard.'

It received a patent in 1505 from Henry VII., and was incorporated by Elizabeth in 1564.

The clergy were called Sir, and addressed as 'Sir-reverence,' in the 'good old times.'

Merchant Queen (The). Venice.

The Merchant Queen, in order to preserve inviolate the Levantine commerce, humbled herself at the footstool of the Sultan.—History of Venice, vol. ii. p. 81 (Murray, 1838).

Merchant Taylors' School, 1568. Founded by the Merchant Taylors' Guild.

Merchants (The Statute of) 'Statutum de Mercatōribus,' 1283. The statute of Acton Burnel is so called. It was passed at Acton Burnel, in Shropshire, in the reign of Edward I., and its object was the speedy recovery of debts due to merchants and traders. The security which the merchant obtained in 1285 by a seisin of the debtor's lands, &c., was called a 'Statute Merchant.' See 'Statute of Acton Burnel.'

Merchants of the Steelyard. London Hanse Town merchants, formed into a company early in the 13th cent.

In 1235 they obtained privileges from Henry III., and received a charter in 1280 from Edward I., with further privileges from Edward IV. and Henry VII. Finally abolished by Elizabeth in 1578. This company in 1505 was opposed by the 'Merchant Adventurers' (q.v.).

Merchants' Petition The), 1820. Drawn up by Mr. Tooke for free trade, especially in corn. Being signed by more than half the court of directors of the Bank of England, and a large number of the chief London merchants, it was presented to the House by Alexander Baring [Lord Ashburton].

Mercia. The last formed and largest of the kingdoms, since called the Heptarchy. It was founded A.D. 582 by Crida or Creda, and included 17 counties and most of Herts.

The counties were—Staffordshire, Worcestershire, and Warwickshire; Cheshire, Derby and Notts; Gloucestershire, Oxfordshire, and Bucks; Shropshire and Herefordshire; Leicestershire and Rutlandshire; Lincolnshire, Norfolk, Hunts, Bedfordshire, and most of Herts.

Mercian Province. So called from the river Mersey.

Merciless Parliament (The), or 'The Unmerciful Parliament,' 3 Feb. to 3 June, 1388. A junto or council of 14, the tools of Thomas [Plantagenet] duke of Gloucester, which assumed royal prerogatives, and attempted to depose the king [Richard II.], then nearly 21 years of age. Sir Nicholas Brembre, thrice Lord Mayor of London, was condemned for siding with the king; the Archbishop of York fled for his life; the king's confessor was driven from the kingdom; several of the judges were condemned to death; Blake the secretary, and Usk the under-sheriff, were put to death. Sir John Beauchamp, Sir James Berners, Sir John Salisbury, and Sir Simon Burley were all executed. In May 1389 the young king took the reins of government into his own hands, and Gloucester's power was shattered into dust. See 'Parliaments.'

Sometimes called 'The Wonderful Parliament.'

Mercu'rius Au'licus. A court journal published in the reign of Charles I. under the court's own direction.

Mère des Peuples (La). Marguerite de France duchesse de Berry, daughter of François I. (1523–1574).

Mer'inides or Merinites (3 syl.). A Saracen dynasty in Morocco which succeeded the Almohades in 1270, in Morocco, and were overthrown by the sheriffs or cherifs in 1516.

Descendants of Merin Abdallah king of Fes.

Mermnades (2 syl.). The third dynasty of the kings of Lydia. So named from Mermnas son of Gygès, the first king, B.C. 708–545. Crœsus was the last of this dynasty.

Merovin'gians (The), or the Merovingian dynasty (420–737). The first race of French kings, called Merovingian from Mer-wig or Meroveus, the third of the line, presuming Pharamond and Clodion to have preceded him. After an interregnum the second race, called the Carlovingian, succeeded.

Merwig is mer, great; wig, warrior. If Pharamond ever existed, he was only Duke of the Franes. He is said to have been the son of Marcomir, and to have died 428. His son Clodion is said to have died 448, and Meroveus was his son. Then followed Childéric (448 481), and then his son Clovis [=Louis].

Merry Monarch (The). Charles II. of England (born 1630, crowned 1661, died 1685).

Called by Rochester 'The Mutton-eating King.'

Mersen (Treaty of), A.D. 870. By which the eastern part of Lotharingia (Lorraine), between the Maas and Rhine, was added to Germany.

Merton College, Oxford. Founded in 1264, by Walter de Merton bishop of Rochester, at Malden, Surrey, but removed to Oxford in 1274. The headmaster is called the warden.

Mesne Lords or Barons, i.e. middle or intermediate lords; who hold their lands, not from the king, but from some subject, who in this case was the mesne lord's overlord. The vassal of a mesne lord is called an arrière vassal, the vassal of a vassal. Lands which owed no allegiance to a lord were called allŏdia (sing. allodium). See 'Land.'

Messali'na of the North (The). Catherine II. of Russia (1729, 1762–1796).

Messe'nian War (The First), B.C. 743–724. Between the Messenians and Spartans. By the terms of peace the Messenians were reduced to the condition of helots, had to pay Sparta half the produce of their land in tribute, and to send a deputation of women to the obsequies of Spartan kings.

The Second, B.C. 685–662. The Spartans were again the victors. Aristomĕnēs was the Messenian hero.

The Third, B.C. 490. The Spartans were again victorious, and banished the Messenians from the soil. Tyrtæus the Athenian poet inspired the Spartans with his lays.

The Fourth, B.C. 465–455. The helots revolted, and found refuge in Naupactos.

Methodism, 1729. Sprang up at Oxford under Mr. Morgan and Mr. Wesley. Whitfield joined the party in 1735. In 1738 Wesley and Whitfield separated on the 'five points.' Wesley took the Arminian views and Whitfield the Calvinistic. Wesley taught that, through the merits of Christ, man's sins are forgiven, and that conversion is a gift of God conveyed instantaneously, so that the converted know when the change takes place. The first Methodist societies were established in 1739. When in 1752 Whitfield separated from the Methodists, those who followed Wesley were called 'Wesleyan Methodists' or 'Wesleyans,' and those who followed Whitfield were called 'Calvinistic Methodists.'

Called Methodists because the societies were governed by certain rules, and the members were required 'to walk orderly and methodically under their respective leaders.' There was a college of physicians in ancient Rome called Methodistæ, from the strict régime which they enforced on their patients; probably this may have suggested the name to the Oxford scholars.

Methodist Episcopal Church (The), 1784. A society of Wesleyan Methodists in the United States of America, first formed in 1766 by immigrants from Ireland. Like Wesley, they regarded themselves as members of the English episcopal church. Wesley ordained Dr. Thomas Coke, the first Methodist bishop. They accept Wesley's abstract of the 'Thirty-nine Articles,' and use his abridgment of the Common Prayer-book. The bishops are itinerant, and ordain bishops, elders, and deacons.

Methodist Protestant Church in the U.S. of America (The), 1830. Seceders from the 'Methodist Episcopal Church' (q.v.). They objected to episcopacy, and desired a popular and independent form of church government.

Meth'uen (Treaty of), 6 May, 1703. A treaty of commerce between England and Portugal. By this treaty the duty on all Portuguese wines was one-third less than on French wines. Modified in 1810, and abolished in 1835.

John Methuen was the English ambassador to the court of Portugal. The king of Portugal at the time was Pedro II.

Métiers de Paris (Statuts des). From the 'Documents inédits sur l'Histoire de France,' recently published. These statutes are supposed to belong to the period of St. Louis (1226–1270).

Meton'ic Cycle (The), 19 years. About B.C. 432 Meton discovered that 235 lunar months very nearly corresponded with 19 solar years; but about a century later Callippus discovered that in a hundred years the Metonic cycle would be a day too long, as a solar year contains 365¼ days, and not 365. So Callippus suggested that a cycle should consist of (19 × 4) 76 years, instead of 19. See 'Callippic Cycle.'

Metropolitan Board of Works (The), transferred in 1889 to the London County Council (q.v.), had its standing committees and sub-committees. The former included the Bridges' Committee, the Building Acts' Committee (q.v.), the Fire Brigade Committee (q.v.), the Parks, Commons, and Open Spaces Committee (q.v.), and the Special Purposes and Sanitary Committee (q.v.), including gas and gas-meters, the Contagious Diseases Act Committee, and so on.

The nine sub-committees were (1) the Artisans' Dwellings' Act; (2) the coal and wine dues, (3) the examination of accounts, (4) the municipal government of the metropolis, (5) officers, (6) overhead wires, (7) sewer emanations, (8) supplementary main drainage, and (9) tramways.

Metternich's Maxim. 'All for, but not through, the people.' In other words, the king and his government, not the popular wish, judge what is best for the general welfare, and the people's interest. Of course, the king and his council must be absolute; popular constitutions could in no wise be conceded according to Metternich's political maxim.

In schools and private families Metternich's maxim is acted on; but nations are clubs, not schools or families; and in clubs the members, not the elected chairman, make the laws.

Mevela'vites (4 syl.). Dancing dervishes, so called from Mevela'va, their founder, who whirled round and round for four continuous days, without rest, food, or refreshment. While Mevelava spun round like a top, Hamsa played on a flute. After the fourth day the dervish fell into a trance, in which marvellous revelations were made to him.

Mexican Revolution (The), 1822, by which the republic was converted into an empire. Augustino Iturbide, the leader of the coup d'état, was proclaimed emperor under the name of Augustin I. of Mexico. He abdicated in March 1823, and retired to Leghorn in Italy; but returned to Mexico in March 1824, was arrested and shot.

Mezentian Thraldom, i.e. being fastened to a dead body. Mezentius was a king of the Tyrrhenians when Æneas invaded Italy. He was notorious for his cruelty, especially for tying an offender face to face with a dead man, and leaving him to die in his thraldom.

Divorce frees a man from that loathsome Mezentian thraldom—the chaining of a man for life to a cold putrefying corpse.—Miss ROBINSON, Whitehall, chap. xix.

 Paul seems to refer to this sort of punishment in Rom. vii. 24: 'Who shall deliver me from this [dead body]?'

Mezuz'ah, pl. Mezuzoth. A piece of parchment fixed by the ancient Jews to the doorposts of a house, according to Deut. vi. 9; xi. 13. The parchment was rolled up, put in a case, and labelled Shadai, one of the names of God. A mezuzah was fixed not only on doorposts, but to door knockers on the right side.

The Tephelim which these pedants wore on their left wrists, and the Mezuzah which they fixed on the right side of their doors to keep off devils.—KINGSLEY, Hypatia, chap. v.

Micare Digitis [Mi-cā-re didg-i-tis]. A game played by the ancient Romans, and still common in Italy. Two players sit opposite to each other, and each one holds out a certain number of fingers, and he who guesses right the soonest is the winner. Thus, if A holds out all the fingers of one hand and three of the other, and B holds out two of one hand and three of the other, the number is 13. If done very quickly it is by no means easy to guess the right number. Our talking with the fingers is sometimes called mication, from 'micare digitis.'

This game is called morra; it is often seen among Italian immigrants in America.

Micel Synod (The). The great council or Witenagemot of the Anglo-Saxons.

Michael (Order of St.), 1469. Instituted in France by Louis XI.; reorganised in 1661 by Louis XIV. Extinct since 1830.

Michael (Order of the Wing of St.). Instituted in Portugal by King Alfonso, 1172.

Michael and St. George (Knights of St.), 1818. A British order founded chiefly for Malta and the colonies.

Michael Angelo of Battles (The). M. A. Cerquozzi of Rome (1600–1660). Battles and shipwrecks were his favourite subjects. Also called Michel-Ange des Bamboches.

Michael Angelo of France (The). Jean Cousin (1500–1590). His great picture is the 'Last Judgment,' or Le Jugement Universel. Michael Angelo has a grand fresco on the same subject called the 'Last Judgment.'

Michael Angelo of Music (The). Gluck (1714–1787) is so called by Dr. Burney, and also father of modern opera

Michael Angelo of Opera (The). Richard Wagner (1805–1864).

Michael Angelo of Sculptors (The). I. Pierre Puget (1623–1694). II. René Michel Slodtz (1705–1764).

Michael Angelo of the Lyre (The). Palestrina (1529–1594).

Michael Angelo of the Reformation (The). Martin Luther (1483–1546).

Michael College (St.), or 'St. Michael House,' 1324. The second foundation in the University of Cambridge, founded by Harvey de Stanton chancellor of the exchequer to Edward II. This college in 1546 was with other foundations consolidated in Trinity College.

Michelade [Mi'-kel-aid], 1567. The massacre of 48 French Catholics at Nismes by Huguenots on St. Michael's Day. The day before they had murdered 72 of their prisoners (FELICE).

Michigan [Mish'-e-gan]. In the United States of America, so called, in 1805, from the lake of the same name (Indian). The inhabitants are usually nicknamed Wolverines.

Miching Mallecho, Esq. The pen-name of Shelley in 'Peter Bell the Third.'

Microcosm. An epitome of all things in one. Paracelsus taught that the human body was such an epitome, containing in itself a part of all visible nature, including the sun, moon, stars, and even the poles of heaven.

Mid Lent. The Fourth Sunday in Lent, called Lætare Sunday, 'Refreshment Sunday,' 'Mothering Sunday,' and Dominica de Rosa. See each of the phrases and 'Bœuf-gras.'

Middle Ages (The). About 1000 years. Hallam in his 'Middle Ages' begins this period with the conquest of Gaul by the Franks, about A.D. 500, and terminates it with the invasion of Italy by Charles VIII. about 1500. Perhaps the most convenient landmarks would be from the fall of the Roman Empire to the Reformation, which would practically be the same thing; for Augustulus Romulus, the last of the Roman emperors, was deposed A.D. 475, and the Reformation was between 1516 and 1540. See 'Mediæval History.'

Middle Passage (The). The sea passage of kidnapped African slaves. The first passage is from their African homes to the ship, and their third passage is from the slave market to the cotton or sugar plantations.

Middle Persian Empire (The First), 226–642. Founded by Artaxarês, or rather Ardisheer Babigan Sassane, a common soldier of Persia who killed Artaban king of Parthia, A.D. 226, and founded the dynasty of the Sassanides (8 syl.), which lasted for 416 years.

Midnight Mass (The). Missa de nocte. On Christmas Day there are three masses: the midnight mass, the mass at daybreak, or in aurora, and high mass. There is also the vigil of Christmas Day. See 'Mass.'

> On Christmas Eve the mass was sung.
> Sir W. SCOTT.

When the clock strikes midnight all the bells ring merrily, mass commences at the principal churches, and at San Luigi dei Francesci and the Gesù there is a great illumination . . . and very good music.—W. W. STORY, Roba di Roma, vol. i. p. 63.

. . . Get shut up, as I have been, after midnight mass on a Christmas night.—R. H. BUSK, Notes and Queries, 6 July, 1889, p. 10.

Midrash Rabboth. A compilation of legends, allegories, and tales, commenced about A.D. 700, to explain or elucidate the Hebrew Scriptures.

Mignon (Un). A dandy or fop was so called in Paris under Henri III.; under Louis XIV. he was called un libertin; under the Regent un beau or un talon rouge; under the Directory un incroyable; later on un petit maître, merveilleux, élégant, crevé, gommeux (sing. and pl.), bécarre.

A libertin in Molière's time meant a freethinker. Mignon, pronounce Min'yone.

Mignon (Le). Henri III. of France (1551, 1574–1589), a man-milliner, 'weaker than woman, and worse than harlot.' See above.

Chicot the Jester had a seat at the council board of the Minion king.—Hist. of France.

Migration of Nations (The). The migration of the northern and eastern hordes towards the civilised west and south, which brought about the fall of the Roman power.

Milan (Edict of). March A.D. 313. Made by Constantine the Great in favour of Christians. By this edict, the persecutions of the Roman governors against Christians ceased, and every Roman subject was free to choose his own religious faith. N.B. What were called heretics soon fell into the exception.

Much has been said about the Roman persecutions, but Buckle tells us 'It is estimated 1,000,000 persons perished during the Arian schism; 1,000,000 in the Carthaginian struggles; 7,000,000 during the Saracen slaughters in Spain; 5,000,000 during the Crusades; 2,000,000 of Saxons and Scandinavians; 1,000,000 in the wars against the Netherlands, Albigenses, Waldenses, and Huguenots; 100,000,000 during the Justinian wars; about 25,000,000 Peruvians and Mexicans; to say nothing of the dragonades, minor conflicts, secret murders, and so on; 140 millions! What were the twelve persecutions compared with this?

Milan (The League of), 1575. A French Protestant league, the object of which was to place the Duc d'Alençon on the throne. This league was aided and abetted by Queen Elizabeth, who was attached to the duke personally. In 1577 King Henri III. put himself at the head of a Catholic league, and another religious war broke out.

Milan Decree (The), 17 Dec., 1807. The counterpart of the Berlin decree (q.v.), extending the 'continental system' to all Italy, except the pope's dominions, which followed soon afterwards. This decree ordained that 'any vessel which had been searched by an English ship, or which had submitted to be sent on a voyage to England, or had paid any duty to the English Government, should be declared denationalised, and be treated as if English.'

Most certainly Napoleon was no politician.

Milanese Liturgy (The), or Ambrosian Liturgy (q.v.).

Mile'sian Sect, B.C. 557. Originated with Anaximander, who taught that man was concocted of earth and water baked in the sun's rays; and that heaven is a solid concave in which the stars are fixed as nails to prevent its falling. However, he taught that the earth is spherical. See Gen. i. 24, and compare with i. 20.

Milesians (The). A Scotic [i.e. Gothic] colony which came to Ireland with Milesius and his eight sons. They landed in the south-west of the island, and dispossessed the dynasties of Tuatha-na-Danaan (q.v.). Five of the sons perished, and ultimately the entire island fell into the hands of Heremon or Erimhon, who furnished twenty successors, all of whom resided at Tara in Meath. About B.C. 900 Ollav Folla [Ollamh Fodhla], of the family of Ir, a collateral branch, became king. The Milesian race is the glory of Ireland. Every Irishman loves to trace his line to the Milesians, and the chroniclers strive to outvie each other in heaping glory, honour, and antiquity on the race. The Milesian kings are called the Scotic—a list of 136 is given before the advent of St. Patrick—and the race lasted 2,000 years, according to tradition; probably half that time would be more historically correct.

Anastasius, the Sinaite, says: 'Those called by the ancients Scythians or Scoti are Goths and Danes. Many Irish chroniclers tell us that the Milesians came from Spain. The Celto-Scythæ formed a part of the people of Spain.'

Military Colours. Each British regiment has a pair of colours, the Royal and the Regimental. The latter contains the names of the most important engagements in which the regiment has taken part Military Knights (The). The title given by William IV. to the 'Poor Knights' (q.v.). He also allowed naval officers to share in the benefits of the brotherhood.

Military Orders. See under 'Monks and Monastic Houses.'

Milkwoman of Bristol (The). Ann Yearsley, a poetess, died 8 May, 1806. Hannah More took an interest in her, and raised 600*l.* on her behalf; but Ann Yearsley proved very ungrateful to her benefactress.

Mill-boy of the Slashes. Henry Clay (1777–1852). So called from 'The Slashes,' a swampy country in the neighbourhood of a place in Hanover County, Virginia, where he was born, and where he worked as a mill-boy.

Millena'rians, 2nd cent. Believers in the millennium. God worked six days and rested on the seventh. Psalm xc. 4 says, a thousand years are in God's sight as one day, and therefore the working world will last 6,000 years, and then will follow the millennial rest for 1,000 years, which will be ushered in by a general resurrection. Fifth-monarchy men.

Papias, Irenæus, Justin Martyr, Tertullian, Lactantius, Nepos, and others were believers in the millennium.

Millenary Petition (The), 1603. Presented to James I. of England on his accession by 800 clergymen, praying for a reform in the church courts, the provision and training of godly ministers, and the suppression of 'popish usages' in the Book of Common Prayer. James paid no heed to the petition, but convened the Hampton Court Conference (q.v.).

The petition was presented by a full tenth of all the clergy of the realm, and was called Millenary because, roughly speaking, it was signed by a thousand clergymen. The chief objections were the use of the cross in baptism, the interrogatories to infants answered by sponsors, confirmation, and a few minor particulars.

Miller (A Joe). A pun, so called from Joseph Miller (1684–1738), an actor, noted for his suppers in which wit and pun sparkled. John Mottley compiled a collection of jests which he attributed to Joe Miller, and since then any jest is called a Joe Miller, especially those anonymous and somewhat stale.

Millerism, or 'Second Adventism,' derives its name from William Miller,

'the American Prophet' (1781–1849), who fixed by minute calculation the end of the world 10 Oct., 1843 or 1844. Before his death he 'demonstrated from prophecy' that, as 1844 had failed, the years 1857, 1867, 1873, and 1889 were indubitably fatal years between 15 and 25 Oct.

In 1857 was the financial panic of America, and in 1873 the great financial crash. Between 1857 and 1867 occurred the 'great rebellion.' These, however, were not the end of the world, nor did they bring on the millennial advent, and yet Miller had a following of at least 40,000 in the Western States, New England, Middle States, and Canada.

Millioni, the millionnaire. Marco Polo was called by the Venetians 'Messer Marco Millioni' (1256–1323), and his house is still called 'La Corte del Millioni.' It is on the canal of St. Giovanni Crisostomo.

Millioni, with one 'l,' is now the more common spelling.

Milton of Germany (The). Friedrich Gottlieb Klopstock, author of 'The Messiah' (1724–1803).

A very German Milton indeed.—COLERIDGE.

Milton of Painting (The). Fuseli (1706–1781) not only because, like Milton, he united terribiles visu formæ with the molle atque facetum, but also painted and exhibited a 'Gallery of Milton.'

Mind Ether, or 'Mind Atmosphere.' An ether which produces by its undulations on the nervous tissue the sensation of light and thought. A concentration of this nervous tissue forms ganglia, and the union of ganglia forms brain. This hypothesis is made to explain 'Thought Reading': thus: Nervous surface, it is said, transmits sensation faster than the undulations of mind ether, and therefore the thought of the thinker is communicated to the reader, who is further off from the brain, simultaneously with the impression made on the brain, which is much nearer.

Mind of the School (The). Aristotle was so called by Plato (B.C. 384–322).

Ming Dynasty (The). The twenty-first Imperial dynasty of China, preceded by the Yuen or Y'en and followed by the Manchoo dynasty. It gave seventeen emperors, and lasted 276 years (1368–1644). The seat of government was Nankin. This dynasty is celebrated for its princes, especially Hong-700 and Tchin-Tsu-wen-tee.

Minims (The), 1431. Founded by St. Francis de Paula. Often called 'Hermits of St. Francis' [i.e. of Paula].

These are not the Minorites (3 syl.) or Frères Mineurs of St. Francis [of Assisi] founded in 1221.

Ministerial Whitebait Dinner (The). A dinner given to the cabinet ministers at Greenwich soon after Trinity Monday, that is, a short time before the close of the session. These dinners began with Sir Robert Preston, M.P. for Dover, who invited his friend Old George Rose, secretary of the Treasury, to dine with him at Dagenham Lake, where he had a 'fishing cottage.' After a year or two Pitt was asked to join, and subsequently Greenwich was selected as a more convenient place of tryst. Lord Camden was next asked to join the trio, and then Mr. Long [Lord Farnborough]. The private dinner next became a ministerial dinner, in which each of the guests paid his quota, and the invitations were sent out by the private secretary of Lord Farnborough.

Ministers' Bill (The), 1660. Passed by the convention parliament (q.v.). By this bill all ministers installed within a stated time were to be expelled from the pulpits of the Anglican Church. This bill did not give satisfaction, because it did not go back far enough, and many pulpits remained in the occupation of Presbyterians.

Ministers' Money. A tax imposed on the householders of Dublin, Cork, &c. for the support of the Established Church. Abolished in 1857.

Minnesingers (The). Minne means love; the Minnesingers were love-poets, contemporary in Germany with the House of Hohenstauffen (q.v.), because these kings spoke Suabian, the richest, smoothest, and most musical of the German dialects. Though called love-singers, some of their poems were national ballads, and some were extended romances. Walter of Vogelweide was by far the best of the lyrists; Heinrich of Veldig was the most naïve and ingenious; Hartmann the most classical; Wolfram the most sublime; and Gottfried the most licentious. See 'Wartburg Contests.'

Minneso'ta (U.S. America). An Indian word meaning 'Sky-tinted Water.'

The state receives its name from the river. The nickname of the inhabitants is Gophers.

Minning Day, i.e. 'Reminding day.' The anniversary of a person's death, when a mass is offered up for the repose of the soul.

Mi'nors, Min'orites (3 syl.), or 'Grey Friars,' 1209. Founded by St. Francis d'Assisi; confirmed 1210; and settled in England 1224.

Minute Men, 1775. The militia of 12,000 men enrolled by the American congress adjourned from Concord to Cambridge. So called because they were to turn out at a minute's notice with musket and rifle. Soon augmented to 20,000.

Miquelets, 1675. Spanish guerillas in the Pyrenees, on the frontiers of Catalonia and Aragon, who armed themselves to push back the French invaders led by Schomberg. So called from their leader Miquelet de Prats. To combat them Louis XIV. created 100 companies of fusiliers de montagnes, also called Miquelets.

The mountain guides in the Pyrenees are called Miquelets. In 1808 Napoleon I. organised them to put down the Spanish guerillas.

> The country swarmed with Miquelets, a sort of lawless Catalans, who declared for the Austrians. —HOWITT, Hist. of Eng. (Anne, p. 212).

Mirabeau of the Gironde (The). Vergniaud, the most eloquent man of the Second Assembly.

Mirabeau of the Sans Culottes (The). George J. Danton 1759–1794. Also called the 'Mirabeau of the Markets,' and the 'Mirabeau of the Mob.' He was Mirabeau cast in a more vulgar mould.

> Pronounce Me'-rah-bo; Sahn [nasal] ku-lot.'

Miracle of the Age (The). So Roger Bacon is called by Dr. Freind, in his 'History of Physic.'

Miracles at St. Médard, 1690–1727. Referred to by Paley in his 'Evidences' as sufficiently grave to be worthy of his consideration. The Abbé de Paris, a very charitable man, was buried in the cemetery of St. Médard, and miracles were said to be performed at his tomb. The crowd so increased that government found it necessary to forbid anyone visiting the tomb. The abbé was a Jansenist, and all Jansenists insisted that the cures were miraculous; but their opponents attributed the cures to excitement operating on the nervous system. Convulsions were the general malady.

> A wag wrote over the gates a doggerel to this effect:
> The king henceforth forbids God's grace
> To show his wonders in this place.

Miraculous Campaign (The), 1670. That of John Sobieski the Polish general, who triumphed over the allied Cossacks and Tartars, instigated to war by Louis XIV. of France.

Mirror of all Martial Men (The). Thomas earl of Salisbury (died 1428).

Mirror of Courtesy (The). Sir Philip Sidney, author of the 'Arcadia' (1554–1586).

Mirror of Justice (The). Queen Victoria. In 1882 prayers were offered in the mosques of Cairo and the provinces for Queen Victoria under that appellation.

Mirror of Salvation (The). A sacred picture book with Bible stories and sacred legends in rhymes, with illustrative pictures. This book and the 'Biblia Pauperum' (q.v.) were immensely popular before the Reformation.

Mise of Amiens (The), 23 Jan., 1264. Louis IX. undertook to mediate between Henry III. of England and his barons, and gave his verdict wholly in favour of the king, cancelling the 'Provisions of Oxford' (q.v.) passed by the Mad Parliament. The verdict adjudged that the great officers of state should be appointed by the crown; and that aliens should be allowed to hold castles in England, and state offices if the king pleased, &c. The decision of King Louis was indignantly rejected by the Londoners, and led to the battle of Lewes, in which Simon de Montfort and the Londoners proved the victors.

> Mise, pronounce meez.

Mise of Lewes (The), 14 May, 1264. A truce after the battle of Lewes. By this mise [mees] it was provided that the king was to be supreme, but was to be assisted by a council nominated by the Earl of Leicester, the Earl of Gloucester, and the Bishop of Chichester. It was at this crisis that Simon de Montfort summoned for the first time two citizens from every borough to take their seats with the knights of the shires in the parliamentary assembly.

Mishna (The). A collection of the civil laws and traditions of the Hebrews. The Jews say that Moses on Mount Sinai received, besides the decalogue, many other laws which he taught the 70 elders. Judas, a learned rabbi, collected these floating traditions, and codified them. The Mishna was written in the 2nd cent. A.D. at Tiberias, and forms the first part of the Talmud (q.v.)

The rabbi Judas was called 'the saint.'

Missa Adventi'tia. A votive mass.

Missa Ambrosia'na. Instituted by St. Ambrose (374–397), and used in Milan Cathedral.

Missa Anima'rum. High mass for the dead.

Missa Annua'lis. Daily mass.

Missa Audi'ta. Mentioned by Robert of Gloucester.

Hora sexta pro grammatistis parva lectio fiat, ut aptius congregentur in sacello, et hora septima præcise celebretur Missa, ut loquuntur, 'Audita.'

Missa Au'rea. An unusually grand mass celebrated in mediæval times once a year in honour of the Virgin Mary.

Missa Cardina'lis. Mass celebrated by a cardinal.

Missa Cat'echumeno'rum. The mass up to the introïtus, when all catechumens are dismissed by the deacon with these words, 'Si quis non communicat, det locum.'

Missa Copeta'ta. A mass accompanied by the striking of a bell on one side with several distinct strokes. 'Campanæ alterum latus divisis et distinctis ictibus pulsare.'

Missa Die'i. The mass celebrated after the usual early mass, 'orto jam die.'

Missa Familia'ris. A private mass.

Missa de Jeju'niis. The mass which is celebrated on fast days.

Missa Judicii. A mass which is an appeal to God of a man's innocence of some charge brought against him. This is of the nature of an ordeal.

Missa Lu'minum, or 'Chandeleur.' In German 'Lichtmesse' for the Feast of Purification (Candlemas), 2 Feb., in commemoration of the 'churching' of the Virgin Mary after the birth of Jesus Said to have been instituted by Justinian in 542.

Missa Lunat'ica. Mass celebrated on the day of the new moon.

Missa Matutina'lis, or 'Missa Minor,' 'quæ post exactas matutinas dicitur.'

Missa Nava'lis, or 'Missa Nautica.' Mass celebrated aboard ship. It is a missa sicca (q.v.), because the rolling of the ship might cause the wine to be spilt.

Missa Nova. A celebrant's maiden mass.

Missa Nuptia'lis. A mass celebrated at a wedding.

Missa Pascha'lis. The seven masses during the Easter festival.

Missa Peregrino'rum. A mass for all except the ordained clergy. After the chapter the poor are summoned by a bell to the 'Missa Matutinālis,' and the celebrant for the week sings the Greater Mass. The alms being then distributed, he proceeds with the 'Missa Peregrinōrum,' which is said, not sung.

Peregrini dicuntur omnes qui non sunt de episcopatu ordinatis, sive sint clerici, sive laici.
DU CANGE, vol. v. p. 246, col. 1.

Missa Perfecta. A mass where both bread and wine are administered to the communicants.

Missa Præsan'ctificato'rum. A mass without consecration, as on Good Friday, when there is no consecration of the elements. They are consecrated the previous day. The Greek Church celebrates such masses in Lent, except on Saturdays and Sundays. See 'Mass of the Presanctified.'

Missa Sicca. A mass without the elements. This may occur when a priest has already administered a previous sacrament. 'Sacerdos non potest conficere quia forte jam celebravit, vel ob aliam causam potest accepta stola Epistolam et Evangelium legere, et docere Oratio-nem dominicam, et dare benedictionem,' &c. DURANDUS, 'Rationale divinorum officiorum libris viii. distinctum' (Book iv. chap. 1, n 23).

Sacerdote agente quæ sunt celebrantis, cum Introitu, Collecta, Epistola, Evangelio, et Canticis; qui tamen, quia non vult communicare, non consecrat ita ut Missa sit sine corpore et Sanguine Domini.—ECKIUS.

Missa Venat'ica. A short mass celebrated very early in the morning for persons about to follow the chase.

Missa Voti'va. A mass 'quæ ex proprio voto, seu motu, peragitur et dicitur, ad differentiam Missæ quæ a Kalendario præcipitur (Monachus Milstatensis, in Miraculis B. Domitiani,' n 20).

Missa de Aguinaldo. Aguinaldo is Spanish for 'New Year's gift.' Latin, strēna. French, étrennes (2 syl.) This mass is offered before daybreak.

Missæ vero quas Hispanice 'de Aguinaldo' vocant, antequam dies illuxerit, ne celebrentur. —Concilium Mexicanum, 1585.

Missa de Excepta'to. In the Ambrosian Missal, is a mass celebrated the day preceding Christmas Day. 'Præparatio ad vesperam Natalis Domini.'

Missæ Bifaciatæ, Trifaciatæ, &c. When the celebrant joins together two or more masses having different objects.

Missæ Feria'les. Seven masses celebrated at the Festival of the Holy Trinity. First day in honour of the Trinity; second day in honour of the Logos; third day in honour of the Holy Ghost; fourth day in honour of Charity; fifth day in honour of the Holy Angels; sixth day in honour of the Cross; and seventh day in honour of the Virgin Mary.

Missal (The), 5th cent. A book which serves for the celebration of the Roman Catholic mass. It contains the text of all the different masses used during the year. Pope Gelasius, who died A.D. 496, composed the first missal; it was in 2 vols., which Gregory the Great reduced to one (died 604). Each diocese and each religious order has its own missal. There are also the Greek, Spanish, Coptic, Ambrosian, and other Missals.

The daily service book is called the 'Breviary' (q.v.).

Missi Domin'ici. Eight commissioners sent into the provinces to inspect the conduct of dukes and counts. They were first organised by Charlemagne, who divided the empire into ten Missatica. Charles le Chauve increased the Missatica to twelve. Each was visited in January, April, July, and October by two Missi (a count and an abbot). The custom was discontinued at the close of the Carlovingian dynasty.

Missing Link (The). The link between man and the ape. According to the theory of evolution, the lower animals develop into the higher animals, so that the larvæ of Ascidians (a marine molluscoid) developed gradually into apes, and probably apes are only one link from man; but hitherto no trace of that link has been discovered, unless, indeed, it be in the Neanderthal skull found in the Rhine province of Prussia, which seems to be between the skull of an ape and the skull of a human being. See 'Alali.'

Evolution goes much further back than this. The condensation of nebulous vapour may be called the first step.

Mission (Prêtres de la), 1632. Established by St. Vincent de Paul. Also called 'Lazarists.'

Mississippi (U.S. America). So called (1800) from the river. It is an Indian word meaning the 'long and great waters.' The inhabitants are nicknamed Tadpoles.

Mississippi Scheme (The), 1716–1720. A financial scheme proposed by John Law to the French government, whereby he himself was to be the sole creditor of the nation, and was to be allowed to issue paper-money to ten times the value of the national debt—that is, he relieved the nation of 208 millions sterling on the right of issuing paper-money to the value of 2,080 million pounds. The regent was so charmed with the scheme that he gave Law permission to open at once The Royal Bank of France, and to issue his notes. The bank received deposits, discounted bills, gave promissory notes, all in paper. It was a prodigious success, and the regent gave 'the Royal Bank' the exclusive right of coining money, transferred to it the old East India Company, and granted it the exclusive trade of Louisiana on the banks of the Mississippi. A 500*l.* share was now worth 18,000*l.*, and John Law was made Comptroller-General of France. In 1720 the scheme exploded, and 20*s.* would have purchased 160,000 pounds' worth of Law's notes. The nation was well nigh ruined. See 'South Sea Scheme.'

Missouri (U.S. America). So called (1821) from the river of the same name (Indian). The inhabitants are nicknamed Pukes, or more commonly Pikes.

Mr. Speaker. The office of Speaker dates back to the reign of Edward III. Sir Walter Hungerford, however, was the first to receive the title of 'Mr. Speaker,' 1414. The Speaker is addressed by members as 'Sir' or 'Mr. Speaker.'

Mithridat'ic Wars (The). Between the Romans and Mithridâtês king of Pontus.

1 (B.C. 89–85). Fimbria defeated Mithridatês at Pergamos.

2 (B.C. 83–81). Sulla took from Mithridatês all the Ionian cities in Asia Minor.

3 (B.C. 74–63). Pompey defeated Mithridatês VI., and the king of Pontus killed himself.

A 'mithridate,' or antidote to all poisons, is named from Mithridatês the Great, who knew the secret of such an antidote.

Mitred Abbots. Lord abbots who sat and voted in the House of Lords. So called because they wore mitres.

Moal'lakats (The Seven). The seven most ancient sacred poems of the Arabians, a copy of which (according to Caussin de Perceval's 'History of the Arabs') is always suspended in the Kaaba of Mecca.

The authors are: Imroulcays, Tarafa, Labid, Zohaïr-Abu-Selma, Antara, Amr-ibn-Kolthoum, and Harith. Armand Caussin has translated his father's book into French.

Mob Monday, 8 Feb., 1886. So called from the riots of the unemployed which took place in Trafalgar Square, London.

Model Prison (The). Pentonville, Caledonian Road, London.

Moderates (The). The Russell, Sydney, and Hampden factions, in the great republican plot headed by Lord Shaftesbury, in the latter part of the reign of Charles II. The more violent, such as Lord Howard, Rumbold, and Colonel Rumsey, were more 'thorough,' and would have assassinated both Charles and his brother James in order to establish a Commonwealth.

Moderates and Highfliers. 1835, in the Scotch Presbyterian Church. The Moderates were also called 'Intrusionists.' That is, they did not consider the Veto Law (q.v.) an arrogant intrusion of the patron's right of presentation, but only a moderate check on that right. A presentee could not be rejected from causeless prejudice, but only for adequate reasons. See 'Intrusionists.'

The leaders of the Moderates were Dr. Bryce, Dr. Cooke, and Dr. Robertson.

Modern Charlemagne (The). Napoleon I. (1769–1821).

Modern History begins with the 16th cent. About which time occurred the invention of printing, the discovery of America, and the Lutheran Reformation.

Printing made generally known	1460
Columbus set sail for America	1498
Reformation begun in Germany by Luther...	1517

Modern History (Professorship of). In the University of Cambridge, 1724, instituted by George I. Present stipend 371*l.* a year. See 'Prince Consort Prize.'

Modern Nimrod (The). Napoleon Bonaparte (1769–1821).

Modern Scepticism (Father of). Bayle (1647–1706). Famous for his 'Historical and Critical Dictionary.'

Modhafferians (The). A petty dynasty of Turkomans, which reigned over Farsistan (1335–1394), when it was overthrown by Tamerlane. It gave four princes, the founder being Modhaffer. They were contemporary with the Il-khanians, and were always at war with other princes in Persia.

Modus (The), i.e. 'Modus decimandi.' A composition for tithes. It may either be perpetual or for the lives of the contracting parties.

Mogh's Half of Ireland. The southern half; the other moiety was called Conn's half, from the sons of a king who divided the island into two parts. This was about half a century after the death of Tuathal.

Mohammedan (A). This word is an insulting misnomer. The system of the prophet is Islam (submission to and faith in God), and a single adherent of that faith is a Moslem, a word from the same root as Islam. As well call a Jew a Mosaist as call a Moslem a Mohammedan.

God is most great, and there is nothing else great, is the Moslem's creed. Man must submit to God, and find in him his only true and greatest happiness in the Moslem's life. Almsgiving, fasting, prayer, and pilgrimage are his four chief duties.

Mohocks, or Mohawks, 1711–1714. A set of disorderly people who infested the streets of London at night and took pleasure in wounding and disfiguring those whom they met. In 1711 the government offered 100*l.* reward for the apprehension of any one of the gang. The Coxe MSS. (in the British Museum) inform us that Marlborough was advised to suborn these ruffians in 1712, 'to scour the streets by night and strike terror into the population.' This seems to be a blunder, as the scourers who scoured the streets of the Mohocks were another set of street brawlers.

These Mohawks were bands of young men, many of them of good families, who issued into the streets at night and committed all sorts of riots and brutalities, even on women and children . . . whom they met with in the badly lighted streets.—HOWITT, History of England (Anne, 292).

In 1712 Sir Mark Cole and three other gentlemen were tried at Old Bailey for attacking the watch in Devereux Street. They slit two persons' noses, cut a woman in the arm with a knife so as to disable her for life, and rolled another in a tub down Snow Hill. Gay, in his 'Trivia,' mentions these atrocities committed by the Mohocks. Mohocks or Mohawks were one of the five confederated nations of the Iroquois.

Moidart. See 'Seven Men of,' &c.

Moiley, i.e. Assassination, 1798. A word adopted by the 'United Irishmen.' A person obnoxious to the secret society was 'consigned to the Moiley'—that is, was doomed to assassination. When a murder became known, it was said that 'Moiley had had him,' or 'Moiley had eaten him.' See 'Irish Associations.'

Captain Moonlight and Rory of the Hill were the phrases used in the last quarter of the 19th cent.

Mo'linism. The doctrine of Louis Molina the Spanish Jesuit. See 'Molinists.'

Mo'linists. Disciples of Louis Molina (1585–1600), a Spanish Jesuit, who attempted to reconcile Free Grace with Free Will. He taught that God's reprobation and election were consequent on God's foreknowledge; that God gives to all sufficient grace for their salvation if they would but accept it; but to the elect He does more—with this general grace He gives also co-operative grace. It is a shade of Pelagianism, from which, however, it differs in this: Molina distinctly presupposes the inability of man to turn to God without a supernatural act of grace.

Molinists, or the disciples of Molina, must not be confounded with Molinosites (Quietists), the disciples of Molinos. See below.

Moli'nosites (4 syl.). Disciples of Michael Molinos (1627–1696) of Spain, author of 'Perfect Contemplation' or Quietism, for which he was imprisoned by the Inquisition in 1685. See 'Quietism.'

Molly Maguires. Irish Ribbonmen, named Maguire from Cornelius Maguire, baron of Inniskillen, who in 1641 took part with Sir Phelim O'Neil in the project of the Irish rebellion. Called Molly because the banded marauders conducted their forays in the guise of women's dresses. The association was planted also in Pennsylvania, where a charter was granted them under the name of 'The Ancient Order of Hibernians.' The Molly Maguires made themselves conspicuous in the sanguinary Tithe War (q.v.), 1830–1835. They also perpetrated many dreadful crimes in the U.S., where numbers of them were executed. See 'Irish Associations.'

Molly Maguires were generally stout active young men, dressed up in women's clothes, with faces blackened or otherwise disguised . . . In this state they used suddenly to surprise the unfortunate grippers, keepers, and process-servers, and either duck them in bog-holes, or beat them in the most merciless manner, so that Molly Maguires became the terror of our officials.—TRENCH, Realities of Irish Life, p. 82.

Momonians. Natives of Munster, in Ireland. The Irish for Munster is Mumha (pronounce Mooa). Cf. Esthonian, Muhuma, 'rich land'; muhunesta, '[men] from the rich land.' (De Kay.)

His claims were admitted after a desperate battle was fought, in which 7,000 Momonians fell, 1151.—O CONOR, History of the Irish People, p. 47.

Monad. According to Pythagoras, is the impartible, a mathematical point without parts. Length is a duad, breadth a triad, depth a tetrad. Physically, he says, intellectual capacity which is impartible is a monad; scientific knowledge is a duad; opinion is a triad; and sense is a tetrad, because it is apprehended by the senses.

Monads (The Theory of). By Wilhelm Leibnitz of Germany (1646–1716). He says there are two kinds of protoplasms—spiritual monads and material monads. The former make mind, and the latter body. Spirit monads, he says, possess innate consciousness,—material monads possess innate sensibility. Spirit monads are the protoplasms of the soul, material monads are the protoplasms of the body.

A monad is the indivisible element of an element.
An atom is the indivisible element of a simple substance.
A molecule is the indivisible element of a compound substance.
A microbe is a minute living organism.
Protoplasm is the physical basis of life.

 An atom of gold is gold, but a monad is the indivisible basis of the element of gold. Zeno, Leucippos, Democritos, and Epicūros preceded Leibnitz in this theory of created things.

Monarchians, 'Monarchiani.' Those who maintained the monarchy of God (q.v.). Tertullian refers to them.

Monarchy of God (The). A phrase used by anti-Trinitarians to express the one and only supremacy of the one God, the one Ruler of the universe.

It is difficult to find words to express this oneness, but it means that God has only one personality, not three personalities, according to the Athanasian Creed.

Monarchy of the Barricades (The). Louis-Philippe of France, called 'Le Roi Citoyen' (1773, reigned 1830–1848, died 1850). Made king after the Grande Semaine, when Charles X. was driven from the throne of France. Louis-Philippe was 'King of the French,' not 'King of France.'

Monastery of the Curses of Ireland (The). The monastery of St. Ruan was so called because in 554 the abbots and monks cursed those who dragged therefrom to Tara a fugitive criminal who had fled to it for sanctuary. The criminal was put to death, and the abbot and monks went in procession to Tara and cursed it. 'From that day no king ever sat again in Tara.'

Monastic Orders. See under 'Monks and Monastic Houses.'

Monatti. A class of men, professed attendants on the plague, ever ready for the most dangerous and disgusting services. It was their duty to convey those sick of the plague to the hospitals, and attend them there; to watch over those who remained at home while the plague lasted, and to carry away the dead for interment.

Mondays (Unlucky). There are three unlucky Mondays in the year: (1) the first Monday in April, on which day Cain was born and Abel slain; (2) the first Monday in August, on which day Sodom and Gomorrah were overthrown; and (3) the last Monday in December, the day on which Judas was born. See 'Egyptian Days.'

PERSIAN
Daric, worth 25*s.*, was used in Athens, and sometimes called a stater.

Money-bote. A commutation of punishment by a money fine. All offences except parricide, sacrilege, and the murder of a master by his slave, could be so commuted.

Mong-koo (The). So the Mogul Tartars are called by the Chinese. 'Koo' means dominion, power, &c., and 'Mong-koo' means 'The Mogul power or dominion,' founded by Ginghis Khan in 1206.

Mongolian Bonaparte (The). Tamerlane or Timur the Tartar (1336–1405).

Mongrel Parliament (The), 1681. Held at Oxford, consisting of Whigs and Tories, by whom the Exclusion Bill was passed, and all Catholics having an income exceeding 100*l.* a year were banished and their children taken from them to be educated in the Protestant faith. See 'Parliaments.'

Monitorial System (The). Mutual Instruction (q.v.), whereby the cleverer pupils are made to teach the less advanced, the pupil teachers being called 'the Monitors.' There are many objections against it: (1) a pupil so employed cannot himself make the same progress as if his time were devoted to his own advancement; (2) the under pupils are not so well instructed as they would be by an experienced master; (3) the respect of children to older children is very different from that which they feel to a full-grown person; (4) unless there is some official to keep order, to watch closely what is done, and to inspire both teachers and learners with a right spirit, but little progress can be expected. The only one recommendation is economy.

Monk Lewis. Matthew Gregory Lewis, born in London, died 1818, at the age of 45. He received his sobriquet from his novel of 'The Monk,' which at the time of publication was immensely popular.

Monk of Bury (The). John Lydgate, poet (1375–1460).

I am experte in poetry
As the monke of Bury, floure of eloquence.
STEPHEN HAWES, The Passe-tyme of Pleasure (1515).

Monk of Eis'leben (The). Martin Luther (1483–1546). He was born at Eisleben in Saxony.

Monk of Westminster (The). Richard of Cirencester, chronicler (14th cent.). See 'Literary Forgeries.'

It is generally supposed that this chronicle is a forgery by Dr. Charles Julius Bertram, professor of English in Copenhagen. He brought it to light in 1747, but never produced any 'original.'

Monk of Wittenberg (The). Martin Luther the reformer (1483–1546). He was professor of philosophy at Wittenberg in 1508, and preacher at the city church of Wittenberg in 1516. It was at Wittenberg that he burnt the Pope's bull in 1520, and at Wittenberg he preached against the Zwickau prophets in 1522. A monument was erected to him at Wittenberg in 1821.

Monks and Monastic Houses.

I. Originated (320–333) in the land of Egypt by Pachomius.

Introduced into Palestine by Hilarion, A.D. 328.
—— Rome by Athanasius, 340.
—— Gaul by St. Martin of Tours, 370.
—— England in 592 by Gregory the Great.

II. Suppressed 1524–1534 in the Protestant states of Germany.

Dissolution 1536 of the lesser monasteries by Henry VIII. in England, and in 1539 of the rest. Altogether 190 were suppressed in England. They contained 50,000 inmates, and their united incomes amounted to 2,858,000*l.* At the time the wages of a master workman was 4*d.* a day and of an ordinary artisan 3*d.* Beef and mutton were ½*d.* a pound.

Suppressed 1790 by the Constituent Assembly in France.
—— (1765–1790) in Austria by Joseph II.
—— 1855 in Sardinia by Victor Emmanuel.
Partly suppressed 1861 in Italy.
Suppressed 1868 in Spain.

MONASTIC ORDERS.

The chief orders are the Augustines, the Basilians, the Benedictines, the Carmelites, and the Franciscans, each of which has its special rule or system of observances. See 'Rule.'

I. AUGUSTINES, those who follow the rule of St. Augustine of Hippo (354–430).

Augustinians, Barefooted Augustinians, founded by Thomas of Jesus, Portugal, in 1574.
Brigettines (3 syl.), or Nuns of St. Saviour, founded by St. Brigett, in 1344.
Dominicans, or Preaching Friars, founded by St. Dominic of Calahorra in 1215.
Jacobins, the French Dominicans.
Order of Mercy, or 'of Redemption,' founded by Pierre Nolasque, for the redemption of Christian slaves, 1223.
Order of St. John of God, or 'Brothers of Charity,' founded in 1498.
Premonstratenzians, or Norbertines (3 syl.), reformed canons regular of Augustine, founded by St. Norbert, in 1120.

II. BASILIANS, those who follow the rule of St. Basil. They belong to the Greek Church and the Eastern rites.

The so-called Basilians of the Latin church are not of this rule.
Calayers, a very strict branch of the order found on Mount Athos, in the Morea, and in Patmos.

III. BENEDICTINES, those who follow the rule of St. Benedict of Nursia, A.D. 529.

Bernardines, reformed Benedictines, founded by St. Bernard of Clairvaux in 1115.
Camaldullians, so called from the monastery of Camaldoli, 30 miles from Florence. Founded by St. Romuald in 1012.
Carthusians, founded by Bruno in 1084.
Celestines (3 syl.), founded by Pietro of Moron [Pope Celestine IV.] in 1254.
Cistercians, founded by Robert abbot of Molesme in 1098.
Cluniacs, founded by Bernon first abbot of Cluny, and reformed by Odo in 942.
Feuillants, founded by Jean de la Barrière in 1577.
Feuillantines (4 syl.), reformed Feuillant nuns, 1590.
Trappists, the most severe of the Cistercian order, founded by Rotrou comte du Perche, in 1140.

IV. CARMELITES (3 syl.), those who follow the rule of Albert patriarch of Jerusalem, who founded a monastery on Mount Carmel in 1209.

The reformed order of Barefooted Carmelites was founded by St. Therêsa in 1562.

V. FRANCISCANS, those who follow the rule of St. Francis of Assisi (1182–1228).

Beguins, founded by Lambert Begg or Lambert le Bègue, in 1170. Of the Third Order of St. Francis.
Capucins, or 'Capuchins,' so called from their capuchon pointu, founded by Matthew Baschi in 1525.
Clarisses, or 'Poor Clares' (1 syl.), a barefooted order of women, founded by St. Francis in 1224.
Cordeliers, bound round the waist by a cord. Founded by Bernardoni in 1210.
Fraticelli, founded by Father Maurato and Father de Fossombroni.
Fratres Minores, or 'Minorites,' a general name for the Franciscans.
Grey Sisters of Flanders.
Minims, or 'Hermits of St. Francis,' founded by St. Francis of Paula, in 1431.
Observants, or 'Fathers of the Observance,' barefooted Franciscans, founded by Paul of Foligno in 1368. There were other Observants.
Picpus, reformed Franciscans, so called from the monastery of Picpus, near Paris, founded in 1601.
Récollets, reformed Franciscans, founded in 1484.
Urbanists, founded for women at Longchamps by Isabelle in 1260. Named in honour of Urban II.

 Other religious orders.

ANNUNCIADES in honour of the Annunciation.
1. The Annunciades of Savoy, founded by Amadeus VI. count of Savoy in 1362.
2. The Annunciades of Bourges (1 syl.), founded by Jeanne de Valois, daughter of Louis XI., in 1500.
3. The Annunciades of Célestes (2 syl.), or 'Filles Bleues,' founded by Maria Vittoria Fornari in 1604.

MILITARY ORDERS.

St. John of Jerusalem, or 'Knights Hospitallers' (11th cent.). Same as 'Knights of Rhodes' and 'Knights of Malta.'
Knights Templars, founded in 1118.
Teutonic Knights, who established themselves in Germany, conquered and converted Prussia and Pomerania, organised by Frederick duke of Suabia in 1190.
JESUITS, or 'Clerks of the Order of Jesus,' founded by Ignatius of Loyola in 1534.
 For Orders, &c. of less note see under each name.

Monmouth (Duke of). Son of Lucy Walters or Barlow. His father, some say, was Charles II., but Macpherson ('Papers,' i. 77) says, 'All the knowing world, as well as myself, had many convincing reasons to believe he was not the king's son, but [Colonel] Robert Sydney's.' 'Lucy was previously the mistress of Colonel Robert Sydney; and her son bore so strong a resemblance to that officer, that the Duke of York always looked upon Sydney as the father' ('Life of James,' i. 491). Lingard calls Lucy a vile worthless woman, and Evelyn describes her as 'a browne, beautiful, bold, but insipid creature' ('Diary,' ii. 11).

Monoph'ysite Controversy (The), 5th and 6th cents. Respecting the nature of Christ. Arius in the 4th cent. had insisted that Christ had but one nature, the human, but in the 5th cent. Eutychês and others maintained that his humanity was merged in his divinity as a drop of rain is lost in mid-ocean. Eutyches, who published his views on the subject in 447, was condemned by the Council of Constantinople in 488—the sentence was reversed by the Council of Ephesus in 449, but he was condemned again by the Council of Chalcedon in 451. A schism was made between the eastern and western churches on the subject in 484; the Monophysites were condemned by the Council of Constantinople in 536, and again in 553; and the sect revived under Jacob Baradæus about 570.

The word monophysite is equivocal, for the Arians believed that Christ had only one nature, viz. the human; but the word is usually restricted to the Eutychêans, who denied the humanity and maintained that it was swallowed up in the divinity. The Copts and Jacobites (3 syl.) are Monophysites (4 syl.).

Monoth'elites (4 syl.), 7th cent. Those who believed that, although Jesus Christ had two natures, He had but one will, the human being absorbed in his divine will. The first person who taught this dogma was Theodore bishop of Pharan, in Arabia. The doctrine was condemned as a heresy by the Third Council of Constantinople in 680, and the sect died out. Their descendants are the Maronites (q.v.).

Greek, μόνος, θέλημα, one will.

Monroe Doctrine (The), 1823. Against European interference or intervention in American affairs. Monroe [2 syl.] was the fifth president (1816–1824). He enunciated a firm opinion that Americans should never entangle themselves in European broils, nor ever permit any state of the Old World to interfere with the affairs of the New World.

Mons Meg. An old gun of great size made of bars of hammered iron hooped together. It is still to be seen in Edinburgh Castle.

Monseigneur (with a name after it). A title given in the time of Cardinal Richelieu to French bishops, previously entitled 'très-saint' and 'bien-heureux.'

Pronounce Mo[ⁿ]-sen-ure.

Monseigneur (without a name after it) meant the king's son in the reign of Louis XIV. See above.

Monsieur (without a proper name after it) the French king's eldest brother. The Duc d'Alençon in the 16th cent., only surviving brother of Henri III., was 'Monsieur,' and hence the phrase La Paix de Monsieur given to the treaty signed at Loches in 1576. In the reign of Louis XIII. Gaston duc d'Orléans was Monsieur; in the reign of Louis XIV. Philippe duc d'Orléans was Monsieur, and his wife Madame; in the reign of Louis XVI. Louis comte de Provence [afterwards Louis XVIII.] was Monsieur, and in the reign of Louis XVIII. Charles comte d'Artois [afterwards Charles X.] was Monsieur.

The last two princes so called were the Comte de Provence (i.e. Louis XVIII.) in the reign of his brother Louis XVI., and the Comte d'Artois (Charles X.) in the reign of Louis XVIII.
Pronounce Mŏ-se'u.

Monsieur de Paris. The executioner.
Pronounce Mŏ-se'u de Părré.
Death arrives, like 'Monsieur de Paris,' to strip the criminal, to clip his collar and hair, and lop away from him life and love and delight.—E. ARNOLD, Death and Afterwards, p. 12.

Monsieur le Coad'juteur (without a proper name) meant, in the reign of Louis XIV., Paul de Gondi, who was afterwards Cardinal de Retz.

Monsieur le Duc (without a proper name) meant, in the reign of Louis XIV., Henri Jules de Bourbon, eldest son of the Prince de Condé and his wife (Mlle. de Nantes, eldest daughter of La Vallière, the king's mistress). The wife of Henri Jules de Bourbon was entitled Madame la Duchesse.

Monsieur le Grand (without a proper name) meant, in the reign of Louis XIV., the Grand Equerry.

Monsieur le Prince (without a name after it) meant, in the reign of Louis XIV., the Prince de Condé, 'premier prince du sang' (who married Mlle. de Nantes, a natural daughter of Louis XIV. by La Vallière). His wife was entitled Madame la Princesse, their eldest son Monsieur le Duc, and their eldest daughter Madame la Duchesse (1621–1686).

Monsieur Veto. Louis XVI. In 1789 the National Assembly resolved that there should be no second chamber, but that the king should have a 'suspensive' veto on decrees sent up to him from the Assembly. The king availed himself of this right on 17 and 29 Nov., and was nicknamed Monsieur Veto. The veto of 17 Nov. was in favour of the emigrants, that of 29 Nov. in favour of the ecclesiastics.

Many believed the veto to be a tax, others thought it was an enemy that ought to be hanged on a lamp-post. 'Don't you know what a veto is?' said one countryman to another. 'Well, I'll tell you. Suppose your pot is full of good broth, and the king bids you empty it out to the dogs, you would be forced to do it.'

Monster (The), 1790. Renwick Williams, who prowled the streets of London at night-time armed with a double-edged knife with which he shockingly wounded women in their breasts and thighs, and sometimes in lonely places mutilated them horribly. He was tried and convicted. Other street rowdies have occasionally 'delighted' in wounding and disfiguring women, especially the Mohocks or Mohawks in Queen Anne's reign. See 'Jack the Ripper.'

Monster Grievance (The). So O'Connell called the Established Church in Ireland, 1832. O'Connell said the 500,000 Lutherans in Ireland cost but little less than nine million Lutherans in England, and that while England had twenty-six bishops, Ireland had twenty-two.

Monster Petition (The), 10 April, 1848, for the repeal of the corn laws. This petition was three miles long.

Monsters (Human). Incredible as it may seem, St. Augustine bishop of Hippo says that he himself had seen in Ethiopia 'many men and women without heads, who had their two eyes in their breasts.' And furthermore, that in countries further south he met with a people 'who had but one eye, and that in the forehead.' 'Notes and Queries,' 3 May, 1890, p. 357.

Sir John Mandeville's accounts (A.D. 1356) of human monsters are equally incredible. The eye in the forehead (reported also by him) is a personal feature of the giant's wife in the story of Jack and the Beanstalk. Halliwell's edition of Mandeville (or Maundevile) has an engraving of a man with the eye in the forehead.

Mont de Piété. A pawnbroker's shop, or rather a loan bank for the poor, where money is advanced on pawns. The loan is for a year, and if not then redeemed or renewed the pawn is sold by auction, and whatever remains over and above the interest and expenses is handed to the pawner. In Paris the interest required is 9 per cent., but in some departments as much as 15 per cent. Introduced 1778; abolished 1789; re-established by the Directory in 1797; and reorganised in 1804.

There are forty-five monts de piété in France, and all are under the authority of the ministre de l'intérieur.

Monts de piété were introduced into France from Italy, where they are called 'Monti di Pietà,' and were established as far back as 1450.

Monts de piété were introduced into Germany in 1766, the interest being fixed at from 8 to 12 per cent. Belgium and Holland have their monts de piété also, but England has no such institution. The needy in the British Isles are handed over to the mercies of pawnbrokers and money-lenders.
Pronounce Mŏnt-d' pe-cy-tey.

Montagnards. The party in the first French Revolution under the leadership of Robespierre. They occupied in the Convention the most elevated seats called La Montagne, in opposition to the Plaine or the lowest seats occupied by the moderate party called the Girondins. The Mountain party overthrew the Girondists on May 31, 1793, but was in turn overthrown 'le 9 Thermidor An II' when Robespierre met with his downfall (1794). Both the Mountain and the Plain were left of the Speaker.

Montalto (Louis de). The pen-name of Pascal in the famous 'Provincial Letters' in defence of Antoine Arnauld the Jansenist.

Monta'ni (Mountaineers). 'Heretics' similar to the Waldenses (q.v.), and probably a branch thereof. So called, says Eberard of Bethune, 'because, in time of persecution, they concealed themselves in the mountains.'

Another derivation is that they were Waldenses of Liguria, the inhabitants of which were called Montani.

Mon'tanists, A.D. 171. Followers of Montănus, a Phrygian who called himself the Paraclete, and said that the two ladies who went about with him (Priscilla and Maximilla) were prophetesses. The Montanists looked on marriage as a spiritual union which would continue after life, and utterly condemned second marriages. They observed rigid fasts, advocated celibacy, encouraged martyrdom, and observed three Lents every year.

Monte Gibello, or Mongibello. Mount Etna is so called by the Sicilians. Monte, 2 syl.

Monte de' Dodici (The), or Oligarchy of the Twelve. The Nine Oligarchs, or Monte de' Nove, having greatly abused their trust, were deposed, and the government of Siena was then committed to twelve men, also elected from plebeian families.
Monte (2 syl.), Do'-dee-che. Nove (2 syl.).

Monte de' Nobili (The). One of the five oligarchies which successively ruled in Siena. This was first of the five oligarchies, for Siena had originally been controlled by certain noble families to the exclusion of all other citizens from state offices.
Monte (2 syl.), No-be'-le.

Monte de' Nove (The), or Nine. One of the five governing bodies which ruled Siena in succession. When the Monte de' Nobili split into parties among themselves, they agreed to relinquish the government to nine plebeian families chosen from the most wealthy and influential of the non-privileged class. Nove, pronounce No'vy.

Monte del Popolo (The). The last of the five governing bodies of Siena. These five were elected from all who were eligible to a seat in the great council of the State. In the 16th cent. Pandolfo Petrucci made himself what the Greeks would call Tyrant of Siena.

Monte de' Sedici (The), or the 'Monte de' Riformatori.' Being tired of the twelve oligarchs, the Sienese next committed the government to sixteen men chosen from the very dregs of the people, who assumed the name of the Riformatori. Like all red republicans, they were too fond of bloodshed, and all parties joined together to depose them.
Monte (2 syl.) Sey'-dee-che.

Monteagle (Lord). Sir Edward Stanley, 5th son of Thomas first Earl of Derby, was at Flodden Field. By a sudden feint he induced the Scots to descend a hill, which was their strong position, and thus very greatly contributed to their overthrow. About a year after the battle, as Henry VIII. was keeping Whitsuntide at Eltham, in Kent, he spoke of Sir Edward's exploits, and especially his ruse which drew the Scots from the hill. Sir Edward's crest was an eagle, and the king created him Lord Mont-Eagle or Baron Stanley, Lord Monteagle.

Months (Anglo-Saxon).

January.—Se æftera Geōla (the latter yule).

February.—Sol-mōnath (the soil or mud month).

March.—Hrōth-mōnath (the fierce month ?).

April.—Eāster-mōnath.

May.—Thri-mylce (the three-milkings month).

June.—Se aerra Lītha (the former Litha, or warm month. Litha = mild).

July.—Se æftera Lītha (the latter Litha, or warm month).

August.—Wēod-mōnath (weed month).

September. — Hālig-mōnath (holy month or time of sacrifice).

October.—Winter-fylleth (winter fall).

November.—Blōt-mōnath (sacrifice month).

December.—Se aerra Geōla (the former yule).

('Notes and Queries,' 20 April, 1889, page 301.)

'Blot month' probably refers to the custom of slaying animals for the winter store. Hence 'Slay Fair' in Chichester and other places in this month.

Month with no New Moon (The), Sept. 1752. This month, in consequence of the change of style, contained only nineteen days. The New Style began on 3 Sept., which was called the 14th. The first quarter of the moon was 15 Sept., at one o'clock in the afternoon, and the full moon was on the 23rd. All days from 2 to 14 (neither included) were annihilated, consequently there was no new moon in that month. The month ran 1, 2, 14, 15, 16, and so on up to 30.

Montijoyeux, or 'Montijocrisses.' The party of the Empress Eugénie, wife of Napoleon III. of France. Before her marriage she was Eugénia de Montijo [Mon-tē'-ho] of Spain.

Monument (The London). Begun 1671, and finished 1677, to memorialise the Great Fire of 1666. Pope says:—

Where London's column pointing to the skies,
Like a tall bully, lifts its head and lies.

The following ill-worded inscription was written by Dr. Thomas Gale, afterwards dean of York. 'The burning of this Protestant city was begun and carried on by the treachery and malice of the Popish faction, in order to the effecting their horrid plot for the extirpating the Protestant religion and English liberties, and to introduce Popery and heresy.' And the Latin inscription contained this sentence: 'Sed furor papisticus, qui tam dira patravit, nondum restinguitur.' All this was erased by order of the city on 6 Dec., 1830. Not a vestige of proof was ever found to justify Dr. Gale's calumny. (See Howell, 'State Trials,' vi. 807–866.)

Monumental Figures.

Those in armour represent knights.

Those with crosier, mitre, and pontificals represent bishops.

Those with hands on the breast and a chalice represent priests.

Those built into the church wall represent founders.

Those east of the altar and elevated represent saints; those not elevated represent holy men not canonised.

Moollah. A Turkish scribe, a kind of D.D. and LL.D.; for Turkish law is based on the Koran, and therein differs from Christian law, which is wholly independent of the Bible.

A defendant would be laughed at who justified himself by a quotation from the Bible; but a text from the Koran would be indisputable law.

Moonlight (Capt.), 1878. The name assumed by some unknown Irish chief of the Land League and Fenians. He used to write warning letters to those who refused to join the league, and these letters were followed up by horrible mutilation of the person's cattle, or his being shot through the legs, or murdered, or boycotted. For several years Ireland was dominated by Capt. Moonlight, and every one was in terror of a visitation of the villain's gang. See 'Irish Associations.'

Daniel Connell was 'Lieutenant Moonlight' in 1882, and was offered a Parnell medal for bravery.

Moonlighters. Adherents of the Moonlight gang. There were Moonlighters in Scotland in the rebellion of 1745. In 'Redgauntlet' Sir W. Scott makes Maxwell say to Fairford (chap. xii.) that the passport at that moment was 'What is the age of the moon?' If the interrogator was answered 'Not light enough to land a cargo,' he was answered, 'Then plague on Aberdeen almanacs,' upon which the person would hold free intercourse with the stranger. But, he adds, these moonlight lads do not take freely to lawyers.

The Moonlighters of Ireland (1879) seem to have grown out of and succeeded the White Boys. Their chief was called 'Capt. Moonlight.' There was an inner circle of Moonlighters called 'Our Boys.' See 'Irish Associations.'

Mora-stone (The). In Swedish Morasteen (the stone on the moor), on which the kings of Sweden were crowned. It was, in fact, a circular range of stones in the plain of Mora, near Upsa'la. The coronation stone itself was a large round stone, but it was surrounded by twelve others of smaller size with wedge-shaped blocks. When Mr. Coxe visited Mora in 1782 he found ten of the stones, but the largest was only six spans long. Probably Stonehenge on Salisbury Plain was used for a similar purpose. The Lia Fail of Tara, in Ireland, was used as a coronation stone. It was removed to Scone in Scotland, and used as the coronation stone of Scotch kings. Edward I. brought it to London, and it is inclosed in our own coronation chair still.

Moral Gower (The). So John Gower, the poet, is called by Chaucer, from his 'Speculum Meditantis' and 'Confessio Amantis,' the former 'treating of the Vices and the Virtues, and of the various degrees of this age,' and seeking 'to teach by a right path the way whereby a transgressed sinner ought to return to the knowledge of his Creator.' No copy of this work is known to exist. The latter is a grave discussion of the morals and metaphysics of love. Probably Chaucer referred to the solemn sententiousness of the 'Confessio' more than to the 'Speculum.'

Moral Philosophy (Professorship of), in the University of Cambridge, 1683. Founded by John Knightbridge, D.D., Fellow of St. Peter's. Stipend 70*l.*, exclusive of fees.

Moral Science Tripos (The). Three classes into which students in the University of Cambridge are classified who have passed with credit their final examinations in the Moral Sciences. The five Moral Sciences are: 1. PSYCHOLOGY (consciousness, feelings and movements, reflex action, instinct, sensation and perception, dreams, thought, desires and volition). 2. LOGIC and METHODOLOGY (as the laws of thought, syllogisms, induction and deduction, &c.). 3. METAPHYSICS (as what is Being, Reality, Finity and Infinity, the Ego and Non-ego, &c.). 4. MORAL and POLITICAL PHILOSOPHY (pleasure and pain, desire and aversion, conscience, judgment, happiness the end of rational action, politics, jurisprudence, forms of government, &c.). 5. POLITICAL ECONOMY (as capital and labour, rate of increase, land-rent, profit and wages, currency, monopolies, banking, &c.). See 'Natural Sciences.'

Moralities. Dramas of an allegorical character to encourage good morals. They succeeded the Mystery plays (q.v.), the subjects of which were the Religious Mysteries, interdicted in the 16th cent. The dramatis personæ of the Morality plays were such as Mr. Carnal-minded, Mr. Great-heart, Faithful, Hopeful, Despair, Youth, Age, and so on.

Moran's Collar. A collar worn by ancient Irish judges, which gave warning by tightening round the neck when the wearer was about to give an unjust judgment. Hence the proverb 'I swear to it by Moran's collar.' Moran was the son of the usurper Carbre Catcan; on the death of his father he refused the crown and restored to the throne the royal race in the person of Feredach, who appointed Moran judge. It is the justice of Moran which gave rise to the fable of the Iodhan Moran.

Mora'vians, or 'The United Brethren.' Said to have existed in the 9th cent., when the kings of Bulgaria and Moravia were converted, and united in communion with the Greek Church. They are episcopal in constitution, and are attached to the Augsburg Confession of Faith. They still exist in large numbers, and have exercised considerable influence on the Christian religion.

It was in 1457 that Michel Bradacz, of Bohemia, united them under the name of 'The United Brethren.' In 1721, after the Thirty Years' War, they found an asylum at Hernhutt, under Count Zinzendorf, and changed their name to Hernhütter Morbus Anglicus. The sweating sickness.

Morden College, Blackheath, 1695. Founded by Sir John Morden, a Turkey merchant, for decayed Levant merchants. There are 40 pensioners, allowed 40*l.* per annum each, and a treasurer. The pensioners have apartments, coals, candles, washing, and service found; and dine in a common hall.

Morganat'ic Marriage. Legalised concubinage. It is a German fiction

A person of rank 'marries' a woman of inferior social position, and gives her a dowry on the wedding day, called morgangina, Saxon for a 'morning-gift.' The offspring of this woman are not heirs, though legitimate, and the bridegroom gives her his left hand instead of his right, whence the phrase 'left-handed marriage.'

A disgrace to common honesty, to say nothing of Christianity.

Morley (Mr. and Mrs.). The Princess Anne and Duchess of Marlborough mutually agreed to abandon all formality and court etiquette in their intercourse with each other. To this end, Anne was to be called 'Mrs. Morley,' her husband 'Mr. Morley,' and the Duke and Duchess of Marlborough 'Mr. and Mrs. Freeman.'

Mormons, or 'The Church of Jesus Christ of Latter-day Saints,' 1830. A religious sect founded by Joseph Smith, of Vermont, who declares that he received his mission from an angel in 1823. This angel told him where to find certain plates containing the records of the ancient American prophets. These plates were about as thick as tin, and held together by three rings running through them all. The character employed was 'Reformed Egyptian,' and with the plates were deposited the 'Urim and Thummim,' or spectacles for deciphering them. The plates say that the Americans were a colony from the Tower of Babel at the confusion of tongues. The Mormonites receive their name from the prophet Mormon who wrote the plates called 'The Book of Mormon.'

Their written Scriptures are called the books of Enos, Jarom, Zeniff, Ether, &c.

Morning Star of Reformation (The). I. In England, John Wycliff (1324–1384).

II. In France, Pierre Waldo (1120–1170) of Lyons.

He taught that the laity might conduct the offices of religion as well as the clergy; that the doctrine of transubstantiation has no warrant from Scripture; that it is wrong to invoke saints; that there is no such place as purgatory; that there are only two sacraments; that the Pope of Rome does not hold the keys of heaven, and that he never received them from St. Peter.

Mortar Boards. See 'Square caps.'

Mortification, in Scotch law, means what the English call 'Mortmain.'

Infeftments of mortified lands are those which are granted to the kirk or other incorporation having no other reddendo than prayer and supplications. Such were the mortifications of the kirk-lands granted by the king to kirkmen, or by private men to provosts and prebendars.—STAIR, book ii. title 3, 39.

Mortimer's Hole. A subterranean passage through the soft sand rock on which Nottingham Castle stands, and leading from the castle-court to the river Leen. Through this passage Edward III. and his conspirators found access to the castle, broke open the door, seized Mortimer, and brought him before the parliament, by whom he was condemned to death. He was hanged at the Elms, near London, 29 Nov., 1330, with three others, and the queen-mother was shut up in her own house of Risings, where she lived for 27 years.

Mortmain (The Statute of). 7 Edw. I. c. 2, 15 Nov., 1279, forbidding the alienation in mortmain of real property to religious houses or other corporations. This statute was based on the 'constitutions of Clarendon' (q.v.).

Lands held by the clergy and corporate bodies were in dead hands (mortuis manibus) so far as the overlord was concerned, because corporations can neither fight for their overlord, nor do they die, like individuals; consequently the lord of the fee lost the fine which accrued to him on change of tenants. As Coke says, 'the lords lost their escheats, and the services for the defence of the realm, wards, reliefs, marriages, and so on.' As a dead hand yields the lord no service, so lands held by corporate bodies yielded the lord no services.

Morton's Fork. The wealthy can pay because they can spare something out of their superfluity. The thrifty can pay because they do not squander their money in self-indulgence. The tale is that Henry VII. in 1507 wanted money—no unusual thing—and levied a 'benevolence' on the whole realm. Cardinal John Morton, archbishop of Canterbury, was appointed chief commissioner to extort money from the clergy. The rich clergy, who tried to get exempt, he said could afford to give because they had abundance, and the poor frugal clergy could afford to give because they were thrifty. BACON, 'Life of Henry VIII.,' p. 436.

Erasmus tells a similar tale of Richard Fox bishop of Exeter (1487–1491). Ecclesiastes ii.

Morven (Kings of). The following are said to have rule over the north-west of Scotland, called Morven.

Trenmor began to rule .	A.D. 32
Fingal (father of Ossian) .	210–246
Ossian I. (the poet) . .	246–287
Oscar	287–300
Ossian II. (Picts and Scots first so named)	300

Moscow Expedition (The), 15 Sept. to 19 Oct., 1812. The disastrous invasion of Moscow by Napoleon. The loss of the French in the expedition and retreat is set down at the enormous total of 200,000 human beings. Some estimate the loss of life as very much greater.

It was Rostopchin who set fire to the city. On the retreat Napoleon left his army at the Beresina, took his route towards Zemlin, and reached Paris 18 Dec.

Moses of Mesopota'mia (The). Jacōbus or St. Jacōbus, a bishop who prayed that God would protect Nisĭbis when the city was besieged by Sapor II. (A.D. 350). Whereupon a swarm of gnats attacked the Persian elephants so fiercely that they ran away, and the city was saved. (See Gibbon, 'Decline and Fall,' xviii., and Theodoret, 'Ecclesiastical History,' ii. 26.)

Moslim (vulgarly 'Mussulman,' plu. 'Mussulmans'). A true believer in Mahomet's mission; but Moslem or Moslemin means 'belonging to Islam or the creed issued by the prophet.'

The adjective is Moslem.

Moss (Treaty of), 16 Aug., 1814. A treaty of peace between Norway, Sweden, and Denmark. Prince Christian Frederick had been proclaimed king of Norway, 19 May, 1814; but Russia, Prussia, Austria, and Great Britain interfered, and induced the prince to abdicate. As resistance would have been madness, he had no choice left, and Norway was confirmed to Sweden according to the terms of the treaty of Kiel, 14 Jan., 1814.

Moss Backs. The Victorians, or people of Victoria, are so called by the Vancouverites, 'because they move so slowly that moss is apt to grow on their backs.'

Most Catholic King (The). The ruling king of Spain. The king of France was the 'Most Christian.'

Most Christian Doctor, 'Doctor Christianissimus.' Jean Charlier de Gerson, chancellor of the University of Paris, born at Gerson (Reims) (1363–1429). It is to this Gerson that many attribute 'The Imitation of Christ,' usually ascribed to à-Kempis, and certainly Gerson's 'Consolation Internelle' resembles it in an extraordinary degree.

Most Christian King, or 'Christianissimus,' was first applied to the kings of France by Paul II. in 1469. It is very strange that Louis XI. should have been the king so honoured. Henry VIII. was called 'Defender of the Faith,' for his book against Luther; but the retention of the title after the Reformation was a mere perversion of its original meaning.

Some say that Pope Anastasius conferred the title on Clovis at his baptism, because he was not an Arian as all or almost all the Christian princes of Europe were at the time. The Spanish king received the title of 'Catholic' for expelling the Moors; the Portuguese kings were entitled 'Most Faithful.'

Most Enlightened Doctor (The). Doctor Illuminatus, or Illuminatissimus, Raymond Lully (1234–1315).

Most Methodical Doctor. John Bassol, a Scotch savant, who died in 1347.

Most Profound Doctor, 'Doctor Fundatissimus' and 'Theologōrum Princeps.' Ægidius de Colonna, i.e. Giles of Cologne (1247–1316), a disciple of Thomas Aquīnas, and archbishop of Bourges. He was a zealous Realist (q.v.). It is said of this scholastic, 'Lux in lucem reducit dubia.' (He was the luminary who brought dark [or abstruse] things to light.)

Probably modern scholars would say he argued so abstrusely that he did not himself understand his own expositions.

Most Resolute Doctor (The). 'Doctor Resolutissimus.' Guillaume Durand de St. Pourçain bishop of Meaux (1267–1332). He was at first a follower of Thomas Aquīnas, and a Nominalist, but afterwards became a Scotist and defended Realism. This gave great offence to the Thomists, and one of them wrote this epitaph:

Durus Durandus jacet hic sub marmore duro,
An sit salvandus ego nescio, nec quoque curo.
Harder than stone, hard by, lies Hardy here
If saved or not I neither know nor care.

John Baconthorpe, who died 1333, a provincial of the Carmelite Order, was called 'The Resolute Doctor.' See p. 261, 'Doctors, &c.'

Most Subtile Doctor, 'Doctor Subtilissimus.' John Duns Scotus (1265–1308), the great opponent of Thomas Aquīnas and defender of the Immaculate Conception. He was a Dominican, the great opponent of the Franciscans, and was born at Duns.

Mota'zalites (4 syl.). Mohammedan sectaries of the sect of Ali. They maintain that God has no attribute separable from his essence, and that the Korân was neither the work of God nor yet perpetual. They reject the dogma of fatalism.

Mother. Anne Lee (1736–1784). The chosen of God to reveal the mystery of iniquity, and the true mother of all living in the new creation. She was born in Toad Lane, Manchester, and her father was a blacksmith. She married Abraham Standley, also a blacksmith, and joined the Shakers, by whom she was called 'Mother,' but she called herself 'Anne the Word.' In 1774 she went to America, and settled in New York, where she was received as the 'Morning Star of Christ's Second Coming.'

Mother Duchesse. So Carlyle calls the Tricoteuse of the French revolution.

Citoyennes who bring their seams with them, or their knitting-needles, and shriek or knit as the case needs. Famed Tricoteuses, patriot knitters, Mère Duchesse . . . giving the key-note.—CARLYLE, French Revolution, vol. iii. book ii. 5.

Bull-voiced St. Huruge is heard, and the hysteric eloquence of Mother Duchesse, chap. 6.

Mother Guilford. So Mary the sister of Henry VIII. called Lady Guilford, her governess, to whom she was greatly attached.

Mother Ludlam's Cauldron. Deposited in Waverley Abbey, whence (at the dissolution of the monasteries) it was removed to Frensham Church. Mother Ludlam was a white witch who assisted her neighbours by lending them such culinary utensils and household articles as they wanted for special occasions. The petitioner went to Mother Ludlam's cave at midnight, and promised to return the loan in three days. On one occasion a cauldron was borrowed, but not returned at the stipulated time, and Mother Ludlam refused to take it back, and discontinued her loans.

Mother Shipton, the prophetess of South Wales, was T. Evan Preece. She predicted the death of Wolsey, Lord Percy, and others, in the reign of Henry VIII.

She predicted that 'the end of the world would come in 1882.' This prophecy was safe enough for 800 years. The 'Propheoies' of Mother Shipton are still extant.

Mother of Universities. Bologna, 1088. A medal was struck in 1888 to commemorate its eight hundredth anniversary.

Mother of her Country (The). Maria-Theresa of Austria (1717, 1740–1780).

Mother of the Gracchi (The), 'Mater Gracchorum.' Cornelia daughter of Scipio Africanus.

When Queen Victoria, in her childhood, read the story about Cornelia showing her sons as her jewels, the princess said to her tutor, 'Not jewels, but Cornelians.'

Mother of the People (The). 'La Mère des Peuples.' Marguerite of France, daughter of François I. (1523–1574).

Mothering Sunday. Mid-Lent, when children go home to their mothers and eat 'mothering cakes.' See 'Sundays.'

Motu Proprio, 1816. An important measure introduced by Cardinal Ercole Consalvi, for the reform of abuses in the papal states. It suppressed all monopolies, feudal taxes, and exclusive rights.

Mount of Corruption (The). The Mount of Olives, east of Jerusalem. So called because thereon Solomon built temples to the gods of the Ammonites and Moabites, out of complaisance to his wives (1 Kings xi.; 2 Kings xxiii. 13).

Mountain (The), Sept. 1791. In the National Convention of France the côté droit was the constitutional party, the côté gauche was the democratic party. This latter party soon divided itself into two, viz. the Mountain and the Gironde. The former seated themselves on the most elevated benches of the hall, hence their name; the Girondists occupied what was called the plaine or the floor. At first, all the côté gauche worked together; but 31 May, 1793, the Mountain overthrew the more moderate Gironde; and 1794 the Mountain fell to pieces with Robespierre their chief.

Several young men of Hungary entered into correspondence with the chiefs of the Mountain. —GODKIN, Hist. of Hungary, p. 209.

Mountain Brutus (The). William Tell (1282–1350).

Mountain Tiger of Nepaul (The). Runjeet Singh, who died 1839.

Mousquetaires (3 syl.). A company of horse-soldiers armed with muskets, created in 1622 in the service of the king of France. In 1661 they formed two companies—the Grey and the Black Mousquetaires, so called from the colour of their horses. Their uniform was scarlet-red, and hence that part of the palace appropriated to them was called the 'Maison Rouge.' In times of peace they followed the king à la chasse, but in war they fought both on horse and foot, like the French dragoons. The Mousquetaires were suppressed in 1791; they were re-established in 1814, but disappeared on the second return of Louis XVIII. See 'Gants Glacés.'

Mozarabic or Gothic Liturgy (The). Consisted of the liturgy of Rome mixed with the oriental liturgies of the Arian Goths. Its use was suspended by the Council of Braga, A.D. 772. It was reprinted in 1500 by Cardinal Ximenês. The Gothic Liturgy is used only in Toledo. See 'Spanish Liturgy.'

Mud-Cabin Votes, 1884. The Irish franchise extended to one-pound householders and under, the number of which was 32,829 in the county Mayo alone.

Making every allowance for the disqualification of occupiers on account of parochial relief, the 'Mud-cabin' voters in county Mayo would outnumber the existing voters at least ten to one.—Standard, 9 May, 1884.

Mufti. A 'doctor of the law' in the Mussulman religion. He interprets both the text and ideas of the Korân. The Grand Mufti, called the 'Sheik-ul-Islam,' resides at Constantinople, and is head of the lawyers and priests or ulêmas. His ordinances, called fetfas, must be blindly obeyed. It is the Grand Mufti who girds on the sultan's sword at his coronation. Every town has its mufti.

Muggletonians. A religious sect which arose in England about the year 1651, and so called from Ludovic Muggleton (1609–1697), a journeyman tailor, who professed to be the mouthpiece of one John Reeve. The two gave themselves out to be the 'two witnesses' of Rev. xi., and assumed the right of 'cursing' all who opposed them. They denied the doctrine of the Trinity, held anthropomorphic opinions of deity, and believed that the devil became incarnate in Eve. They existed as a sect in the first half of the 19th cent., but the census of 1851 showed no trace of them.

Mules of Ma'rius (The). When Marius, in his second consulate, raised an army to march against the Cimbrians, he found considerable difficulty in enlisting men. His sternness repelled them, his arbitrary habits were offensive, and those who submitted patiently were called 'the mules of Marius'; but the term of reproach soon became a term to be proud of.

Multipliers. Alchemists who pretended to multiply the precious metals.

Mul'vian Bridge (The). Outside the city, about two miles from Rome. The most northerly of the eight bridges over the Tiber. Built by Scaurus.

Mumping Day. The 21st Dec. (St. Thomas's Day). 'To mump' is to beg, and on St. Thomas's Day the poor used to go about the country begging corn for the Christmas feast.

Munce'rians. A sect of Anabaptists in Germany, so called from Muncerus their ringleader, who died 1525.

Mundane Era (The). This era begins Oct. B.C. 4008.

According to the modern Greek Calendar B.C. 7388
" Josephus ... ... " 7282
" Scaliger... ... " 5829
" Professor William Hale ... " 5411
" 'L'art de Vérifier les Dates' " 4963
" Usher ... ... " 4004
" Calmet ... ... " 4000

 Of course, all such speculations, in the light of modern science, are wholly worthless, except as historical landmarks, and even then they are most misleading.

Mundane Era (The Alexandrine), 29 Aug., B.C. 5502.

Mundane Era (The Ecclesiastical) of Constantinople, 1 April, B.C. 5508.

(The Civil) of Constantinople, 1 Sept., B.C. 5508.

Mundane Era (The Grecian), 1 Sept., B.C. 5598.

Mundane Era (The Jewish).- Vernal equinox, B.C. 3761. But the civil Jewish era is Oct. 3761.

Mundane Era (The Julian), 1 Jan., B.C. 4713.

Mundane Era of Abyssinia (The). Begins 29 Aug., B.C. 5493.

Mundane Era of Antioch (The). 1 Sept., B.C. 4592.

Municipal Corporation Act (The), 5, 6 Will. IV. c. 76, 9 Sept., 1835. For the regulation of municipal corporations in England and Wales. This act abolished the 'freemen,' as they were called; the prohibition of any but freemen keeping a shop or following a trade in a corporate borough; and the power of purchasing one's freedom. Instead of freemen the burgesses were endowed with municipal powers; a burgess being any male of full age who has been an occupier for two years within the borough or within seven miles of it, and has paid poor rates, provided his name has been duly inscribed on the burgess-roll. The mayor and aldermen are to be elected annually by the council; the councillors by the burgesses; and the council from the aldermen and councillors. See 'County Council.'

The 'Irish Municipal Corporation Bill,' altering the entire structure of the corporations of Ireland, is 3, 4 Vict. c. 108, 10 Aug., 1840. The Municipal Corporation Act does not apply to London.

Municipal Reform Acts (The), 1835. The passing of a Bill which gave the right of voting to all ratepayers in towns and boroughs, besides allowing the freemen to retain their former privileges. The lists of voters were as follows: Freemen's Roll, Burgess List, and Ward List.

Muns. A name assumed soon after the Restoration by a clique of young blades in London, whose delight was to break windows, upset the night watchers, kiss the pretty girls, molest sober citizens, render the streets somewhat dangerous, and get themselves talked about as 'impudent young dogs,' 'sowing their wild oats.' See 'Street Bullies.'

'Muns' means the face or mouth, and these simpletons so called themselves because they kissed the pretty young women and made mouths at the coarse and older ones. It would seem more likely to be a contraction of the French 'Muscadins,' only the Muns existed many years before the Paris Muscadins.

Münster (Truce of), closing the Thirty Years' War. It led to the 'Peace of Westphalia,' 24 Oct., 1648.

Murab'itins (The), i.e. devoted to religion. So the followers of Abdallah ben Yassim (1046) were called. Some say 'Al-Moravides' (q.v.) is a variant of the same word. 'Moravides' (3 syl.).

Murat of the Magyar Army (The). Paul Kinisi (15th cent.). Like him in ostentation, like him in brilliancy, like him as a beau sabreur, and he was raised, like him, for his valour, from the ranks.

Murato'rian Canon (The). A list of the books of the New Testament, said to have been compiled about A.D. 150, discovered in the Ambrosian library, Milan, and published by Lodovico Antonio Muratori in 1740. Its genuineness is very doubtful.

The author of the Muratorian Canon appears to take for granted that the apostle (Paul) went into Spain.—WORDSWORTH, New Testament (Pauline Epistles, p. 429).

Muscadins of Paris (1795). Paris dandies or exquisites, who aped London cockneys after the Reign of Terror. Their dress was top-boots with thick soles, knee-breeches, a dress-coat with long tails and high stiff collar, and a thick cudgel called a 'constitution.' They affected a huskiness of voice, bearish manners, and vulgarity both of speech and behaviour.

Littré says the affectation came into use during the Revolution, and he derives the word from muscarde, which he deduces from musc. He says: 'Petit-maître, homme qui affecte une grande recherche dans son costume. Ainsi dit du parfum des muscadins.' See 'Partis en France.'

Cockneys of London, muscadins of Paris.
BYRON, Don Juan, viii. 124.

Muse of Tragedy (The). Mrs. Siddons the great actress (1755–1831).

Mushroom Cities. Chicago, St. Louis.

Music of the Spheres (The). The music produced by the seven planets rolling in their orbits. Pythagoras noticed that different lengths of string, stretched like those of a harp, produce different sounds, and as the seven planets revolve in seven orbits of different circumferences, they must, like an Æolian harp, produce different sounds as they whiz through space. These seven sounds or musical notes Pythagoras called the 'Music of the Spheres.'

Musical Scale (The Greek).

		Called
1	Ut	Hypâtê	= Principal	A Diatessaron.
2	Re	Par-hypate	= Post-principal
3	Mi	Lichânos	= Index
4	Fa	Mêsê	= Medium
5	Sol	Para-mese	= Post-medium	A Diatessaron.
6	Re	Trite	= Third
7	Mi	Para-nêtê	= Ante-penult
8	Fa	Nete	= Ultimate

The 'Diapente' is from Ut to Sol, and from Sol to Fa is the 'Diatessaron.' The 'Diapason' = the Diapente plus the Diatessaron. Similarly, from Fa to Fa is a Diapente. In both cases there are three tones and one semitone in a Diatessaron.

Musical Small-coal Man (The). Thomas Britton (1650–1714). An amateur musician and antiquary, dealer in small coals in Aylesbury Street, Clerkenwell. The room of his gatherings, says Dr John Hawkins, 'was over the coal-shop, and his weekly concerts were attended by the highest order of nobility.' Dr. Pepusch and, later on, even Handel played the harpsichord at these concerts. Here used to assemble Mr. Needler, accountant-general of the excise, the poet Hughes, Woolaston the painter, and many others. Walpole says that Britton took money from his visitors.

Musketeers (The). 'Les Mousquetaires,' 1622. A company of gentilshommes à cheval who formed the garde du roi created by Louis XIII. There were two companies—the Grey and the Black—so called from the colour of their horses. Being dressed in scarlet, the part of the palace where they lodged was called the Maison-Rouge. Suppressed in 1791; restored in 1814, but not organised again by Louis XVIII. on his second restoration.

Mutiny Bill (The), or 'Mutiny Act,' 1689 (1 William & Mary, c. 5). It enacted that any military offenders might be arrested by military authority, and tried and condemned by court-martial, in perfect independence of the civil courts.

This bill also provided for the better payment of the army, and for better quarters.

Mutiny of the 'Bounty' (The), 1789. H.M. ship 'Bounty,' commanded by Capt. Bligh, was sent to Otaheite for bread-fruit, and on the return voyage the crew rebelled, led by Fletcher Christian, the master's mate. The rebels forced Capt. Bligh and 18 of the men into a boat and set them adrift, but they landed in time at a Dutch settlement, and reached England. The British government sent Capt. Edward Edwards to seize and bring home the rebels, when fourteen were apprehended, but nine were missing. The captives were tried by court-martial, and three were sentenced to death. Twenty years afterwards the nine missing were heard of at Pitcairn's Island (1806); but only one—viz. Alexander Smith (alias John Adams)—was alive. He had become a religious man, and was farmer, schoolmaster, physician, and pastor in the island, in which were 170 inhabitants, 88 being males and 82 females. He died in 1829.

Mutiny of the Nore (The), 22 May, 1797. Suppressed in June. This mutiny was preceded by a rebellious dissatisfaction of the seamen of the channel fleet at Spithead, who deprived their officers of command and threatened their lives. This uprising was quelled by an increase of pay; but it was succeeded by a mutiny of the fleet at the Nore, led by one Parker, and very extravagant terms were demanded. After a few weeks the men surrendered at discretion, and Parker was executed.

It was to encourage loyalty among our sailors that, at this period, Charles Dibdin wrote his sea-songs, and was rewarded with a pension.

Mutton-eating King (The). Charles II. of England (1630, 1659–1685).

Here lies our mutton-eating king,
Whose word no man relies on
He never said a foolish thing,
And never did a wise on'.
EARL OF ROCHESTER.

Mutual Admiration Society (The). In French, 'La Société d'Admiration Mutuelle.' A jocose appellative applied in Paris to the 'Société d'Observation Médicale.'

In England it has been applied to several sets; as Shakespeare, Ben Jonson, Beaumont and Fletcher, &c.

Another consisted of contributors to the 'Spectator,' such as Addison, Steele, &c.

A third was the famous 'club' of Johnson, Goldsmith, Burke, Reynolds, Beauclerc, and Boswell.

Mutual Instruction, 1795. A system of education introduced by Dr. Bell in the Madras schools, where the more advanced pupils were set to teach the less advanced, whereby the number of the staff of paid teachers was very greatly reduced. Joseph Lancaster in 1798 caught the idea, and for a time the mutual instruction plan was largely adopted in our charity and parish schools. The only remnant now left is that of pupil teachers.

M.W.S., 1798. The legend on the black flags of the Irish rebels in the United Irishmen's sedition. The initials of Murder Without Sin.

Myrmillons (The), or 'Mirmillōnes' (4 syl.). Gladiators on foot who combated with the retiarii. So named from a fish, called by the Greeks μορμύρος, which surmounted their helmets.

Mysteries, 18th, 14th, 15th cents. Dramatic representations of the 'religious mysteries,' such as the Incarnation, the Crucifixion, the Holy Trinity, and the Real Presence. They were acted by monks, generally in a cathedral. At their decline they were replaced by the Moralities (q.v.).

The four best Mystery plays were the 'Passion,' the 'Resurrection,' the 'Incarnation,' and 'St. Catherine.' The 'Mystery of the Passion' is still (1890) performed in the Tyrol during 'Passion Week.'

Mystics. Those Christians who believe there is a natural and mystical meaning in Scripture, the latter to be gleaned only by particular inspiration and 'converse with heavenly habitants.' They are great in visions, dream revelations, and inward lights.

'Let there be light' means, in a natural sense, 'Let there be the light of day'—the light which now proceeds from the sun—but mystically it means 'Let there be divine inspiration and the light of glory; let light illumine the soul; let light be diffused in the heart, that it may know the divine mysteries, and see what is hid from the natural understanding.'

Mythical School (The) of Theology in Germany was founded by Strauss, who tried to prove that the gospels are not real history, but beaux-idéals of ancient prophecies personified. His 'Life of Jesus,' in 1840, produced an immense sensation. His 'Christian Doctrine and Faith' enters on the struggle between science and the Bible (1808–1874).

Naamans. A religious party founded by Alexander Knox and Rowland Hill, half churchmen and half dissenters. They were like Naaman in the house of Rimmon.

Nab. To seize unexpectedly. Nabis king of Sparta (B.C. 206–191) made a statue resembling his wife, and clothed it in magnificent apparel. When anyone refused to deliver up his riches to the tyrant, he was led up to the statue, and the statue by secret springs seized the victim in her arms and squeezed him to death against iron spikes secreted by her dress. If this is not philologically tenable, it is at any rate an historical curiosity. See 'Bullies.'

Similarly, to Burke, to Boycott, &c. The Norwegian 'nappe' (to seize) is a cognate word. It may possibly be a contraction of apprehend (seize) with an initial n.

Nabathæan Kingdoms (The). The kingdoms of the east. Arabia Felix is called Nabathæa from Nebajoth the son of Ishmael (Gen. xxxvi. 3). The people of Arabia Petræa are called the Nabathæans, but the term is very widely applied.

Eurus ad Auroram Nabathæaque regna recessit
Persidaque, et radiis juga subdita matutinis.
Vesper et occiduo quæ littora Sole tepescunt,
Proxima sunt Zephyro; Scythiam septemque triones
Horrifer invasit Boreas; contraria tellus
Nubibus assiduis pluvioque madescit ab Austro.
OVID, Metamorphoses, bk. i. 61, &c.

Nabonassar. See 'Era of.'

Naboth's Vineyard. A possession coveted by others. Thus in 1885, when half the nations of Europe were swooping down upon places for colonies or annexation, it was said that 'Germany, France, and Italy were looking about for a Naboth's vineyard,' that is, a part of the world which they could appropriate. Of course the allusion is to King Ahab in 1 Kings xxi.

Nag's Head Ordination (The). In 1559, 17 Dec., Matthew Parker was consecrated archbishop of Canterbury. Pennant says the ceremony was to have been performed by Anthony Kitchen bishop of Llandaff, but Bonner interfered; whereupon fourteen ecclesiastics determined to consecrate each other to the vacant sees. Scory, a deposed bishop, met the party at the Nag's Head Tavern, Cheapside, and consecrated Parker archbishop; this being done, Parker proceeded to consecrate the rest. Strype refutes this tale in his 'Life of Archbishop Parker,' and in Bennet College library is an instrument said to have been used on the occasion, and being the consecration in Lambeth chapel by William Barlow (late bishop of Bath and Wells), John Scory (late bishop of Chichester), Miles Coverdale (bishop of Exeter), and John Hodgkins (suffragan bishop of Bedford), of Parker and others. The Nag's Head tale is attributed to Father Talbot and another Jesuit named Holywood. Dr. Doyle in 1824–25, before a committee of the House of Commons, revived the Nag's Head tale.

The story is this: the Nag's Head is the tavern where the dean of the arches and the civilians went to refresh themselves after the confirmation of a bishop, and while the ecclesiastics were there, one Neale (Bonner's chaplain) peeped through the keyhole to see what was going on. He saw Kitchen bishop of Llandaff solicited to assist in the consecration service, but he stoutly refused to take any part therein. Scory (late bishop of Chichester) then made all kneel down, and said to Parker, 'Take thou authority to preach the word of God sincerely.' This tale was accepted as an historic fact for at least forty years; but we are told that the Earl of Nottingham was present and contradicted it, and that Archbishop Abbot produced the register of Canterbury to disprove it. Of course Neale's tale, as well as that of the earl and archbishop, are so doubtful that no reliance can be placed on either of them.

Nails (The), used at the crucifixion. Gregory Nazianzen asserts that there were only three nails used, but Cyprian maintains that there were four. The number of those said to have been found in the cave where the three crosses were buried is equally uncertain. One was sent to Rome, and is deposited in what was afterwards the Santa Croce; two others were sent by the Empress Helĕna to her son Constantine, one of which was welded as an amulet to his helmet that he might not be slain in battle, and the other was set in his horse's headstall; a fourth the empress threw into the Gulf of Venice to allay a storm; a fifth was beaten out into a thin band, and is set in the famous 'iron crown of Lombardy,' with which Charlemagne and Napoleon were crowned. So that the find of the empress did not settle the disputed point, but only made it more doubtful. See 'Crucifixion, Relics of the.'

Similarly the dispute about the wood of the cross was not settled by the discovery of the 'true cross.' Was it oak, pine, cedar, gopher wood, or what? Some affirm it was made of three or more different kinds of wood. Certainly the relics which profess to be parts of the cross vary, so that the question is still undecided.

Calvin enumerates fourteen nails: one in the Santa Croce at Rome, another in Siena, a third in Venice, a fourth in the church of the Carmelites in Paris, a fifth in the Holy Chapel, a sixth at Draguignan, a seventh at Trenaille, an eighth at Trèves, a ninth at Monza, a tenth in the crown of Lombardy, one was thrown into the Gulf of Venice, one was welded into the helmet of Constantine, one was set in the headstall of the emperor's horse (Gregory of Tours says two of the nails were set in the headstall). This would make fourteen. Not the slightest reliance can be placed on the genuineness of any of the relics of the crucifixion, or of the 'saints.'

Nails found in Coffins. A nail was at one time placed in a coffin for luck, much as a horseshoe is nailed to a stable door. The Romans drove annually on the ides of September a nail into the side wall of the temple of Jupiter Capitolinus (Livy, vii. 3).

It is supposed that the nails were originally a sort of tally for marking the number of years, and were continued out of reverence to an old custom (Festus). The nail driven into the temple was technically called 'Clavus annālis.'

Names Classicised. It was much the fashion, especially with German and Dutch authors who wrote in Latin, to convert their names into a Greek or Latin equivalent, or to give them a classic turn, as:—

Agricola (1492–1566) the reformer, and friend of Luther, whose real name was Schneider (a tailor). This was assuming another name.

Bucer (1491–1551), a Dominican and friend of Luther, whose real name was Kuhhorn (cow-horn), of which bucer is the Greek.

Desiderius Erasmus (1467–1536), a Dutchman whose real name was Gheraerd Gheraerd, of which Desiderius is the Latin, and Erasmos the Greek.

Melanchthon (1497–1560), one of Luther's friends, whose real name was Schwartzerde (black earth). Melanchthon is the Greek for a 'heap of black earth.'

Œcolampadius, the Latinised name of Johann Hausschein, the reformer (1482–1531).

Paracelsus (1493–1541), Græco-Latin for bombast, the real name being A. T. Bombast.

Porphyry, the Grecised name of Malk, the real name of the disciple of Plotin (233–304).

Regiomontānus, a Latinised form of Königsberger. So Johann Müller called himself (1436–1475). He was born at Königsberg in Franconia.

Stobæus is Stubbs Latinised (5th cent.).

Till after the reign of Friedrich II. the Great (1740–1786) the Germans were ashamed of their language, and all their standard works were written in Latin or Greek. Of course this does not apply to Porphyry, though probably he disliked the name of Malk.

Nameless Finger (The). The 3rd finger of the right hand. The right-hand fingers are the pointer, long finger, nameless finger, little finger; of the left hand they are the pointer, long finger, ring finger, and little finger.

Nanekism. The religious system of Nanek, founder of the religion of the Sikhs, which is a fusion of Islamism and Buddhism. The Sikhs recognise both the Vedas and the Korân. His code is called the Adi-granth. Lahore is the centre of Nanekism.

Nanek was born 1469, and died 1539.
N.B.—'Sikh' is one of a Hindû sect, and means disciple. 'Sheik' is an Arab chief.

Nantes (Edict of), July 1591, granted by Henri IV. to the Protestants of France, was only a revival of the Edict of Poitiers conceded by Henri in 1577. The difference was this: the Edict of Nantes was enforced, that of Poitiers was a dead letter. In 1597 the edict was extended, and the Huguenots were allowed the public exercise of their religion in all places in which it had obtained a footing in 1597, and in the suburbs of towns. Permission was given to lords of high rank to hold religious services in their castles, and to noblemen of second rank to admit thirty co-religionists to their private chapels; the reformed were admitted to public offices, their children to schools, and the poor to a share of alms; the right of printing books in certain towns was conceded, equal representation in some of the palements, four academies of scientific and theological instruction, and a certain number of places of security.

Napier's Bones, 1617. A contrivance by John Napier baron of Merchiston for saving the tedious processes of multiplication and division by shifting about slips of ivory or bone, and, after the slips have been arranged, merely adding or subtracting the figures on the slips.

Thus a sum of multiplication by five figures would (after the bones are arranged) be performed by simply adding five lines of figures.

Napoleon (The Code of), 1803–1804. The 'Code Civil,' consisting of three books, the first of persons, under 11 titles; the second of goods, under 4 titles; and the third of the ways of acquiring property, under 20 titles. The whole code contains 2,281 articles. Tronchet was 'the soul of the code,' but he was assisted by Rœderer, Portalis, Thibaudeau, Cambacérès, and Lebrun.

Though the Napoleon Code means the Code Civil, yet there are several other codes for different branches of the law, as the 'Code Pénal,' the 'Code des Délits et des Peines,' the 'Code d'Instruction Criminelle,' &c.

Napoléon le Grand. Napoleon I. (1769, 1804–1814, died 1821). Banished to Elba 1814 (he was deposed 4 April, and arrived at Elba 4 May). Flight from Elba 26 Feb., 1815; reached Paris 20 March; defeated at Waterloo 18 June. He gave himself up to Capt. Maitland of the 'Bellerophon,' 15 July; was banished to St. Helena, and arrived there in the 'Northumberland,' commanded by Admiral Sir George Cockburn, 16 Oct. He died 5 May, 1821. His remains were removed to Paris in 1840, and were deposited in the Hôtel des Invalides 15 Dec., 1840.

His 'day of the Violets' is 1 March, the day when he reached Cannes after his escape from Elba. See 'Violets.'

Father, Carlo Buonaparte of Corsica; Mother, Maria Letizia Ramolina; Wives (1) Josephine, widow of Beauharnais, divorced; (2) Maria Louisa archduchess of Austria; Son, François Joseph Napoleon Bonaparte. Contemporary with George III. Memoranda. Napoleon Bonaparte was sub-lieutenant of artillery 1785, captain 1792, commander of the National Guards 1792, brigadier-general 1794, commander-in-chief of the army in Italy 1796, First Consul 24 Dec., 1799, First Consul for life 2 Aug., 1802, Emperor 18 May, 1804. He won fifty-two victories. His life was attempted in Dec. 1800 by an 'infernal machine' planted in the Rue St. Nicaise. The intention was to kill him on his way to the opera. He was once wounded slightly in battle, and was excommunicated by Pius VII. in 1809.

His abdications: I. Deposed by the senate, and abdicated at Fontainebleau 4 April, 1814. Sent to Elba in the British frigate called the 'Undaunted,' under the command of Capt. Usher; went on board 28 April, and arrived at Elba 4 May, 1814.

II. After the battle of Waterloo he abdicated a second time, 22 June, 1815. He gave himself up at Rochefort to Captain Maitland, commander of the 'Bellerophon.' Accompanied by Count Bertrand, Count Montholon, Count Lascases, Baron Gourgaud, a surgeon, and twelve domestics, he was then sent to St. Helena in the 'Northumberland,' under the command of Admiral Sir George Cockburn, and arrived there 16 Oct., 1815, Sir Hudson Lowe being governor of the island. He lived in Longwood House, and died 5 May, 1821, amidst a phenomenal tempest.

His crack regiments were the 30th, 43rd, and 96th. To belong to one of these infantry corps was a warrant of reckless courage and undaunted bravery. Napoleon and all his staff uncovered and bowed low as any one of their tattered colours filed in review before them.

Napoleon II. Son of Napoleon I. and his second wife Maria Louisa archduchess of Austria. He was created 'King of Rome' from the moment of his birth (20 March, 1811), and, when his father abdicated in 1814, the Senate proclaimed him Napoleon II., a title which the powers of Europe would not allow. On the fall of his father in 1815, the lad retired to the court of his maternal grandfather, the emperor of Austria, and received the title of 'Duke of Reichstadt.' He died of consumption at Schönbrunn in 1832.

Napoleon III., Emperor of the French (1808, reigned 1852–1870; deposed, and died 1873).

Father, Louis Bonaparte, brother of Napoleon I.; Mother, Hortense de Beauharnais, daughter of Josephine by her first husband (her second husband was Napoleon I.); Wife, Marie-Eugénie de Guzman, comtesse de Téba. Contemporary with Queen Victoria.

 His life was attempted six times.

1852, 24 Sept. An infernal machine was found at Marseilles designed to kill him.

1853, 5 July. His assassination was attempted as he was leaving the Opéra Comique.

1855, 28 April. Giovanni Pianōri fired at him in the Champs Elysées.

1857, 7 Aug. Barcolotti, Gibaldi, and Grillo came to London to assassinate him while he was on a visit to Queen Victoria.

1858, 14 Jan. Orsi'ni (q.v.) attempted his life.

1863, 24 Dec. Greco attempted his life.

Orsini organised his infernal plot in London, Pianori did the same; Mazzini, Ledru-Rollin, and Campanello in London supplied plotters with arms, &c. The French ambassador complained to the British government; and these plotters against the French emperor nearly dragged us into a war with France.

Special Constable in London, 10 April, 1848. Louis Napoleon, with 170,000 noblemen, gentlemen, merchants, and tradesmen, volunteered to be sworn in as special constables to prevent disturbance of the peace by the Chartists when they presented their monster petition (q.v.). Louis Napoleon acted under the Earl of Eglinton.

 Nicknames:—

COMTE D'ARENSBERG. So he called himself after his escape from the fortress of Ham.

BADINGUET. The name of the man he shot in his Boulogne escapade.

BOUSTRAPA. A compound of Bou[logne], Stra[sbourg], and Pa[ris], the places of his noted escapades.

GROSBEC. So called from the rather unusual size of his nose.

MAN OF DECEMBER. So called because December was his month of glory. Thus he was elected president 11 Dec., 1848; he made his coup d'état 2 Dec., 1851; was chosen president for life by plebiscite 21 Dec., 1851; and was created emperor 1 Dec., 1852.

MAN OF SEDAN. So called because at Sedan he surrendered his sword to William king of Prussia, Sept. 1870.

MAN OF SILENCE. See p. 548.

OUI-OUI was the pet name given him by Hortense in his childhood. He was a quick, intelligent boy, beautiful as a girl.

RATIPOLE (3 syl.). The same as the West of England word rantipole, meaning a harum-scarum fellow, half idiot and half madcap.

SEDANTAIRE. A pun on Sedan. See above.

SOULOUQUE (q.v.).

The Little. Victor Hugo gave him this title, but the hatred of Hugo for Napoleon was a monomania.

VERHUEL. The name of his supposed father. He was born while his mother was separated from her husband. So scandal says she had been separated thirteen months.

 Whatever may be said of Napoleon III., two things deserve mention: (1) He was the only crowned head of France who visited England as a friend; and (2) all through his reign he knew his best policy was to remain friendly to England. From this wise policy he never swerved, although sometimes goaded to animosity by his military advisers. Our relations with France have certainly not improved by the substitution of a republic.

Napoleon of Peace (The). Louis-Philippe king of the French (1773–1850, reigned 1830–1848). Also called 'The Citizen King.'

Napoleon of the East (The). Mehemet Ali pacha of Egypt (1769–1848).

Napoleon of the Turf (The). Lord George Bentinck (1802–1848).

Nassac Diamond (The). Formerly in the possession of the East India Company; weighed 89¾ carats, but since the Duke of Westminster had it cut anew it weighs only 78⅛ carats. Its value is about 30,000*l.* See 'Diamonds.'

Nation of Shopkeepers (A). So Louis XIV. called Holland. Napoleon Bonaparte applied the phrase to England; but whether England or France is the more given to trade would be hard to determine. Probably the proportion of men independent of trade would be in favour of England; and without the least doubt the money-grabbing or commercial spirit in Frenchmen is very much stronger than it is in Englishmen. I lived eight or nine years in France, and mixed with all classes—the court, the military, the medical profession, the literati, the bourgeois, and the proletariat.

Nations (Expedition of the), A.D. 625. When the Koreish were defeated by Mohammed. They had been defeated by him in 623 at Bedr and Ohud. See 'Ditch.'

RR

National Anthem (The) of Hungary is 'Rakotski's March.' See 'God save the King.'

Prince Franz Leopold Rakotski, a Transylvanian prince, protector of Protestantism (died 1676).

National Assembly (The).

I. Of France, 17 June, 1789. 'L'Assemblée Nationale,' the tiers état, which withdrew from the States-General, while the nobles and clergy were debating how the votes were to be counted, and whether they should sit in the same house with the deputies.

The nobles and clergy wanted to have three houses and to vote by houses. This, of course, would be simply to ignore the tiers état. The deputies, who numbered 584 members, while the two other estates numbered both together only 561, insisted on voting per capita.

II. Of Germany, 1848. It superseded the old German 'Diet' (q.v.), which held its meetings at Frankfort. The National Assembly met at Berlin, and offered the imperial crown to William king of Prussia, but he declined the honour. It formed a constitution with two chambers; the upper one was to contain 200 members and the lower one to consist of representatives of the people, one-third of the members to retire every two years. The kaiser was to have the absolute right of declaring peace and war, and of making treaties. Free municipal institutions were to be established; and perfect freedom in religion, education, science, and the press to be conceded. All this fell through in 1849, when a new legislative body was constituted, consisting of two chambers, which met at Brandenburg.

The National Assembly of Berlin proved so refractory that the city was deserted, trade was paralysed, and Prussia was reduced to the verge of civil war.

National Association for the Repeal of the Union (The), i.e. the union between Great Britain and Ireland. Organised in Ireland 1840, and monster meetings were held on the Hill of Tara to promote the object 15 Aug., 1843. The subject of repeal has agitated Ireland ever since 1810, and in 1886 Mr. W. E. Gladstone brought in a bill with a view of putting an end to the ever-recurring agitation. In 1840 Daniel O'Connell was the great agitator; and from 1881 to 1890, under the name of 'Home Rule' and the leadership of Charles Stewart Parnell, the question of repeal obstructed almost all parliamentary business. See 'Irish Associations.'

National Association of Ireland (The), 1864. Formed to disestablish the Irish Church, and to alter the land laws. The church was disestablished in 1869. See 'Irish Associations.'

National Board (The), Ireland. The 'Commissioners of National Education' (q.v.).

National Confederacy of Poland (The). The dissidents under Prince Radzivil. They amounted to 72,000 noblemen and gentlemen, and were opposed by a Catholic association called the 'Confederacy of Bar' (q.v.), which in 1774 conspired to assassinate the king (Stanislaus Augustus Poniatowski), suspected of favouring the dissidents. The king escaped in a miraculous manner, lived through the two partitions of Poland, was compelled by Catharine of Russia to abdicate in 1795, and died in obscurity in 1798, aged 66.

National Convention (The).

I. Of Chartists, 1838. Up to 12 Aug. the delegates met at the Arundel Coffee House, in the Strand, London. It was declared illegal by the Convention Act Dec. 1839, but meetings continued to be held for ten years longer.

The Chartists were strongly averse to the Anti-Corn-Law League, because, they said, it would reduce the labouring man's wages, which were virtually regulated by the price of corn.

II. Of France. 'La Convention Nationale' (from 21 Sept., 1792 to 26 Oct., 1795). The French legislature which succeeded the Legislative Assembly (q.v.). On the very first day of meeting it abolished royalty and proclaimed France to be a republic. On 17 Jan., 1793, it pronounced sentence of death on Louis XVI. On 5 Oct., 1793, it declared that all dates should be computed from the foundation of the republic (22 Sept., 1792). On 16 Oct., 1793, it brought Marie-Antoinette to the guillotine. On 21 Oct. it condemned to death twenty-one of the Girondists. On 5 April, 1794, it condemned to death Danton, Camille Desmoulins, and many others of the Cordeliers (q.v.). On 27 July, 1794, it condemned to death Robespierre. On 26 Oct., 1795, it declared itself dissolved.

On the right sat the Girondists, on the left the Montagnards, in the centre the middle-men. The number of members was originally 721; reduced to 500 in Year III. and to 300 in Year VIII. (21 Sept., 1792).

National Covenant (The), 1638. A bond of union drawn up at Edinburgh by the leading Presbyterian ministers, embodying the Confession of 1580, and binding all who signed it to spare nothing in the endeavour to preserve their national religion. The proximate cause of this bond was the attempt of Charles I. to enforce on Scotland episcopacy and the Common Prayer Book.

National Debt (The), 1664. The national debt began in the reign of Charles II., to make up the deficiencies of the revenue. In 1672 he declared that the interest could not be paid, but in 1684 the payment of interest was resumed. In 1699 the rate of interest was fixed at 3 per cent. Future sovereigns increased the debt chiefly for war expenses. The debt was highest in 1817, when it was almost 841 millions. In 1888 the interest was reduced to 2¾ per cent.

National Defects. The special plague of CHINA is leprosy, so was it of the ancient JEWS; of JAPAN and INDIA smallpox and cholera; of SOUTHERN ITALY physical deformities; of HOLLAND spinal diseases; of GERMANY defective eyesight; of SWITZERLAND goître and rotten teeth; of NORTH AMERICA rotten teeth and early baldness; of FRANCE 'the French disease'; of ENGLAND consumption, especially among girls.

National Gallery (The), 1824. The National Picture Gallery in Trafalgar Square, London. The foundation was the collection of Mr. Angerstein, purchased by government; enriched by the gifts of Mr. Vernon, Mr. Sheepshanks, Mr. J. W. M. Turner, and others.

The building in Trafalgar Square by Wilkins was opened 9 April, 1838, enlarged by Pennethorne in 1860. The eastern wing was granted to the Royal Academy of Arts for their annual exhibition of pictures, &c., formerly shown at Somerset House; and the western wing was set apart for national pictures of ancient and modern deceased artists, formerly exhibited in Pall Mall. In 1868 the Royal Academicians removed their exhibition to Burlington House, and left the whole of the National Gallery for the exhibition of national works.

National Land League of Great Britain, March 1881. To abolish rent altogether in Ireland; and to make Ireland an independent nation, 'with its own flag among the nations of the world.' This league was in substitution of Michael Davitt's LAND LEAGUE (q.v.), which was suppressed in 1882. Proclaimed as unlawful Aug. 1887. See 'Irish Associations.'

In 1885 there sprang up, in the U.S. of North America, the 'Irish National League of America.'

National League (The), 1882, Ireland, had for its objects:—

1. National self-government.
2. Land law reform.
3. Local self-government.
4. Extension of parliamentary and municipal franchise.
5. The development and encouragement of native industries and manufactures.

The Land League, instituted in 1881, was suppressed in 1882. See 'Irish Associations.'

National School Society (The) of England, 11 Nov., 1811. Parochial schools in connection with the Church of England, supported by voluntary contributions, school pence, and government grants. The schools are examined by government inspectors and are under diocesan inspection also. See 'Board Schools.'

National Schools (The), of Ireland, 1833. Introduced by Mr. Stanley, chief secretary. These schools are under a board called the 'Commissioners of National Education in Ireland' (q.v.). The schools are strictly undenominational, and no pupil need attend any religious instruction which the parents or guardians do not approve; but any pupil may receive special religious instruction at a fixed appointed time. No book to be introduced without the express approval of the commissioners.

National Subsidy (The English), 1770. The interest of the large subscriptions made in Great Britain for the augmentation of the pastors' salaries in the Piedmontese valleys. This was in addition to the 'Royal Subsidy' (q.v.).

Nationalists (1886). An Irish party led by C. S. Parnell, M.P., which wanted to secure for Ireland a separate parliament, with the ulterior view of separating Ireland from England, and making it an independent kingdom. In 1886 Mr. Gladstone brought in a bill for Home Rule in Ireland. Those Whigs who favoured this bill were called Separatists, and those who opposed it were called Unionists. See 'Irish Associations.'

Natura Naturans. 'Nature operating is Nature's creator.' Bruno's phrase (1550–1600), by which he meant that it was not God who created all things out of nothing, but that 'energising Nature' was the true creative force. Not 'Deus creavit omnia ex nihilo,' but 'Natura naturans naturavit naturam.'

Spinoza taught that God and Nature are identical; and Stahl taught that God is the anima mundi, or its vital principle, as the soul is of the body.

Natura Naturata. Nature made Nature; or Nature is the outcome of natural energy.

Natural Experimental Philosophy. See 'Jacksonian Professor.'

Natural Science Tripos. Three classes into which students in the University of Cambridge are divided who have passed with credit their final examinations in the Natural Sciences. The Natural Sciences include (1) CHEMISTRY (the laws of heat, and the laws of metallic and non-metallic bodies); (2) BOTANY (the structure, &c. of vegetable cells, the vessels of plants, the functions of their organs, their means of reproduction, and their classification); (3) ZOOLOGY (the genera of animals, their special forms and skeletons, nervous system, digestive system, circulatory system, organs of respiration, ova, and embryo); (4) GEOLOGY (the leading facts of Physical Geography, the order of the stratified rocks and their general character). And these six other subjects: Biology, Physics, Mineralogy, Comparative Anatomy, Human Anatomy, and Physiology. Of course, no examination includes all these nine subjects. See 'Moral Sciences.'

Nautch Girls (The). See under 'Bayaderes' (3 syl.).

Naval Mass. The mass celebrated on board ship, when the rolling of the vessel might cause the wine to be spilt or the 'bread' to be scattered. In this mass the oblation, the consecration of the elements, and the communion are all omitted.

Navarrais (The), 1357–1364. Charles the Bad of Navarre, son-in-law of Louis X. of France, who conspired with the dauphin against Jean II. le Bon. He was imprisoned, but made his escape after the battle of Poitiers. In 1357 he joined the English, and while Jean was in captivity in London, laid claim to the crown of France (1358). At the death of Jean, his son and successor Charles V. sent Bertrand du Guesclin against these invaders and marauders. He encountered them in Normandy, routed them utterly, and slew their leader the Captal de Buch.

Charles the Bad met with a very singular death. He was advised by his medical attendant to sleep in a nightdress steeped in spirits of wine. He did so, his dress caught fire, and he was burnt to death.

Navigation Act (The), 1651. Promulgated by Cromwell. Its object was to exclude all foreigners from English ports, and to secure to England and its colonies all the carrying trade. Hitherto Holland had been the great carrying state, but by this act it was ordained that no goods from Asia, Africa, or America should be imported to Great Britain except in ships belonging to England or its colonies. Abolished in 1849. See 'Reciprocity Act.'

Nazarenes (3 syl.), or Nazaræans. A sect mentioned by Tertullus in Acts xxiv. 5. The Christians were so called insultingly; but the word was subsequently applied to Judaizing Christians, who demanded exact conformity to the Mosaic ritual. The only gospel they accepted was 'an heretical gospel' ascribed to Matthew.

In Evangelio juxta Hebræos, quod Chaldaico quidem Syroque sermone, sed Hebraicis literis conscriptum est, quo utuntur usque hodie Nazareni.—JEROME, Dialog. adv. Pelagianos, book iii. 2.

Nazarites (3 syl.). Persons separated or consecrated to God (Numb. vi.). (1) They abstained not only from wine, but even from the grapes of which wine is made; (2) they were never allowed to cut their hair; (3) they were never allowed to defile themselves by contact with a dead body, not even if that body was the nearest and dearest, as husband or wife, father or mother, son or daughter, brother or sister.

Nazoreans. 'Nazireans,' 'Nazareans,' or 'Nousaïeriens,' a sect (mentioned by St. Epiphanius), and said to have been in existence before the Christian era. They had a scripture called the 'Book of Adam,' containing most of our 'Book of Genesis.' When Christ came, they abjured his mission, and called their own founder the real Messiah ('Anacalypsis,' p. 657).

Nebraska (U. S. America). So called from the river Nebraska (Indian), now the River Platte. The inhabitants are nicknamed Bug-eaters; they are said to have once eaten locusts during a visitation of those insects.

Necessary Doctrine or Erudition (The), 1543. A book of directions drawn up in convocation by the bishops inclined to the reformation. This book was of authority in the English Church during the remainder of Henry VIII.'s reign.

Necessitarians. Those who deny the freedom of the will, such as Augustine and Calvin. Thus Augustine insisted that conversion is solely by free grace, independent of the human will; and Calvin insisted that those saved were predestined to be saved. Pelagius and Arminius insisted that man is free to accept or reject the gospel.

Negative Elements of our Belief (The). The Unitarian Confession of Faith, contained in four articles (Martineau, 'Studies,' p. 77).

The Positive Ones, as described by Dr. Beard, are about eight or nine.

Negative Oath (The), 1641. An oath imposed on the clergy in the reign of Charles I., that they 'would not consent to alter the government of the Church.' The University of Oxford protested against this oath.

Neill of the Showers (King), 795– . So called because on the night he was born three showers fell in Ireland: a shower of honey, a shower of silver, and a shower of blood.

Nelson (The Danish). Peter Tordenskiold (1691–1720). He was a tailor's apprentice in Trondhjem, and raised himself to the rank of vice-admiral.

Trondhjem, pronounce Tron-yem.

Nelson's Column, in Trafalgar Square, was erected in 1843; the four lions by Landseer were added in 1867.

The design of the column was furnished by W. Railton, who took for his model a column of the Temple of Mars Ultor at Rome. The order is Corinthian, and the material Devonshire granite.

Nelson's Eye. August 1794, at the siege of Calvi, a very strongly situated and fortified place in Corsica, Nelson lost the sight of one of his eyes by gravel driven into it by a shot which fell near him (age 36).

He lost his arm in July 1797, in an attack on Santa Cruz, Teneriffe (age 39).

Neme'an Games. Held in Neme'a, in Argŏlis. Instituted by the seven heroes on their return from Thebes; but historically B.C. 575. Philip of Macedon presided at the opening games. They were held four times a year, and the original prize was an olive wreath. Eleven of the Odes of Pindar are in celebration of victors in these games.

Nemedians (The). Invaders of Ireland under Nemedius, who compelled the subjugated Fomorians (q.v.) to build forts for them, and afterwards put the architects to death. They were driven out of the island by the natives, but a few left behind had a district awarded them (Keating, p. 121).

Moore, in his 'History of Ireland,' says the Fomorians were African pirates who overcame the Nemedians, dispersed them, and destroyed them.—Chap. v. 76.

Nemours (The Treaty of), 1585, in which Henri III. of France engaged to deprive the Huguenots, not only of the public exercise of their religion, but also of liberty of conscience. It was ordered by this treaty that all the Calvinistic clergy should quit the kingdom within a month, and that all Huguenots, who would not abjure, should emigrate before six months under penalty of confiscation of goods and death. This term of six months was afterwards reduced to fifteen days.

Neo-Fenians, 1878–79. Founded by John Devoy. His 'new departure' had for its object the 'uniting of the forces of revolution and constitutional agitation, with a view of advancing the aims of the separatist party.' See 'Irish Associations.'

Neolo'gians, Neol'ogy. A rationalistic form of Christianity introduced in the 18th cent. by Eichhorn and Paulus, who denied the divine origin of the Scripture; maintained that the Old Testament is like any other history; that clergymen are mere professors of theology, as lawyers and medical men are professors of their respective professions; and that miracles, if worthy of any credit, are only natural occurrences.

Neoplat'onism. This philosophy developed itself in Alexandria, and its object was an amalgamation of Plato's philosophy with Eastern mysticism. The Neoplatonists gave objective reality to abstract ideas. Thus Wisdom was made a person, and it is thought by some that 'The Word' referred to in the gospel of St. John is an instance in point. The Trinity of the Neoplatonists consists of Unity, Wisdom or the Word, and the Mundane Soul. The chief exponents are Ammonius Saccas, Plotinus, Porphyry, Jamblichus, Proclus, and Julian the Apostate.

Neoplatonism, in Alexandria, originated with Philo about A.D. 35 or 40; but was more definitely constituted by Ammonius Saccas about 190-240.

Neph'ites (2 syl.). The second American race according to the Book of Mormon. The first were Jaredites, so called from Jared, who led a colony to America at the dispersion when God confounded the tongues of the builders of the Tower of Babel. The first colony were all slain by internecine war. The Nephites were so called from Nephi (youngest of the four sons of Lehi), who led the second colony, and was appointed by God to rule over the colony settled in Chili.

As the brothers of Nephi opposed this decree of God their skins were blackened, and they became the founders of the American Indian tribes. Nephi heard the earthquake at the crucifixion, and Christ himself appeared to him forty days and revealed to him the truths of Christianity. In A.D. 384 the race of Nephi was annihilated. See 'Book of Mormon.'

Neri (The), 1294. A political faction in Pistoia, similar to the Donăti of Florence, and favourers of the Guelfs. Their opponents were the Bianchi (q.v.).

The names were derived from two powerful families; the Neri represented the high aristocratic class, and the Bianchi the rich merchant class. See the 'Blacks and Whites.'

Nero of Persia (The). Sefi or Sophi, grandson of Abbas the Great (1628-1642). This tyrant had not one redeeming quality.

Nero of the North (The). Christiern II. of Denmark (1480, 1513-1523).

Nero's Torches. Christians smeared with oil or tar, stuck in the ground, and set alight. It is said that the Emperor Nero threw on the Christians the charge of setting fire to Rome, and thus tortured some of them in public thoroughfares A.D. 64.

It must not be forgotten that religion and politics were united in the Roman empire, and that the persecution of Christians was in all cases more a matter of civil policy than of aversion to Christian dogmas.

Nertschinsk (Treaty of), 1689. Between Russia and China, fixing the boundary line between the two countries. The river Kerbeschi (the Gorbitza) was made the line of separation.

Nestor of Europe (The). Leopold king of Belgium (1790, 1831-1865).

Nestor of German Poesy (The). Christoph August Tiedge (1752-1841).

Nestor of German Sculptors (The). John Heinrich Dannecker (1758-1841).

Nestorian Liturgy (The). No Nestorian liturgy has been printed, but probably the Anglican missionaries sent to the Assyrian Church in 1887 will make it a part of their duty to print these service-books. The Nestorians teach that there are two persons, not two natures, in Christ. Their chief bishop used to be called the Catholicos, but is now called the Patriarch. They do not accept the canon of Scripture as authorised in the Council of Rome 494. They have seven sacraments, but these are not identical with the sacraments of the Western Church. They are rigid sabbatarians, and acknowledge three orders of the ministry.

Nestorians, A.D. 428. The followers of Nestorius patriarch of Constantinople (died 439). He maintained that Jesus Christ was the union of two persons, the Divine Word and the man Christ Jesus. The former dwelt in the latter as in a temple, and Mary was not the mother of God, but only the mother of the man Christ Jesus, for 'God' could not be born, neither could He die. This heresy was condemned by the General Council of Ephesus in 431. There is a Nestorian Liturgy. See 'Theophoron,' &c.

Theodore of Mopsuestia first broached this heresy, which still subsists in Persia and Turkey. One party insisted that the Virgin Mary was 'Theotocos' (mother of God), another insisted that she was 'Anthropotocos' (mother of man); Nestorius devised a middle term, 'Christotocos' (mother of Christ), and thus offended both sects.

Netherlands (The), 1548. The seventeen provinces which under Charles V. formed the 'circle of Burgundy.' They passed to Spain in 1556. Seven of the northern provinces in 1579 leagued together in what is called the 'Union of Utrecht,' threw off the Spanish yoke, and became in 1594 .'the Republic of the Seven Provinces.'

Under Louis XIV. of France Artois, with parts of Flanders, Hainaut, and Namur were united to France, and the rest was called the 'Spanish (or Catholic) Netherlands.' By the peace of Rastadt, in 1714, these provinces were ceded to Austria, and received the name of the 'Austrian Netherlands.' In the French Revolution, France took these provinces from Austria; and in 1814 sixteen French departments were formed into the 'kingdom of the Netherlands,' and given to William I. of the house of Nassau. In 1830 the kingdom was divided into 'the kingdom of the Netherlands' (Holland) (north), and the 'kingdom of Belgium' (south).

The king of Holland still calls himself the 'king of the Netherlands.' See 'Holland.'

Neustria. The ancient name of Normandy.

Neva'da (U.S. America). So called from the Sierra Nevada, or 'snowy mountain chain,' which traverses the state. The nickname of the inhabitants is Sagehens.

Neuters. Presbyterians to be added to the Rump. They would have no power and no influence against the satellites of Cromwell, who would form an overwhelming majority.

Scarcely had they met the next morning, when Colonel Ingoldsby hastened in and informed them that the Commons were hard at work pushing forward their bill for increasing their own numbers by the introduction of the neuters.—HOWITT, Hist. of England (Commonwealth), p. 229.

Neutralisation of the Black Sea (The), 30 March, 1856. All ships of war (with recognised exceptions) prohibited from entering the waters of the Black Sea, but it was free to the mercantile marine of every nation.

The exceptions were that Russia and Turkey might each have six steamships of 800 tons and four light vessels of 200 tons each.

New and Latter House of Israel (The). See 'Jezreelites.'

New Church (The). The Swedenborgians.

New College, Oxford, 1886. Founded by William of Wykeham, bishop of Winchester. The head-master is called the warden.

New Connection (The), 1797. Seceders from the Methodist Connection led by Alexander Kilham. In doctrine they follow Wesley, but in discipline they resemble the Presbyterians. The people choose their own officers, and send representatives to all the synodical meetings of the denomination. They seceded because they thought the conference is not sufficiently representative; and they give an equal share in all administrative affairs to laymen and ministers.

New Departure (The), 1880. In Irish history, commenced on the visit of Mr. Parnell to North America. It combined the murderous violence of the Clanna-Gael or United Brotherhood with the craft of the 'constitutional agitation in Ireland,' and the craze of the peasantry (stirred up by the Land League at the suggestion of Michael Davitt) of paying no rent for their farms. See 'Irish National Brotherhood.'

New Franciscans (The), 1763. A club of twelve profligates who met in an old Cistercian abbey at Medmenham on the banks of the Thames, and there caricatured the rites and processions of the Catholic brotherhood by obscene rites and profane imitations. Over the portal they inscribed the motto which Rabelais says was placed over the gate of Theleme Abbey: FAY CE QUE VOUDRAS. They rivalled in licentiousness and profanity the Hell Fire Club.

Amongst the members were Wilkes (editor of the 'North Briton'), Sir Francis Dashwood (chancellor of the exchequer), Paul Whitehead, Lord Sandwich, &c. Called 'Franciscans' from Francis (the Christian name of Dashwood, who had his likeness taken in the habit of a Franciscan friar.

New General Baptist Association (The), 1770. Seceders on the question of the divinity of Christ.

New Hampshire, in N. America, previously called 'Laconia,' received its present name from Captain John Mason of Hampshire, to whom it was conceded in 1629 by the Plymouth Company. It is a state of mountains and lakes, and called 'the Granite State' and the 'Switzerland of America.' The inhabitants are nicknamed 'Granite Boys.'

New Inn Hall, Oxford, 1888. Founded by Dr. Cramer dean of Carlisle. The head of the hall is called the principal.

New Jersey (U. S. America). So called, 1664, in compliment to Sir John Carteret, who had defended Jersey (in the British Channel) against the Parliamentarians in 1642. Charles II. gave the territory to his brother James, and James gave it to Lord Berkeley and Sir George Carteret. Lord Berkeley resigned his right to Penn and others, but Philip Carteret the governor divided the territory with them by a straight line from north-west to south-east. Carteret took the east side and Penn the west. The inhabitants are nicknamed Jersey Blues, Spaniards, Crows, and Clam-catchers.

New Jerusalem Church (The). The Swedenborgians (q.v.).

New Method (The), 1720–1724. The work of John Wesley was so called at Oxford. His 'method' was to visit the sick, and go from place to place preaching. Methodism as a system arose in December 1739.

New Model (The), 1645. The reorganised army according to Cromwell's plan. Essex, the leader of the parliamentary army, 'who was afraid to conquer his king,' was replaced by Sir Thomas Fairfax. Cromwell said, 'If I met the king in battle, I would as soon fire my pistol at him as at any other man.' No officer of either House was to command the new-modelled army, for the tenure of military and civil offices in the same person is incompatible. The army must be wholly severed from the parliament. The soldiers must be picked men, honest and God-fearing. Young men are to be preferred. In a word, the aristocratic element was to be eliminated, and the whole army to be constructed on the model of Cromwell's 'Ironsides.' They were volunteers, not pressed men, men who left their farms and shops for a purpose, and would return to them when that purpose was accomplished.

New Moral World (The). The 'model parallelogram' of Robert Owen; established at Orbiston, in Lanarkshire, 1825. Only one corner of the parallelogram was ever built, and only 200 inmates were ever collected together at any one time. It was treated as a great moral nuisance, and the building was soon levelled to the ground. Owen's next scheme was in 'Harmony Hall,' Hampshire, 1844, where he was president. This, like the Orbiston parallelogram, was an utter failure, and Owen was deposed by his own disciples. He went to Paris in 1848, but made no mark, and died in 1858.

Beside the Orbiston parallelogram and the Harmony Hall, he had a place in Indiana (America) which he called New Harmony, also an utter failure.

New Republic (The) The following names in Roman letters are supposed to be the academy figures of the characters in italics, introduced into the novel entitled 'The New Republic' by William Hurrell Mallock. Donald Gordon, Thomas Carlyle; Lady Grace, Mrs. Mark Pattison (Lady Charles Dilke); Herbert, Professor Ruskin; Dr. Jenkinson, Professor Jowett; Leslie, Mr Hardinge; Luke, Matthew Arnold; Rose, W. Pater; Saunders, Professor Kingdon Clifford, or else F. Harrison; Seydon, Dr. Pusey; Mrs. Sinclair, Mrs. [Violet Fane] Singleton; Stockton, Professor Tyndall; Storks, Professor Huxley. The 'Historian,' chap. ii. bk. 3, is Professor Freeman.

New River (The). The united streams of two rivulets in the parishes of Ware and Amwell (Hertfordshire), brought by Hugh Myddelton through a course of twenty miles, to supply London with water. Begun 1609, completed and opened in 1613.

New Style. The reformed calendar introduced by Gregory XIII. in 1582. It was at once adopted in Italy, Spain, and Portugal by abridging October eleven days, and calling 5 Oct. the 15th. France adopted the reform the same year by calling 10 Dec. the 20th. Catholic Switzerland, Germany, and the Netherlands adopted the new style in 1583; Poland in 1586; Hungary in 1587; Protestant Germany, Holland and Denmark in 1700; Protestant Switzerland in 1701; England in the reign of George II., 1752, when Wednesday 2 Sept. was followed by Thursday 14 Sept.; that is, 3 Sept. was called 14 Sept. (Holy-rood day). In Sweden the new style was adopted in 1753; Russia alone of European nations retains the old style.

In all cases such rules have been adopted as to prevent the recurrence of any appreciable error; but the change is observable in our quarter-days: thus new Midsummer day is 24 June, but old Midsummer day is 6 July; new Christmas day is 25 Dec., but old Christmas day is 6 Jan.; new Lady day is 25 March, but old Lady day is 6 April; so new Michaelmas day is 29 Sept., but old Michaelmas day is 11 Oct.

New Testament (The), was originally written on Egyptian papyrus; but in the 12th cent. it was written on silk paper.

From the 5th to the 8th cent. it was written in uncial letters (i.e. inch-large letters), but from the 9th cent. cursive letters were employed.

At first there were no divisions of words. Euthalius (a deacon at Alexandria), in the 5th cent., divided the words into stichs (στίχα), that is, paragraphs. In the 6th cent. the text was divided into breves. In the 13th cent. Hugo de Santo Caro (a French cardinal, Hugues de St. Cher) divided the gospels into chapters and verses, and Robert Stephens in the 16th cent. extended the division and introduced the chapters and verses still in general use.

The earliest MSS. of the New Testament are in uncial letters. And the oldest known MS. is the 'Codex Vaticanus' (q.v.).

New Year's Day. The Franks began the day on 1 March, the day of their Champ de Mars or national assembly. In the reign of Charlemagne it was shifted to Christmas day, and continued so till the 16th cent., when 1 Jan. was constituted New Year's day. There are numerous relics of the custom of beginning the year on 1 March.

March is a repetition of January. The moon repeats itself, thus if it is new on 1 Jan. it will be new on 1 March, &c.

New York (U. S. America). Received its present name in 1664, in compliment to James (afterwards James II. of Great Britain and Ireland) duke of York, to whom the territory was given by his brother Charles II. The inhabitants are nicknamed Knickerbockers.

It had previously been called New Amsterdam.

Newdigate (The). A prize for English verse given in the University of Oxford annually, value 21*l*. Founded by Sir Roger Newdigate in 1808. In Cambridge a medal is given called 'The Chancellor's English Medal' (q.v.).

Newmanism. The proper adjustment of Christianity and the world according to the opinions of the Oxford Tractarians.

The Oxford Tractarians (1833–1841) were 'A,' i.e. Rev. John Keble, professor of poetry; 'B,' the Rev. Isaac Williams; 'C,' the Rev. E. B. Pusey, D.D., regius professor of Hebrew; 'D,' the Rev. John Henry Newman, author of 'Tract No. 90' (he subsequently joined the Catholic Church, and was made a cardinal; died in 1890); 'E,' the Rev. Thomas Keble; 'F,' Sir John Provost, Bart.; 'G,' the Rev R. F. Wilson.

The Rev. John Henry Newman, born in London 1801; seceded from the Established Church in 1845; was made a cardinal in 1879; and died in 1890.

Newmarket Oracle (The). Ogden, a professional betting-man, who rose from nothing (18th cent.).

Newnham College, 1880 (Cambridge), for the residence and instruction of ladies. Miss Fawcett's position in the Mathematical Tripos of 1890, 'above the senior wrangler' of Cambridge, put this college in the first rank.

Newspapers.

In ancient ROME an official gazette, called 'Acta Diurna' (q.v.), was issued under the management and authority of the government, and posted up daily in some prominent place in the city.

In VENICE a paper of public intelligence, called 'Gazzetta,' was published in 1620

In ENGLAND the first weekly newspaper was published by Nathaniel Butler in 1622

" the first daily newspaper in ... 1709

In FRANCE the first weekly newspaper was published in 1631

" the first daily in 1777

In AMERICA, at Boston, a newspaper was published in 1690

In IRELAND the first newspaper, called 'Pue's Occurrences,' appeared in 1700

" the oldest Dublin newspaper, 'The Freeman's Journal,' in 1755

In GERMANY the first newspaper was published in 1715

In HOLLAND the first newspaper was published in 1732

In TURKEY the first newspaper was published in 1795

In AUSTRALIA the first newspaper was published in 1803

 For particular newspapers see each under its own title.

Newton (The American). David Rittenhouse (1732–1792) of Pennsylvania.

Newton and the Apple, 1666. It is Voltaire who states that Mrs. Conduit, Newton's niece, told him the story. Newton, she said, was at Woolsthorpe, and, seeing an apple fall, was led into a train of thought which resulted in his discovery of gravitation.

The story is discredited by Martin Folkes, Hegel, Gause, and many others. And certainly neither Whiston nor Pemberton mentions it.

Newton of Harmony (The). Rameau (1683–1764), the most philosophical musician of France. His great work is a 'Dissertation on the Principles of Harmony.'

Newtownbarry Riot (The), 18 June, 1831. On the occasion of a seizure of stock for tithes, a conflict ensued between the yeomen and people, in which 35 persons were wounded or killed. The jury could not agree, and was discharged without coming to a verdict.

Niag'ara Falls Association (The), 1883. To promote legislation and other measures for the restoration and preservation of the natural scenery at Niagara Falls in accordance with the plan proposed by the Commissioners of the State Survey in their special report on the subject. The State of New York gave a million and a half (dollars) for the purpose, and the 'Falls' were made free to all mankind for all time to come. The bill was signed in 1885 for the payment of the 'Falls' in state bonds, and on 15 July, 1885, the Niagara Falls, including Goat Island and the lands contiguous (on the American side), were declared free to the world for ever.

Nicæan Barks. The ships of Alexander the Great. They were under the command of Nearchos, and sailed from the Indies to the Persian Gulf and to Susa. They were called Nicæan barks because they were built at Nicæa.

Nicene Creed, or 'Symbŏlum Nicænum,' 325, concocted at the First General Council of Nicæa, but completed by the Council of Constantinople in 381. This is the creed in the Communion Service.

The Apostles' Creed in its present form was adopted in the Church in the 11th cent.; but a formula containing some of the articles existed in the 2nd cent.

The Athanasian Creed was adopted in the Latin Church in 678; in France in 850; in Spain and Germany a century later; in England about 1000. It was not the work of Athanasius, who lived 296–372, but was supposed to incorporate what he taught on the subjects contained in the Creed.

Nicholites (3 syl.), or 'New Quakers.' An extinct sect of liberal Quakers, once found in Maryland, but long since united with the Hicksites (2 syl.).

Nicias (Peace of), B.C. 421. A peace for 50 years, in the eleventh year of the Peloponnesian war, between Sparta and Athens. By this treaty each party agreed to restore all the prisoners and places mutually taken during the war. The signatories were the Athenian Nicias and the Spartan king Pleistoanax.

Nickers. London night-larkers of the 17th and 18th cent., whose delight was to nick or hit a pane of glass and break it, by flinging a copper at it. He was the best nicker who nicked the highest panes. See 'Street Bullies.'

His scattered pence the flying Nicker flings,
And with the copper shower the casement rings
GAY, Trivia, iii.

Nicode'mus (Gospel of), or 'Acta Pilāti.' An apocryphal gospel supposed to have been forged somewhere between 320–376. See 'Spurious Gospels.'

By 'Acta Pilati' is generally meant an apocryphal account of the Crucifixion, said to be the despatch of Pilate to the Emperor Tiberius. Eusebius, book ix. chap. 5, speaks of another 'Acta Pilati' 'full of every kind of blasphemy against Christ, which, with the consent of the emperor, was circulated throughout the whole Roman empire.' In these Acts Christians are charged with the most revolting crimes.

Nicola'itans (5 syl.). Condemned in Rev. ii. 6, 15. They taught the lawfulness of a community of wives; that Christians might partake of the heathen feasts; and maintained that God dwelt in the body of Jesus as in a temple, but was not united like body and soul.

Nicolas was one of the first seven deacons.—Acts vi. 5. Peter is supposed to refer to this heresy in 2 Epis. ii. 15-20.

Night of Al Kadr (The), 24 Ramadân. The night when Mohammed received his first revelation from Gabriel.

Verily we sent down the Korân in the Night of Al Kadr.—The Korân, chap. xcvii.

Night-boys. Same as Moonlighters (q.v.). See 'Irish Associations.'

Nightingale of Twickenham (The). Alexander Pope, who lived at Twickenham (1688–1744).

For my own part I abhor your irregular geniuses, and I love to listen to the little nightingale of Twickenham.—DISRAELI, Venetia, bk. vi. c. 8 (Cadurcis).

Nightingale of Wittenberg (The). So Hans Sachs [Sax] the mastersinger (q.v.) in 1523 calls Luther in a poem addressed to the reformer. It seems a strange comparison, but Sachs means that Luther was a bird which sang in moral darkness, as a nightingale sings at night.

Nihilism started into existence in 1848 under Herzen, a radical philosopher of the Hegel school. He was joined by Bakunin, and the two became joint editors of a communistic journal called the 'Bell' (Kolokol), published in London, but widely circulated in Russia. In 1866 the emperor was shot at by a young man, and the danger of Nihilistic teaching roused the serious attention of the Russian authorities. Soon after the death of Bakunin the secret Nihilistic societies greatly multiplied till 1881, when the Emperor Alexander II. was horribly assassinated. Since then the dogmas of the Nihilists have been gradually spreading, especially among the common people.

In 1868 the following manifesto was circulated: (1) Tear out of your hearts the belief in the existence of God, or you can never know what freedom is; (2) the second lie to get rid of is Right, which is only the bastard of Might. Might makes Right. Without Might there is no such thing. Away with it! (3) having got rid of these two lies, civilization, property, marriage, morality, and justice will snap like pack-thread; (4) let your own happiness be your only law; but, in order to enjoy this law, you must destroy everything that exists in the shape of government and social organisation. Annihilate everything as it now exists—the good with the bad—make a clean sweep of all; for if but one atom of the old leaven is suffered to remain, it will corrupt the new order, and all the work will have to be done again.

It is said that this manifesto was drawn up by Bakunin, who died between 1876 and 1878.

Nika Sedition (The), Jan. A.D. 532. A sedition between the Greens and the Blues (q.v.), which lasted five days, and almost laid Constantinople in ruins. It occurred in the 5th year of Justinian on the ides of January. The Greens appealed to the emperor for protection, when the Blues rose up against them like raging lions. Seven of the ringleaders were condemned to death, but, being rescued by the mob, were carried in triumph through the streets, and as they were Greens and Blues, the two factions united for the nonce against the magistrates, and used for their watchword NIKA, that is Victory. The military were called out, and, hurling firebrands against the insurgents, set fire to the city, burning down the cathedral of St. Sophia, the baths of Zeuxippus, a part of the imperial palace, a hospital, and many churches, edifices, and private houses. Some 30,000 Greens fell in this sedition.

Nimbus in Christian Art (The). The representation of a glory round the head.

For ANGELS, the nimbus consists of rays, surrounded by a circle of quatrefoils, like pearls and roses.

For APOSTLES, MARTYRS, and CONFESSORS, the nimbus is golden.

" CHRIST, the nimbus is more or less cruciform. Sometimes the glory, called aureola, envelops the whole figure.

" GOD the FATHER, the nimbus is triangular, or a circle with hand in the act of blessing. Sometimes the glory, called aureola, envelops the whole figure.

" PENITENTS, the nimbus is yellow, more or less shaded.

" PROPHETS and PATRIARCHS, the nimbus is white or silver.

" SAINTS (1) living, a square nimbus.

" " (2) married, the nimbus is green.

" " (3) who have struggled hard with temptation, the nimbus is red.

" VIRGIN MARY, the nimbus consists of small stars. Like God the Father and God the Son, her whole body is sometimes inclosed in an aureola.

5th to 12th cent., a disc over the head.

14th cent., the triangular nimbus was introduced.

15th cent., a broad band behind the head, and the inscription of the name of the saint in the nimbus was introduced.

17th cent., the nimbus was discontinued.

19th cent., it was introduced again.

A SQUARE NIMBUS indicates that the person was living, a square being the symbol of the earth.

A CIRCULAR NIMBUS indicates that the person is gone to heaven, a circle being the symbol of eternity.

A BLACK NIMBUS is given to the traitor Judas.

GOLD NIMBUS, awarded to saints of the highest order.

GREEN NIMBUS, assigned to married persons (Hope, not Certainty).

RED NIMBUS, awarded to those who were tried as by fire, fighting against sin.

SILVER NIMBUS, next in honour to the golden nimbus.

YELLOW NIMBUS, given to sinners who by prayers and penance had become saints.

Nimeguen, in Holland (Treaty of), 1678, 1679. This was a great peace congress of the European powers, to put an end to the wars which had embroiled France, Germany, Spain, Holland, and Sweden. The treaty was first agreed on between France and Holland, 10 Aug.; then between France and Spain, 17 Sept.; then between France and Germany, 5 Feb., 1679. Next, Denmark, Sweden, and the Elector of Brandenburg agreed to the peace. By this treaty Sweden was put into possession of all it had at the commencement of the war.

Pronounce Neem-gen, with g hard.

Nine Articles of the Evangelical Alliance (The). To be held by those who belong to the society.

1. The divine inspiration, authority, and sufficiency of the Holy Scriptures.

2. The right and duty of private judgment in the interpretation of the Holy Scriptures.

3. The unity of the Godhead and the Trinity of persons therein.

4. The utter depravity of human nature in consequence of the fall.
5. The incarnation of the Son of God, his work of atonement for sinners, and his mediatorial intercession and reign.
6. The justification of the sinner by faith alone.
7. The work of the Holy Spirit in the conversion and sanctification of the sinner.
8. The immortality of the soul, the resurrection of the body, the judgment of the world by Christ, the eternal blessedness of the righteous and eternal punishment of the wicked.
9. The divine institution of the Christian ministry, and the obligation and perpetuity of the ordinances of Baptism and the Lord's Supper.

Our creeds are: the Apostles', the Nicene, and the Nine Articles of Faith adopted by the Evangelical Alliance.—M. McLEAN, Echoes from Japan (1889, p. 24).

See 'Lambeth Articles.'

Nine Days' Queen (The). Jane Dudley, better known as Lady Jane Grey; but she was married to Lord Guilford Dudley, son of John [Dudley] duke of Northumberland (1537–1554). Proclaimed queen 10 July, and Mary was proclaimed queen by the Earl of Arundel 19 July, 1553.

Nine European Heroes of Delhi (The), 11 May, 1857. Lieutenants George Willoughby, Forrest, and Raynor; Conductors Buckley, Shaw, and Scully; Sub-conductor Crow; and Sergeants Edwards and Stewart. These nine men defended the magazine against a swarm of Sepoy mutineers. Edwards and Crow were killed, then Scully fired the mine, and, as the building blew up, the surviving seven effected their escape. A trooper cut down Scully and a marauder slew Willoughby on the road to Meerut. Forrest, Raynor, Stewart, and Buckley escaped, and lived to receive the Victoria Cross.

We are not told what became of Conductor Shaw.

Nine Gems (The). The nine wise or learned men of Hindostan in the reign of Vikramáditya, B.C. 56, &c.

Nine Kingdoms of the Latin World (The). (1) England, France, and Scotland (more ancient than the reign of Charlemagne); (2) Castile, Aragon, and Navarre (created by the sword); (3) Sweden, Denmark, and Hungary (created by their baptism).

The Nine Kingdoms of the Latin World disclaimed their new associate (Sicily).—GIBBON, chap. lvi.

Nine Orders of Angels (The). Disposed in three circles. Three × three = nine, the most sacred number.

Novem vero angelorum ordines dicimus . . . scilicet (1) Angelos, (2) Archangelos, (3) Virtutes, (4) Potestates, (5) Principatus, (6) Dominationes, (7) Thronos, (8) Cherubim, et (9) Seraphim.—GREGORY, Homily 34 (A.D. 381).

Nine Worthies (The). Hector of Troy, Alexander the Great of Macedon, Julius Cæsar emperor of Rome, Joshua leader of the Israelites, David king of the Jews, Judas Maccabæus, Charlemagne, Arthur king of the Britons, and Godfrey baron of Jerusalem.

One naturally looks for the name of Moses.

Nisi Prius. A trial by jury in some civil action. A judge sitting at nisi prius means a judge presiding at a jury trial in a civil cause. The phrase is borrowed from the first two words of the old writ for summoning juries.

By 13 Edw. I. c. 30, juries were summoned to appear at the courts of Westminster 'in Octabis Sancti Michaelis NISI PRIUS' the judge on circuit came to hold his court in the assize town where the jury lived. This nisi prius proviso has been disused (in England) since 1852, and all trials, as a matter of course, take place on circuit.

Nizam'-gedittes' (2 syl.), 1807. An army of 10,000 Turks raised by the Sultan Selim, clad in European costume, and officered by European soldiers, chiefly French. The old Turkish janissaries, jealous of these new troops, deposed the sultan and placed his cousin Mustapha on the throne.

No. 1, organiser of the Irish Invincibles, 1881, was a man named P. J. Tynan. He was a handsome man, about five and a half feet high, and wore spectacles. He went about in various disguises. All Invincibles were Fenians of the better class. See 'Irish Associations.'

No. 45 (of the North Briton), 1763, in which Wilkes said the words in the king's speech that the peace of Paris 'is honourable to the crown and beneficial to the nation' are false. This being deemed an insult to the king (George III.), Wilkes was arrested 30 April, and committed to the Tower. When brought to trial the bench declared that the arrest could not be sustained on account of Wilkes's privilege as a member of parliament, for nothing short of treason could interfere with that privilege. Wilkes was accordingly at once discharged. His release was celebrated, especially in the cider counties, with processions, in which a jack boot, a petticoat, and the king led by the nose by Bute, were carried. See 'Jack Boot.'

In 1772 George prince of Wales, having been chid for some boyish fault, stole into the king's apartment and shouted, 'Wilkes and No. 45 for ever!' George III. only laughed at the boy's impudence.

No. 61. The 'Secret Select' (q.v.) of the Glasgow Trades Union, 1837.

No. 90 (Tract). One of the 'Tracts for the Times,' written by John Henry Newman, D.D., Fellow of Oriel, Oxford. This was the last of these famous religious tracts issued 1833–1841. Dr. Newman subsequently joined the Church of Rome, was made a cardinal, and died in 1890.

No. 290. The 'Alabama' (q.v.).

'No Popery' Riots. In Edinburgh and Glasgow, January 1779.

In London, June 1780, called the 'Gordon Riots' (q.v.).

Noach'idæ. Those proselytes who refused to be circumcised. They bound themselves to observe the precepts of Noah, but not the law of Moses.

Noble Lesson (The), 1100. A metrical production consisting of 479 lines in the Romance or Vaudois language. It is chiefly an abstract of the Old and New Testament history. It refers to the corruptions introduced into the church since the days of the Apostles. It begins thus:—

O brethren, give ear to a noble lesson: (nobla leyczon)
We ought often to watch and pray,
For we see this world is near its end; . . .
Eleven hundred years are fully accomplished,
Hence it was written 'We are in the last times.'

Noble Proclamation (The), 980. The proclamation of Malachy monarch of Ireland after his conquest of the Danes. It was in substance as follows: 'Let all the Irish who are now in servitude return to their respective homes, and enjoy themselves in peace and gladness.' The number released by the Northmen was upwards of 2,000.

Nobles of the Genoese War (The), 1381. When Venice was threatened with utter destruction by the Genoese, the Venetian Grand Council announced that, at the termination of the war, The Forty (q.v.) would elect thirty of the citizens by ballot into their own council. These new nobles were to enjoy all the rights, privileges, and immunities of the original nobles. At the close of the war the promise was fulfilled, and among those aggrandised was 1 banker, 5 tradesmen, 6 simple citizens, 1 merchant, 5 of the lower order, and 8 operatives. Four centuries later only eight of 'I Nobili della Guerra di Genoa' had representative survivors.

Nobody's Club, 1800. A club consisting of the friends of William Stevens (1732–1807), who assumed the pseudonym of 'Oudeis' (nobody). They met at the Freemasons' Tavern, London, once a year. The original number was fifteen.

Nobs [In the Glasgow Trades Union], 1837, were employers who had made themselves obnoxious to the workmen, and were appointed to be dealt with by the 'Secret Select' (q.v.). The names of these 'Nobs' were enrolled in a book, and every sort of annoyance was offered to them.

Nocturns. Same as Matins. One of the eight daily services of the Catholic Church, and the first of the four great ones at break of day. See 'Canonical Hours.'

Noel's Catechism, or 'Nowel's,' &c. 1563. Alexander Nowel or Noel, dean of St. Paul's, at the recommendation of Cecil revised the 'Larger Catechism,' but his book was not published till 1570.

Noetians. Heretics of the 2nd cent., also called Patripassians, whose doctrines resembled those of the Sabellians. Founded by Praxeas, who was succeeded by Noëtus. If Jesus was verily the 'Everlasting Father,' then when Jesus suffered on the cross God the Father was crucified. (Pater-passus, the Father suffered.)

I consider that he had Noetian tendencies.—We Two, xxiv.

No-flint General (The). Major-General Grey, afterwards Lord Grey of Howick, and finally Earl Grey, who in the American war, 1778, ordered his men to take the flints out of their guns and trust wholly to their bayonets; also called 'No-flint Grey.'

Nolan (The). Giordano Bruno (1550–1600), born at Nola in Naples. He was burnt to death as a heretic.

Nol'umus leges Angliæ mut'ari. This celebrated answer was made by the lay lords in the famous parliament held at Merton the day after the coronation of Henry III., and was given in answer to a motion of the bishops for legitimatising natural children provided, after the child was born, the father and mother married (1216).

Nominalism and Realism. Terms used in scholastic divinity during the Middle Ages to express the nature of abstract ideas, such as circle, beauty, god, &c. The question was this: is there such a thing as abstract beauty, or must not our idea of beauty be allied to some object? Nominalism is the system adopted by nominalists, and realism is the system adopted by realists. Aristotle was a nominalist, and Plato a realist. See next article.

Nominalists. Those who believed in nominalism. They were the disciples of Roscelin (1040–1120), canon of Compiègne, and denied the existence of universals. Take a tree in the abstract; this is a universal, and a nominalist would say such has no existence. Take an oak tree, an elm tree, a fir tree, &c.; these are particular objects which stimulate in us certain ideas. Well, say the nominalists, our idea of a tree must be limited to particular trees, and our concept of tree in the abstract must be derived from such particular objects. It is universalia post rem, tree in the abstract formed post rem, after the concrete has been formed. It is altogether à posteriori, an inference of a universal or abstract idea from particular objects cognised beforehand. Of course, according to nominalism, the abstract idea of God is impossible; all we can know of God is from his works, &c.

In theology there is another sort of nominalism. We are taught that Father, Son, and Holy Ghost are one God. Well, as three persons cannot really be one, the nominalist contends that these 'three persons' are only different names (nomina) of the same being, just as father, son, and husband may be three distinct names of the same individual.

Abelard, William Occam, Buridan, Hobbes, Locke, Bishop Berkeley, Condillac, and Dugald Stewart were nominalists.

St. Anselm of Canterbury, Albertus Magnus, Thomas Aquinas, and Duns Scotus were realists (q.v.).

Roscelin seems to have raised the question whether the personal distinctions of the Deity are real or nominal only.

Nominees (The King's), 1662. Thirty-six of the Irish nobility and gentry specially nominated by Charles II., after his restoration, to be restored to their Irish estates, from which they had been banished by Cromwell.

About 6,000 of the restorable Irish were never restored to their estates. There were four classes, viz. Innocents, Articlemen, Ensaignmen (q.v.), and the King's Nominees. Of the 7,778,000 acres forfeited in the Commonwealth, 66,360 statute acres were awarded to the Nominees.

Non-Catholics, i.e. Protestants. See 'Edict of Toleration.'

Nonconformists, 1565. Those who refused to conform to the 'Book of Advertisements' drawn up by order of Queen Elizabeth by the Court of Ecclesiastical Commission for the sake of securing uniformity of doctrine and discipline in the kingdom.

Now nonconformist is a synonym of dissenter, one who does not conform to the State Church.

Non-importation Act (The), 26 March, 1806. Passed by Congress to prohibit the importation of British manufactures into the United States. The immediate cause of this prohibition was the annoyance caused by the British ship 'Leander' cruising off New York and insisting on searching American vessels under pretence of looking for deserters. In one of these searches an American sailor, named Pearce, was killed, and the hostility of the States, which had long been smouldering, burst into a blaze.

Non-intercourse Act (The), U.S. Passed Congress 27 Feb., 1809, suspending all trade between the U.S. and either France or England. The offence of England was its claim of the right of search, which compelled American vessels to surrender any British subjects who formed part of their crew. The offence of France was the Continental system (q.v.). Napoleon, having removed all obstructions to American trade, Congress renewed intercourse with France 2 Nov., 1810; but the breaking out of the second American war with Great Britain in May 1812 continued the non-intercourse till after the battle of Waterloo, when friendly relations were restored.

Non-intrusion Controversy (The), 1838–1843. A controversy in the UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORNIA

Presbyterian Church of Scotland respecting the right of the State to interfere in ecclesiastical matters. It began with the question, Have patrons the right of presenting to livings or does the choice rest with the congregation? In 1833 Dr. Thomas Chalmers suggested that a patron should nominate, but the people should have the right of veto. This was accepted by the Assembly in 1834. In 1838 the Veto Act was ruled to be illegal, and the Assembly declared that the Church is wholly free and independent. Several appointments by patrons were made and disputed, and the result was a split in 1843, which gave birth to the 'Free Church.'

Non-Intrusionists (The). Those who separated from the Presbyterian Church of Scotland at the Non-Intrusion controversy. The split consisted of 470 ministers, with their office-bearers, elders, and communicants, and in 1843 the separatists formed the 'Free Church of Scotland.' They did not consider the veto proposed by Dr. Chalmers any intrusion or illegal interference with the right of a patron.

The chief leaders were Drs. Chalmers, Chandler, Candlish, and Gordon, with Messrs. Guthrie, Cunningham, and Dunlop. Dr. Thomas Chalmers was elected president of the new 'Free Church.'

 The law was that a congregation has the power of rejecting a presentee for 'adequate reasons.'

Non-juring Clergy of France, 28 Jan., 1791. Those clergymen who refused to take the 'civil oath' to accept the new constitution concocted by the Assemblée Constituante. See 'Prêtre Insermenté.'

The constitutional members of the late assembly . . . . drew up an address to the king [Louis XVI.], urging him to refuse his sanction to the decree against the non-juring priests.—HOWITT, Hist. of England (Geo. III. p. 586).

Non-jurors (The), 5 March, 1689. Those episcopal clergymen who refused to take the oath of allegiance to William and Mary, according to a clause in the Convention parliament that 'after 1 March no person shall sit or vote in either house till he has taken the new oath of allegiance to their majesties William and Mary.' The non-jurors comprised the Archbishop Sancroft, seven bishops, and about 400 of the inferior clergy. As they believed in 'the right divine,' and that the king was 'the Lord's anointed,' they could not possibly believe that James was justly and lawfully set aside.

The six bishops were Ken bishop of Bath and Wells; Turner bishop of Ely; Frampton bishop of Gloucester; Lloyd bishop of Norwich; White bishop of Peterborough. The Bishop of Worcester and Bishop of Chichester died before the Act took effect.

Dr. Tillotson was made primate of All England in place of Dr. Sancroft.

Non Obstante (The Bull). By Innocent IV. sent to Robert Grosted or Grosteste commanding him to bestow a valuable benefice on an infant and that infant an Italian. The honest bishop tore up the bull, and wrote back to the pope that such practices were 'shaking the very foundations of the church.'

At this time the money paid to Italian priests in England was 60,000 marks per annum, a greater revenue than that of the crown. The barons remonstrated, and to that the words of the bull refer. Non obstante, i.e. notwithstanding [this remonstrance I require you to do what is set forth in the bull].

Non Possumus (A). Something not possible to be done, either because the person is unwilling to do it or thinks it inexpedient. Your prayer or petition cannot possibly be granted. The words used by the pope when he negatives a suit or request.

They opposed a non possumus to the Irish demand.—Newspaper paragraph, Jan. 1886.

Non-Regents. Masters of arts and doctors in a university no longer bound to give lectures. Regents were at one time the lecturers or professors. The terms regent and non-regent were retained in the University of Cambridge till 1858, though the duty of lecturing had long before passed to professors.

Non-Regent's House (The). The Lower or Blackhood House of the University of Cambridge, consisting of masters of arts of more than five years' standing and doctors of more than two Abolished in 1858. See 'Senate.'

Non-resistance (The Doctrine of). That is, passive obedience to every ordinance of man and to the king—for those 'who resist the power shall bring to themselves damnation.' When the divine right of kings was maintained in the Stuart dynasty, those who took this view, of course, insisted on the doctrine of non-resistance. It was most clearly set forth in 1683 by Oxford, in what is called a 'Judgment and Declaration' (q.v.).

Enforced by the Homilies 1569; by the Canons of Convocation in 1606; the Oath of Non-resist ance was imposed in 1661 (13 Car. II. s. 2, c. 1). The act was repealed 1718 (5 Geo. I. c. 6).

Non-resisting Test (The), 1675. To be taken by all members of parliament, privy councillors, magistrates, and persons holding office under the crown: 'I [A. B.] do declare that it is not lawful on any pretence whatever to take up arms against the king; and I do abhor the traitorous position of taking arms against his person, or against those that are commissioned by him according to law, in time of rebellion or war, and acting in pursuance of such commission. I [A. B.] do swear that I will not endeavour any alteration of the Protestant religion now established by law in the Church of England; nor will I endeavour any alteration in the government in church and state as it is by law established.'

Nones (1 syl.). One of the eight daily services of the Catholic Church, and one of the four lesser ones. At 3 o'clock in the afternoon, the ninth hour of the day. See 'Canonical Hours.'

Norbertines (3 syl.), 1119. An order of Canons Regular founded by St. Norbert. See 'Premonstratensians.'

Nore (The Mutiny of the), 22 May, 1797. A mutiny of the fleet; suppressed in June; Parker, the ringleader, was executed at Sheerness 30 June, 1797.

Norfolk Commotion (The), 1549. So Ket's or Kett's Rebellion (q.v.) is called by the old chroniclers.

Normal or Training Schools. To train teachers in the principles and art of teaching. First organised in Prussia. The following dates give the order in which they have been established: at Stettin, in Prussia, 1735; at Berlin by Frederick the Great 1748; at Hanover 1757; the Borough Road school for teachers founded by Joseph Lancaster 1805; French training schools for teachers 1810; in Holland 1816; Normal Schools for England and Wales 1838; at Framingham and Westfield, in Massachusetts, North America, 1839; Battersea training school for teachers, 1840. See 'Ecoles.'

Norris'ian Prize (The). For an essay on some sacred subject. Prize given once in five years to any graduate of the University of Cambridge of not more than thirteen years' standing. Value 60*l.*, a part of which is to be expended on a gold medal worth seven guineas. Founded, in 1777, by John Norris, who also founded the Divinity professorship, when 12*l.* was given annually, altered in 1858. See 'Regius Professorship of Divinity.'

Norris'ian Professorship of Divinity. Founded 1777 in the University of Cambridge, by John Norris, of Witton, Norfolk. Original stipend 150*l.* a year, but now considerably augmented. See 'Regius Professorship of Divinity.'

Norroy King-of-arms. English herald of the northern provinces, first appointed by Edward IV. The herald of the southern provinces is called Clarenceux (formerly Surroy) King-of-arms (q.v.).

Norroy, of course, is Nor(th)roy. We still speak of a Nor' West wind or Nor' Wester. Surroy is South-roy.

North Briton (The), a newspaper edited by John Wilkes; was started in 1762. The printers and publishers were prosecuted for No. 45 in 1763; Wilkes was sent to the Tower in April, but discharged in May. The paper (15 Nov., 1763) was ordered by the House of Commons to be burnt by the hangman.

19 January, 1764, Wilkes was expelled from the House of Commons; but in March 1768 was elected M.P. for Middlesex. He was again arrested in the spring of 1768, and his imprisonment occasioned a riot in St. George's Fields. He was again expelled the House in 1769, but was again re-elected for Middlesex. He was made Lord Mayor of London in 1774, and Chamberlain of the City of London in 1779.

North German Confederation (The), 1866. After the famous 'Seven Weeks' War' and the 'Peace of Prague,' when Austria was entirely excluded from Germany. The confederation included Hanover, Hesse-Cassel, Nassau, and Frankfort (all incorporated with Prussia), and the states north of the Main united to Prussia in a bund. Strictly speaking, therefore, the confederation was Prussia and the states north of the Main. In 1870, during the Franco-German war, the 'North German Confederation,' being joined by Bavaria, Würtemberg, Baden, and Hesse-Darmstadt, became the 'German Confederation,' and two months afterwards (18 Jan., 1871) the King of Prussia had the title of 'German Emperor' given him.

Austria with Bohemia and Hungary form no part of the modern German empire.

North-West Company (The), 1783. The North-West Company of Montreal was formed in opposition to a French company confirmed in 1697 by the treaty of Ryswick, abandoned in 1713 by the treaty of Utrecht, but still continued by adventurers, till the formation of the North-West Company. This company in 1821 coalesced with the Hudson's Bay Company. Its great traffic was furs or peltry.

North-West Passage (The). That is, a passage from the Atlantic to the Pacific by way of the Polar Sea, to the north of America. Above 200 voyages have been made in search of such a passage. Sir John Franklin reached N. Lat. 77° in 1847. Although much has been added to our geographical knowledge by these expeditions, they have clearly proved that such a passage is useless for mercantile purposes.

Northampton (The Treaty of), 4 May, 1328, between Edward III. and Robert Bruce, whereby the independence of Scotland was formally recognised, and Bruce was acknowledged to be its king.

A marriage was agreed upon between the Princess Joanna (sister of Edward III.) and David son of Robert Bruce (both infants). Bruce renounced all intentions of aiding the rebels of England, and Edward of abetting the rebels of the isles of Scotland. All charters and documents carried from Scotland by Edward I. to be restored. Scotland to pay 20,000*l.* to the King of England.

Northern Télémaque (The). Alexander I. of Russia, 1777 (1801–1825).

Northmen (The). Came from Scandinavia (Norway, Sweden, and Denmark). Karl III. the Fat bribed them to peace; but his nephew Arnulf attacked them boldly and drove them back.

Norwich Rentys. The London house or place of the bishop of Norwich, known subsequently as York House. In 1585 Norwich House passed by a special act of parliament into the hands of Charles Brandon earl of Suffolk. The lands ran westward as far as Hungerford Market.

No'sarites (3 syl.). A people of Syria so called from the town of Nosar. Their religious creed, like that of the Druses, is a mixture of Paganism, Judaism, Mohammedanism, and Christianity. Their chiefs are entitled 'Mekaddem.'

Nose-tax (The). A tax of one ounce of gold from every householder of Ireland, exacted by the Danes in the 9th cent., the non-payment of which was punished by slitting up the nose. This continued for thirteen years, when a general massacre of the Danes in Ireland put an end to the tax.

Probably the nose-tax was merely a poll-tax. We still retain the phrase to 'count noses,' and in Sweden the people paid Odin a 'scot-penny for each nose.'

Nosey. Wellington was so called lovingly by his soldiers.

'Notes and Queries.' A London weekly journal chiefly to furnish enquirers with information by correspondents on literary, biographical, and heraldic difficulties. Commenced 3 Nov., 1849.

Nothing from Nothing. 'Ex nihilo nihil fit.' The axiom of Xenophănês, founder of the Eleatic school (B.C. 619, died after 476).

Notre Dame. In the 'Petits Bollandistes,' by Mgr. Paul Guérin, chamberlain of Leo XIII., there are 2,011 articles headed 'Notre Dame,' one headed 'Jesus,' and one headed 'Christ,' and not a single one 'Notre Seigneur.' Notre Dame is called the 'Mother of God,' and Joseph the carpenter is called the 'Husband of God's Mother' (époux de la Mère de Dieu). This may be logical, but it looks more like Mariolatry than Christianity.

Under the words 'Passion de Notre Seigneur Jésus Christ' will be found the whole of 'Passion Week.'

Nottingham (Peace of), 868. Between Alfred and his brother Ethelred on one side, and the Danes on the other. By this treaty England was divided into two parts, one of which remained to Alfred and the other was assigned to the Danes. The Danish portion was Northumbria, East Anglia, and the bulk of Mercia, called 'Danelagh,' because this part was subject to Danish law. The Danish portion was the larger of the two, but Alfred kept London.

Nottingham Captain (The), 1817. Jeremiah Brandreth, a framework knitter of Nottingham and fiery agitator, who collected some three hundred people, whom he persuaded to 'march from Derby to London and overturn the government.' At Eastwood, about three miles from Nottingham, they were stopped by a troop of horse from Nottingham, and fled in all directions, but many were made prisoners, and three executed, viz. Brandreth, Ludlam, and Turner, 7 Nov., 1817.

Nou'menon. What Aristotle called the hypokimenon (ὑποκείμενον), an imaginary something which underlies all visible phenomena—the ghost of a thing, immutable and unaffected by those logical accidents, colour, odour, growth and decay, shape, size, &c. We can gain some idea of this hypostasis if we fix our thought on 'identity.' The infant man and decrepit eld have an identity, though no part of the man is common with that of the child or eld. That identity is the noumenon or hypokimenon. Again, no two persons see the same tree; no individual sees the same tree twice. It grows and decays, shoots out leaves and sheds them—is for ever changing, but remains the same. It is the phenomenon which changes; the noumenon is changeless. Kant introduced the word to express the real object, or the essence of an object, divested of its substance or phenomenon.

Noushir'wan [The Magnanimous]. So Chosroes the Great was called (A.D. 531–579). The Arabs called him Al Malek.

Novæ Tab'ulæ (New Tables). 'Turning over a new leaf'—that is, abolishing old debts and beginning afresh.

Nova'lis. The pseudonym of Friedrich von Hardenberg (1772–1801).

Novatians (The), 3rd cent. Followers of Novātus, who insisted that no lapsed Christian should be received again into communion with the church. He denied the power of the church of absolving 'mortal sin,' and his followers opposed the lawfulness of second marriages. They called themselves Cathări, or Puritans.

Novels (The), or 'Novellæ.' The fourth part of the 'Corpus Juris Civilis,' compiled A.D. 534, and containing the new constitutions made by Justinian himself, with the emendations of the errors detected in the other three parts. Extracts made from these novels were called 'Authentics.' See 'Corpus Juris Civilis.'

The novels are cited by number and chapter, thus: Nov. 115, 3, or Nov. 115, c. 3. If the chapter referred to is subdivided into paragraphs, then a third figure is added.

Noyades, 1793. A method of wholesale drowning adopted by Carrier to purge Nantes of anti-revolutionists. He murdered about 30,000 men, women, and children in a few months in Nantes alone. The boats employed had movable bottoms, so constructed as to let the victims through without admitting sufficient water to sink the boats. This method of wholesale murder was a 14th cent. invention. See 'Purgers.'

Also called 'Carrier's Vertical Deportation.' Noyades, pronounce Nwoi-yahd.

Noyon (Treaty of), 13 Aug., 1516. A treaty of peace between Charles V., Pope Leo X., and François I., after the brilliant victory at Marignano, the 'combat of the giants.' Charles V. engaged to marry the daughter of the king, whose dowry was to be Naples; and he engaged to restore Navarre to the house of Albret. Neither of these stipulations was carried out.

Nullity Bilson (Sir). A nickname given to the son of Thomas Bilson bishop of Winchester, knighted by James I. for his scandalous sycophancy in the matter of Sir Thomas Overbury, or (more strictly speaking) the divorce of the Earl and Countess of Essex in consequence of a liaison with Robert Carr, the king's favourite.

Robert Carr was at that time Viscount Rochester, and subsequently Earl of Essex. The famous Rochester was John Wilmot, quite another person.

Nullum Tempus Act (The) 1769. An act to abolish the custom of Nullum tempus occurrit regi—that is, no length of tenancy can bar lands which once belonged to the crown. The 'Nullum Tempus' Act limited the time to sixty years of adverse possession, i.e. if a person has been in possession of crown land for sixty years, the crown cannot reclaim it.

In 1772 Mr. Henry Seymour introduced a 'Nullum Tempus' Bill to apply to church property, but it was thrown out.

Number of Members in the House of Commons. The present number (1890) is 670 members. Of these 465 are for England, 80 for Wales, 72 for Scotland, and 103 for Ireland.

Of the 670 members 86 are 'Nationalists,' and about 74 or 75 are 'Liberal Unionists.'

Numbers. Symbolism of the first 13.

1 the unity of deity; 2 the hypostatic union of Christ; 3 the Trinity; 4 the Evangelists and great Prophets; 5 books of Moses and wounds of Christ; 6 the creative week; 7 times Christ spoke on the cross; 8 beatitudes; 9 orders of angels; 10 commandments; 11 apostles after the apostasy of Judas; 12 minor prophets and the original apostolic college; 13 the complete college including Matthias and Paul.

II. A still more remarkable coincidence is 1869, the last year of the third Napoleon's glory. This is obtained by adding either his birth or his marriage to the year of his coronation, or the birth of Eugénie, or the capitulation of Paris. Thus 1852 he was crowned; he was born 1808; he was married 1853; Eugénie was born 1826; Paris capitulated 1871.

Nuptial Mass. 'Missa Nuptialis.' The mass celebrated in the marriage service. See 'Mass.'

Nuremberg Nimbus (The). A cruciform nimbus with finials resembling the fleur-de-lis. See 'Nürnberg.'

Nürnberg (Peace of). See under 'Peace.'

Nürnberg Eggs, i.e. watches. 'Dans cette ville les montres furent inventées vers 1500, ce qui les fit d'abord nommer œufs de Nuremberg' (Bouillet, 'Dict. Hist.' &c. p. 1365). They were like eggs in shape.

Nystadt, in Finland (Treaty of), 13 Sept., 1721. A treaty of peace between Russia and Sweden, after the death of Charles XII. 'the Brilliant Madman.' By this treaty Sweden lost Livonia, Esthonia, Ingermania, and Carelia.

O. Before the time of Brian king of Munster (978–1014), every Irishman took the name of his father or grandfather as a surname. The prefix Mac stood for 'son of' and the prefix O for 'grandson of.' Brian established the arrangement that the patronymics thus formed should be permanent in families.

Of course nowadays O' means a descendant of some chief whose name is appended to the patronymic, as O'Brien or O'Brian, a descendant of Brien king of Munster; O'Neills, descendants of the king of Ulster; O'Connors, descendants of the kings of Connaught.

O's (The Great). Thirty-one antiphons for the 'Magnificat' and 'Benedictus' from the 'Proper' of Advent and of St. Thomas, all beginning with 'O,' as 'O admirabile commercium'; 'O Adonai'; 'O beata Infantia,' &c. See 'Notes and Queries,' 31 Dec., 1887, p. 527.

Oak (The Parliament). An oak still standing in 'Clypston' (Clipstone) in Sherwood Forest, Notts, under which Edward I. in 1282 held a parliament. He was hunting in the forest, and, being told of the revolt of the Welsh, hastily convened his nobles under the tree, and resolved to march at once against Llewellyn, who was defeated and slain the same year.

Oak Boys (The). I. 1549, the insurgents in Ket's rebellion. See 'Oak of the Reformation.'

II. 1757. Protestants in the North of Ireland who rose in insurrection against the Road Act, which threw the burden of making roads and keeping them in repair on the payers of poor-rates, instead of on the landed proprietors. Called 'Oak Boys' from a sprig of oak stuck in their hats.

III. In 1760. This association was a revival of the preceding, with a small difference. In 1757 the grievance was that the burden of keeping the roads in repair was thrown on the ratepayers; the new grievance was that those who complained of want of work were set to make a road through a part of Armagh. It did not please them to be made to work, and they vowed that they would not work like slaves to please anyone. See 'Irish Associations.'

Oak of Reformation (The). The oak on Mousehold Heath, near Norwich, under which Ket, the Norfolk farmer, held his court, and administered justice, 1549. When the rebellion was crushed out by the Earl of Warwick nine of the ring-leaders were hanged on this tree.

One of the Kets was hanged on the top of Warwick Castle, and the other on the top of Wymondham church, near Norwich. (Wymondham = Wine-dum.)

Oath of Abjuration (The), 1701 (13 Will. III. c. 6). Aimed against Papal aggression. Abolished 1858 (21, 22 Vict. c. 48).

This oath abjured the pope and the pretender, denying the authority of the former and the claims of the latter to the British throne. On the death of Cardinal York there remained no descendant of James II., and the oath so far as the pretender was concerned was a dead letter.

Oath of Allegiance (The). From feudal times. Like the oath of a vassal to his lord: 'I (A. B.) do promise to be true and faithful to the king and his heirs, and truth and faith to bear of life and limb and terrene honour, and not to know or hear of any ill or damage intended him without defending him therefrom.'

The oath remained in force above 600 years. The Convention Parliament (q.v.) changed the oath to the following words: 'I (A. B.) do sincerely promise and swear that I will be faithful, and bear true allegiance to H. M. * *.' 1 Will. & Mary, c. 1 & 8, A.D. 1689. It was again altered by 1 Geo. I., stat. 2, c. 13, A.D. 1714–15, and modified by 1 Vict. c. 24, A.D. 1838.

Oath of Supremacy (The), 1 Eliz. c. 1, A.D. 1559; abolished in 1858. This was not an oath acknowledging the king's supremacy, as it was wholly silent on that point, but an oath against the non-supremacy of the pope in England. The form established by William and Mary 1694 is as follows: 'I, * *, do swear that I do from my heart abhor, detest, and abjure . . . . that damnable doctrine . . . . that princes excommunicated by the pope may be deposed or murdered by their subjects. . . . And I declared that no foreign. . . potentate hath or ought to have any jurisdiction . . . . ecclesiastical or spiritual within this realm.'

Oath of the Jeu de Paume (The), 20 June, 1789. Three days after the Tiers Etat formed themselves into the National Assembly (q.v.), several members of the two other estates joined them, and they all met in the tennis court, at Versailles. Having sent an invitation to the nobles and clergy to join them there, Bailly rose, bade the whole assembly follow his example, and then, raising their right hands, the entire assembly joined in the oath never to part till they had given France a constitution.

Jeu de paume (the hand-game) means tennis, and the oath of the Jeu de paume [pome] means 'the oath taken in the tennis court.'

Oath of the Vehmgerichte (4 syl.). Every person brought before the secret tribunal was sworn to profound secresy . . . . 'Not to divulge to wife or child, father or mother, friend or confessor, not to tell in words, or express in writing, or signify by symbols, or dress in parable, or hint at by sign, or communicate by look, anything done or heard or seen in the tribunal, if he would sleep in an unbloody grave.'

Obedience (An). The instrument containing the written precept of the superior in any religious order to the persons in subjection, to undertake a specific office, to proceed on a stated mission, to relinquish a certain appointment, and so on.

Obedience in canon law means the duty by which the various grades in the ecclesiastical system are held subject.

Avignon Obedience during the great schism of the West meant the acknowledgment of the popes of Avignon.

Roman Obedience, during the same period, meant allegiance to the Roman pontiff.

Obédience (Pays d'). The territory where the pope nominates to vacant benefices. During the great schism of the West, each contemporary pope had his own 'pays d'obédience.' Thus, in the 14th cent. we had 'The Obedience of Urban VI.' (comprehending North Italy, Germany, Bohemia, Hungary, Poland, Prussia, Denmark, Sweden, Norway, and England), and the 'Obedience of Clement VII.,' comprehending all the rest of Europe.

Obedience of Benedict XIII. (The). Means, in the great schism of the West, obedience given to Benedict XIII. by the supporters of the French pope, in opposition to the contemporary Roman pope (first Boniface IX., then Gregory XII., then the double popes Gregory XII. and Alexander V.).

At the death of Gregory XI. the Italians insisted that an Italian only could be pope, but as most of the cardinals were Frenchmen, they stoutly resisted this dogma. Neither would give way, so the Italians elected Urban VI., who resided at Rome, and the French elected Clement VII., who resided at Avignon (1378). As death occurred in either chair, the respective partisans elected a successor; thus Urban was succeeded in Rome by Boniface IX. and Gregory XII.; while Clement, the Avignon pope, was succeeded by Benedict XIII. See 'Great Schism of the West.'

Obedience of Gregory XII. (The). Means the acknowledgment of the authority of Gregory XII., the Roman pope, in opposition to Benedict XIII., the Avignon pope, in the great schism of the West (q.v.).

Obelisk of Constantius (The), i.e. the Egyptian obelisk which Constantius II. presented to the city of Rome when he went to visit that ancient capital. It was 115 feet in length and had been transported from Heliopolis by Constantine the Great to adorn his new city of Constantinople, A.D. 354.

Obelisk of Heliop'olis (The), or 'Matarieh,' erected by Osortesen I. about B.C. 1900. The oldest of the large obelisks.

An obelisk which Rameses II. erected at Heliopolis was removed to Alexandria. The 'Flaminian Obelisk' begun by Sethos I. and finished by Rameses II. was removed to Rome by Constantius. In the pontificate of Gregory XIII. this obelisk was found buried 16 feet under the surface, and was set up by Fontana, the architect.

Obelisk of Karnac (The), or large obelisk erected by Thothmes I. before the granite sanctuary of Karnac.

His daughter Hatasu erected two obelisks before the second propylæon of the same sanctuary.

Obelisk of London (The), or Cleopatra's Needle on the Thames Embankment. See 'Cleopatra's Needle.'

The Arabs call obelisks 'Pharaoh's needles'; the Egyptian priests called them 'Sun fingers,' because they acted as gnomons to mark the hour on the ground.

Obelisk of Paris (The). In the Place de la Concorde is one of the obelisks of Rameses II., originally erected at Luxor (Thebes). Removed to France in 1833, and called l'Obélisque de Louqsor.

Obelisk of St. John Lateran (The). The highest in the world. It was removed from Thebes, and was erected by Thothmes IV., some 35 years after the death of Thothmes III.

Obelisk of the Atmeidan (The), or of the Hippodrome of Constantinople. The oldest of the obelisks of Thothmes III., erected to record his conquest of Naharānia or Mesopotāmia.

Obelisk of the Upper Alps (The). Felix Neff, also called 'The Apostle of the Upper Alps' (1798–1829).

Ober-Ammergau (Ammergow), in Upper Bavaria. Rendered specially famous of late for its Passion Play, representing in 18 acts the last days of Jesus Christ. Act i. Entry of Christ into Jerusalem, and his purging of the Temple; Act ii. The Sanhedrim; Act iii. The Leave-taking at Bethany; Act iv. The Last Journey to Jerusalem; Act v. The Last Supper; Act vi. Judas receiving the Blood-money; Act vii. Jesus in the Garden of Gethsemane; Act viii. Jesus before Annas; Act ix. Jesus before Caiaphas; Act x. The Despair of Judas; Act xi. Jesus before Pilate; Act xii. Jesus before Herod; Act xiii. Jesus scourged and mocked; Act xiv. Jesus condemned to Death; Act xv. The Via Dolorōsa; Act xvi. The Crucifixion; Act xvii. The Resurrection; Act xviii. The Ascension.

History of the Play.—As far back as the 12th cent. there had been a Passion Play performed in the little village, but in the 16th cent. a plague carried off 80 of the inhabitants, and the survivors made a vow, if the plague was stayed, to perform the Passion Play every ten years. Daisenberger, a priest, converted the 'miracle play,' which was a farce, into the present drama. In 1890 it attracted great attention, and throngs from America and Europe went to the Tyrolean Alps to witness the performance.

Obi, or Obe (2 syl.). Witchcraft or sorcery. An O'beah man is a wizard, an O'beah woman a witch, among the negroes of the West Indies.

O'bit. In the Latin church means the service for the dead. One de die obitus, one on the day of the funeral, and a third on the 30th day. It consists of the matins and lauds of the Officium Defunctōrum, and a mass for the dead.

Oblates, 'Oblāti.' I. Those who, on entering a monastic order, abandon their worldly goods for the benefit of the society, or who offer themselves for any work that may be put upon them.

II. Those offered to God from birth, or consecrated from birth to a 'religious life.'

III. Those laics who pay to live in an abbey.

IV. Invalid soldiers who, before the foundation of the Hôtel des Invalides, were quartered by the kings of France on religious houses.

Oblates of Mary Immaculate (O. M. I.), 1815. A congregation of priests established by the Abbé Mazenod, whose special mission is the supervision of schools and prisons; many are missionary priests. America, more especially Canada, is full of them.

Oblates of St. Ambrose, 1578. A congregation of secular priests established at Milan by Charles Borromëo, their special mission being the supervision of schools and colleges.

Oblivion (Bill or Act of), 12 Car. II. c. 11, 1660. An act of indemnity for treason and state offences committed between January 1, 1637 and June 24, 1660.

Oblivion (The Committee of). When the American trouble began, in 1775, petitions from trading companies in the United Kingdoms poured into the House of Commons, urging the ministers to abstain from coercive measures against America. A committee was appointed to report on these petitions, but so long was the report delayed that the merchants thought their petitions were forgotten, and the committee appointed to consider them was facetiously called 'The Committee of Oblivion.'

Obregons. Nurses of hospitals, &c., were so called in Spain from Bernardin Obregon (1540–1599). Called in France 'L'ordre des Frères-infirmiers Minimes.' See 'Franciscans (Third Order of).'

Obscurantism, Obscurants. The word obscurant was in Germany applied to those writers who endeavoured to stem the tide of the French Revolution. Obscurantism means the doctrine, or policy, of non-progressive conservatives, fossil politicians. It also means opposition to popular enlightenment, or the progress of knowledge. Matthew Arnold expressed this idea by the words 'Philistines' and 'Philistinism.'

> Cimmerian obscurantism and this thrice-glorious revolution shall wrestle for it then.—CARLYLE, French Revolution, vol. ii. bk. v. 9.

Obscure Philosopher (The). Heraclitos the Ephesian, who died B.C. 495, aged 60. Called 'obscure' because he was vir obscurus, a very reserved man. Also called the 'weeping philosopher' (q.v.).

Observance (The Religionists of the). Persons who imposed on themselves the obligation to observe rigorously every item of the rule of the order to which they belonged. They are:

1. 'Les Pères de l'Observance,' or the 'Observantins' (q.v.), Reformed Franciscans.

2. Those who followed the 'Strict Observance' of the Cistercian Order.

3. Those who followed the 'Great Observance' of the Order of Mercy.

4. Preaching Friars of the 'Primitive Observance.' They were Reformed Dominicans. The other congregations of Observants are Franciscans, Cistercians, Carmelites, and Observants of the Order of Mercy.

Observantins (Les), or 'Les Pères de l'Observance reguliëre,' 1363. Reformed Franciscans, of which St. Bernardin of Sienne was the author. In 1517 they were called Reformed Franciscans by order of Leo X. The Observantins of France were called 'Cordeliers,' from the cord which they used for belt. The Strict Observantins were barefooted Franciscans.

Observer (The). A London weekly journal, commenced 1792.

Obstructionists, 1879. Obstruction to the business of the House of Commons began with the Home Rule party soon after the death of Mr. Butt in May 1879. Their object was to prevent legislation by the dog-and-manger process. In October 1882 Mr. Parnell was elected president of the National League, which arose on the suppression of the Land League, and the obstructionists were also called Parnellites. A reign of terror was then established in Ireland.

Obstructionists (Parliamentary), 1889, 1890. A parliamentary junta chiefly of the Irish Home Rule party (q.v.), who set themselves to block or talk down every measure of importance introduced by the ministers of the day, regardless of the merit thereof. Night after night was wasted by the dreary drip of dilatory debate, which degenerated into absolute rudeness and unmannerly behaviour. See 'Kentish Petition.'

In six months, 1890, twenty opponents of the Government asked 1,768 questions, and made 1,826 speeches. There were 669 members, and just 669 hours available for public business.

Occamists. Followers of William Occam, who revived Nominalism, which was violently opposed by the Scotists. Roscelin (who died 1106) founded the sect of the Nominalists, who maintained that universals have no real existence except in the thought. There is no such thing as tree in the abstract, though there are such things as special trees, as oaks, firs, birches, and so on. The Realists denied this. The disciples of Duns Scotus were Realists, and Occam was a pupil of Scotus, but became a Nominalist, and the revived sect were called Occamists.

Occam was called the 'Invincible Doctor' and the 'Prince of Nominalists.'

Occasional Conformity Bill (The), 1711. A bill to evade or revoke the act of toleration granted by William III. Three times in Anne's reign was the Bill introduced, and though passed by the Commons was rejected by the Lords. Bishop Burnet resisted it. Dr. Sacheverel (1709) created riots in London against the Act of Toleration. When the Tories succeeded the Whigs, under the administration of Harley, they passed the Conformity Bill and the Schism Bill (q.v.), both of which were repealed in 1718 (5 Geo. I. c. 4).

The Occasional Conformity Bill was an attempt to crush opinion instead of influencing understanding; to convict when they could not proselytise; to swell the nominal numbers of churchmen with slaves and hypocrites.—HOWITT, Hist. of Eng. vol. iv. p. 589.

Occasionalism, or 'The Doctrine of Occasional Causes.' A doctrine which sprang from a dogma of Descartes (2 syl.), that spirit cannot act on matter without the concursus of God. By this theory the action of the mind cannot be the cause of the action of the body, and therefore whenever the action of the body follows that of the mind, God must interfere to produce the effect. This is called the Cartesian system, from Descartes, the French philosopher.

Occupation of Moscow (The), September 1812. The occupation by Napoleon and his army. Moscow was set on fire 15 Sept., and was burning a whole week. When Napoleon quitted the city, a month afterwards, 19 Oct., he had the Kremlin undermined and blown up with gunpowder, though hundreds of the French sick and wounded soldiers had been carried there as to an hospital.

Ocean's Queen (The). England. So called for the daring and valour of her navy, more than for the number and tonnage of her ships.

Ockhamists. The disciples of William of Ockham or Occam, who in the 14th cent. revived Nominalism (q.v.), i.e. that abstract ideas are obtained only by comparing a number of real phenomena or real facts. Thus the abstract idea of tree could not exist at all unless we knew real trees.

O'Connell's Tail. His henchmen or parliamentary following. So called because they had no opinions of their own, but followed O'Connell's dicta as a tail follows its owner.

O'Connor of the Bloody Hand. Cathal O'Connor was so called from the number of battles which he fought (12th and 13th cents.).

Octaeteris. A space of eight years added to the cycle of Calippus, making that cycle to consist of 84 years, instead of 76. When Dionysius of Alexandria calculated his Easter he made use of the Octaeteris, or cycle of 84 years, which continued in use till Gregory XIII. reformed the calendar.

Octavian War (The), or 'Bellum Octaviānum,' B.C. 87. Part of the social war of Rome, so called from Cneius Octavius, the consul. It was caused by the opposition of Cornelius Cinna his colleague. A battle ensued between the partisans of the two consuls, in which 10,000 men were slain. Cinna was driven from the forum, deprived of his consular office, quitted Rome, put himself at the head of an army of insurgents, and was joined by Caius Marius.

Octavians (The), 12 Jan., 1595 to 1596. The eight commissioners to whom James VI. of Scotland committed the care of his finances. They were all lawyers, and were responsible for the receipts and expenditure of the government. On them devolved the settling of accounts, making grants, and, in short, every national expense. Five made a quorum.

The Octavians used the trust reposed in them with as much moderation, perhaps, as could possibly have been expected; and by their knowledge of business, and the exercise of a rigid economy, they brought the affairs into much better order than they had ever been during James's reign.—Sir W. Scott, History of Scotland, xxxviii.

October 5, 6, 1789. Noted for the great insurrection of Paris, when a mob of men and women made their way to Versailles, massacred the guard, and compelled Louis XVI. with his wife and family to go to Paris.

October Diploma (The), 1860. Introducing a constitutional form of government for Hungary, and vesting the power in the provincial Diets of Austria and the National Diet of Hungary.

Octonary (The). A name given to the Calif Motassem. He was the 8th of the Abbasside califs; he reigned 8 years, 8 months, and 8 days; won 8 battles; left 8 sons, 8 daughters, 8 thousand slaves, and 8 millions of gold. (Gibbon, with notes, ch. 52.)

Oculi. The third Sunday in Lent. So called from the introït which begins thus: 'Oculi mei semper.' See 'Sunday.'

The 'Introït' is the psalm or passage of Scripture chanted in Catholic churches while the priest enters the chancel.

Od Force. An all-pervading force. A term introduced by Baron Reichenbach to express that luminosity which is said to be manifested at the poles of magnets, and wherever chemical action is going on. It has negative and positive poles.

In animal magnetism it is said that od force is transmitted from the magnetiser to the magnetised.

Odal Tenure. In the Orkney and Shetland Islands. The right to land without any written deed, based solely on possession. Absolute possession before the introduction of feudalism.

Odalisks. Female slaves of the Turkish harem attached to the service of the women. They are ordinarily either Circassians or Georgians, and are generally selected for their beauty.

Odcomb'ian Legstretcher (The). Thomas Coryat of Odcombe, Somersetshire, traveller, and author of 'Coryat's Crudities' (1577–1617).

O'Donnell Rebellion (The), in Spain, 1841. The object was to restore the queen-mother, Maria Louisa, who had been compelled by Espartero to abdicate, that he himself might be regent. The revolt failed in its object, and in 1854 Espartero joined O'Donnell, who was made minister of war. O'Donnell now effected Espartero's dismissal and was named president of the council. He resigned in 1866, and died the following year (5 Nov., 1867).

Odour of Sanctity (The). To die in the odour of sanctity. It was and perhaps still is a prevalent notion among Roman Catholics that when the body of a good man dies, God will not suffer his holy one to see corruption, and that it exhales a sweet odour; but that the body of the wicked gives forth at death a stench increasing in foulness in proportion to the scale of crime. Of course, there is a sort of truth in this notion, for the bodies of holy men were embalmed, and the swinging censers filled the room with sweet odour. Besides, monks and nuns lived so in the odour of the censers that their clothes and skin got impregnated with the perfume. Bad men, on the other hand, were neither embalmed nor incensed. Shakespeare speaks of the stench exhaled by Antiochus and his daughter, who were killed for their wickedness by lightning:

A fire from heaven came, and shrivelled up
Their bodies, e'en to loathing; for they so stunk
That all those eyes adored them ere their fall
Scorned now the hand which gave them burial.
Pericles Prince of Tyre.

Odour of Nations (The). Maxime du Camp says:—

Chaque pays a une odeur spéciale qui le fait reconnaître: l'Égypte sent la fleur des fèves, l'Italie sent la cire et l'encens, l'Angleterre sent la fumée de houille, la Grèce sent l'araki, la France sent le pain de munition, la Hollande a aussi son parfum à elle et tout à fait distinct—elle sent la tourbe humide.

Certainly, a French crowd 'a une odeur spéciale,' unlike any crowd that I ever mixed in.

Odyssey (The German). 'The Kudrun,' in three parts: (1) 'The Hagen'; (2) 'The Hilde'; and (3) 'The Hedel.'

Œcumenical Councils. Only seven are recognised by Russia.

1. The Council of Nice, A.D. 325, in which the Arian heresy was condemned.
2. The First Council of Constantinople in 381.
3. The Council of Ephesus in 431.
4. The Council of Chalcēdon in 451.
5. The Second Council of Constantinople in 553.
6. The Third Council of Constantinople, in 680, against the Monoth'elites (q.v.), who recognize in Christ but one will in his two natures, the human will being merged in his divine nature.
7. The Second Council of Nice in 787.

An Œcumenical Council should be called by the pope, presided over by the pope, and attended by bishops from all parts of Christendom.

Œdipus. Caracalla was so called because, like Œdipus, he married his own mother. The people of Alexandria gave him this sobriquet, and the emperor in revenge slaughtered many thousands of them.

Œil de Bœuf (L'), 17th and 18th cents. A large reception room [salle] in the palace of Versailles, lighted by a round window [œil de bœuf] from the king's bedroom. The ceiling had been decorated by Van der Meulen, and on the walls were represented the children of Louis XIV.

Three short years ago there was still Versailles and an Œil-de-Bœuf.—CARLYLE, French Revolution, vol. iii. bk. i. 1.

Œillet (Chevaliers de l'), or 'Knights of the Pink,' 1793. A society organised to rescue the queen Marie Antoinette and her young son (Louis the Dauphin) from the hands of the revolutionists. It had its ramifications in Austria and Prussia, but its headquarters were in Paris. Their attempt to save the queen failed, and the failure was announced to the Parisian conspirators by one of the members pulling a pink to pieces and flinging the stalk on the ground.

Offa's Dyke. An immense trench and rampart extending from the estuary of the Dee to the mouth of the Wye. It was carried through marshes and over mountains and rivers for 100 miles. Its remains are still visible. It was used for the boundary which determined the confines of England and Wales. Every Briton found with a weapon on this side of the dyke was to have his hand cut off (Sharon Turner, 'Hist. of the Anglo-Saxons,' p. 171).

This dyke was made by Offa king of Mercia A.D. 777.

Offaley, Ireland, was called 'King's County,' and its chief town 'Philipstown,' in honour of Philip of Spain, the husband of Queen Mary. At the same time Leix was called 'Queen's County,' and its chief town 'Maryborough,' in honour of Queen Mary.

Ogdoad, or Combination of Eight. Meaning the Good Principle and his 7 æons (Mind, the Word, the Understanding, Power, Excellencies, Princes, and Angels), from each of which sprang other æons amounting to 365, the mystic number of the Gnostics. The Greek expression for the 7 æons is Abraxas (7 letters), each æon being supposed to govern a world. See 'Basilidēs.'

Ogham Character (The). A species of old Irish writing. It seems to have been either a cipher or shorthand, consisting of certain lines and marks bearing a relative value to a principal horizontal line. The word is Irish.

I shall certainly find you exerting your poetical talents in elegiacs upon a prison, or your antiquarian researches in detecting the Ogham character.—Sir W. SCOTT, Waverley, ch. xxviii.

Ogy'gian Flood (The), B.C. 1759. A great flood said to have taken place in the reign of Ogȳgēs, a mythical king of Attica and Bœōtia.

Bœotia was called Ogȳgia.

Ohio (U.S. America). So called, in 1802, from its river of the same name (Indian). The inhabitants are nicknamed Buck-eyes.

Oil (The Sacred). For anointing the kings of France. Kept in a phial of antique form, about an inch and a half high. The oil is reddish, not unlike thin liquid glue, and the phial is kept in the tomb of St. Remi at Reims. When a king of France was to be anointed, the tomb was opened and the phial taken out. We are told that it shrinks visibly in quantity when a dying king is to be anointed, but assumes its normal volume when a new king is to be anointed with it. According to legend it was brought to St. Remi by a pigeon when Clovis was baptized.

Trained pigeons played a very prominent part both at the death and baptism of those whom the Catholic Church delighted to honour.

Old and New Irish (The). The descendants of the Milesians and the Anglo-Irish settled in the Pale (q.v.).

Old and New Learning (Men of the). So Catholics and the Reformers were called in England after Henry VIII. broke from the pope.

The leaders of the Old Learning were Lee, archbishop of York; Stokesley, bishop of London; Tunstall, bishop of Durham; Gardiner, bishop of Winchester; Sherbourne, bishop of Chichester; Nix, bishop of Norwich; and Kite, bishop of Carlisle. These prelates were countenanced by the Duke of Norfolk, and by Wriothesley, the chief secretary.

The leaders of the New Learning were Cranmer, archbishop of Canterbury; Latimer, bishop of Worcester; Shaxton, bishop of Salisbury; Hilsey, bishop of Rochester; Fox, bishop of Hereford; and Barlow, bishop of St. David's. These prelates were supported by Cromwell, the vicar-general.

Old Bags. I. A nickname given to Nicholas Vansittart by William Hone in one of his political squibs, called 'The Political Showman,' published in 1821. In this satire Lord Sidmouth figures as the Doctor, his father having been a medical man.

II. John Scott lord Eldon was so called because he carried home with him in sundry bags the cases pending his judgment (1751–1838).

Old Bullion. Colonel Thomas Hart Benton, advocate of the gold and silver currency in the U.S. of N. America (1783–1858).

Old Catholics, 1870. Those Romanists who deny the ecumenical character of the Vatican Council of 1869, and reject the Vatican decrees, especially those concerning the pope's infallibility.

Old Fox (The). Marshal Soult was so called from his strategic abilities and never-failing resources (1769–1851).

Old Glory. Sir Francis Burdett (1770–1844). At one time the glory of the radicals, but subsequently he became a Tory.

Old Gravity. Lord Chancellor Thurlow (1732–1806).

So much for Old Gravity.
PETER PINDAR, Great Cry and Little Wool, epist. ii.

Old Grog. Edward Vernon the admiral (1684–1757). So called by B[illegible] sailors from his grogram cloak, which he wore in foul weather.

Old Hickory. President Jackson of U.S. of America. So called because in his contest with the Creek Indians (1813) on one occasion he was so destitute of provisions that he and his men fed on hickory nuts.

There can be no doubt that 'Old Hickory' possessed animal force and courage in a high degree . . . [but] it is not surprising to learn that his reign was a period of general lawlessness and rowdyism, outrages being committed in the streets of the capital of which Jackson refused to take notice.—Nineteenth Century, August 1888, pp. 272, 273.

Old Ireland Party (The). The followers of Daniel O'Connell, as opposed to 'Young Ireland' led by Smith O'Brien. Both sought repeal, but the old party was Catholic, and the young party wanted to unite all Irishmen, irrespective of creed, into one union. The two parties hated each other.

Old Learning (The). The Catholic faith, in contradistinction to the Reformed faith.

Old Man Eloquent. President John Quincy Adams (1767–1848). President 1825–1829.

Isocrates, the Athenian orator, is generally meant by 'The Old Man Eloquent' (B.C. 436–338). It is to him that Milton refers

. . . . that dishonest victory
At Chæronæa, fatal to liberty,
Killed with report that Old Man Eloquent.

When Isocrates heard of the defeat of the Athenians at Chæronæa, it had such an effect on his spirits that he drooped and died within four days. He was nearly 90 years of age.

Old Man of the Mountain (The). King of the Assassins, whose name was Hussun Subah sheik ul Gebel (1090–1258). He was a convert to the doctrines of the Ismaelians (q.v.). He ruled over a tribe called the Aschischi in the northern mountains of Persia. The word Aschischi is from haschish, an intoxicating substance that produced delirium, in which the imagination had very enthusiastic views of eternal happiness. Hussun reared his young disciples into absolute obedience, so that they were fearless of man of any rank, and the greatest princes trembled at his name. Houlagou or Houlaku extirpated the order in Persia in 1258, but it lingered in Syria till 1280, when the Mamelukes stamped it out.

Old Man of the North (The). [illegible]hristian Jacques Drahakemberg, of Aarhuus, in Jutland. Died 1772, aged 146. See 'Macrobiots.'

Old Noll. Oliver Cromwell (1599–1658).

Old Patch. A great banknote forger. In 1784, by making his own paper and ink, and working off the notes on his own private press, he managed to get into circulation false notes to the value of 200,000*l.*

Other great forgers of Bank of England notes have been Mathison, 1783; Vincent Alessi (the Italian); and the Duke of Rovigo and Desnouettes (of Hamburg). Vincent Alessi was betrayed by a confederate; the Duke of Rovigo and Desnouettes made their notes in Hamburg, and employed agents to circulate them in England.

The name of Old Patch was Charles Price, but he had many aliases, as Wigmore, Wilmott, Brank, Bond, Parks, Powel, Schutz, &c.

Old Pretender (The). Francis Edward James [Stuart] son of James II. He claimed the British throne by right of birth, but as his father had abdicated the right fell through (1688–1765).

Old Public Functionary, or O. P. F. President James Buchanan (1791–1868). So called from the following words in his message to Congress in 1859: 'This advice proceeds from an old public functionary.'

Old Rowley. Charles II. was so-called from his favourite racehorse (1630, 1660–1685).

A part of Newmarket racecourse is still called 'the Rowley mile.'

Old Sarum. Marchioness of Salisbury, grandmother of the prime minister, burnt to death in 1835, at the age of 86. She used to drive in the park in a low phaeton with four black ponies and outriders in splendid liveries; always went to court in a sedan-chair, her footmen carrying flambeaux at night; she hunted till she was past 70, wearing a sky-blue habit with black velvet collar, and a jockey-cap; was a bold rider, and no fence ever stopped her.

Old Style and New Style (The). Old Style, computing according to the old calendar. New Style, computing according to the reformed calendar. Hence we have Lady Day 25 March, and Old Lady Day, 6 April. Midsummer Day, 24 June, and Old Midsummer Day, 6 July. Michaelmas Day, 29 Sept., and Old Michaelmas Day, 11 Oct. Christmas Day, 25 Dec., and Old Christmas Day, 3 Jan.

Old Testament (The). The language of the Old Testament is a composite of Aramaic, Arabic, and Hebrew. Ezra (who died B.C. 459) declared what books were to be considered canonical.

The following portions are in Chaldaic, viz.:—
Ezra iv. 8, vi. 18, and vii. 12-26.
Jer. x. 11.
Dan. ii. 4 and vii. 28.

The Hebrew Scriptures were translated into Greek in the 3rd cent. B.C.; but parts seem to be as late as the time of Antiochus Epiphanes, who died B.C. 164.

It was first printed in 1488, at Soncino. In 1526 the Rabbinical Bible was printed at Venice.

Esdras, i.e. Ezra, says: 'Behold, Lord, . . . thy law is burnt, therefore no man knoweth the things that are done of thee . . . . but if I have found favour before thee, send the Holy Ghost to me, and I will write all that hath been done in the world since the beginning, [all] that was written in thy Law. . . . And I took five men, as the Lord commanded me, and we went into a field and remained there. And the next day, behold a voice called me, saying, "Esdras, open thy mouth, and drink what I give thee." . . . So I opened my mouth, and, behold, he reached me a full cup, which was full as it were with water, but the colour of it was like fire. And I took and drank it. And when I had drunk of it, my heart uttered understanding, and wisdom grew in my breast, for my spirit strengthened my memory. . . . And the Highest gave understanding to the five men, and they wrote the wonderful visions of the night which were told [and] which they knew not. And they sat forty days, they wrote in the day, and at night they ate [their] bread. In the forty days they wrote 204 [margin says 904] books. And it came to pass when the forty days were fulfilled, that the Highest said to me, "The first [book] which thou hast written publish openly, that the worthy and the unworthy may read it; but keep [back] the 70 last [books], and deliver them only to such as be wise among the people, for in them [i.e. the 70 books] is the spring of understanding, the fountain of wisdom, and the stream of knowledge." And I did so.'—2 Esdras xiv. 21, 22, 37–48.

 It is very difficult to understand what is meant by 'the first book'; still more what is meant by the '70 books'; and why should these books, in which were 'the fountain of wisdom and the stream of knowledge,' be kept back from the public eye?

Old Testament. Books referred to, but not in the canon.

The Book of the Wars of the Lord (Numbers xxi. 14).
The Book of the Covenant (Exodus xxiv. 7).
The Book of Jasher (Joshua x. 13, and 2 Sam. i. 18).
The Book of the Acts of Solomon (1 Kings xi. 41).
The Book of the Chronicles of the Kings of Israel (1 Kings xiv. 19; 2 Chron. xx. 34, xxxiii. 18; and 18 other places).
The Chronicles of the Kings of Judah (1 Kings xiv. 29; and 12 other places).
The Book of the Kings of Judah and Israel (2 Chron. xvi. 11; and 6 other places).
The Book of Samuel the Seer (1 Chron. xxix. 29, and 2 Chron. ix. 29).
The Book of Nathan the Prophet (1 Chron. xxix. 29).
The Book of Gad the Seer (1 Chron. xxix. 29).
The Chronicles of King David (1 Chron. xxvii. 24).
The Prophecy of Ahijah the Shilomite (2 Chron. ix. 29).
The Visions of Iddo the Seer against Jeroboam (2 Chron. ix. 29).
The Book of Iddo the Seer concerning Genealogies (2 Chron. xii. 15).
The Story of the Prophet Iddo (2 Chron. xiii. 22).
The Book of Shemaiah the Prophet (2 Chron. xii. 15).

The Book of Jehu (2 Chron. xx. 34).
The Memoirs of Hircanus (mentioned in 2 Maccabees ii.).
The Books of Jason (mentioned in 2 Maccabees ii).
The Acts of Uriah (2 Chron. xxvi. 22).
The Three Thousand Proverbs of Solomon (1 Kings iv. 32).
A Thousand and Five Songs of Solomon (1 Kings iv. 32).
The Prophecy of Jeremiah, torn in pieces by Jehoiakim (Jeremiah li.).
The Prophecy about the city of Babylon (Jeremiah li.).
The Memoirs of Jeremiah (mentioned in 1 Maccabees ii.).
The Prophecy of Jonah (Jonah).

Old Testament. Books supposed to be lost.

The Generation of Adam.
The Revelation of Adam.
The Genealogy of the Sons and Daughters of Adam.
Cham's Book of Magic.
A Treatise called 'Seth.'
The Assumption of Abraham.
The Jetsira, ascribed to Abraham.
The Book of the Twelve Patriarchs.
The Discourses of Jacob and Joseph.
A Prophecy of Habakkuk, and some by Ezekiel.
The Prophecy of Eldad and Medad.
The Treatise of Jannes and Jambres.
The Book of Og.
Jacob's Ladder, and several others.

See 'Apocryphal Scriptures' (New Testament).

Oldenburg (The House of). The present reigning house of Denmark, founded in 1448 by Christian I. of the house of Oldenburg.

Ol'eron (Laws of). Maritime laws chiefly borrowed from the 'Consolato del Mare,' compiled in the middle of the 13th cent. The story runs that the Laws of Oleron were enacted by Richard I. while his fleet lay at anchor there on his expedition to the Holy Land. The Ordinances of Wisby in Gothland were compiled from the Laws of Oleron before 1400.

Other traditions ascribe these laws to the Flemings, to Otto the Saxon, to the Seigneur of Oleron in 1196, to Eleonore of Guyenne, and some others.

Olim. The most ancient registers of the Parlement de Paris, from 1254 to 1318, comprehending the reigns of St. Louis, Philippe le Hardi, Philippe le Bel, Louis le Hutin, and Philippe le Long. These valuable registers contain, not only reports of the administration of justice in that period, but also the organisation of the parlement and contemporary events of all sorts. They were published in 1840.

Oliva (Peace of), 3 May, 1660, between Sweden, Poland, the kaiser, and the elector of Brandenburg; signed soon after the death of Charles X. of Sweden. This treaty, and that of Kardis (with the Czar of Russia), put an end to the wars in which Charles X. had involved the Swedes. The Peace of Oliva ensured the integrity of Poland, but in 1773 the first partition of Poland between Russia, Prussia, and Austria was effected.

Olive Branch (The), 8 July, 1775. The petition of the American Congress to King George III. after the battle of Bunker's Hill, expressive of an earnest desire for an honourable peace. The petitioners vowed that this petition if not successful should be the last.

Oliver Optic. The pen-name of William Taylor Adams, an American novelist.

Oliver's Fiddler. Sir Roger L'Estrange (1616–1704). So called because at one time he was playing a fiddle with others, in the house of John Hingston, when Oliver Cromwell was for a time one of the guests.

Roger L'Estrange, who used to be called 'Oliver's Fiddler,' formerly in danger of being hanged for a spy, and about this time the admired buffoon of High Church.—CALAMY.

Olive'tans (4 syl.), or 'Brethren of Our Lady of Mount Olivet,' 1272. A religious order in the Catholic Church, an offshoot of the Benedictines (q.v.), founded by Bernard Tolomei and others on Monte Olivēto in Tuscany, whence the name.

Olmütz (The Camp at), Sept., 1850 A military political display for the sake of averting the Crimēan War. Austria assembled at Olmütz 50,000 men 'for field exercise.' The Emperor of Russia, the Emperor of Austria, the King of Prussia, Count Buol chief minister of Austria, the British and French ministers, all met and conferred on the war. Russia suggested that the 'Vienna Note' (q.v.) drawn up by Count Buol should be accepted, and that the Four Powers should guarantee the good faith of Russia. Austria and Prussia agreed, but England scouted such sponsorship after the deception of Russia during many months, and France stood firm beside England. It really was most unsatisfactory and unbusiness like, but Prussia and Austria separated from the Western Powers.

Russia has always adopted that vile maxim of Prince Metternich: 'He who knows not how to deceive, knows not how to rule.' As if lying was the divine right of kings, instead of being the prerogative of 'the father of lies.'

Olympiad. In ancient Greece meant the space of four years between one celebration of the Olympic games and another. As a system of chronology it began from B.C. 776.

The games were held at Olympia, in Elis, dedicated to Zeus, called by the Romans Jupiter Olympus.

Olympic Games (The). Said to have been instituted by Heräklês. They were held on the plains of Olympia every fifth year, and constituted the most splendid national festival of the ancient Greeks. Dates were reckoned from these games, and the five intervening years made an Olympiad.

Olyn'thiac Orations (The), B.C. 350. The three orations of Demosthenês against Philip king of Macedon, who had captured a town of Chalcidicê in the sacred war. Olynthus, the head of 32 Greek towns, trembled for its own safety. Demosthenes tried to arouse the Athenians to take part with the Olynthians against Philip; but the Athenians made no great stir, and in 347 Olynthus fell into the hands of Philip.

Olyn'thian War (The). I. B.C. 382–379, between Sparta and the Olynthians.

II. B.C. 349–346, between Philip of Macedon and the Olynthians. The Olynthians were defeated in two battles, and their city taken.

Ommi'ades (3 syl.), 661–750. An Arabian dynasty, so called from Ommîah grandfather of Abou Sofyan, chief of the temple of Mecca before Islamism was known. This Ommiah the Koreishite was father of Moaviah, who founded the dynasty. The seat of empire was Damascus. The Ommiades were dethroned by the Abbassides in 749 or 750.

The Ommiade califs were Moaviah I. (661), Yezid I. (680), Moaviah II. (683), Merwan I. (684), Abdel Malek (685), Walid I. (705), Soliman (715), Omar II. (717), Yezid II. (720), Hescham (724), Walid II. (743), Yezid III. (744), Ibrahim (744), Merwan II. (744).

Omnibus, 1829. Introduced into London by Mr. J. Shillibeer. The first omnibus ran from the 'Yorkshire Stingo,' in the New Road, to the Bank of England, the fare being one shilling. In 1830 the fare was reduced to sixpence, and since then other reductions have been made.

Omnibus Bill (An). A general bill in parliament promoted by some public body (such as the Ecclesiastical or Charity Commissioners, the Board of Works, &c.), who for economy sake include in one application to the legislature several schemes or projects, mostly by way of schedule.

Omnibus Order (An), in law. A single order made by a judge for dealing with several applications pending before the court. All the applications are put in one omnibus or order.

Omnibus Section of the Russian Penal Code. Revised in 1885. Section 249 is so called from its wide scope and sweeping applicability. It drags into its clutches all revolutionists of every shade and degree; even thoughts are not free; and as to words, paragraphs in newspapers, advice, hints and expressions of discontent, they are all treasonable, and render the offender liable to exile for life and the forfeiture of all his goods.

Omri (Statutes of), B.C. 920. King of Israel, founder of Samaria. He compelled by severe laws the worship of the Israelitish idols, and these laws are still called by the Jews 'The Statutes of Omri.'

One-Sandalled Man (The). Jason was so called because on his way back to Iolcus he lost one of his sandals in crossing the river Anaurus.

One Thousand Eight Hundred and Sixty-seven (1867). A Fenian toast and catchword: as 'Three cheers for 1867!' This was the date of the Fenian rising.

Onion Pennies. Certain Roman coins found pretty abundantly at Silchester in Hampshire. So called from one 'Onion,' said to be a giant who dwelt in this city.

On'kelos. The supposed author of an Aramäic version of the Pentateuch.

O. P. Riots, 1809. Covent Garden having been destroyed by fire during the management of John Kemble, a new house was erected in the course of a year, and the prices of admission raised. The theatre-going public took this in dudgeon, and night after night crowded the house with cries of 'O. P.' (old prices). They danced on the pit-benches and sometimes on the cushions of the boxes to the harsh music of cat-calls, and to tunes written for the occasion. O. P. music and dances were to be seen in every music shop. When at last the benches began to be torn up, the cushions demolished, and the decorations destroyed, the magistracy interfered.

Sir Vicary Gibbs, being employed to conduct the prosecution, convulsed the court with a happy quotation: 'Opes [O.Ps.] irritamenta malorum.'

Open Sea of Kane (The). A sea supposed by Elisha Kane the traveller (1822–1857) to surround the North Pole.

Oph'ites (2 syl.), 2nd cent. A Christian sect. So called from the Greek word ὄφις (a serpent). They maintained that the serpent (Gen. iii.) was the Logos or Christ, who came into Eden to deliver man from that ignorance to which the Creator or Demiurge had doomed him, and to make him 'wise unto salvation.' (From 2nd to 6th cent.)

Oppian Law (The). 'Oppia Lex,' a law by C. Oppius, the tribune, forbidding any woman to wear more than half an ounce of gold, to have parti-coloured garments, or to be carried more than a mile except for the purpose of celebrating some religious festival or solemnity.

Optime (3 syl.). The second class of the Mathematical Tripos is called 'The Senior Optimes,' and the third class is called the 'Junior Optimes.' These phrases are derived from the 'Acts' which used to be held in the schools before degrees were conferred. The compliment of the moderator paid to an opponent who had answered very well was Optime quidem disputasti, or Domine opponens, optime disputasti, and to the respondent who had disputed pretty well, Domine respondens, satis et optime quidem et in thesi et in disputationibus tuo officio functus es. See 'Wrangler.'

Optimism. The doctrine that whatever is is in its best possible state, for God would not have made anything otherwise. What we call evils are needful for our conservation, and all odds will be made even in the life hereafter. Malebranche taught optimism, and Leibnitz in his 'Essais de Théodicée'; Bolingbroke adopted the same theory, and Pope in his 'Essay on Man' says, 'Whatever is, is right.' See 'Pessimism.'

Opus Majus [not 'Opus Magnum']. The title of the great work of Roger Bacon the Franciscan. It contains the results of his researches, and he tells us that he spent above 2,000*l.* in twenty years on apparatus for his experiments [equal to 30,000*l.* of our money at present]. His discoveries were in geometry, astronomy, physics, optics, mechanics, and chemistry.

Opus Operan'tis, in theology, means that the effect is due not to the opus or act itself, but to the disposition of the operans or operator. See next article.

There is no virtue in kissing the crucifix per se, but the mind of the devotee may by its fervour and devotion bring grace to the person who kisses it. Of course the Catholics never apply the term to sacraments, but the Anglican Church seems to imply it in the words 'feed on Him in thy heart by faith.'

Opus Opera'tum, in theology, means that the rite or sacrament itself conveys grace independently of the mind of the recipient. The opus is the efficient cause of grace.

Thus when the sacrament is administered in articulo mortis, though the recipient is moribund, yet it conveys grace.

Opus Triparti'tum (1514). The ancient customs and royal decrees of Hungary compiled by Verboczi, and divided into three parts. A second volume was added, and the whole was entitled 'Jus Consuetudinārium Regni Hungāriæ.'

Or (gold). One of the colours in heraldry of the escutcheon, expressed by dots.

There are seven colours employed in England, and nine by foreign heralds. See 'Heralds.'

Oracle of Delft (The). Hugo Grotius was called the 'Oracle of Delft, the Phœnix of his Country' (1583–1645).

Oracle of Delphi (The). On the south slope of Parnassos; founded in honour of Apollo, surnamed Pythĭos, because he slew the serpent python. The ravings of the priestess were due to a mephitic gas which issued from a hole in the earth over which the tripod was placed. Men held the woman down till the gas had intoxicated her, and her ravings were then taken down by priests and turned into verse. The priestess was called the Pythĭa.

Certainly some of the Delphic responses were most witty equivokes. Thus:

1. When Pyrrhos consulted the oracle respecting his war with the Romans, he received for answer: 'Credo te, Æacide, Romanos vincĕre posse,' i.e. 'The Romans, I believe, you will conquer.' Which may mean either you will conquer the Romans, or the Romans will conquer you.

2. Another response was 'Ibis, redĭbis nunquam per bella peribis.' [You shall return never by war shall you perish.] Whether the comma is placed before or after never makes all the difference.

3. When the allied Greeks demanded of the oracle what would be the issue of the battle of Salămis, they received for answer—

Seed-time and harvest, weeping sires shall tell
How thousands fought at Salamis and fell;

but whether the weeping sires were to be Greeks or Persians was not stated.

4. When Crœsos demanded what would be the issue of the battle against the Persians headed by Cyrus, the oracle replied: 'Crœsos will behold a mighty empire overthrown'; but which empire is left doubtful.

5. When Philip of Macedon sent to inquire if his Persian expedition would prove successful, he received for reply: 'The ready victim crowned for sacrifice stands before the altar.' Philip took it for granted that the 'ready victim' was the King of Persia, but it was he himself.

When Maxentius was about to encounter Constantine he consulted the guardians of the Sibylline Books as to the fate of the battle, and the prophetess told him: 'Illo diehostem Romanorum esse periturum'; but whether Maxentius or Constantine was 'the enemy of the Roman people' the oracle left undecided.

In the Bible we have a similar equivoke: When Ahab king of Israel was about to wage war on the king of Syria, and asked Micaiah if Ramoth Gilead would fall into his hands, the prophet replied, 'Go! for the Lord will deliver the city into the hands of the king' (1 Kings xxii. 15, 35). Ahab thought that he was the king referred to, but the king into whose hands the city fell was the king of Syria. See p. 650, n. to 'Orleton's Message.'

Oracle of Dodo'na (The), in Epĭros. The most ancient oracle of Greece, dedicated to Zeus (1 syl.). Its responses were made by women called pigeons (q.v.), who derived their responses from four sources: (1) The cooing of doves; (2) the bubbling of a spring of water which rose at the foot of the sacred oak; (3) the rustling of the leaves of the oak; and (4) the tinkling of a gong hung in the branches of a tree. The gong was struck by knotted cords hung on the branches of the tree. In B.C. 219 the Ætōlians destroyed the temple and cut down the sacred grove. See 'Pigeons.'

Oracle of France (The). St. Bernard of Clairvaux. See 'Oracle of the Church.'

Oracle of the Church (The). St. Bernard, abbot of Clairvaux (1091–1153), also called the 'Mellifluous Doctor,' the 'River of Paradise,' and the 'Last of the Fathers.' He was the founder of the Order of Bernardines, but not of the Hospice. The founder of the Hospice was St. Bernard of Menthon, who lived about a century earlier (923–1008).

Orange (Prince of). Orange, a corruption of Arausio, in the department of Vaucluse, some sixteen miles from Avignon. The town was the capital of a principality from the 11th to the 16th century; its last sovereign being Philibert de Châlons, whose sister married William count of Nassau. This count was the father of William I. the stadtholder of the United Provinces, and grandfather of William II. stadtholder. This William II. married Mary eldest daughter of Charles I., whose eldest son was our William III., who married Mary eldest daughter of James II. while he was Duke of York.

William count of Nassau married Philibert's sister, and was the father of William I. stadtholder.

William I. the stadtholder was the father of William II. the stadtholder, who married Mary daughter of Charles I.

William II. was the father of WILLIAM III. of Great Britain, who married Mary daughter of James II.

Or'angeists (3 syl.), 1785. The Orange faction of Holland opposed to the French faction. The former stood by the stadtholder, and accused their opponents of democratic principles and a tendency to French influence. The democrats accused the Orange party of aiming at monarchy or oligarchy, and trampling on the ancient liberties of the people. The French faction prevailed, and the country was laid at the feet of France.

Or'angemen (3 syl.). A development of the Peep-of-day Boys in Ireland, consisting of rich and influential Irish Protestants in defence of Protestant ascendency in Ireland. So called from William of Orange, whose name and reign are associated with the Protestant ascendency in the island. The first Orange lodge was founded in the village of Loughgall, county Armagh, 21 Sept., 1795. As many as twelve or fourteen Roman Catholics would be ejected in a single night by these Orangemen. By 1798 the Orangemen were a very powerful society, having a 'grand lodge,' extending over the entire province of Ulster, and ramified through all the centres of Protestantism in Ireland. In 1808 a grand lodge of Orangemen was opened in Manchester, in 1821 it was transferred to London, and in 1827 the Duke of Cumberland was elected Grand Master. In 1835 the number of members was 200,000. See 'Irish Associations.'

There are Orange lodges in Canada and the Colonies also.

Orateur du Genre Humain. See below, 'Orator of the Human Race.'

Orator Henley (1692–1756). Called by Pope 'the Zany of his age' ('Dunciad'), and introduced by Hogarth into two of his humorous pieces. In one he is christening a child, and in the other he is represented on a scaffold with a monkey at his side, and the motto 'Amen.' His periodical called the 'Hip Doctor' is a farrago of nonsense.

Orator of Nature (The). Patrick Henry of Studley, Hanover, in Virginia, who advocated the cause of the people against the claims of the clergy of Virginia. He was highly distinguished in the war of independence, and contributed greatly to the carrying of the Declaration of Independence. 'If we would be free,' he said over and over again, 'we must fight. Yea, I repeat it; we must fight! we must fight!' (1736–1799).

Orator of the Human Race (The). The not very modest title assumed by Anacharsis Cloots [Baron Jean Baptiste Cloots], a Prussian by birth, brought up in Paris, where he adopted the revolutionary principles (1755–1794). So called because he appeared at the bar of the National Assembly accompanied by deputies from all the nations of the civilised world who had chosen him for speaker. He was guillotined by the French republicans.

The next day this deputation of all nations was found to be a hoax, and the deputies were merely vagabonds hired for the nonce at 12 livres apiece. One of the rascals went to the Marquis de Blancourt for the money, and said he had been the Chaldean. 'Mr. Chaldean,' said the Marquis, 'you have come to the wrong person.' M. de Blancourt made no secret of the visit, and next day it was duly reported in the daily papers. Hunt was called Orator Hunt (1773–1835).

Orators (The). Mark Antony and Licinius Crassus. Cicero says, 'Crassus is the greatest orator Rome had ever seen except Antony, and Antony the greatest except Crassus.'

Mark Antony the 'Orator' was not the triumvir, but the grandfather. Thus: Mark Antony the 'Orator,' whose eldest son was Mark Antony surnamed Creticus, and the triumvir was the son of Creticus.

Oratory (Congregation of the), 1550. Founded by Philip de Neri, at Rome, under the name of the 'Confraternity of the Trinity.' Introduced into Paris in 1611; and into England by Cardinal Newman in 1847. The fathers of the Oratory live in community without any special vows. Oratorians are so called 'parce qu'ils se placaient devant l'église pour appeler le peuple à la prière.'

Suppressed in France in 1790, but restored in 1853 by the Abbé Pétetot, under the title of the 'Oratory of the Immaculate Conception.'

Orbis Sensualium Pictus, 1654. The first picture-book or illustrated manual for the young by J. Amos Comenius, and published at Nürnberg. Object lessons in infant schools are of a similar character.

Ordainers, 1310, 1311. A council of 28 noblemen appointed to reform the government and the king's [Edward II.] household. These lords were empowered to enact ordinances which should have the force of laws. The cause of this junto was the infatuation of the king for Piers Gaveston, a Gascon, on whom he lavished lands and honours with most wanton profusion. The ordainers revoked all the grants of the king to his favourite, demanded the removal of all foreigners from high offices, and took from the king the power of making war or peace without the consent of his barons.

Ordeal. An appeal to the judgment of God made known by the success or failure of certain acts performed by the accused. Hebrew women accused of adultery appealed to the 'water of jealousy.' There are nine different ordeals in use among the Hindûs. In Africa a man who fancies himself bewitched by his wife sends for the o'beah woman, who administers to her a drink made of 'goho'; if she vomits it, she is pronounced innocent; if not, she is put to death. In Europe the ordinary ordeals were those of fire, water, and wager of battle (q.v.).

Ordeal by Fire. In this ordeal the accused was required to carry a piece of red-hot iron in his hand a given distance, or to tread blindfold and barefoot amongst nine red-hot ploughshares without setting his foot on any one of them. If the accused escaped unhurt he was pronounced innocent. This ordeal was reserved for the wealthy, and as priests were the adjudicators, they could easily instruct those they wished to befriend how to escape unhurt.

Ordeal by Water. Chiefly for the lower orders. There was the ordeal of hot water and the ordeal of cold water. Athelstane's law was for the accused to pick a stone out of a tub of boiling water, the arm being quite bare, and water up to the wrist, in some cases up to the elbow. The ordeal of cold water was to be flung into a pond or river; if the accused sank he was pronounced innocent, if he floated he was pronounced guilty. See 'Wager of Battle.'

Order 14. The Judicature Act which provides that when a writ has been served and duly appeared to, if the creditor makes an affidavit that his claim is for a definite sum of money of which there is no dispute, and respecting which the debtor makes no defence, then the creditor may issue a summons calling the debtor at two days' notice to appear before a Master in Chambers, and, if all is satisfactory, the creditor is allowed to obtain immediate execution, saving thus the delay and expense of going to trial in the ordinary way. A summary process of exacting payment of a debt.

Order in Council (An) is an order by the sovereign under the advice of the privy council.

Order in Council (The), 7 Jan. 1807. Ordained that all neutral vessels shall be prohibited from entering any port belonging to France, or her allies, or under her control. If any vessel violates this order, both the vessel and its cargo may be confiscated to the English Government.

11 Nov. 1807 another order was issued, by which all harbours and places of France, her allies, and colonies were placed under the same restrictions as if they were strictly blockaded.

Order of Alcan'tara (The), 1156. Instituted by Don Suarez and Don Gomez, entrusted with the defence of Alcantara, in Spain. They were first called 'Knights of the Pear Tree,' then 'Knights of St. Julian,' from San Julian del Pereyro.

Order of Argonauts (The), 1382. Instituted by Charles III. of Naples.

Order of Assassins (The). See 'Assassins.'

Order of Aviz. An order of knighthood in Portugal, instituted by Sancho the first king, in imitation of the order of Calatra'va, and having for its object the subjugation of the Moors (1146).

Order of Bernar'dines (3 syl.), 1115. Reformed Benedictines, founded by St. Bernard of Clairvaux.

Order of Calatra'va (The), 1158. Instituted in Spain by Sancho III. of Castile. When Sancho took from the Moors the strong castle of Calatrava he committed its defence to the Knights Templars, who declined to undertake it. Whereupon Don Raymond of the Cistercian order, with several caballeros of quality, volunteered to defend it, and were created 'Knights of Calatrava.'

Order of Celes'tines (3 syl.), 1274. Founded by Celestine V. (Pierre de Moron), but suppressed in 1776 by Pius VI.

Order of Christ (The), 1205. Instituted in Livonia by Albert bishop of Riga, and incorporated with the Order of Teutonic Knights in 1237. Also called 'The Short Swords of Livonia.'

Not to be mistaken for 'The Order of the Knights of Christ' (q.v.).

Order of Christ (The), 1318. A religico-military order instituted by Dionysius I. of Portugal to guard the frontiers of Algarve from invasions of the Moors. It is now only an order of honour. See 'Chevaliers Porte-glaive.'

This order was simply that of the Templars expelled from France by Philippe le Bel [IV.], and received into Portugal under a new name. A branch of the same was admitted by John XXII. into the Papal States. Another branch subsisted in Brazil until the revolution of 1890.

Order of the Golden Fleece (The). Founded by Philippe III. duke of Burgundy, 10 Jan., 1429. The grand-mastership of the order was disputed for twenty-four years (1700–1724) between Kaiser Karl VI. and Felipe king of Spain; but when Louis XV. of France sent back the infanta, to whom he was betrothed, the Spaniards were so indignant that they broke off their French alliance and joined Austria, and Felipe yielded to Karl the moot point. When the house of Burgundy became extinct, the grand-mastership of the order passed to the house of Austria—Karl V. transmitted it to his successors in Spain. When the dynasty failed, Philippe of Bourbon, king of Spain, with a disputed title, claimed the mastership, but the kaiser refused to renounce his prior right. This was the sore point which was healed by the alliance of Spain with Austria.

Order of the Golden Shield (The). Instituted by Louis II. of France (about 878) in defence of the country. The motto was Allons! (a call to arms). Extinct.

Order of the Golden Spur (The), 1534. A Roman order established by Paul III.; or, as some say, restored by him, but founded in 312 by Constantine in honour of his victory over Maxentius. Gregory XVI. reformed the order in 1841 and called it 'The Order of St. Sylvester,' or the 'Golden Spur Reformed.' The decoration is a cross of eight points, suspended on a black and red ribbon, and between the arms of the cross is a little golden spur.

Order of the Guelfs (The), or 'The Guelfic Order,' in Hanover, 1815. Instituted by George prince of Wales, the prince regent of England. Extinct.

Order of the Hare (The). Instituted by Edward III. The French raised a tremendous shout, and Edward thought it was the shout of onset, but it was occasioned by a hare running between the two armies. Extinct.

Order of the Holy Faith of Jesus Christ (The), 1221. A military order for a crusade against the Albigenses. Extinct.

Order of the Holy Ghost (The). I. Neapolitan, 25 May, 1352, instituted by Louis of Anjou, king of Naples.

Order of the Theatins (The). See 'Theatins.'

Order of the Thistle (The), 809. Said to have been instituted by Archaïcus king of the Scots. It was renewed in 1540 by James V. of Scotland; again in 1687 by James II. of Great Britain; and again by Queen Anne.

The rue mixed with the thistles is a pun on the word Andrew. That is: 'Thisties and Rue.'

Order of the Trappists (The). See 'Trappists.'

Order of the Virgin's Looking Glass (The), 1419. Instituted by Ferdinand of Castile.

Order of the White Eagle (The), 1325. Instituted by Ladislaus V. in Poland. Suppressed in 1638. Restored by Augustus II. in 1705. Included in the Russian orders 1832.

Order of the White Falcon, 1732. Instituted by Ernest Augustus of Saxe-Weimar. The idea is expressed in the motto Vigilando ascendimus.

See under 'Ordre.'

Orders (Holy). The profession of a clergyman. Every clergyman, after ordination, is said to be in holy orders. In the Scotch and other Presbyterian churches ministers 'licensed to preach the gospel' are called licentiates or probationers till they are ordained over some pastorate.

Orders (Social), or 'Castes.' At one time it was well nigh impossible to rise out of the social order in which one was born, and marriages were, of course, restricted to castes also.

In ancient EGYPT there were four social orders: priests, the military, the merchant class, and the artisans.

In FRANCE [ancient régime] there were only three recognised orders: the clergy, the noblesse, and the tiers état.

In INDIA the four great castes are: (1) the Brahmans or the sacerdotal order; (2) the Chutria or the military order; (3) the Vaisya or the mercantile class; and (4) the Sudras or working class.

In ancient ROME we find only three recognised social orders: senators, the equestrian order, and the plebeians.

In SWEDEN the four social orders are: the nobles, the clergy, tradesmen, and peasantry.

Orders in Council are acts of the Privy Council made by the sovereign (who is personally present) by advice of the privy council. If the sovereign is not present, they are called 'Acts of the Lords of the Council.'

Orders of Mendicants (The). See p. 571, 'Mendicant.'

Orders of the Church. See under 'Church' and 'Monastic Orders.'

Ordinaires (Les). The French royal bodyguard which, in the reign of Henri III. (1574–1589), supplanted the Scottish Archers, and were by Louis XIII. (1622) changed into the celebrated Musketeers (q.v.).

Of course the word has other meanings, as the ecclesiastical superior who has ordinary jurisdiction; the book which indicates the church service for each day in the year; the ordinaire de la messe, and so on. 'Ordinaires' (3 syl.).

Ordinance for the State of Ireland (The), 1289. Vindicates the right of the English Parliament to bind Ireland (17 Edw. I.).

Ordinance for the Suppression of Blasphemies and Heresies, 1647. A statute passed with triumphant majorities after King Charles I. was made prisoner by Colonel Hamilton, governor of the Isle of Wight. It was aimed at Cromwell and his favourers, and provided that any one who denied the doctrine of the Trinity, the divinity of Christ, or that the Bible is the word of God, or anyone who denies the resurrection of the body, or a future day of judgment, shall suffer death. Anyone who denies man's free will to turn to God, anyone who affirms that there is a purgatory, that images are lawful, or that infant baptism is unlawful, shall be committed to prison. Anyone who denies the obligation of observing the Lord's Day, or that church government by presbytery is unlawful, shall be committed to prison.

Ordinance of the 5th September, 1815. Reducing the number of French deputies from 459 to 260, and declaring that no article of the 'Charte Constitutionelle' (q.v.) should be revised.

Ordinanze della Giustizia, 1282. A law of Florence excluding all nobles from the government.

Ordinary (The), in church matters means the bishop of the diocese; but in emergency a rector or vicar of a parish may act as ordinary. It means one who in ecclesiastical matters has chief authority in a parish.

The word has several other meanings: as the soldier who waits on an officer; a daily meal at a fixed price, or the place where it is given; part of an escutcheon, &c.

Ordnance. A name given to whatever concerns artillery.

Board of Ordnance. In 1683 the board consisted of five principal officers, besides the master-general, a lieutenant-general, the surveyor-general, clerk of the ordnance, storekeeper, and clerk of deliveries. It deliberates, regulates, and orders everything relating to the artillery and garrison.

Master-General of the Ordnance. Commander-in-chief of the artillery corps. He used to have the sole command of the Royal Regiment of Artillery, but was assisted by a lieutenant-general. The office was abolished 25 May, 1855, and the duties transferred to the secretary of state for war.

Ordnance Select Committee (The). A committee of officers who advise the secretary of state for war on all inventions submitted to them. Their office is at Woolwich, near the headquarters of the Royal Artillery. The committee contains 2 artillery officers, 1 officer of the engineers, and 1 officer of the line, with secretary and assistant secretary both in the artillery.

Ordnance Survey. The survey of the British dominions by the Ordnance Department, who also prepare maps and plans both of the whole kingdom and also of its parts.

Of Great Britain: England commenced by Roy in 1784; Scotland in 1809; England and Wales completed January 1870.

Of Ireland: commenced 1824, and completed in 1840.

Of India, commenced by Lambton in 1801.

Ordonnances. Laws made by the French king, beginning with the words, Au nom du roi, and ending with the clause car tel est notre plaisir. The three famous ordinances of Charles X. led to the revolution of 1830: (1) Abolished the liberty of the press; no journal might be issued before being submitted to government inspection; (2) the chamber of deputies was dissolved; and (3) two-thirds of the electors were disfranchised; and the number of deputies was reduced nearly one-half.

Ordre de l'Epic (L'), 1450. Instituted by François I. duc de Bretagne. The collar was of gold braid representing ears of corn in saltire, at the end of which hung an ermine, with the legend A ma vie. The order expired when Britanny was annexed to the crown of France. See 'Ordre de l'Hermine.'

'Epic' here means a spike or ear of corn. Old French épic=spica.

Ordre de la Geneste (2 syl.), 1234. Instituted by St. Louis (IX.) on his marriage with Marguerite of Provence. The collar was decorated with broom flowers and fleurs de lis in gold. See p. 643, 'Order of St. Genette.'

Ordre de l'Hermine, 1381. Instituted by Jean V. duc de Bretagne, on his reconciliation with the French and with Clisson. The insignia was a collar of gold charged with ermines, and the motto A ma vie.

Ordre de la Toison d'Or. See p. 636, 'Order of the Golden Fleece.'

Ordre de St. Michel (L'), 1 Aug., 1469. A military order instituted by Louis XI. at Amboise, in honour of St. Michael, the patron saint of France. At first the chevaliers were limited to 36, but they were subsequently increased to 100, the reigning king being the grand-master. It ceased to exist in 1830.

Ordre des Humiliés, 1134. A religious confraternity of Milan, instituted by St. John de Méda, of the rule of St. Benedict. Suppressed in 1571.

Ordre du Mérite Militaire (L'), 1759. Instituted by Louis XV. to honour Protestants of the French army disqualified by their religious tenets for being 'Chevaliers de St. Louis.' Their decoration was a star of eight points cantonnée de fleurs de lis. The motto was Pro virtute bellica. It was abolished in 1830.

Ordre du St. Esprit (L'), 1578. An order of chivalry instituted by Henri III. in memory of his being elected King of Poland on the day of Pentecost. The chevaliers were limited to 100, of which 9 were ecclesiastics. The cross bore the image of the Holy Spirit, and was suspended on a blue ribbon. Every member must be a Catholic, and a Knight of St. Michael. Suppressed in 1789. Revived at the Restoration, but again suppressed in 1830.

Orebro, in Sweden (Treaty of), 6 July, 1812, between Great Britain and Sweden. Its object was to circumvent Napoleon, who had invaded Russia with 450,000 men.

Oregon (U.S. America). So called, in 1846, from its river of the same name. The inhabitants are nicknamed Webfeet and Hard-cases.

Oriel College (Oxford), 1326. Founded by Edward II. The head of the college is called the provost

Oriental France. So Germany was called in the time of Charlemagne, still preserved in the name Franconia, a circle of Germany containing nearly 9,000 square miles.

Orientation, in churches, means their position more or less correctly due east and west. Very few churches stand due east and west, but the deviation seems owing to the carelessness of the builders or to some local cause.

It cannot be due to the position of the sun on the day of the patron and saint, as churches dedicated to the same saint do not occupy the same position.

Similarly it cannot typify the bending head of the crucified Saviour, because no uniform rule is observed in church orientation.

Oriflamme (The). The flag of St. Denis, made by Philippe I. in 1082 the standard of France. A phonetic form of the Latin Auri-flamma, or flame of gold. The oriflamme was a large red banner mounted on a gilt staff, the loose end of the flag being cut into three tongues resembling flames, between each of which was a green silk tassel. When the counts of Vexin became possessed of the abbey of St. Denis, the oriflamme passed into their hands, but in 1082 Philippe I. united Vexin to the crown, and the oriflamme became a royal banner. (St. Denis = Sahn Dnee.)

The first time it was displayed in a battlefield was in 1119, when war was declared with England; and the last time was at the battle of Agincourt in 1415. On both occasions the French were compelled to sue for peace. It was made of red taffeta, and was without device. Called golden from the gilt staff.

Orkney Islands (The). The Orkejar or Orkeyjar, the Northern Islands of the Norwegians, as distinguished from the Sudrejar or Southern Islands, now called Sodor (q.v.), and the Western, or Hebrides.

Orkney, Latin Orcădes, is probably connected with the Norwegian orcan or orken, a hurricane.

Orkneyinga Saga (The). History of the men of Orkney. This saga was printed among the Icelandic Sagas for the Master of the Rolls in 1887. It is in Icelandic and not translated.

Orleanists (The). See 'Armagnacs.'

Orléans (House of). A younger branch of the Bourbons represented in France by Louis-Philippe (1830–1848).

The Orléans-Orléans was Louis XII. (1498-1515), and the Orléans-Angoulême consisted of François I., Henri II., François II., Charles IX., and Hen III. (1515-1589).

Orléans. The Plot of Gaston duc d'Orléans, 1632. This was a plot to murder Richelieu, the obnoxious minister of Louis XIII. The duke induced Henri de Montmorency to join it, and they succeeded in raising a revolt in Languedoc. The cardinal sent troops to quell the revolt; a battle was fought; the insurgents were defeated; and Montmorency, being taken prisoner, was beheaded.

Orleton's Message. Adam Orleton, bishop of Hereford, sent this ambiguous message to the keeper of Berkeley Castle, 21 Sept., 1327: 'Edwardum occidere nolite timere bonum est.' This may be either a command to murder the king, or not to murder him, according to the way the words are pointed. Thus: 'Edwardum occidere nolite timere,—bonum est' (to kill Edward fear not, it is right); or, 'Edwardum occidere nolite,—timere bonum est' (do not kill Edward; it is right to dread doing so). See p. 638, 'Oracle of Delphi.'

Wolsey, in early life, was cautioned to 'beware of Kingston.' The warning made a great impression on his superstitious mind, and he would never enter the town of Kingston (on the Thames). When he was confined to his cell by order of Henry VIII. a blare of trumpets announced the approach of armed officials, and Sir William Kingston entered. Then the warning of his younger days flashed across him in a new light, and, bowing his head, he uttered those memorable words, 'If I had served my God as faithfully as I have served my king, He would not have forsaken me in my grey hairs.'

HENRY IV. of England was told he should 'die in Jerusalem,' which he took for granted meant the Holy Land; but he died in the Jerusalem Chamber, London, the chapter-house of Westminster Abbey.

CAMBYSES, son of Cyrus, was told that he should die in Ecbatăna, which he supposed meant the capital of Media. Being wounded accidentally in Syria he asked the name of the place, and being told it was called Ecbatana, he replied, 'Here, then, I am destined to end my life.'

When in 1568 the Countess of Egmont implored Alva to spare the life of her husband, he replied, 'Certainly, madam, he shall be released to-morrow morning.' The countess thought the duke meant her husband would be released from prison, but Alva meant that he would be executed and released from life.

Jourdain the wizard told Somerset, if he wished to live, to 'avoid where castles mounted stand.' The duke died in an alehouse called 'the Castle,' which stood in St. Albans.

* * These punning prophecies are very numerous, and somewhat amusing.

Orloff Diamond (The). Weighs 194¾ carats, and is set on the top of the imperial sceptre of Russia. It is of pure water, and about the size of a pigeon's egg. It is said to have been one of the eyes of an idol in a temple in India. Subsequently it came into the possession of Shah Nadir of Persia; and, when the Shah was murdered, it was stolen by a French grenadier, who sold it to an English sea-captain for 2,000*l*. The captain brought it to England, and sold it to a Jew merchant for 12,000*l*. The Jew sold it to Shafras, an Armenian merchant, and in 1775 Catharine II. of Russia bought it of Shafras for 90,000*l*., and a pension for life of 4,000*l*. per annum. See 'Diamonds.'

Ormond Crown (The). A silver 5*s*. piece coined in Dublin 1643 for circulation in Ireland. Called Ormond from the proclamation of the Duke of Ormond, then lord-lieutenant of Ireland, establishing its currency.

Orphanites (3 syl.). A sect of Hussites (2 syl.) who professed unbounded admiration of Ziska, their chief, and after his death, thinking no one worthy to succeed him, wanted to place the government of affairs in the hands of a council. They were annihilated in 1434 by the Calixtines (q.v.).

Orphica. An enormous mass of literature which in the 3rd and 4th centuries grew out of the old Orphic myths and songs, not dissimilar to the Ossian of Macpherson, based, it may be, on some threads of older literature. Not only the Hellenists but the church fathers referred to those forgeries as to primitive and authentic sources of Greek religion, from which Pythagoras, Heraclitos, and Plato had drawn their theological philosophy. Wesseling and Lobeck have demonstrated that these writings are forgeries of the 3rd and 4th cents.; and that, so far from being the sources of the Greek mythology, they are wholly deduced from Hesiod and Homer. See 'Literary Forgeries.'

Orry King, or 'Ree Gorree,' of Manx. There was in the island at one time a 'King Orry's Tower,' now the residence of the lord bishop. It is supposed that Orry was a Norwegian who fled to Man during the desolating wars of Harold Harfaga; that he succeeded in establishing his sway over the island, and was a wise, vigorous, and politic ruler. To him Man is indebted for its legislative government. He held his court at Tynwald Hill, and his descendants continued to rule the island till 1077, when Godred IV. routed the islanders, and established a new dynasty.

Orsini Conspiracy (The), 14 Jan., 1858. A most infamous attempt was made to assassinate Napoleon III., as, with the Empress, he was driven to the French opera. The carriage (8·30) had just arrived at the door of the Italian Opera, in the Rue Lepelletier, when a bomb was thrown at it which exploded and killed twenty persons. A second was then thrown which killed one of the imperial horses. A third burst under the carriage; but, though the carriage was shattered, one of the horses was killed, and the aide-de-camp in the same carriage, the Emperor and Empress escaped with very slight injuries. Count Felix Orsini, Colonel Pierri, Gomez a domestic, and Rudio were arrested. The first three were executed, and Rudio was transported for life. The French ambassador remonstrated with the British Government for harbouring such villains, and Lord Palmerston brought in a bill for the punishment of conspiracy to murder. In the meantime the French colonels demanded to be allowed to extirpate the English nation. This, of course, roused a strong feeling, and the bill was lost by a majority of 19.

The life of Napoleon III. was attempted six times. See 'Napoleon III.' The silly bluster of the French colonels was called at the time 'Cock-a-doodle-do.'

Ortliebians (4 syl.), 1212. A branch of the 'Brethren of the Free Spirit' (q.v.) in Alsace, whose leader was a fanatic named Ortlieb. They spread into Thurgau and the Upper and Lower Rhine. They were pantheists, and in France were popularly called Turlupins.

Osmanlee, 1300. A Turk, or follower of Othman, founder of the Turkish empire. Othman interpreted Islam (the Mohammedan creed) in his own way. To call an Osmanlee a Turk is considered an insult.

Osman or Othman is a contraction of Al Thaman (the Bone-breaker). That is O'thaman, O'th'man, Osman.

Ossorian Wolves. Giraldus Cambrensis tells us of a certain race in Ossory who were transformed every seven years into wolves. This is not given as history, but as the statement of an historian.

De quodam hominum genere . . . . Ossyriensium, unde quolibet septennio per imprecationem sancti cujusdam Natalis . . . . formam . . . . humanam prorsus exuentes, induunt lupinam.—GIRALDUS.

Osso'rians (The). The inhabitants of Ossory, which comprised the present county of Kilkenny, with parts of Tipperary and Queen's County.

Os'suary of Morat, Switzerland (The), 1416. Made of the bones of the Burgundians slain by the Swiss in the battle of Morat, 22 June, 1476. It was destroyed by the French in 1798, and in 1822 a stone obelisk was erected on the spot.

Ostiarius. St. Ignatius in his letter to the faithful of Antioch mentions this church officer. His duties were to open the book for the officiating priest; to keep the keys of the church, and to be responsible for the cleanliness and good order of the church and its furniture; to open and close the doors at the right time; to maintain good order in the congregation; and to prevent the entrance of any Jew or heathen. They were always elderly men.

Our beadle has many of the duties of the more ancient ostiarius.

Ostrogoths. Goths of the East, in opposition to the Visigoths or Goths of the West. They disappear from history in 553.

Oswald's Law, A.D. 962. The law of Oswald archbishop of York that all collegiate chapters be turned into Benedictine fraternities, and if any chapter refused to make this change, then was an opposition church, under the special patronage of the Virgin, to be set up.

Otrepieff the Pretender. Gregory Otrepieff, a runaway monk of Ischoudoff, in Russia, was the first of the impostors who impersonated Dmitri V. son of Ivan the Terrible, put to death in his infancy by Boris Godounoff, in 1591. Supported by Sigismund II. king of Poland, he overthrew Boris and reigned at Moscow in 1605. His marriage to a Pole and a Catholic led to his murder by the mob in 1606. See 'Pougatcheff.'

Ottanta (The). See 'Eighty.'

Otta'va Rima. The stanza of the later Italian writers like Boccaccio. Byron's 'Don Juan' is an English example. Lines 1, 3, 5 rhyme, and lines 2, 4, 6 rhyme, while 7, 8 rhyme independently. Called ottava because it is an eight-line stanza. See 'Terza Rima.'

Ottima'ti (The). The aristocracy of Florence.

Otto I. the Lion, and 'the Great King' of Germany. The second of the Saxon dynasty (912, king of Germany 936–973, emperor of the Romans 961–973).

Father, Heinrich I. the Fowler; Mother, Mechtildis; Wives, (1) Eadgyth daughter of Edward the Elder, and granddaughter of Alfred the Great; (2) Adelheid widow of Lothaire king of Lombardy. Contemporary with Athelstan, Edmund, Edred, Edwy, and Edgar the Peaceful.

Otto II. of Germany. 'The Red,' 'the Bloody,' 'the Pale Death of the Saracens' (955, 973–983).

Father, Otto I. the Great; Mother, Eadgyth granddaughter of Alfred the Great; Wife, Theophânia daughter of Românus II. emperor of the East. Contemporary with Edgar, Edward the Martyr, and Ethelred the Unready.

 Called 'the Bloody' from the Bloody Banquet. See 'Otto's Bloody Banquet.'

Otto III. the Wonder of the World. Born 980; king of Germany 983–1002; kaiser of the Holy Roman Empire 996–1002.

Father, Otto II.; Mother, Theophânia; Wife, Mary daughter of the king of Aragon, burnt to death for adultery. Contemporary with Etheired.

Otto's Bloody Banquet, 981. The Romans, desirous of freeing themselves from the German yoke, formed a conspiracy to make Rome a republic. This conspiracy was revealed to Otto II. of Germany, and the kaiser, pretending to know nothing about it, invited the chief of the conspirators to a banquet. When the guests were seated, Otto stamped with his foot, and the hall was filled with armed men. The kaiser then deliberately unrolled a paper, and as he read aloud the names the victims were dragged from table and strangled.

Ottoman Empire (The). The empire of the Osmanlis,' i.e. all those countries under the Turkish sultan. So called from Ottoman or Othman (1289–1326), who had laid the foundation of the independent sovereignty of the Turks.

Otway the poet, we are told, being in a starving condition, had a guinea given him. He went immediately and bought a loaf of bread, but died swallowing the first mouthful. Allusion to this tale is often made.

Ouida. The pen-name of Miss Louise de la Ramé. The name was suggested by a little girl who said Weeda for Louisa.

Our Boys. An inner circle of Moonlighters (q.v.), who had their own captains, subservient to Captain Moonlight. They were armed, some with revolvers, and some with other weapons. Their objects were to compel men to belong to the Land or National League, to terrorise those who took evicted farms or who dealt with persons boycotted. See 'Irish Associations.'

Our Lady of Mercy. Mme. Tallien (1774–1831), daughter of Cabarrus, a Spanish banker. Called 'Our Lady of Mercy' because she was always pleading for the life of some one condemned to death by the revolutionary tribunal.

Our Lady of Walsingham. An image of the Virgin Mary in the abbey of Little Walsingham, Norfolk. This was the most famous image in all England. Persons of all degrees paid their vows and made offerings to it, and the most extravagant miracles were ascribed to it. It was burnt at Chelsea in 1538.

In the last age, whoever had not made a visit and an offering to the Blessed Virgin of this place [Walsingham] was looked upon as impious.—CAMDEN.

Henry VIII., when a boy, walked from Barham barefoot to the shrine, and presented to the image a necklace of great value. Its secret springs were exposed to the public before it was destroyed.

Out in the '15, i.e. in the rebel army of the Pretender in 1715 (Geo. I.). See below.

Anderson of Whitburgh, a gentleman whose father had been out in the '15.—HOWITT, Hist. of Eng. (Geo. I., p. 500).

Out in the '45, i.e. in the rebel army of the Young Pretender in 1745. See above.

Outburgers. Called in German 'Ausburgers.' Aliens who had been admitted to privileges of citizenship, though resident at a distance from the city. In consequence of this 'privilege' they claimed exemption from all dues to their feudal lord; and if the lord resisted this unreasonable claim, he had to do battle with the city which threw its shield over the Outburger.

Outed Prelates (The). The Scotch episcopate disestablished in 1689.

Alexander Rose, the last survivor of the outed prelates.—ROBERT CHAMBERS, The Threiplands of Pingask.

Ovate. A kind of Druidical curate or deacon. The heads of the hierarchy were Druids, the next in rank the Bards, and the third order was that of Ovates. Old English ofydd, a sapling or young shoot.

Overthrow of the Geraldines (3 syl.) in Ireland (The), 1535. The Geraldines were great Norman lords in the south of Ireland. They had been suffered by Henry VII. to govern Ireland in the name of the English crown; but when Henry VIII. was king, he resolved to be supreme in Ireland, and Lord Thomas Fitzgerald revolted. Skeffington, the new lord deputy, levelled to the ground Maynooth, the stronghold of the Geraldines, and wholly extirpated the family, leaving only a single boy to preserve the name.

Ovid (The French). Du Bellay (1524–1560). Also called the 'Father of Grace and Elegance.'

Ovid of the English Nation (The). Michael Drayton (1563–1631). So called by Dr. Heylin in his 'Cosmographia,' p. 303 (1637).

Ovid's Tower. About two leagues from Karansebês, upon a steep hill, stands a small square tower so called; and tradition asserts that the Roman poet was confined there by Augustus for having written his 'Art of Love.' This is most improbable. No doubt the poet was banished from Rome for some offence, but not for writing shaky poetry, and the place of his banishment was most likely Tomi in Thrace.

Owen Meredith. A pen-name assumed by Lord Lytton, British ambassador in Paris; under which name he published a number of poems. One of the windows in Knebworth Church is that of Owen Tudor, and the other is that of Ann Meredith. These windows are memorials of Lord Lytton's family on the paternal side.

Lord Lytton, i.e. the Right Hon. Edward Robert Bulwer-Lytton, created earl in 1880; son of Edward Lytton Bulwer 2nd Baron Lytton, the novelist, who died 1873. Owen Meredith was born 1831.

Owlglass the Jester, 1493; but the earliest copy now known is dated 1540. Thyl Owlglass was the son of a poor Brunswick peasant who lived by his wits, and was cramful of practical jokes—half knavery and half fun. He was servant, charlatan, lansquenet, artist, disputant, monk, blacksmith, cook, miller, and so on. He died 1350. Thyl was a little squat figure, with sharp keen eyes, red beard and hair. The American Clockmaker is not unlike Thyl Owlglass. Called in Germany 'Eulenspiegel.'

Ox (The). Domenichi'no (1581–1641). When so called by his fellow-students on account of his plodding slowness, Annibal Carracci remarked that the 'Ox will plough a fruitful field.' See below.

Ox (The Dumb). Thomas Aquīnas the 'Angelic Doctor' (1224–1274). So called by his fellow-students at Cologne on account of his taciturnity and dulness; but Albertus said, 'We call him the Dumb Ox, but he will one day give such a bellow as shall be heard from one end of the world to the other.'

Also called 'the Great Sicilian Ox.' The family was allied to the kings of Sicily. He was also of unusual size, very tall and stout in proportion.

Oxford Act of 1665 (The). The act of parliament more usually called 'The Five-mile Act,' which banished nonconforming ministers five miles from any parliamentary town.

And two private halls Charsley and Turrell. incorporated with Hertford College in 1874.

 Magdalen Hall was

Mansfield College, 1889. The first Nonconformist college at Oxford. The chief object of the college is the education of young men for the congregational ministry; the first 'Principal' being Dr. Fairbairn.

To these may be added Lady Margaret Hall and Somerville Hall for ladies.

Oxford's Masterpiece (The Earl of). The monopoly of trade to the South Seas granted to a company of merchants incorporated as the South Sea Company.

Oxford's Miss (Lord). Elizabeth Davenport, actress, called by Pepys 'Roxalana,' from a favourite character in 'The Siege of Rhodes.'

Oxford of Belgium (The). The University of Louvain founded 1834 at Malines for the union of divine and secular knowledge. The following year it was transferred to Louvain.

Oxford of Holland (The). Leyden.

Oxford Tract Movement, 1833–1841. A religious revival which originated at Oxford by the publication of certain pamphlets called 'Tracts for the Times,' chiefly by Pusey, Newman, and Keble. These tracts taught the dogmas of the divine origin of the church, the apostolic order of the clergy, and the high church doctrines. Church architecture, church renovation, clerical dresses, and all externals of religion were more carefully attended to; but, at the same time, it must be confessed that an enormous accession to the Roman Catholic Church was the result, and a long disputation about such things as vestments, candles, genuflexions, and so on.

Oxford University. The heads of the several colleges have the following titles.—

Of 1 he is called the Dean, viz. the head of Christ Church.

Of 8 he is called the Master, viz. of Balliol, Pembroke, and University College.

Of 4 he is called the President, viz. of Corpus, Magdalen, St. John's, and Trinity.

Of 3 he is called the Principal, viz. of Brasenose, Jesus, and Hertford; and of the 4 halls (New Inn, St. Alban's, St. Edmund, and St. Mary). To these add Mansfield.

Of 3 he is called the Provost, viz. of Oriel, Queen's and Worcester.

Of 2 he is called the Rector, viz. of Exeter and Lincoln.

Of 5 he is called the Warden, viz. of All Souls, Keble, Merton, New College, and Wadham.

In Cambridge University the head of every college except two is called the Master, that of King's is called the Provost, and that of Queens' is called the President.

Oyer and Terminer, to hear and determine. A commission granted by the crown to judges of assize, &c., to 'hear and determine' all cases of treason, felony, and trespass brought before them on their respective circuits.

Pacata, or Pezade (2 syl.). Un impôt de la paix, 1040. Levied during the 'Truce of God' for the establishment of a militia to enforce obedience to the truce.

Paccanarists, followers of Paccanari. Paccanari was a Tyrolean priest who died about 1802. He founded the order called 'Les Pères de la Foi' after that of the Jesuits was abolished by Clement XIV. in 1778.

Pacha of Egypt (The). A diamond cut on eight sides. It weighs 40 carats, and cost 700,000 francs [28,000*l.*]. See 'Diamonds.'

Pacifères (3 syl.), 14th cent. Armed peasantry of France, associated together to resist the Grand Companies which plundered and oppressed the people.

Pacific Parliament (The). A triennial parliament dissolved 8 Aug., 1713. A Tory parliament noted for the treaty of peace signed at Utrecht after a war of eleven years. Bolingbroke and Oxford were its chief members. See 'Parliaments.'

No assembly but one composed as this was could have sat quiet under such a peace.—BURNET, Own Time.

Pacificateur de la Vendée (Le). Lazarus Hoche (1768–1797). So called because in 1796 he brought the Vendéan war to an end.

Pacification (Edict of). The same as the 'Edict of Amboise' (q.v.). Called the 'Edict of Pacification' because it closed the first religious war of France (19 March, 1563).

Pacification of Dunse (The), 18 June, 1639. The arrangement made with the Covenanters who had encamped on a hill called Dunse Law, when Charles I. tried to enforce episcopacy and the English Prayer Book on the people. Charles, fearing the result of a battle, proposed terms of peace, and agreed to leave to a convocation all church matters. By this convocation presbytery was restored, episcopacy in Scotland was abolished, and the existing bishops were deprived of their titles and sees.

Dunse Law is an elevated spot some 680 feet high, north of the town.

Pacification of Ghent (The). Signed 8 Nov., 1576. An accommodation between Holland cum Zealand and the Catholic states of the Netherlands, providing that no foreign soldiers should be permitted in the states, and that all the signatories should help each other against all opponents. This treaty was known as 'The Perpetual Peace.'

Pacification of Passau, in Bavaria (The), 7 Aug., 1552. Securing freedom of religion to Protestants. This 'pacification' led to the 'Religious Peace of Augsburg,' 26 Sept., 1555.

Passau pronounce Pas-sow (ow as in 'now').

Pacification of Vienna (The), 23 June, 1606. Concluded between the Archduke Mathias of Austria and the ministers of Botskai of Hungary. By this treaty Hungary was split into three parts, of which Turkey possessed 1,859 square miles, Botskai in Hungary and Transylvania 2,082 square miles, and Austria 1,222 square miles.

Pacificator of Europe (The). Benedict XIII. (1724–1730). He pacified the angry antagonists of the bull Unigenitus (q.v.) by his bull Pretiosus (q.v.). He pacified the Sicilians, who were in contention about the 'Tribunal de Monarchia.' He settled the controversy with the king of Sardinia respecting the right of nomination to certain abbacies and benefices in Piedmont. And he brought about the treaty of Seville in 1729 between England, France, Spain, and Holland, thereby settling the succession of Tuscany and Parma.

Pack-Monday Fair. Held the first Monday after 10 Oct. at Sherborne. It was held in the churchyard, and blowing cows' horns was a distinguishing feature of it. Said to be in commemoration of the completion of the church.

Pacta Conventa. Polish covenants between the nobles and the person nominated for the crown. The first was in 1355, between the Polish nobles and Louis I. of Hungary, who was invited to accept the crown of Poland. These pacts made Poland virtually an oligarchy, and were the real cause of its downfall.

Of 1573. Passed by Henry of Valois, securing freedom of worship and equality of rights to all Poles. Formally abolished in 1786. These covenants were signed by every king of Poland at his coronation. They not only disavowed all religious distinctions, but also strictly limited and defined the powers and prerogatives of the crown.

Pacte de Famille (La), 15 Aug., 1761. Signed at the instigation of the Duc de Choiseul by the king of France, the king of Spain, and the duke of Parma, all of whom were of the Bourbon family. Its object was to break down the maritime superiority of England, but it was an utter failure. The king of the Two Sicilies refused to subscribe the treaty, and in 1789 other affairs superseded it in interest.

Pacte de Famine (La), 1765–1789. Monopolists of corn who brought great misery on France, especially in the years 1767–1769, 1775–1778, 1788–1789. The events of 1789 put an end to this abominable traffic.

Pædagogy (The). See p. 27, 'Andrews (University of St.).'

Pædobaptists. Those Protestant dissenters who practise infant baptism, in contradistinction to the Baptists, who allow adult baptism alone, and that after a personal confession of faith.

The Church of England and the Presbyterians are Pædobaptists, but applied to these churches the word only denotes a practical doctrine carried out by these Christians. As a distinctive title it is opposed to Baptists, and applies chiefly, if not entirely, to the Independents or Congregationalists (q.v.).

Pains and Penalties. Acts of parliament to attaint particular persons of treason or felony, or to inflict pains and penalties beyond or contrary to common law, to serve a special purpose. They are new laws pro re nata. When Queen Caroline wife of George IV. was tried, she was proceeded against by a 'Bill of Pains and Penalties,' but was acquitted.

Painted Chamber (The). Chambre peinte. Anciently St. Edward's Chamber. It was destroyed by fire with the houses of Parliament in 1834. When, at the beginning of this cent., the tapestry and wainscoting were taken down, it was discovered that the interior had been originally painted with single figures and historical subjects, arranged round the chamber in six bands, somewhat like the Bayeux tapestry. Careful drawings were made at the time by J. T. Smith, and drawings by Charles Stothard were engraved in 1819 for the 'Vetusta Monumenta.'

Painter of Nature (The). So the French called Belleau, one of their Pleiad poets (1528–1577). His chief poem is entitled 'Loves and Transformations of the Precious Stones.'

Painters (Father of Modern). John Cimabue of Florence (1240–1300).

Paire de Gants. Donnez-nous notre paire de gants. Famous royalist song during the 'Hundred Days' in the mouths of all the dames des halles of Paris. It was a pun on 'Donnez-nous notre père de Ghent,' referring to Louis XVIII., who was residing at Ghent.

Pairs de France (Les). Philippe Auguste fixed the number at twelve, half of whom were seculars and half ecclesiastics. The secular peers were the duc de Normandie, the duc de Bourgogne, the duc de Guyenne, the comte de Flandre, the comte de Toulouse, and the comte de Champagne; the ecclesiastical peers were the archbishop of Reims, and the bishops of Laon, Langres, Beauvais, Châlons, and Noyon. Subsequently, the number was unlimited. All princes of the blood were pairs-nés. Peers were abolished in 1798, but were re-established in 1814 at the Restoration. In 1831 the heredity of peerage was abolished, and all peers were nominated by the crown. The Chamber of Peers was called the Cour des pairs, and at the Restoration formed a corps législatif with the House of Deputies, but in 1848 the House of Peers was superseded by the Senate.

Paishdadians. See Pishdadian Dynasty.'

Paix Boiteuse (La), 1570. There was signed at St. Germain in 1562 an edict which forbade the Calvinists to levy troops and preach against the Roman Catholic religion, but it authorised their holding religious services in country places. In 1570 a peace was signed between the Catholics and Protestants; but it was neither sincere nor durable. It was called 'La Paix Boiteuse et Malassise,' because its terms were drawn up by H. Mesmes and signed by Biron. Biron was boiteux, and Mesmes was seigneur de Malassise, but the insincerity of the affair gave point to the puns boiteux and mal assise (lame and unstable).

Paix Fourrée (La), 9 May, 1409. Between the children of the Duc d'Orléans (recently assassinated) and Jean-sans-Peur duc de Bourgogne.

Paix Malheureuse (La), 1559, which closed the Italian war between France and Italy (1483–1559). By this treaty Henri II. renounced all claim to Genŏa, Naples, Milan, and Corsica.

Paix de Dieu (La), 1085. A suspension of arms brought about by the clergy to put a stop to the depredations of the barons. From every pulpit in France was read this command and malediction:—

'May they who refuse to obey be accursed, and have their portion with Cain the first murderer, with Judas the arch-traitor, and with Dathan and Abiram who went down alive into the pit. May they be accursed in the life which now is; and may their hope of salvation be put out, as the light of these candles is extinguished from their sight.'

At the last words the priests extinguished their tapers, and the people responded, 'So may God extinguish the joy of those who violate this peace. Amen.' See 'Trève de Dieu.'

Paix de Longjumeau (La), 1568. Between the Catholics and the Calvinists, preparatory to the Paix de St. Germain. This peace is called 'La Paix Fourrée' (q.v.), and sometimes 'La Petite Paix.'

Paix de Monsieur (La), 1575. Monsieur, the title of the king's eldest brother. This peace was signed at Loches in Touraine by François duc d'Alençon, the only surviving brother of Henri III.

By this treaty the appanage of 'Monsieur' was tripled, and he assumed the title of 'duc d'Anjou,' heretofore borne by his brother the king.

Paix des Dames (La), or 'La Paix de Cambray,' 1529. The pope, jealous of the power of Charles V., formed a league with France, England, Venice, and Milan; but Charles at once laid siege to Rome; 8,000 Romans perished, and the pope fled for safety to the castle of St. Angelo. A capitulation followed which was signed at Cambray 5 Aug., 1529, and was called 'La Paix des Dames,' because it was negotiated by Margaret of Austria (aunt of Charles V.) and Louise de Savoie (mother of François I. of France). The hollow peace was broken in 1536.

Palace of Ice (The), 1739. Built by the direction of Anne empress of Russia, to honour the nuptials of Prince Galitzin with a peasant girl. The bride and bridegroom had to pass their wedding night in a room the walls of which, all the furniture, and even the bed itself, were wholly of ice.

Palais Bourbon. Now called the Palais du Corps Législatif, between the Quai d'Orsay and the Rue de Bourgogne, and opposite the Pont de la Concorde. It was at one time the residence of the Bourbon princes, but was confiscated at the revolution. Under the Directory it was the Chamber of the Conseil des Anciens; under the first empire it was the house of the Corps Législatif; at the restoration it was the Chambre des Députés; under the republic of 1848 it was the seat of the Assemblée Nationale; since 1852 it has been the seat of the Corps Législatif. The Salle des Séances was reconstructed by M. de Joly (1828–1832).

Palais Cardinal (Le). Now called 'Le Palais Royal' of Paris. It was built by and for the Cardinal Richelieu in the reign of Louis XIII., and was divided into an outer and inner court. The gardens extended over several acres and were the wonder of Europe.

Palais Royal (Le). See above, 'Palais Cardinal.'

Palais de Justice (Le). In the cité de Paris. Here, at one time, dwelt the kings of France, up to the reign of Charles VII. (1422–1461), who resided at the Palais des Tournelles. It has often been reconstructed; the last time was in 1787. The Salle des Pas-Perdus, originally called the Grande Salle, was constructed by J. de Brosse in 1622.

Pal'amites (3 syl.). The followers of Gregory Palămas, who maintained that there were two sorts of light, one increate and one create. The former the light of Deity, who said, 'I am the Light of the world,' the latter the light of the Sun. This distinction from 1341–1351 caused a schism in the Greek Church. The monks of Mount Athos insisted that the light seen on the mount of Transfiguration was the increate light of Deity; but Barlaam insisted, in that case that there must be both a visible and an invisible God. The upshot of the matter was this—the synod presided over by the Greek emperor determined the opinion of the monks of Mount Athos to be an article of faith, and Barlaam was obliged to quit the country.

Palatinate. 'Pfalz,' Germany. The ancient empire had two palatinates, the upper and the lower. The Upper or Bavarian Palatinate, in the circle of Bavaria; and the Lower Palatinate or Palatinate of the Rhine. At the Peace of Westphalia Karl Ludwig was made elector, which increased the number of electors from seven to eight.

Palatinate (War of the), 1688–1697. It was occasioned by Louis XIV. in favour of the Duchess of Orleans, sister of the last elector-palatine, against Philipp Wilhelm prince palatine of Neuburg. The dauphin conquered the palatine in less than two months. In 1689 Marshal Duras made such brutal ravages in this country as called forth the indignation of all Europe, and caused a new coalition to be formed against Louis XIV. In 1697 the Peace of Ryswick gave possession of the palatinate to Johann Wilhelm son of Philipp Wilhelm.

Palatine. So the governor of Poland was formerly called, and his dominion was a palatinate or vayvody. The crown was not hereditary, but elective.

Palatine (Count). 'Comes Palatīnus,' a high judicial officer, generally near a frontier, with jura regālia. The district over which he had jurisdiction was called a palatinate or county palatine.

I. In England there were three such counties: Lancaster, Chester, and Durham, frontiers of Wales. Lancaster was made a palatinate by Edward III., but the crown is now 'palatine of Lancaster.' Chester was made a palatinate by William the Conqueror, but was annexed to the crown in the reign of Henry III., and is now vested in the prince of Wales. Durham was also made a palatinate by William the Conqueror, but in 1886 this also was vested in the crown.

II. In France, under the Merovingian kings.

III. In Germany the 'Pfalz-graf' was far more powerful than a simple graf. He superintended the royal revenue, and took part in the government. Originally the palatine was named by the kaiser, but in time the title and office became hereditary. The chief palatines were the counts of Lotharingia, Saxony, Bavaria, Swabia, and later on Burgundy. Of these the palatine of Lotharingia was the chief, being the first prince of Germany, and afterwards called the Palatine of the Rhine. In 1815 this nobleman was called the Elector-Palatine.

Palatine (Princesses). Anna di Gonzâga (1616–1684); Elizabeth granddaughter of James I. of England (1618–1680); and Charlotte Elizabeth of Bavaria (1652–1722).

Palatine (The Great). Foremost of the Hungarian magnates; he was first minister of the crown, head of the army, lord chief justice, and regent when a regency was required. He was elected by the National Assembly, who sent up four names, from which the king selected one.

Palatine of Heidelberg (The). A large library, museum, and botanical garden.

Palatines of the County of Limerick (The), 1709. Some 3,000 Protestants, driven from their homes, and sent by the English government to Limerick in the reign of Queen Anne. They are generally called Methodists, and are supposed to have been driven from the palatinates by the remorseless persecutions of Louis XIV. Many emigrated to America, and were called the American Palatines. Many Palatines and other continental Protestants had, before this, joined the army of William III.

The Rev. MATTHEW HENRY in his 'Commentary' refers to them (pp. 88, 89). 'When many of the poor Palatines, driven from their country by persecution, visited Chester in the year 1709, to the discontent of the High Church party, though only going to Ireland, I lent them my stable to sleep in.' The editor adds this note: 'The number who arrived in Chester within three weeks was about 3,140. The women and children and goods travelled in 109 waggons, for which Mr. Henry was informed by the mayor that the queen paid carriage, besides two shillings per week subsistence for each head.'—HENRY, Diary.

Pale (The). In Irish history means that portion of the island over which the English rule and English law were acknowledged. It was an ever-varying quantity. In Henry II.'s reign it meant Dublin, Wexford, Waterford, and the chief part of Leinster. John distributed the Pale into twelve counties palatine, viz. Dublin, Meath, Kildare, Louth, Carlow, Kilkenny, Wexford, Waterford, Cork, Kerry, Tipperary, and Limerick. In Edward III.'s reign, after the statute of Kilkenny, the Pale was limited to four counties (Dublin, Carlow, Meath, and Louth). Richard II. increased the palatinate to nine. In Henry VI.'s reign it was again contracted. Roughly the Pale means Dublin, Meath, Carlow, Kilkenny, and Louth. Except in the Pale the king's power was only nominal.

Palestro (The Hero of). Victor Emmanuel II. king of Sardinia and afterwards of Italy (1820–1878). The Sardinians and French defeated the Austrians at Palestro 31 May, 1859.

Come, one and all, cluster closely round the hero of Palestro.—Garibaldi to his soldiers, 1860.

Pali. A trans-Gangetic idiom from the Sanskrit in Burmah, Siam, and Ceylon. In this idiom the sacred writings of the Buddhists are written. Like Sanskrit, Hebrew, Latin, and several other sacred languages, Pali is not now spoken.

Pall Mall Gazette (The). A London daily newspaper commenced 7 Feb., 1865.

Palles'chi (The). The Medicean party devoted to the ruling house of Florence, or desirous of establishing in that city an oligarchy or tyranny.

Pallikars. A national militia of Greece organised to stamp out the Klephts (1 syl.) or brigands. The Armatôlès formed a principal part of the militia.

Palm the Bookseller, shot by court-martial 26 Aug., 1806. This was a most unjustifiable murder. Napoleon wanted to overrun Prussia, and Palm published a pamphlet entitled 'L'Allemagne dans son profond abaissement,' for which he was tried by court-martial, and, as he refused to give up the author, was ordered to be shot. England, Russia, and other free countries were loudly indignant; and in 1813 when the Germans rose against Napoleon, many regiments emblazoned on their banners the bloody figure of Palm the Bookseller.

Palm Sunday. 'Festum Broncheriæ,' or 'Festum Palmarum,' 'Dominica in Palmis.' The Sunday next before Easter Day, in commemoration of Christ's triumphal entry into Jerusalem, when the people strewed palm branches in the way. Instituted in 1106. In the Catholic Church palms, being blessed and sprinkled thrice with holy water, are distributed first to the clergy present and then to the laity, who receive them kneeling. A procession is then made, and at the mass all the communicants hold palms in their hands during the 'Passion' and the Gospel. See 'Sunday.'

Dies palmarum, sive florum atque ramorum appellatur.—RUPERT, De Divin. Offic., chap. vii.

Palmers. Pilgrims who brought home a branch of palm in proof of their having been to Palestine. This palm-branch was deposited in the church of the pilgrims' town. Sometimes the palm-branch was wreathed round the pilgrim's staff.

Palmyra's Queen, or 'Queen of Palmyra.' So Lady Hester Stanhope was called (1770–1839). She took up her residence at Djouni, in Syria. The last and one of the most noted queens of Palmyra was Zenōbia.

Palsgrave [Pfalzgraf]. The reeve or president of the pfalz or palace-court, the highest court of the realm, which originally moved from place to place with the monarch. In France called 'Le Maire du Palais.' When the court became stationary, the presidency was given to a 'judge'; but the king could, if he chose, confer the judicial honour on a 'man of a fief' or province, who then became a pfalzgraf or vice-roi.

There were two German reeves possessed of this judicial power, and their districts or provinces were called 'palatinates.' There was the Upper Palatinate (which was Bavaria), and the Lower Palatinate on the Rhine; but the word pfalzgraf, unqualified, always means the count-palatine of the Rhine.

The pfalzgraf of the Rhine was one of the seven original electors of the German kings; but in the tenth year of the Thirty Years' War he was deposed from the college of electors, and his place given to the duke of Bavaria.

At the Peace of Westphalia, in 1648, it was settled that the dignity of elector could not be alienated, so the pfalzgraf was restored, and the number of electors raised to eight. When, in 1692, the electorate was conferred on Ernest duke of Hanover the electoral college contained nine members; but in 1777 the number was again reduced to eight by the amalgamation of the two palatinates of Bavaria and the Rhine; the duke of Bavaria being also pfalzgraf of the Rhine. The title was abolished (except for Hessen-Cassel) by Napoleon in 1806.

Panard of the 19th century. Armand Gouffé, born at Paris (1775–1845), founder of the Caveau Moderne.

Panare'ton. The book of Ecclesiasticus, by Jesus son of Sirach, an Alexandrian, was so called because it was a complete breviary of all the moral virtues. It lays down rules for the daily regulation of life. Jesus died B.C. 150.

Pan'athenæ'a, B.C. 1495. A great Athenian fête in honour of Athēnê [Minerva], instituted by Erichthŏnios. Athēnê was goddess of all [pan] Attica. The Great Pan-Athenæa was celebrated every fifth year, and the grand ceremony was carrying the peplum or veil of Athēnê to the citadel. The prize in the games was a wreath of olives and cruse of oil.

Panda'vas (The). The descendants of Pandû. Five princes whose contest for regal supremacy with their cousins, the Kurûs, forms the subject of the great Indian epic poem entitled the 'Mahabharata.'

Pandu means 'white.' The elder of the two princes was excluded from the throne for his whiteness, probably some disease, but his five sons were the Pandavas.

Pandects (The). The Greek word for the Roman Digest compiled in the reign of the Emperor Justinian A.D. 533.

The entire Corpus Juris Civilis contained (1) the Code in twelve tables; (2) the Digest or Pandects in fifty books; (3) the Institutes, a summary of the Digest to teach the elements of Roman law, in four books; and (4) the Novels or new laws, containing sixteen edicts and 168 laws published by Justinian.

The Pandects or Digest are in fifty books: each book is subdivided into Titles; each title into Laws; and sometimes a law is subdivided into paragraphs. Thus D 50. 17. 50 means Digest Book 50, Title 17, Law 50. D 12. 2. 5. 3 means Digest Book 12, Title 2, Law 5, Paragraph 3. The symbol ff for Pandects is a corrupt form of the Greek π (i.e. P. initial of Pandect).

Pandours (The). The ferocious hordes of irregular troops by which Austria for a long time spread terror among her neighbours, and which, even so late as 1849, played an important part in the army of the Ban Jellachich.

When leagued oppression poured to northern wars
Her whiskered pandours and her fierce hussars.
CAMPBELL, Pleasures of Hope.

Panic Sunday, 10 May, 1857. The day of the Sepoys' outbreak. It was about five o'clock in the evening when a rocket gave the signal of uprising. The Sepoys seized their arms and set upon their officers, released the convicts, and killed all the Europeans they chanced to meet. The bungalows were set on fire, the European dwellings were plundered. Ladies and children were brutally treated. The mutiny began at Barrackpore, spread to Delhi, Oude, Lahore, Lucknow, Jhansi, and Cawnpore. See 'Sunday.'

Pan-ionia, B.C. 777. Fêtes in honour of the patron god of the Ionian cities, the object being to bind together the twelve confederate cities. See below.

Pan-ionium. A confederation of twelve Ionian cities:—Ephesus, Melētos, Smyrna, Phocæa, Colŏphon, Teos, Erȳthræ, Clazoměnæ, Priēnê, Lebĕdos, Samos, and Chios. The place of muster was a building on Mount Mykălē.

Panno'nia. Latin name for Hungary, the country of the Pannonii.

Ancient Panonnia included, besides Hungary, the eastern part of Austria, a part of Croatia and Bosnia, with Styria, Carinthia, Carniola, and Slavonia.

Pannus Nebula'tus. The veil used to cover the pyx containing the consecrated host.

Panontism. The deification of instinct. It teaches that instinct is the force of nature, and that creation was the work of irresistible instinct and not of all-wisdom and all-power. All wisdom, power, and love would have provided against the evils which abound, but instinct is blind, and simply follows a masterless impulse.

Panslav'ism, 1831. The confederation or union of all the Slavic branches into one great nation, including Russia, Poland, Hungary, Bohemia, &c. This scheme was advocated by the Hungarian poet Kollar (1793–1852).

Eastern Slavs: The Russians, the Serbs and Hungarian Serbs, Bosnians, Herzegovinians, Montenegrins, Slavonians, Dalmatians, Croats, Winds, and Bulgarians.
Western Slavs: Poles, Silesians, Bohemians, Moravians, Slovaks (of Hungary), and the Wends or Slavs of N. Germany.

Pantheism. Either the ultimate absorption of all things in deity, when 'God will be all in all'; or else the identification of deity with the phenomenal world, in which case God is simply the force behind everything, that which glows in the sun and blossoms on the trees. In India the Brahmins and Buddhists are Pantheists—the latter teach the ultimate absorption of everything in God. In Greece the Stoics and Eleatics, and in Italy the Pythagorēans, were Pantheists. In Alexandria the Neo-Platonists and Gnostics. In the 7th cent. John Scotus Erigĕna taught that 'God is everything and everything is God.' In the 12th cent. Amalric de Bena and David de Dinante taught the same system. Giordano Bruno was burnt to death in 1600 for Pantheistic notions; Spinōza of Holland followed in his footsteps. In modern Germany Fichte, Hegel, and Schelling were Pantheists.

If God is everything, and everything is God, then all-worship is simply God worshipping himself.

Pantisoc'racy. A visionary scheme of Coleridge of a society where all the virtues were to thrive, and all the vices to be rooted out.

Papa Angel'ico. An ideal pope, emblem and impersonation of all virtues Dante not only advocated a Papa Angelico, but also a Universal Overlord, who was to reign over the whole world, to redress grievances, punish offenders, administer justice, defend the weak, redeem all wrongs, be the father of the fatherless, and an ideal God on earth.

Papal Aggression, Sept. 1850. The establishment by Pope Pius IX. in England of a papal hierarchy. Dr. Wiseman was appointed vicar apostolic of the London district and lord archbishop of Westminster, with the title of cardinal. Dr. Ullathorne was appointed Roman Catholic bishop of Birmingham. In 1851 Dr. Briggs was enthroned bishop of Beverley, Dr. Brown of Clifton, and Dr. Burgess of Shrewsbury. Lord John Russell fumed furiously, and brought in a bill to prohibit the aggression. His bill was pared down to a fine of 100*l.* to any one who assumed such titles in England, but the fine was never enforced.

Pap'alins. Those of a papistic bias, little papists. Strype calls the two parties in England at the accession of Queen Elizabeth 'Evangelics and Papalins,' those who would drive post speed to Protestant doctrines and discipline, and those who would retain a spice of Romanism.

Paper Duty. The paper duty repealed in 1861 was the tax imposed in the reign of Queen Anne (1711) to meet the expenses of Marlborough's wars. There was, however, a duty on paper so far back as 1694.

Paper King (The). John Law (1671–1729), the projector of the Mississippi Bubble (1716–1720).

Papy'ri. Rolls made of the papy'rus plant. The Egyptian papyri are of very great antiquity, some of them running back to B.C. 2000 or more. Some have been found deposited with mummies; others, of a civil nature, have been found in jars or boxes.

1. The Hi'eroglyph'ical papyri, accompanied with pictures, are solar litanies, books 'of the empyreal gate,' or rituals.

2. The Hieratic papyri, written in the cursive Egyptian hand, are mixed civil and religious writings.

3. The Demotic papyri, in enchorial character, consist of rituals, contracts, and miscellaneous documents.

The papyri of Pompēii and Herculāneum are numerous. They are rolled on a stick and placed in a cylinder.

Papy'rus Prisse. The most ancient MS. in existence, said to be before Abraham's time. It is occupied with a plaint on the degeneracy of the manners and rueful decadence of man since the good old times. The MS. derives its name from M. Prisse d'Avennes, by whom it was procured at Thebes and given to the Bibliothèque Nationale, Paris. It consists of eighteen pages, was published in 1847, and is the most perfect specimen extant of the Hieratic writing. ('Notes and Queries,' 12 Feb., 1887, p. 127.)

Paques Véronaises (Les), 17 April, 1797. For political ends compared by Bonaparte to the 'Sicilian Vespers,' (q.v.). A considerable number of Italian and Slavonian troops, and mere armed peasants, made an attack on the French under the charge of Junot, sent by Bonaparte into Verona. As many as 500 French, scattered in different forts or lying in hospitals, were put to death, while the citadel fired red-hot balls upon the town. A powerful reinforcement from the French head-quarters in Italy put an end to the fray, and Verona submitted with humility to the French.

Pronounce Lay Park Ver'ro-naze'.

Parabola'ni (The), 5th cent. A charitable corporation of Alexandria instituted during the plague of Galliēnus. Their duty was to visit the sick and bury the dead, but they were so mercenary under St. Cyril the patriarch that the emperor restricted the number to five or six hundred; even then they were a canker in the empire.

Paracelsus. The knob of his staff was said to inclose the four elemental spirits—Kobold (earth), Salamander (fire), Undine (water), and Sylph (air). See p. 607, 'Names Classicised.'

Paraclete. The oratory erected at Troyes by Abelard after his condemnation by the Council of Sens. He made his paramour Héloïse (3 syl.) head of the oratory, and there, at death, his ashes were deposited.

In 1817 the remains of both Abelard and Héloïse were removed to Père-la-Chaise, in Paris, and interred in one sepulchre.

Paradise of Bohemia (The). The district round Leitmeritz.

Paradise of Central Africa (The), Fatiko. (Sir S. Baker, 'Exploration of the Nile Sources,' 1866.)

Paradise of Europe (The). The valley of the Arno in Tuscany.

Paradise of Holland (The), or 'The Dutch Paradise.' The province of Gelderland.

Paradise of Portugal (The), or 'The Portuguese Paradise.' Cintra, north-west of Lisbon.

Paradise of the Indies (The). Ceylon.

Paradise of the Jews. Poland was so called before its partitions.

Paraschistes. One of a low class employed in embalming, and, singularly enough, held in abhorrence by the Egyptians. They lived in the cemeteries or their neighbourhood. A scribe marked a line with a reed pen on the left side of the body of the corpse, beneath the ribs, down which line the paraschistes made a deep incision with a rude knife or Ethiopian stone, probably flint. He was then pelted by those around with stones, and pursued with curses. The taricheutes or preparer removed the entrails and lungs, with the exception of the heart and kidneys. The cholchytæ were the custodians of the mummies. As all classes were embalmed, including malefactors, the paraschistes, in spite of the disgust he inspired, was probably in as good case as the public executioners in Europe. Embalming cost from about 750*l.* to a mere trifle. See 'Chambers's Encyclopædia,' and Rawlinson's 'Herodotus.'

Paravail, or 'Tenants' Paravail.' The lowest tenant. The tenants of the king were the highest tenants. If these tenants let out their tenements they were overlords; and if these overlords let out their tenements their tenants were mesne lords; and the tenants of mesne lords were paravails (French per, avayler).

The tenants of kings were overlords to their own tenants; and these tenants were mesne lords to the tenants under them; and the tenants of mesne lords were 'tenants paravail.'

Parian Chronicle (The), B.C. 264. Certain pieces of marble containing inscriptions in Greek capitals. These inscriptions are chronological lists of Grecian events from Cecrops down to the archonship of Diognêtos (B.C. 1556–264), and supposed to have been executed about the year B.C. 264. They are the principal part of the Arundelian marbles (q.v.), and are preserved in Oxford University. Called Parian because they were made in the Isle of Paros about A.D. 250.

Paris (François de). A celebrated deacon born at Châtillon in France (1690–1727), and celebrated for the numberless 'miracles' said to have occurred at his tomb at St. Médard, Paris. This cemetery was so crowded day after day, and the scenes of the convulsionists there were so scandalous, that in 1732 the government closed the cemetery, and this epigram was by some wag attached to the gates:—

De par le roi défense à Dieu
De faire miracle en ce lieu.
It is forbidden to God's Grace
To work more wonders in this place.

Paris (Little). Brussels. So called from its brilliant shops, its numerous cafés, and its general gaiety.

Paris (Patron Saint of). Ste. Geneviève (423–512). Born at Nanterre.

Paris (Treaties of).

1. 12 April, 1229. Between Raymond VII. count of Toulouse, St. Louis, and the Pope, for the cession of Provence.
2. 10 May, 1505. Between France and England, for the restoration of Aquitaine to Edward I.
3. 24 May, 1515. Between Karl of Austria (sovereign of the Netherlands) and François I. of France.
4. 15 Aug., 1761. (Called the FAMILY COMPACT.) Between the different branches of the House of Bourbon.
5. 10 Feb., 1763. Peace between France, Spain, Portugal, and Great Britain. By this treaty Canada was ceded to England.
6. 6 Feb., 1778. Between France and the United States of North America, recognising their independence after the British overthrow at Saratoga.
7. 20 June, 1784. Between Great Britain and Holland.
8. 15 May, 1796. Between the French Republic and the King of Savoy, for the cession of Savoy and Nice to France.
9. 10 Oct., 1796. Between Ferdinand IV. king of Naples and France.
10. 8 Oct., 1801. Between France and Russia.
11. 29 July, 1806. Between France and Russia; signed but not ratified.
12. 10 Nov., 1807. Between France and Holland by which Flushing was ceded to France.
13. 6 Jan., 1810. Between France and Sweden.
14. 14 March, 1812. Alliance between France and Austria.
15. 11 April, 1814. Between Napoleon I. and the allies. Napoleon was deposed and banished to Elba.
16. 23 April, 1814. Convention between the Comte d'Artois and the allies for the cessation of hostilities and evacuation of French territory.
17. 30 May, 1814. Between France and the allies, whereby it was stipulated that France should return to its ancient boundaries with the exception of Avignon, the Comtat Venaissin, Mulhouse, and a small part of Savoy. Malta was confirmed to England, and the three French colonies (viz. the Mauritius, St. Lucia, and Tobago) were ceded to our dominion. The French troops were recalled from fifty-three garrisons, and all fortresses were restored to their respective claimants.

18. 20 July, 1814. Between France and Spain, confirming previous treaties.

19. 2 Aug., 1815. Convention between Great Britain, Russia, Austria, and Prussia, charging the British government with the safeguard of Napoleon.

20. 26 Sept., 1815. The Holy Alliance. Between Russia, Austria, and Prussia.

21. 20 Nov., 1815. Between Great Britain, Russia, Austria, and Prussia, defining the boundaries of France, &c.

22. 10 June, 1817. Between Great Britain, France, Spain, Russia, and Prussia, to fulfil the articles of the Congress of Vienna.

23. 28 Aug., 1817. Between France and Portugal, for the cession of Guiana to France.

24. 25 Aug., 1818. Convention between France and the allies.

25. 25 April, 1818. Convention between Great Britain and France respecting debts to British subjects.

26. 1 Feb., 1856. Peace, after the Crimean war, between Russia on one part, and Great Britain, France, Austria, and Turkey on the other. It stipulated for the independence of the Ottoman empire; the neutralisation of the Black Sea, that no arsenal was to be maintained on the Black Sea coast, and that neither Russia nor Turkey should maintain more than six steamships of 800 tons.

27. 8 March, 1857. Peace between Great Britain and Persia.

28. 26 May, 1857. Between the Great Powers of Europe, respecting Neuchâtel.

29. 19 Aug., 1858. Convention between the Great Powers of Europe, to constitute the Danubian principalities.

30. 25 March to 16 April, 1865. Congress to arrange terms of peace between Russia and the allies.

31. Jan., 1868. Conferences between the Great Powers respecting the Turkish difficulty.

Paris Club (The). Called the société mère or mother society of the Jacobin clubs. The Jacobin clubs contained 400,000 members, and their platform was 'anarchy and revolution.' As Michelet ('Hist. Fr. Rev.' pp. 476, 485) says, the Jacobin clubs 'soon became a vast committee of revolutionary police.'

Paris Garden. A bear-garden on the bank of the Thames. Blount in his 'Glossographia' says that Richard de Paris had a house and garden there in the time of Richard II., and he quotes as his authority the Close Roll 16 Rich. II.; but the words of the Roll are 'domum Roberti de Parys.'

It was originally a copyhold manor which fell to Robert Marmion, after the Conquest, and was given by his son to the monks of Bermondsey Priory.

Paris of Japan (The). Osāka.

Parishes. In England and Wales 14,610, of which 550 are in two counties. Benefices 11,728; of these 9,669 are in the province of Canterbury, and 2,059 in the province of York.

In Ireland 2,500.

In Scotland a parish is merely an ecclesiastical division.

By the Poor-law Amendment Act, 18,964 of the parishes were amalgamated into 585 unions, but besides these there are 21 unions by Local Acts, 12 by Gilbert's Act (q.v.), and the 89 parishes of the Scilly Isles united.

Parisian Wedding (The). The massacre in Paris begun on St. Bartholomew's Eve during the wedding festivities of Henri of Navarre and Marguerite of France.

Charles IX., although it was not possible for him to recall to life the countless victims of the 'Parisian Wedding,' was ready to explain those murders to the unprejudiced mind.—MOTLEY, Dutch Republic, iii. 9.

Parker (Admiral). Richard Parker, an able seaman, was called by his comrades 'Admiral' because he was the ringleader of the mutiny of the fleet in the Nore. He was hanged at the yard-arm of a man-of-war off Sheerness in June 1797.

Parker Society (The), Cambridge. Established in 1840 for reprinting the works of the early English Reformers. Dissolved 1853 or 1854. Fifty-three works were published under its auspices, equal to four every year.

Parker's Bible (The), 1572. The second folio edition of the 'Great Bible' (q.v.), with corrections and several prolegomena, under the supervision of Archbishop Parker. See 'Bibles.'

Parks, Commons, and Open Spaces Committee (The Metropolitan) has under its charge about 3,000 acres or 4 square miles of the metropolitan area. Some 300 bailiffs, gardeners, and labourers are constantly employed.

Parlamento is a meeting of the Florentine people on the piazza of the Signory.

Parlement de St. Louis (Le), 13th cent. A law court where causes were tried by evidence. It had no fixed locality, but followed the king wherever he went. The staff consisted of 3 high barons, 3 prelates, 19 knights, and 18 councillors. Its chief business was to register the royal decrees; it had no legislative power of its own.

These parlements had no point of resemblance to our parliament, but though they did not make laws, they had to register the royal edicts and ordinances before they became law. The Paris parlement was formally abolished in 1790. See 'Olim.'

Parlement of France. Originally an ambulatory court of justice which followed the king and administered justice in his name. Philippe le Bel in 1302 was the first to fix a 'parlement' in Paris. It held sessions, at first, only twice a year; but in 1380 it was made permanent. There were 13 other parlements in France. That of Toulouse was established in 1302; of Grenoble in 1451; of Bordeaux in 1462; of Dijon in 1477; of Rouen in 1499; of Aix in 1501; of Rennes in 1553; of Pau in 1620; of Metz in 1633; of Besançon in 1676; of Trevoux in 1696; of Douay in 1713; and of Nancy in 1775.

Parlement of Paris (The), 28 Jan., 1226. Was called to excommunicate Raymond VII. count of Toulouse. Another was called on 29 March, 1226, to arrange a crusade against the Albigenses.

Parliament. Edward the Confessor called his witenagemots parlements.

1164. Henry II. called together at Clarendon, in Wiltshire, the prelates and nobles to pass the famous 16 ordinances to limit the power of the church.

1265. Simon de Montfort, summoned, in the king's [Hen. III.'s] name, two knights for each county, two citizens for each city, and two burgesses for each borough, to a national council.

1274. The national council was first called a parliament (Edw. I.).

1330. (4 Edw. III. c. 14) Parliaments were ordered to be held annually.

1377. (Rich. II.) The first Speaker elected. It was Peter Delamere.

1694. The Triennial Act was passed (6, 7 Will. & Mary). Similar acts had been passed by Charles I. & II.

1716. The Septennial Act was passed (1 Geo. I. c. 38).

Bills in the form of acts were first introduced in the reign of Henry VI. In the reign of Edward V. there was no parliament.

Parliament (Irish). The first regular parliament of Ireland was held 1295, and the great officials of the Pale (q.v.) were summoned to England to consult on the crisis. In 1459 the Irish parliament insisted on complete legislative independence and sovereignty. In 1780 Henry Grattan moved that 'the king, lords, and commons of Ireland are alone competent to enact laws to bind Ireland.' In 1782 Poyning's Act (q.v.) was repealed in the Irish parliament and Ireland was declared free. In 1800 the Irish parliaments were united with those of Great Britain. See 'Parliaments.'

Mr. Gladstone and his party have pleaded for an 'Irish parliament for purely Irish affairs,' but Grattan honestly confessed that the Irish alone should make laws for Ireland, and that the Irish ought not to be subject to the laws of England. This is the true Irish doctrine for better or for worse.

Parliaments (The Four Longest) 1575–1586 (Q. Eliz.); by 18 prorogations it lasted 11 years.

The 'Long parliament,' including the 'Rump,' 19 years 132 days, from 3 Nov., 1640 to 16 March, 1660. The Rump began 1653, so that the original long parliament was 12 years 168 days, from 3 Nov., 1640 to 20 April, 1653 (Charles I. and Cromwell).

The 'Pensionary parliament,' 16 years 260 days, from 8 May, 1661 to 24 Jan., 1678 (Charles II.).

The fourth Long parliament lasted 13 years 252 days, from 14 Nov., 1816 to 24 July, 1830 (George IV.).

The Pension or Pensionary parliament was followed by the Ten-week parliament, from 6 March to 24 May, 1679.

The longest parliament up to the reign of Edward IV. was convened in 1472 and lasted 2 years.

* The fifth and last convened by Charles II.
† The last convened by Cromwell.
‡ Called the 'Short Parliament.' It was the last dissolved by Charles I. and was followed by the 'Long Parliament.'

 The following may be added:—

1806. 4 months 5 days. From 25 Dec., 1806 to 29 April, 1807 (Geo. III.).
1830. 5 months 27 days. From 26 Oct. 1830 to 20 April, 1831 (Will. IV.).
1886. 5 months 14 days. From 12 Jan., 1886 to 26 June, 1886 (Victoria). This was the Gladstone ministry, broken up by his Home Rule Bill (Ireland).

Parliament of Bats (The), 1426. During the regency in the reign of Henry VI. In consequence of the litigious character of the Duke of Gloucester the citizens were forbidden to carry arms; so when parliament assembled the members of the House of Commons came armed with bats or clubs. See 'Parliaments.'

Parliament of Dunces (The), 1404. Convened by Henry IV. at Coventry. So called because all lawyers were excluded from it. See 'Parliaments.'

Parliament of 1654. One of the most memorable parliaments in English history. It was the first in which Scotch and Irish members took part. There were no members for rotten and pocket boroughs. It was the freest of all elections hitherto known. The 'Instrument' (q.v.) or New Constitution was carried through, and Cromwell was acknowledged Lord Protector. It was dissolved by Cromwell in Jan. 1655. See 'Parliaments.'

Parliament Oak. Within the ancient park of Clipstone Palace. As Edward I. with his retinue, in 1294, was chasing the deer in Sherwood Forest, a messenger arrived in breathless haste to announce that the Welsh were in revolt. The king instantly summoned his knights around him under this oak, and the unanimous voice was for war. The oak is still standing (1890).

Parliamentary Candidate Society (The), 1831. To supply information to electors of the political opinions of candidates, by extracts from their speeches, their votes, and their public conduct. If new candidates, their characters and connections were given.

Parliamentary Reform. The Bill passed 7 June, 1832, for the adjustment of the inequalities of the representative system and an extended franchise. Fifty-six boroughs in England and Wales were entirely disfranchised; 30 which had previously returned two members were restricted to 1; 42 new boroughs were created, of which 22 boroughs returned 2 each, and 20 boroughs returned 1 each. Four members were assigned to the city of London, 2 to each of the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, and 1 to each of 133 cities or boroughs. Lancashire was allotted 5 members; the West Riding of Yorkshire 4 members; 25 counties 4 members each; 7 counties 3 members each; 9 counties and the East and North Ridings of Yorkshire 2 members each; and 10 counties 1 member each. Total 658 for the United Parliament.

The numbers for Scotland were increased from 45 to 53, and for Ireland from 100 to 105. The qualifications of electors were made to be 40*s.* freeholders, 10*l.* general leases, and 50*l.* annual rent. The old freemen were wholly set aside.

Parliamentary Reform Agitation.

1776. (20 March.) The motion of John Wilkes for parliamentary reform negatived without division.
1782. (7 May.) 7 May, 1783, and 18 April, 1785, motions by W. Pitt negatived.
1784. Horne Tooke and Mr. Hardy tried for high treason and acquitted.
1810. (21 May.) Brand's motion for parliamentary reform negatived. The same year Cobbett was fined 1,000*l.* and sent to Newgate.
1817. As many as 600 petitions were presented to the house in favour of reform. 20 May Sir Francis Burdett's motion in favour of reform was negatived.
1818. (3 June.) Sir Francis Burdett was sent to the Tower for exciting to agitation.
1819. Hunt, a Wiltshire farmer, was sentenced to imprisonment for haranguing multitudes at Birmingham.
1829. (29 April.) Lord John Russell's motion for parliamentary reform was negatived.
1826. Major Cartwright was fined for inciting to agitation.
1829. (3 June.) The Marquis of Blandford's motion for reform was negatived.

Parliamentary Session of 41 Hours. The longest session was in 1881, when on one occasion the house sat continuously for 41 hours. The session began on Monday afternoon, 31 Jan., at four o'clock, and went on without a break till Wednesday morning, 2 Feb., after the clock had struck nine. Mr. Gladstone was prime minister.

The subject was leave to bring in a bill for the 'Protection to Person and Property' in Ireland, against the Land League (q.v.), and Mr. Forster, the secretary for Ireland, moved for the petition. It was the Irish members who tried to weary out the house by obstructing business. The obstruction was closed by the Speaker forbidding any more speaking on the subject, and the Bill was carried by 164 against 19.

Parliamentary Trains. Trains established by Act of Parliament for the benefit of third-class passengers, at the rate of one penny a mile. In France the traine parlementaire means a train reserved for the use of members of both the houses of legislature (1840).

Parliamentary Undertakers. The little group of nobles who, till William Pitt's administration, returned fully half the members of the House of Commons. More than sixty seats were in the hands of Lord Downshire, the Ponsonbys, and the Beresfords alone. 'They undertook to manage parliament in their own way and on their own terms.'

Parnassus of Germany. Blocksberg.

> On Blocksberg we'll find room enough;
> The wide Parnassus 'tis of Germany.
> GOETHE, Faust (Dr. Anster).

Parnassus of Japan. Fusiyama. (Gibson, 'Gallery of Geography,' p. 921; 1872.)

Parnell Commission (The). Sat for 200 days in 1889, and its report was issued 13 Feb., 1890, consisting of 121 closely printed pages of the Blue Book. The Commissioners were Sir James Hannen and Justices Day and Smith, and the object of inquiry was whether and how far Charles Stewart Parnell and his Irish party were connected with the crimes of the Irish Land League, which Mr. Gladstone asserted 'dogged it throughout.' The report was divided into nine charges, and the general tenour was that Mr. Parnell and his 'lieutenants' were at least morally responsible for much of the mischief, inasmuch as they did nothing to repress it, much to foment it, but adroitly avoided mixing up themselves with the misdemeanants.

Lord Selborne says the Irish members as individuals and politicians are cleared of charges against them, but as a political body they are proved beyond a doubt of being agents of disturbance and centres of disaffection.

The 'Standard' acknowledges that the defendants are exonerated from direct complicity with crime, but 'the report shows Mr. Parnell to have been the leader of men devoted to the treasonable design of separating Ireland from England; to have been implicated in the whole system of crime, outrage, and lawlessness which has so long prevailed in Ireland; and to have been closely connected with foreign mercenaries who made no secret of their being the enemies of the Queen [Victoria].'—14 Feb., 1890.

Parnellism and Crime, 1888. A pamphlet published by the editor of the 'Times' newpaper to show that the Home Rule and Land League Irish party, of which Charles S. Parnell was the head, was, as Mr. Gladstone stated, 'dogged by crime in all its steps.' It appeared anonymously, but was written by Woulfe Flanagan, son of the Right Hon. Judge Flanagan, who had been judge of the Irish Land Estates Court. This pamphlet was made the basis of a trial before three commissioners in 1889.

Mr. Gladstone, 11 July, 1882, says of the Parnellite policy, 'It means the destruction of the peace of life; it means the placing in abeyance of the most sacred duties, of the most cherished duties; it means the servitude of good men, and the supremacy of bad men'; and on 28 Jan., 1882, he said, 'With fatal and painful precision the steps of crime have dogged the steps of the Land League.'

Sir William Harcourt said of the Land League, 'The doctrine so expounded is the doctrine of treason and assassination. To-morrow the civilised world will pronounce its judgment on this vile conspiracy.'

Those who read the Report of the Commissioners will see clearly that the extreme party—the party ruled by the Clan-na-Gael—has been the real motive power, in the hands of which the Irish Land League and Mr. Parnell and his friends have been nothing but tools and puppets. Wherever the Land League has been most active in its operations, whenever what is called coercion has fallen into abeyance, the increase of crime in Ireland has been something fearful. This has been proved to demonstration by the report of the Commissioners. While, therefore, it must be deplored that, in the matter of the forged letters, the authorities of the 'Times' did not exercise more care and greater vigilance, and therefore are open to grave censure; yet, in unearthing this great conspiracy which has prevailed so long in Ireland, they deserve the sincere thanks of all good and all honest men in the United Kingdom.—Newspaper leader, 14 Feb., 1890.

Parnellites. The followers of Charles Stewart Parnell, M.P., who in the election of 1885 contrived to bring to the English House of Commons eighty-five Irish members, who agreed to vote solidly with Mr. Parnell, member for Cork. This large contingent, thrown into either the Tory or Liberal side, was sufficient to secure a majority, consequently the Irish party ruled the British parliament. The object of Mr. Parnell was to secure to Ireland 'Home Rule,' or the right of controlling the legislature of Ireland. The weak point was this: they wanted to establish a Dublin parliament, and yet to sit in the British house at Westminster.

Parochial Charities (The City), i.e. of London. In 1887 an act, passed in 1883, came into operation, which invested the money of these charities in the Ecclesiastical Commissioners in behoof of the more populous districts of 'Greater London' for the following purposes:—

The education of the poorer inhabitants of the metropolis.
The establishment of libraries, museums, and art collections.
The preservation, &c., of open spaces for recreation, &c.
Provident institutions and convalescent hospitals.

* * A permanent Board of 21 Trustees was added to the Charity Commissioners. The charities were, in 1887, worth 118,000*l.* a year, of which sum 85,459*l.* was applicable to ecclesiastical purposes.

Parsee. A disciple of Zoroaster. A fire-worshipper is so called in the West Indies; in Persia the Mohammedans call fire-worshippers guebres (Persian ghebr, infidel). In Bombay they are wealthy and influential. In 1852 an association was formed for the restoration of the creed of Zoroaster, which had been much corrupted. The Zend Avesta is the book containing the sacred writing of Zoroaster. The original, 'received from heaven,' is lost; but copies exist.

Parson Garlic. Joseph Tucker, D.D., dean of Gloucester (1711–1799), so called in the effigy burnt near his own door by a mob enraged against him for his essay in support of the Hessians who had come to settle in England.

Par'tholan Race (The). A fabulous race of people said by the bards to have taken possession of Ireland at the beginning of the 4th century after the flood. Partholan was of the race of Japhet. He landed on Wednesday, 14 May, at Imbersceine, in Kerry, and fixed his residence in the province of Ulster, on the island of Inis-Samer, in the river Erne. After holding possession of the island for 300 years his race was extirpated by a plague.

Partholanians (The). The second colony of Ireland, who came to the island some 2,200 years before Christ, and found it inhabited by the Fomorians. The chroniclers inform us that the Fomorians were a Basque or Iberian colony, and the Partholanians an Aryan colony, so named from Partholan, who came to Ireland with his four sons and a number of followers. The tradition is of small historic value, but the Irish boast of their Iberian descent, and scorn the notion of being Scotic.

No doubt the dark complexion, the short stature, and gracefulness of manners give colour to their Iberian descent.

Particular Baptists. Those Baptist Dissenters who hold the Calvinistic views of election, predestination, and reprobation, in contradistinction to the General Baptists, who maintain the doctrine of universal redemption. See 'Free Communionists,' 'Close Communionists.'

Partidas (Las). A code of laws established by Alfonso X. 'The Wise,' of Leon (1203, 1252–1285).

Partis en France, between 1793–1795.

Alarmistes.
Apitoyeurs, those who sympathised with the royal family.
Brissotins (q.v.).
Buveurs de Sang, those who revelled in blood and slaughter.
Chevaliers du Poignard (q.v.).
Chouans (q.v.).
Compagnons de Jéhu (q.v.).
Contre-Révolutionnaires, the anti-revolutionary party.
Crapauds du Marais. See 'Marais.'
Egorgeurs, those who were for death and slaughter without end.
Emissaires de Cobourg, the 'Suspects' supposed to be influenced by emissaries of Friedrich prince of Saxe-Coburg.
—— de Pitt, those who attributed the anti-revolutionary movement to bribes given by William Pitt. This silly notion was very general.
Endormeurs, poisoners. In ancient jurisprudence an Endormeur was one 'qui pour dépouiller ses victimes, mêle dans leurs aliments une drogue somnifère.'
Fédéralistes. See 'Federalism.'
Girondins (q.v.).
Habitants de la Crête.
Hébertistes, partisans of Hébert surnamed 'Le Père Duchêne' (q.v.).
Hommes d'Etat.
—— de la Plaine, the Yea-nay party or Trimmers.
—— du 10 Août. See 'August 10.'
—— du 31 Mai, those who took an active part in the Reign of Terror.
Jeunesse dorée de Fréron (q.v.).
Maratistes, partisans of Marat.
Ministériels.
Modérés.
Montagnards (q.v.).
Muscadins (q.v.).
Partisans de la vie civile.
Patriotes de 1789, those who had taken part in the storming of the Bastille.
Sans-culottes (q.v.).
Septembriseurs (q.v.).
Suspects (q.v.).

Terroristes (q.v.).
Thermidoriens (q.v.).
 Veut-on savoir, pendant ces deux ans, c'est-à-dire de '93 à '95, combien il y a eu de partis en France? Il y en a eu trente-trois.—DUMAS, Les Blancs et les Bleus.

Partition (Treaty of). I. Signed at the Hague by France, England, and Holland, 11 Oct., 1698. It stipulated three things: (a) That at the death of Carlos II. the kingdom of Spain should not be absorbed by Germany, but should be given to the electoral prince of Bavaria, son of the elector; (b) that Naples, Sicily, Sardinia, the province of Guipuzcoa, Fontarabia, St. Sebastian, Ferrol, and certain towns on the Tuscan coast owned by Spain, should be settled on the Dauphin; (c) that Milan should be settled on Karl the second son of the kaiser. Frustrated by the death of the electoral prince of Bavaria in 1699, aged eight years.

II. The same contracting parties agreed to confer the crown of Spain, when vacant, on the Archduke Karl, son of the kaiser; the Italian States were to be the dauphin's portion. Signed 13 March, 1700. Set aside by the will of Carlos II. of Spain in 1701, in which the whole Spanish monarchy was bequeathed to the duke of Anjou, second son of the dauphin.

Partition of Poland (The). First Partition, 1772, planned by Frederick II., was between Russia, Austria, and Prussia. Russia took 42,000 square miles, Austria took 27,000, and Prussia 13,000.

The Second Partition, 1790, was between Russia and Prussia; Russia took 96,000 square miles and gave Prussia 22,000 as a sop, but left Austria in the cold.

The Third Partition, 1795. Austria thought the Second Partition unfair, and a third spoliation was agreed upon, in which Russia took 43,000 square miles, Prussia 21,000, and Austria 18,000.

In 1847 Austria occupied Cracow, and thus seized the last remainder of independent Poland.

Altogether, Russia took 181,000 square miles, Prussia 56,000, and Austria 45,000. The nominal cause of this spoliation was a religious difference, the reigning powers being Protestants and the 'patriots' being Catholics.

Party Volant (The). Those who, in the reign of Charles I., fluctuated in political principles from parliament to king. Nominally parliamentarians, they hankered after the court. The heads of the Party Volant were the Earl of Northumberland, the Earl of Holland, the Earl of Clare, the Earl of Portland, Waller the poet, and the widowed Countess of Carlisle (daughter of Northumberland).

Parvula Evangel'ia. Extracts from the Gospels worn as an amulet.

Quo loco [Jerome] comparat pharisæos certis superstitiosis mulierculis, quæ insani fide inductæ, circumferebant tum temporis Parvula Evangelia, hoc est, excerptas ex evangelio sententias. . . . Eadem superstitio apud multos ultimis sæculis invaluit, qui collo appendebant initium Evangelii Johannis.—SCALIGER.

Pascal of Germany (The). Novālis, i.e. Friedrich von Hardenberg of Saxony, a lyric poet, and chief of the Romantic school (q.v.). He is so called by Carlyle, but 'the Keats of Germany' would have been more appropriate (1772–1801).

Paschal Canon (The). A table of the movable feasts, showing the day of Easter, and all other feasts depending on Easter, for a cycle of nineteen years.

Paschal Controversy (The), or 'Easter Controversy' (162–673). A controversy about the time of keeping Easter—whether the right time is the fourteenth day of the moon, or the Sunday following the fourteenth day. The former is the practice of the Eastern Church, the latter of the Western Church. Victor bishop of Rome excommunicated the churches of Asia in 190 for keeping Easter as they did. The two churches, however, continued to disagree upon the question.

The Council of Nice (325) determined that Easter day should be the Sunday following the Jewish feast of the Passover, which was kept the fourteenth day (or full moon) of the month Nisan; that is the full moon on or next after 21 March. In 532 Dionysius Exiguus proposed a new method of reckoning the feast. The British Church did not conform till 673, at the Council of Hertford. Iona later still.

Paschal Mass. 'Missa Paschalis.' The Mass 'quæ in singulis septimanæ Paschalis feriis agitur.' See 'Mass.'

Pas'chites (2 syl.), 2nd cent. Those Christians who celebrate Easter on Jewish paschal day, which was the 14th of the moon. In 196 Pope Victor excommunicated those who kept Easter on any day but Sunday. The controversy was not finally settled till the Council of Nice, A.D. 325.

Pasha is a ruler of a province in the Turkish empire. A three-tailed pasha is of the highest rank; his standard is decorated with three tails, which are its pennons.

Pass of Brander (The). The famous dark gorge which narrows into the Pass of Awe, the scene of the desperate engagements between Wallace and the caterans of Macfarlane, and Bruce and the Macdougalls of Lorn.

Pass of Plumes (The), 1599. A pass in Leinster, where the Earl of Essex was attacked by the O'Moores; so called from the number of plumes of which the soldiers of Essex were despoiled.

Pass under the Yoke (To). The yoke under which the Romans made a vanquished army pass, in sign of subjugation, consisted of two upright spears stuck in the ground, with a third spear fastened transversely atop, thus Π (Livy, iii. 28; Florus, i. 11, 13.)

The custom was adopted by other nations with whom the Romans made war. Thus Pontius the Samnite, the Numantians, and Jugurtha the African, made the Roman army pass under a yoke. Of course the men laid down their arms before they passed sub juga.

Passagins. So the Waldenses (q.v.) were sometimes nicknamed, meaning men of passage, or missionary vagrants.

Passar'owitz, in Servia (Peace of), 21 July, 1718. Between the kaiser, the Porte, and Venice. By this treaty the Morëa was confirmed to Turkey.

Passau, in Bavaria (Treaty of), 22 May to 7 Aug., 1552. Moritz, the new elector of Saxony, rebelled against Charles V., drove him from place to place, till at length he signed the treaty of Passau, granting full liberty to all Protestants to worship in any way they chose, free of all interference and restraint. This is called 'The Religious Peace.'

Passau, pronounce Pas-sow (ow as in now).

Passion Sunday. The 5th Sunday of Lent, 'Dominica in Passione Domini.' This Sunday began 'Passion Week' (q.v.). See 'Sunday.'

Passion Week, or the Great Week, was originally a parson's week—that is, as many days as can be massed together with only one Sunday; of course, this may be thirteen days. It began the Monday following the 5th of Lent, and ended on Holy Saturday (the day preceding Easter Sunday). The last seven days of this period constitute Holy Week. The first day of Holy Week is Palm Sunday, the fourth day is Spy Wednesday, the fifth Maundy Thursday, the sixth Good Friday, and the last Holy Saturday or the Great Sabbath. When the Great Week is reduced to seven days, as it usually is by Protestants, then Passion Week and Holy Week are commensurate terms; but those who seek to restore the ancient ritual call Passion Week the period between the 5th of Lent and Palm Sunday (not included), and Holy Week from Palm Sunday to Holy Saturday. Strictly speaking, Passion Week covers thirteen days, the last seven of which constitute Holy Week.

Passionists, 1741. A religious order founded by Paul de la Croix. They dress in black and go about bareheaded and barefooted, but wear sandals.

Passive Obedience, or 'Non-resistance,' is the political doctrine that subjects are bound to obey those in authority, whether right or wrong, good or bad. Applied to kings it includes also the dogma that the king, being the Lord's anointed, must not only be obeyed, but that he cannot be deposed. The doctrine is based on Romans xiii. 1, 2: 'Let every soul be subject unto the higher powers. For there is no power but of God; the powers that be are ordained of God. Whosoever therefore resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God. And they that resist shall receive to themselves damnation.'

It is hard to see how those who allow the authority of these words can resist the dogma of 'passive obedience.' Of course those who set aside the authority of St. Paul assert that 'the powers,' being civil rulers, are the servants of the state, and like other servants can be dismissed if they neglect their duty or are incompetent to perform it. This, however, is setting aside the dictum of St. Paul for the doctrine of expediency.

Pasteurienne Inoculation, 1885. Inoculation first suggested by M. Pasteur of Paris, to cure persons bitten by mad dogs or wolves, or to prevent their becoming rabid. In 1887, out of 3,020 patients treated by M. Pasteur, only 34 died, and out of 3,852 treated by M. Pasteur and nine others, 54 died; a little over 4 per cent.

Pas'teurise (3 syl.). A verb derived from the name of M. Pasteur, the Parisian chemist, who introduced the process of and art of sealing up wines and beers in air-tight casks, to prevent the entrance of ferment or germs to deteriorate the liquors. See 'Listerise.'

Somewhere between 1880 and 1884.

Paston Letters (The). A series of letters and other documents collected by members of the Paston family, to whom most of them are addressed (1564–1700). The Pastons lived in Norfolk during the time of the Wars of the Roses, and these letters throw much light on the customs and incidents of the period. Four vols. were published between 1787 and 1789 by Mr. [Sir John] Fenn of Norfolk, but the originals have not been discovered. A fifth vol. was published in 1823 by Mr. Serjeant Frere, the originals of which were presented to the Antiquarian Society, and 95 were discovered in Roydon Hall in 1875.

These letters reveal to us various modes by which the strong man was enabled to turn the scale against the weak one at law; but the most extraordinary relation concerning the family itself is one which occupies more than a volume, and details the actual war made upon them by the Duke of Norfolk. The celebrated general Sir John Fastolf left Sir John Paston the estate of Caistor in 1459; but the duke declared that Sir John had given it to him . . . and he laid siege to it . . . and took it.—HOWITT, Hist. of England (vol ii. p. 44).

Pastoral Poets of Greece (The). Theocritos of Syracuse, the father of pastoral poetry. Thirty of his idyls and several of his epigrams are still extant (B.C. 300–230). Bion of Smyrna (B.C. 295–238), author of a poem on the 'Death of Adonis,' and Moschos of Syracuse (B.C. 289–200), the friend of Bion.

Pastoral Romance (Father of). Honoré d'Urfé (1567–1625), author of 'Astrea.'

Pastoreaux (Les), 1250. Politico-religious insurgents in Flanders during the captivity of St. Louis in Egypt. From Flanders the insurrection spread through France, and soon swelled to a mass of 100,000 men, divided into companies, with banners bearing a cross and a lamb. Their leader was a Cistercian monk named Job or Jacob, from Hungary, who gave out that he was commissioned by the Virgin Mary to preach a crusade to the poor against their oppressors. This Job was received at Amiens, Bourges, Orléans, and Paris as a prophet. His wrath was mainly directed against the idleness and corruption of the clergy, some monasteries were plundered by him and their inmates put to the sword. In 1251 government interfered, and the rabble was dispersed or cut to pieces at Berry and Beaucaire. See 'French Brigands.'

Seventy years afterwards another insurrection broke out, and these insurgents called themselves by the same name. The object of this second 'crusade' was the general massacre of the Jews. They were called Shepherds because they assumed to be the Shepherds of the Lord who protected the 'lambs' from the 'wolves.'

Du Cange says:—'Pastoureaux, quod pastorem infimæque plebis hominem significat, cujusmodi erant plerique ex Pastorellis, ut testatur continuator Nangii vernaculus sub 1251.'

Pastoreaux, pronounce Pastor-o.

Patans (The). So the Afghans were called in the middle ages. A dynasty of Patans reigned in India from 1205 to 1398, and succeeded the Gaurides (2 syl.). Delhi was their capital. Tamerlane overthrew the Patans, and established the dynasty of the Timorides (3 syl.).

Pat'erins, or Patarins (The). A branch of Paulicians who said that creation was the work of the Spirit of Evil. They were pretty abundant in Illyria and Bosnia in the 12th cent. Called Paterins because they taught that prayer should be addressed to the Father only. The Waldenses were sometimes called Paterins or Paterini, as well as Cathari and Gazari (in Italy). In France they were called Albigenses and Vaudois. Condemned by the Council of Lateran in 1179.

Du Cange says: 'A loco urbis Mediolani, qui Patarea vel Pataria vocabatur.'

Apollo was called 'Paterinus,' from Patara now Patera, a town of Lycia, which had an oracle of Apollo.

Pâtre de Montalte (Le). The swineherd of Montalte, Sixtus V., the 'second founder of Rome.' Born at Montalte (1521, 1585–1590).

Patres Conscripti [Fathers and Conscripts]. The Patres of Rome were the patrician senators; but when some of these were slain at the expulsion of Tarquin, Junius Brutus selected others to fill the vacant seats; and as these names were enrolled in the senate with the patres or previous senators, they were called the Conscripts, and the house was addressed as 'Patres [et] Conscripti.'

Pat'res Pat'riæ, 1774. The delegates to the first American Congress which met at Philadelphia on 14 Sept. representing twelve different states: The four New England states, with those of Virginia, Pennsylvania, Maryland, New York, New Jersey, Delaware, and the two Carolinas. They assembled for business in Carpenters' Hall. The congress sat till 26 Oct., and then adjourned till 10 May, 1775.

Patrician of Rome. A title conferred by Pope Adrian I. on Pepin le Bref, which made him the representative of the imperial power in the West. Charlemagne continued the title.

Patrimony of St. Peter (The), 'Estates of the Church,' 1077. The dotation of the Countess Matilda of Tuscany to the Holy See of Moděna, Parma, and Mantua. It was united to the new kingdom of Italy in 1870.

Between Orvieto in the north, Umbria in the east, the champaign of Rome and the Tyrrhenian Sea.

This dotation was only a part of the Papal States. The Exarchate of Ravenna was given to the Holy Church by Pepin king of the Franks; Benevento was given to it by Heinrich III.; Forlì and the Romagna were added in 1297; Bologna in 1364; Ferrara in 1598; Urbino in 1626; Orvieto [Or-vee-a'-to] in 1649.

Patriot King (The). George III. was so styled by Bolingbroke.

Patriot Party (The), 1692. The 'Ins' or 'Let-alones,' formerly called the Court party. They were in opposition to the Country party or 'Outs,' called the 'Grumbletonians,' in Walpole's ministry. See next article.

Patriots (The), 1724. A political party organised by Bolingbroke and Pulteney against Sir Robert Walpole, chief minister of state in the reigns of George I. and George II. Their organ was 'The Craftsman,' a journal which they started to air their opinions in.

George II. hated 'the rogue' (Walpole), but being henpecked he was a nonentity; and Walpole, who had gained the queen, remained in office for ten years after the accession of George II.

Patriots of '89 (The). Those Frenchmen who assisted in storming the Bastille.

Patriotic Brotherhood (The), 1881. A 'gang of murderous conspirators' in Ireland, some of whom were brought to trial at the Antrim assizes in March. P. J. Sheridan was the chief organiser in Mayo, and took a leading part in forming the association.

Patripassionists, or 'Patripassians.' Certain Monoph'ysites (4 syl.) who admit the divinity of Christ, but maintain that He was the indivisible God the Father, and that it was this God, the one and only God, who was crucified on Calvary. St. Augustine refers to them. They were also called Deipassionists.

Patrius Sermo. The language of the fathers and of fatherland.

Paul (The German). Martin Luther (1483–1546).

Paul (The Second St.). St. Remi or Remigius, 'the Great Apostle of the French' (439–535).

Paul Lorrain's Saints. Convicts said to have died penitent. Paul Lorrain was ordinary of Newgate, and died in 1719. He always represented his convicts as dying penitent. 'The Tatler,' No. 63. See also Note to 'Spectator,' No. 338 (Morley's edit.).

Paul Veronese of France (The), Delacroix (1799–1863). Sometimes called the Rubens of France from his rich colouring.

Paul's School (St.), 1509. Founded by Dean Colet for the gratuitous instruction of 153 boys in humane letters. This number was selected in accordance with that of the miraculous draught of fishes mentioned in the Gospel of St. John. This was the first public school in England in which Greek was taught. William Lilly was master of St. Paul's.

Paul's Walkers. Loungers in St. Paul's Cathedral in the Commonwealth and afterwards.

> The young gallants . . . . used to meet at the central point, St. Paul's; and from this circumstance obtained the appellation of 'Paul's Walkers,' as we now say 'Bond Street Loungers.' —European Magazine (July 1807).

Paulette, 1604. A tax imposed by Henri IV. of France to supply him with ready money. It granted to members of parlement the right of transmitting their office to their heirs on payment of an annual fee 'au 60me de la valeur présumée de la charge.' It received its name from Henri's secretary the Chevalier Paulet, who suggested the impost.

Paulianists (The). 260 disciples of Paul bishop of Samisat, and afterwards patriarch of Antioch. He denied the doctrine of the Trinity and the divinity of Jesus Christ. Condemned by the Council of Antioch in 270.

Paulicians. The 'Waldenses' of the Greek Church (660–845), so called because they formed their religious views from the Pauline epistles. They rejected the worship of the Virgin, disbelieved the intercession of saints, the sanctity of relics, and the material presence in the Eucharist.

> One Constantine of Mananalis, near Samosáta, had a Greek New Testament given him by one who had been a captive among the Mahometans. He studied it, and formed his own religious views therefrom. The sect was almost stamped out by the persecutions of Theodora, who massacred 100,000 of them, if Porphyry is to be believed.

Paulicians (The). 'Heretics' of the 10th and 11th cents. A branch of the Manichéans, who believed in two principles, a good one and an evil one. So called from Paul of Armenia (born 844).

> Petrus Siculus says the Paulicians believed in an evil and a good God; the former they say was the Creator of the world, the latter is the author of that which is to come. Warne Encyclopædia.

Pauli'na Potio (Paulinus's draught). A deadly poison concocted by Paulinus, a Dominican monk, by which Kaiser Heinrich VII. was poisoned.

> In grandi stat tristitia > Exercitus militia,
> De principis ruina,
> Quam feritas damnabilis
> Manusque detestabilis
> Coagulat Paulina.
> Rythmi in obitum Henrici VII.

Paulinists, or 'Universalists.' Those who believe that the gospel system is meant for all, both Jew and Gentile. Those who insisted that it was meant for the Jews and Jewish proselytes only are called by Dr. Baur 'Judaites' or 'Apostolites.' By the latter word he means that the apostles were Judaites. The theory of the universality of the Gospel system is called 'Pau-linism' by the Tübingen school of theologians. 'I am of Paul [a universalist], and I of Apollos [a Judaist],' a distinction which lasted till the close of the 2nd cent.

When Christ told his Apostles to go into all the world and preach the gospel to every creature, the Tübingenists tell us he meant the Jews and the Jewish proselytes scattered abroad.

Pau'peres Com'milito'nes. Pauper soldiers of the Holy City, i.e. the 'Knights Templars' (q.v.), or Red Cross Knights.

Pauvres de la Mère de Dieu (Les). See 'Piaristes.'

Pawnees. A nation of North American warriors (Nebraska; now removed to the Indian territory). Their divinity is the planet Venus, which they call the Great Star; but they are rapidly dying out.

Pays de Franc-salé (Les). Provinces exempt from the salt tax in France. See 'Gabelle.' Some were redeemed provinces, having given Henri II. a large sum of money for the redemption; others were maritime, in which it was not possible to prevent the smuggling of salt. The redeemed provinces were Angoumois, parts of Poitou, Aunis, and Saintonge, Limousin, parts of Auvergne, Quercy, Périgord, Guyenne, and the counties of Foix, Bigorre, and Cominges. The free provinces were Flanders, Artois, Hainaut, Calaisis, Boulonnaise, principalities of Sedan, Arles, Rançon, and Brittany, and the isles of Oléron and Ré, with parts of Poitou, Saintonge, and Aunis. In the redeemed provinces salt was sold from 6*s.* to 12*s* the cwt. In the free provinces it was sold from 2*s.* to 9*s.* per. cwt.

Pronounce Pay'-e d' Frahnk salt'-ley.

Pays de Grande Gabelle (Les). Gabelle (q.v.) was the salt tax in France before the revolution. There were the provinces of Grande Gabelle, the provinces of Petite Gabelle, the provinces of Quart-bouillon, and the free provinces or Pays de Franc-salé. The Pays de Grande Gabelle paid the maximum impost. The capitation was 9 lbs. per head yearly, and the price was 62 francs the cwt. or quintal. These were the Ile de France, Orléans, Maine, Anjou, Touraine, Berri, Bourbonnais, Burgundy, Picardy, Champagne, Perche, and part of Normandy. See 'Pays de Petite Gabelle.'

Pronounce Lay pay'-e d' grahnd' Gah-bell'.

Pays de Petite Gabelle (Les). Gabelle (q.v.) was the salt tax in France before the revolution. All France was sub-divided into four parts, those called the provinces of the Grand Gabelle, the provinces of the Petite Gabelle, the provinces of Quart-bouillon, and the free provinces. The Pays de Petite Gabelle paid the minimum impost. The capitation was 11 or 12 lbs. per head yearly, and the price was 33*s.* the cwt. or quintal. These pays were Lyonnais, Mâconnais, Forez, Beaujolais, Bugey, Bresse, Dauphiné, Gévaudan, Languedoc, Provence, Roussillon, Rouergue, and parts of Auvergne.

Les pays de Grande Gabelle qui payaient le maximum de l'impôt; les familles étaient dans ces pays taxées à 9 livres de sel par tête, et le prix du quintal s'élevait à 62 liv. (or francs).

Les pays de Petite Gabelle, qui payaient le minimum: le prix du quintal y était de 33 livres 10 sous (about 33 shillings), mais la consommation était réglée à 11 ou 12 livres par tête.

Pronounce Lay pay'-e duh teet Gah-bell'.

Pays de Quart-bouillon (Les). Lower Normanday was so called in reference to the gabelle or salt tax. There were salt-works here, 'où l'on faisait bouillir un sable mouillé d'eaux salines et versaient le quart du produit de leur fabrication [in return for this privilege] dans les greniers du roi.' The capitation was 25 lbs. of salt per head yearly, and the price was 16*s.* a cwt. or quintal. See 'Pays de Grande Gabelle,' and 'Pays de Petite Gabelle.'

Pronounce Lay pay'-e d'kar' boo'-yone'.

Peace (The Perpetual), 24 Jan., 1502. Concluded between England and Scotland, a few years after the battle of Flodden Field (q.v.).

Peace of Antal'cidas (The), B.C. 387. Concluded by Antalcídas the Spartan and Artaxerxes.

Peace of Clement IX. (The), 1669. An attempt to reconcile the Jansenists and Jesuits by virtually abolishing the formulary (q.v.).

Peace of Durham (The), 1139. After the battle of Caton Moor or Northallerton, in which the Scots under Prince Henry were routed by Stephen. In this peace Stephen surrendered to Prince Henry the whole earldom of Northumberland, with the exception of the two castles of Newcastle and Bamborough, as a bribe that he might use his influence with his niece Maude, who was in arms against Stephen.

Peace of God (The), 1035. A command by papal bull for all men to lay down their arms, under the expectation of the second advent of Christ, 'the Prince of Peace.' Five years later, 1040, the prohibition was modified by the 'Truce of God,' which did not forbid all military contentions, but commanded all men to cease from hostilities on Thursday, Friday, Saturday, and Sunday.

After the Gospel of the day the officiating priest read from the pulpit these words: 'May they who refuse to obey be accursed, and have their portion with Cain the first murderer, with Judas the arch-traitor, and with Dathan and Abiram, who went down alive into the pit. May they be accursed in the life which now is; and may their hope of salvation be put out, as the light of these candles is extinguished from their sight.' At which words the priests extinguished their tapers.

Peace of Monsieur (The), 6 May, 1576. So-called because it was signed at Chastenoy by Monsieur, i.e. the brother of Henri III. It granted to the Huguenots the free exercise of their religion throughout the kingdom of France, Paris only excepted; admission to all public offices; equal numbers with the Catholics in the various parlements; eight places of surety; the right to open schools and to convoke synods; and restoration of their estates, appanages, and governments. The terms of this treaty were never carried out.

Peace of Nicias (The), B.C. 421. The fifty years' truce in which the Lacedæmonians engaged to give up Amphipŏlis.

Peace of Nürnberg (The), 1532. By the Diet of Augsburg, held in 1530, the Emperor Charles V. pronounced the Protestants contumacious heretics, and commanded them to return to mother church on pain of his great displeasure. At the time Solyman II., at the head of a large army, was in Hungary, and threatened Vienna. The princes of Germany were asked to assist in driving back the Turkish invaders, but the Protestant princes united in a league (called the Smalkaldic league) not to stir unless the decree of Augsburg was revoked. In this dilemma there was no choice left, so the decree was withdrawn, and the Protestants were allowed full liberty of worship till the next imperial diet. This ad interim concession was called the 'Peace of Nürnberg,' because it was signed in that city.

Peace of Religion (The), 1555. The treaty of Passau confirmed by the Diet of Augsburg the foundation of religious freedom in Germany. Protestants were allowed the free exercise of their religion in their respective dominions (Karl V.).

Passau, pronounce Pas-sow (ow as in now).

For others see under the special name, because most of these treaties are differently called by different writers. Sometimes they are called Treaties, sometimes Treaties of Peace, sometimes only Truces, &c.

Peacock of the North (The). Robert Neville, who beautified Middleham Castle in 'a very peacocky style.'

Peacock's Feather. The badge of the Chinese general.

Let the peacock's feather be plucked from the cap of Yihshan for his imbecility and tardiness in bringing up his forces . . . and let every officer in the province of Canton . . . be deprived of his official button.—The Emperor's despatches in the first Chinese war.

Pearl of Brittany (The). The Princess Eleanor, daughter of Geoffrey duke of Brittany, granddaughter of Henry II. and niece of King John; confined in Bristol Castle because she was next heir to Arthur to the crown of England (1184–1241). She was starved to death.

Pearl of Ireland (The). St. Bridget, born in Ulster, lived in a cell in an oak called Kill-dara, or the 'cell of the oak,' 6th cent.

Pearl of Normandy (The). Emma, sister of Richard II. duke of Normandy, and wife of Ethelred the Unready (died 1046).

Pearls are next in value to diamonds. The following are historic:—

'La Peregrina' weighed 126 carats, and was pear-shaped. Gongibus of Calais brought it from India in 1620. When laid before Felipe II. of Spain, he said: 'How could you concentrate all your fortune on so small a thing?' To which the merchant replied: 'Because I knew the world contained a king who would buy it of me.' This gem came into the possession of Princess Youssopoff, and is valued at 37,000*l.*

Felipe II. had another pearl, about the size of a pigeon's egg, and weighing 134 grains. It came from Panăma, and was valued at 23,000*l.*

The Kaiser Rudolf II. possessed a pearl of 180 grains; and Napoleon I. had one about the same size.

The pearl which Louis XIV. gave to Madame de Maintenon, and which was offered for sale in 1819, weighed 27⅞ carats.

The Shah of Persia has a pearl an inch in diameter. In 1633 it was valued at 64,000*l.*

The pearl in the possession of the Arabian imam of Muscat is valued at 82,000*l.*

The Crown Prince of Prussia gave to the Princess Royal of England a necklace of thirty-two pearls valued at 20,000*l.*

The pearl which Cleopatra melted and drank in health to Antony was valued at 80,000*l.*

The Romans called the large bell-shaped pearls Uniones, the pear-shaped pearls they called Elenchi, the half-ball-shaped Tympania, and the whitest Exaiminata Margaritæ.

Peasant Bard (The). Robert Burns (1759–1796).

Peasant Painter of Sweden (The). Peter Hörberg, who died in 1814.

Peasant Poet of Northampton (The). John Clare (1793–1864).

Peasant Poet of Suffolk (The). Robert Bloomfield, author of 'The Farmer's Boy' (1766–1823).

Peasant Revolt (The), 1381. Under Wat Tyler, who had been a soldier in the French wars. A spirit of discontent had long been seething; it was aggravated by the Statute of Labour, which most unjustly fixed the price of labour to what it was two years before the Black Death, although the price of food had risen greatly. The discontent came to a head by a poll-tax for the prosecution of the French war, and this poll-tax was the same to the poor as to the rich. All the eastern counties rose in revolt, but Kent took the lead. Wat Tyler being stabbed to death by William Walworth the lord mayor, the young King Richard II. by a happy address promised to be the new leader, and the revolt was easily put down

Peasant of Cotignola (The). Sforza, whose name was Giacomuzo d'Attendolo, born at Cotignola, a village of Romagna. He was an agricultural labourer, but at the age of 12 entered the army as groom to Count Alberic, who gave him the pseudonym of Sforza, because he 'gained his own way by force.' His grandson, Francesco Sforza, married the only child of Francesco Maria Visconti duke of Milan, and succeeded to that dukedom, thus transferring its crown to the line of 'The Peasant of Cotignola' [Co-tin'-yo-lah].

Peasant of the Danube (The). 'Le Paysan du Danube,' Louis Legendre, a member of the French National Convention, famous for his 'éloquence sauvage' (1755–1797).

Peasants' War (The), in Germany, or 'War of the Rustauds,' 1524–1525. The grievances were these: (1) The people demanded the free election of their parish clergy; (2) the appropriation of the tithes of grain, after deducting therefrom the suitable maintenance of the parish clergy—this 'appropriation' was to be set aside for the support of the poor; (3) the total abolition of serfdom, hunting and fishing rights, and game laws; (4) throwing open of forests and other lands tied up to secular and ecclesiastical nobles; (5) equal administration of justice; and (6) the abolition of certain odious exactions made by the clergy. In 1525 the rising was stamped out with terrible cruelty, and more than 150,000 of the insurgents perished.

Pecquigny (Treaty of), 1475. Louis by bribes induced Edward IV. to sign this treaty, and withdraw his army from France.

Pronounce Pe-keen'-yĕ.

Peculiar Church, or Parish (A). Church or parish having special jurisdiction of its own, and exempt from the ordinary. There are royal peculiars, archbishops' peculiars, bishops' peculiars, and the peculiars of deans and chapters.

Peculiar People (The). A Protestant religious sect who trust in Providence to cure their sick of all diseases. They anoint the sick with oil and pray over them, but give no medicine and call in no medical adviser.

Pecu'lium. The plot of land given in feudal times to a slave, the produce of which helped to supply him and his family with food. When the peculium was more than the man could manage, he might employ a drudge, who was called Servus servi.

Pedobaptists. See 'Pædobaptists.'

Pedro the Cruel, King of Castile (1319, 1350–1369). He began his reign by murdering his father's mistress, Leonora de Gusman; daily his nobles fell his victims; he put to death his cousin and one of his natural brothers; he caused his queen (Blanche de Bourbon) to be cast into prison and there poisoned. A second queen suffered in the same way.

Pedro, pronounce Pay-dro.

Peel's Hundred Days. Sir Robert Peel held the seals of office from Nov. 1834 to May 1835, between the first and second administrations of Lord Melbourne.

Peel's Velveteens, 1842. Velveteens containing as design wheat-ears on a scroll on which was the word 'Free.' A specimen was sent to Sir Robert Peel and accepted by him, but afterwards returned. See 'Velveteen Plot.'

Peep-o'-day Boys. An Irish Presbyterian party, organised in 1790. In 1688 the whole Catholic property of Ireland was confiscated; and when in the 18th cent. William Pitt made some attempts to mitigate this injustice, the Irish Protestants took alarm, regarding 'Protestant ascendency' endangered. Acts of violence against the Roman Catholics were organised, and as they were perpetrated at the peep of day, the party was called 'The Peep-o'-day Boys.' See 'Defenders' and 'Irish Associations.'

The Peep-o'-day Boys in 1795 became the Orangemen, and the Roman Catholics the 'Defenders.'

Peers of France (The Twelve). There were six lay and six ecclesiastical peers. The lay peers were the duke of Normandy, the duke of Burgundy, the duke of Aquitaine, and the three counts of Flanders, Toulouse, and Champagne; the ecclesiastics were the archbishop of Reims, the archbishop of Sens, and the four bishops of Noyon, Langres, Beauvais, and Châlons.

All Brittany, for a time, did homage to the Duke of Normandy.

Aquitaine included Poitou, Limousin, most of Guienne, and the feudal superiority of Angoumois.

The feof of Flanders stretched from the Scheldt to the Somme.

The Count of Flanders possessed Languedoc, with Quercy and Rouergue, and feudal superiority over Auvergne.

Peg Nicholson's Knights. See 'Margaret's Knights.'

Pegas'ians. In Latin Pegasiāni. A law school so called from Pegāsus, a jurist, and follower of the Procu'lians (q.v.) of the republican or popular party.

Pehle'vi Dynasty. See 'Pishdadian dynasty.'

Peine Forte et Dure. Being pressed to death. Remanded to a low, dark chamber in a prison, the victim was laid on his back on the bare floor, naked; then on his body was placed a great weight of iron. On the first day he received three morsels of the coarsest bread: on the second day three draughts of stagnant water; and so on alternately till he died. Abolished.

Pronounce Pain fort a dure.

Pela'gian Heresy (The), or 'Pelagianism,' 5th cent. The doctrines of Pelagius, whose religious views were opposed to those of St. Augustine. He denied the dogma of original sin, and declared man to be a free agent capable of himself, without the aid of the Holy Ghost, of receiving or rejecting the proffered salvation, and of performing good works. His doctrines were condemned by the two councils of Carthage and Milevium or Milevia, in Numidia, A.D. 416. Pelagius was anathematised by Innocentius in 417, and expelled from Jerusalem in 424.

It is said that Pelagius is a Greek translation of the Welsh name Morgan (sea-born). He was a man of rank, and his life was most exemplary. It is generally supposed that he was a monk of Bangor in Wales, but it is far more likely the monastery was Bangor or Banchor, in Carrickfergus, Ireland.

Pells (Clerk of the). From the Latin pellis, a skin [i.e. of parchment]. An officer of the exchequer whose duty it is to enter on the pells or parchment rolls every bill sent in for payment, with the receipt thereof when discharged, and all disbursements. Hence there are pells or rolls of receipts, and pells or rolls of disbursements.

Peloponnesian War (The), B.C. 431–404. A war for supremacy between Athens and Sparta, which lasted 27 years. It may be divided into three parts: (1) From the commencement of the Nician truce; (2) from the truce to the Sicilian expedition; and (3) from that catastrophe to the surrender of Athens. The proximate cause of the war was this: The republican party of Epidamnus rose in rebellion against the rulers, drove them from the town, and then applied to Corinth for protection. The exiled rulers applied to Corcȳra. Whereupon the Corcyræans laid siege to Corinth, and obtained aid from Athens. The Corinthians applied to Sparta for assistance, and thus Athens and Sparta were drawn into the quarrel, which ended in the ruin of Athens.

Pembroke College. I. Cambridge, 1347. Founded by Mary de St. Paul, widow of Aymer de Valence earl of Pembroke, in honour of her husband, who was killed in a tournament soon after his marriage. It was originally called the 'Hall of Valence and Mary.' Subsequently Pembroke Hall; and now Pembroke College.

II. Oxford, 1624. Founded by James I. It was originally called Broadgates Hall, but was renamed after the Earl of Pembroke, chancellor of the university. The head of the college is called the master.

Penal Laws (against Catholics). These existed before the Treaty of Limerick, 1691.

An act subjecting all who maintain the supremacy of the Church of Rome to the penalties of præmunire, and requiring the oath of supremacy as a qualification for office of any kind.

An act imposing fines on absence from the parish church on Sundays.

An act authorising the chancellor to appoint a guardian to the child of a Catholic.

An act to prevent Catholics from being private tutors without a bishop's licence.

These were added in 1695 (Will. III.):—

An act to disarm Catholics; to banish Catholic priests and prelates; to prevent the intermarriages of Protestants and Catholics; to prevent Catholics from being either solicitors or gamekeepers.

These were added in Queen Anne's reign, 1703:—

The father of a papist who conformed to the established religion was incapacitated from disposing of his property by sale, mortgage, or bequest.

A papist was prohibited from being guardian even to his own child. The child on conforming was to be given in charge to a Protestant.

Papists were incapacitated for holding land for more than 31 years; and if at any time the profit of the land exceeded one-third of the rent, the lease was to be transferred to the Protestant who made the discovery.

Papists were not allowed to inherit the lands of Protestant relatives, nor to keep any horses above the value of 5*l.* each.

In 1709 an Act was passed prohibiting Catholics from holding life annuities; to assist in schools; to act as sheriffs; to sit on grand juries.

Repealed 1861 (24, 25 Vict. cc. 95, 101). Some mitigation had been made in 1778 (18 Geo. III. c. 60).

Peninsular War (The), 1809–1813. Against the French in the peninsula of Portugal and Spain. Arthur Wellesley [duke of Wellington] was the British commander-in-chief who landed in Portugal 12 July, 1808, and by April 1814 had expelled the French from the peninsula. The following year he won the great battle of Waterloo.

The battle of Vime'ra (Portugal), 21 Aug., 1808. Marshal Junot was defeated. For this victory Wellington was highly censured by Sir Hew Dalrymple, the commander-in-chief, for fighting without orders.

The battle of Douro, 12 May, 1809, in which Wellington defeated Marshal Soult.

The battle of Talave'ra (Spain), 27, 28 July, 1809. Joseph Bonaparte and Marshal Victor were defeated by Wellington, who was made in April commander-in-chief of the British forces in the Peninsula.

Battle of Busa'co (Portugal), 27 Sept., 1810. Marshal Masséna was repulsed by Wellington, and on 3 and 5 May, 1811, the French marshal was utterly foiled at Fuentes de Oñoro (Spain).

1812. Wellington invested Ciudad Rodri'go (Spain), and on 19 Jan. took it from the French by storm, and 6 April he took Ba'dajoz by storm.

Battle of Salamanca (Spain), 22 July, 1812. Marshal Marmont was defeated by Wellington.

The battle of Vittoria (Spain), 21

June, 1813. Joseph Bonaparte and Marshal Jourdan were defeated by Wellington.

Battles of the PYRENEES, 27 to 31 July, 1813. Marshal Soult was defeated by Wellington; and SAN SEBASTIAN was stormed 31 Aug., 1813.

The battle of ORTHEZ (Pyrenees), 27 Feb., 1814. Marshal Soult again defeated by Wellington; and again, 10 April, at TOULOUSE.

General Graham defeated Marshal Victor (5 March, 1811) at Barossa in Spain; and Marshal Beresford defeated Soult at Albuéra 16 May, 1811. And 16 Jan., 1809, Sir John Moore fell at Corunna. In Nov. 1813 Sir John Murray defeated Soult's army on the Nivelle.

 Between 21 Aug., 1808, and 10 April, 1814 (less than five and a-half years), Wellington had defeated six French marshals: Jourdan, Junot, Marmont, Masséna, Soult, and Victor, together with Joseph Bonaparte. He had won the battles of Vimeira, Douro, Talavera, Busaco, Fuentes de Oñoro, Salamanca, Vittoria, the battles of the Pyrenees, Orthez, and Toulouse, besides the sieges of Ciudad Rodrigo, Badajoz, and San Sebastian.

 After the victory at the Douro, Sir Arthur Wellesley was created 'Baron Douro'; after the battle of Talavera, he was made 'Viscount Wellington'; after the siege of Ciudad Rodrigo, he was made 'Earl of Wellington'; after the battle of Salamanca, he was made 'Marquis of Wellington'; and for his victory at Vittoria he was created 'Duke of Wellington.' We had no honour left for his victory at Waterloo.

Penitent (A). A man whose duty it was (before the introduction of safety lamps) to descend into a coal mine, early every morning, to explode the fire-damp which had accumulated during the night. So called because he was dressed like a religious 'penitent,' in a woollen dress, which covered his face and body.

Penitents of Love (The), 13th cent. A fraternity established in Languedoc consisting of knights and esquires, dames and damsels, whose object was to prove their love by bearing the extremes of heat and cold. Many perished, but what matter? 'They received the crown of martyrdom.'

Penitentes. Fanatics of New Mexico, who, during Lent, not only fast, but subject their bodies to the most horrible tortures. On Good Friday they go in procession from their lodge to a cross, with their skin cut into furrows, and as they march scourge themselves or each other over the shoulders till their bodies are completely covered with blood. Sometimes one or more will then volunteer to be crucified. They may be seen even in the streets on Good Friday with a huge wooden cross strapped on their back, their arms drawn up and fastened to the cross-bar, and a spear fastened to their body, so that the point touches the arm, and if in walking over the road strewed with potsherds, sharp stones, and thorny plants the foot flinches or stumbles, the spear point wounds the flesh of the arms.

Penitential Week. Hebdomada Pœnitentialis. The same as 'Hebdomada Pœnalis' (q.v.).

Penitentiary of England. A lucrative office for granting papal dispensations.

Pennsylvania (U.S. America). The 'Penn Forest.' So called from William Penn, who in 1681 founded the colony. The inhabitants are sometimes called Pennamites, and were once locally nicknamed Leather-heads.

Pennsylvanian Bonds. Kites, or waste-paper bonds. In 1843 Pennsylvania, the richest state in America, repudiated its debt, having borrowed money for the construction of roads and canals. No transaction in history is more disgraceful than this, as the state was well able to pay, but would not.

Pennyless (The). Kaiser Maximilian I. (1459, 1493–1519). Called in Italian 'Massimiliano Pochidanario.'

Pensionary Parliament (The). From 8 May, 1661 to 24 Jan., 1678, i.e. 16 years and 260 days. It was convened by Charles II., and was so called because it had so many pensions to grant to Royalists impoverished by the late troubles. See 'Parliaments.'

Pensioners (The). All the ordinary students of the University of Cambridge who are in statu pupillari. There are a few fellow commoners, either sons of the nobility, sons of men of fortune, or married men, who dine at the fellows' table (whence their name). These students wear a special costume, and have certain exemptions; and there are a few sizars, sons of men of small means, most of them clergymen's sons. The sizars have their commons free, and have other emoluments which vary in different colleges. Like the fellow commoners, they are not called 'pensioners.' In Oxford the ordinary students are called 'commoners.'

Pensioners are those who pay a pension. Commoners are those who 'common' or dine at a general table.

Pentap'olis.

1. The Five Cities of Cyrenaica, near Egypt: Apollōnia, Arsinōê, Berenīcê, Cyrênê, and Ptolemāis.

2. The Dorian Pentapolis: Camīros, Cnidos, Cos, Ialȳsos, and Lindos.

3. The Five Cities of Italy in the exarchate of Ravenna: Ancōna, Fano, Pesāro, Rimīni, and Sinigaglia.

4. The Five Cities of the Philistines: Ascalon, Ashdod, Ekron, Gath, and Gaza.

5. The Five Cities of the Plain: Admah, Gomorrah, Sodom, Zoar, and Zeboim.

Pentarchs (The). The French Directory, composed of five members.

The astonishing man whom the 18th Brumaire had placed alone on the tottering throne of the Pentarchs, conceived the idea of detaching the emperor of Russia from the cause of his allies.—DUNCAN, History of Russia, vol. i. p. 288.

People of the Book (The)—i.e. the Koran. The four 'people' are Christians, Jews, Magians, and Sabians, who are more tolerantly treated by Mahometans than idolaters.

The People of the Book were permitted to redeem their adherence to their ancient law by the payment of tribute.—HALLAM, Middle Ages, vol. ii. p. 167.

People's Charter (The), 1838. Consisting of these six demands: (1) Universal suffrage; (2) annual parliaments; (3) stipendiary members; (4) vote by ballot; (5) equal electoral districts; and (6) abolition of monetary qualification.

The Ballot Bill passed in 1872.

People's Friend (The). Marat. So called from his journal 'L'Ami du Peuple.'

The People's Friend is evidently rising in importance as his befriended people rises. — CARLYLE, French Revolution, vol. iii. bk. iii. 3.

People's William (The). William Ewart Gladstone (1809–). He began his political career as a Tory, but turned Whig, and became a Radical towards the close of his life.

Between 1885 and 1886, being nearly 80 years old at the time, his political views, especially in regard to the Irish Land League, the Plan of Campaign, Boycotting, and other revolutionary subjects, underwent a complete change. In 1885 he said that 'Crime dogged the Irish Land League in all its steps,' and Sir William Harcourt spoke still more strongly against the League; but in 1886 both Mr. Gladstone and Sir William Harcourt defended the Parnellites through thick and thin, and found excuses for boycotting, the refusal to pay rent, and even for open resistance of the law. They blamed the Irish Constabulary, which a few months before they most highly praised, and seemed politically to have made a volte face.

Peppercorn Rent (A). A mere nominal rent, like the delivery of a grain of wheat or corn of pepper, in acknowledgment of the rights of the landlord.

Perceval (Mr.) Assassinated Spencer Perceval, second son of Lord Egmont, prime minister of England, was shot in the lobby of the House of Commons 11 May, 1812, by Bellingham, who mistook him for Lord Levēson Gower, late ambassador to the court of St. Petersburg, who (he said) had refused him redress after acting in a diplomatic matter. He was executed for murder. Mr. Perceval was fifty years of age.

Père Duchêne [Du-shane].

I. James René Hébert, the French revolutionist, was so called from his obscene journal of that name (1755–1794).

II. A journal during the French Revolution conducted by Hébert. This scandalous red republican newspaper contained the most exaggerated democratic sentiments, and circulated the most horrible innuendos against the queen.

Père des Lettres (Le). François I. of France (1494, 1515–1547).

Pères de la Foi (Les). The French Jesuits, readmitted at the Restoration, so called themselves. They had flourishing colleges at Montrouge and St. Acheul; but these were closed in 1828, and declared to be in violation of the law. Since 1848 there has been a slight revival of Jesuitism in France. See 'Paccanarists.'

Peregrine Mass. 'Missa Peregrinōrum.' After the chapter the bell announces the Matutinal Mass for the approach of paupers, and the priest, who had celebrated high mass for the last seven days, says the 'Missa Peregrinōrum.' See 'Mass.'

Perfecti (The Perfect Men). So the Waldenses (q.v.) were sometimes nicknamed, from their professed puritanism.

Perfectibilists (The), 1776. An order created by Adam Weishaupt, afterwards called the 'Order of the Illuminati.' A secret society, organised on the plan of the Order of the Jesuits. Persons of any religious creed were admitted members, but passive obedience was a sine quâ non. It greatly flourished, but became political, and was interdicted in Bavaria in 1784.

Perfectists (The). A sect of the Independents which rose up during the civil war between Charles I. and his parliament. The Franciscans, Jesuits, and Molinists believed in the perfectibility of man; and the Wesleyan Methodists teach that Christian perfection is attainable, according to the exhortation contained in Heb. vi. 1.: 'Let us go on to perfection'; and our Lord himself says: 'Be ye perfect, as your Father in heaven is perfect.'

Under the head of Independents . . . were the Arminians, Millenaries, Baptists, Anabaptists, Familists, Enthusiasts, Seekers, Perfectists, Socinians, Arians, and others.—HOWITT, History of England (Charles I., ch. vi. p. 273).

Perfidious Albion. A favourite expression of Napoleon I., but not of his invention. Probably it referred originally to the homage paid by Edward III. to Philippe VI. of France in 1329 (see Rymer, 'Fœdera,' i. p. 260). Edward paid the homage exacted of him, but resolved upon vengeance, and executed it to the bitter end. Napoleon talking of 'perfidy' is like the pot calling the kettle 'black-face.'

'L'Angleterre, ah! la perfide Angleterre, que le rempart de ses mers rendoit inaccessible aux Romains, la foi du Sauveur y est abordée.'—BOSSUET, A Sermon preached at Metz.

Peripatetics (The). A sect of philosophers of ancient Greece, founded by Aristotle of Stagira in Macedonia, a pupil of Plato (B.C. 384–322). He used to lecture in a covered walk of the Lycēan gymnasium in Athens, and hence his disciples were called the 'Walking Sect,' or 'Sect of the Walk.' His favourite pupil was Theophrastus (B.C. 394–287).

Aristotle was called the Stagirite (3 syl.) from Stagira, his native place.

The proper name of Theophrastus (the divine speaker) was Tyrtămos, but Aristotle called him 'the divine speaker' from his grace and fluency of speech.

Peronne (Treaty of), 1468. Between Louis XI. and Charles le Téméraire of Burgundy. Louis agreed by this treaty to abandon his suzerainty over the fief of Burgundy.

Perpetual Council of the Gallic Nation (The). The Sorbonne (q.v.).

Perpetual Edict (The). I. Edictum Perpetuum, A.D. 132. The various edicts of Roman prætors, compiled and arranged by Salvius Julian, a lawyer, by order of the Emperor Hadrian. Previous to this C. Cornelius got a law passed to prevent prætors from altering their edicts. 'Ut Prætores in Edictis suis Perpetuis jus dicerent.' A.U. 686 (B.C. 69).

This was the first general code of Roman law published by authority.

II. The 'Pacification of Ghent' (q.v.), 12 Feb., 1577. By which William prince of Orange gained nearly all he asked for. See above.

Perpetual Peace (The). I. 31 May, 1419. Between the French and Henry V. of England. It was signed at Troyes, and ratified by Isabella (wife of Charles VI.) and Philip the Good of Burgundy. It made Henry the successor of Charles VI. at death, and regent of France till then. It also gave him the Princess Catherine for his wife.

II. 'La Paix Perpétuelle,' Sept. 1515, after the battle of Marignano, or 'Combat of the Giants.' Between François and the Swiss, signed at Freyburg. It formed the basis of all subsequent relations between France and Switzerland till 1789.

Perse Free Grammar School. For 100 scholars, now enlarged to admit 190 boys. Founded by Stephen Perse, M.D. Fellow of Caius College, 1615, reorganised in 1873 (Trumpington Road, Cambridge).

Fees for the junior department 5*l.* a year, and 14*l.* a year for the senior department.

Persecution in Lyons (The), A.D. 177. Under Marcus Aurelius the Christians were hunted from their houses, expelled from the public baths and markets, insulted, stoned, and plundered. No distinction of nationality, sex, or age was made. Marcus Aurelius being applied to, gave instruction that all 'who confessed themselves to be Christians should be put to death.'

Persecution of the Jews, in 1348–1349. I. During the prevalence of the Black Death (q.v.) the Jews were the scapegoats in Germany, and their treatment was revolting. The notion got abroad that the wells were poisoned, and that the Jews had poisoned them to extirpate the Christians. Men bound themselves by oaths to stamp out the cursed race which had crucified Jesus Christ. Some were torn to pieces; some were burnt alive. At Speyer the Jews in despair set fire to their own houses rather than fall into the hands of the mob. In Mainz 10,000 Jews were massacred. At Eslingen the whole Jewish population burnt themselves in their synagogue. At Strasburg 2,000 were burnt in their cemetery. Anyone who protected a Jew was put to the rack and executed without mercy. See also under 'Milan, Edict of.'

The report was that the Jews obtained the poison from some remote parts of the earth and mixed it with the venom of spiders, owls, adders, and toads. No doubt the Flagellants (q.v.) were the chief instigators of this horrible persecution.

II. By banishment.

Persecutions by Christians (The).

I. Against the Albigenses, 1179–1235; most bitter, bloody, and relentless.

II. Against the Moslems, in eight crusades, 1095–1274. These wars cost the lives of 5 millions of human beings.

III. Against the Huguenots, in the Dragonnades, under Louis XIV., in 1685.

IV. Against the Protestants of Germany, in the Thirty Years' War, 1618–1648.

V. Against the Waldenses, or Vaudois, 1179–1848. See Félice, 'History of Protestants,' &c.

VI. Against the Jews by Christians generally.

VII. The Inquisition, 1203–1814, was a series of persecutions against 'unorthodox Christians.'

VIII. The Reformation introduced a series of persecutions by Protestants against Catholics, and Catholics against Protestants.

IX. St. Bartholomew massacre of the French Huguenots, in 1572, was a frightful affair.

X. The Smithfield fires. Speed says, 'More bloud was spilt in that short time of [Mary's] raigne, than had been shed for ease of christianity in any kings time since Lucius the first establisher of the Gospell in this realme.' 'Hist. of Great Britaine,' p. 1151 (1623).

To these may be added the general persecutions of different sects, whether that between the Eastern and Western Churches, that between Catholic sects, or that between Protestant sects. All who think differently to the established or 'orthodox' system being held 'heretics.' Buckle estimates the loss of life by these Christian persecutions at 140 millions of human beings. That would be about a tenth part of the entire present inhabitants of the earth, and most frightful to think of. See p. 585, 'Milan, Edict of.'

Orthodoxy means simply the doxy of might. In one country it is Brahmanism, in another Buddhism, in a third Zoroasterianism, in a fourth Druidism, in another Paganism; in the Eastern Church it differs from the Western; in England it is Protestantism, with the Jews Mosaicism, and so on. It is then divided into sects, and only that sect sanctioned by the state is orthodox. Hence the mutual persecutions of Arians and Trinitarians, the Jesuits against the Jansenists, the Church of England and Church of Scotland, the Sadducees and Pharisees, and so on throughout. There is no such thing as absolute orthodoxy, it is simply the power to enforce certain religious views.

Persecutions of Christians (The), by Roman emperors. Called 'The Ten Persecutions.'

(I.) under Nero, 64–68; (II.) under Domitian, 95; (III.) under Trajan, 106; (IV.) under Marcus Aurelius, 166–177; (V.) under Septimus Severus, 199–204; (VI.) under Maximinus, 235–238; (VII.) under Decius, 250–252; (VIII.) under Valerian, 258–260; (IX.) under Aurelian, 275; and (X.) under Dioclesian, 303–313. The last is called 'The Era of the Martyrs.'

Christians were not persecuted by the Roman emperors for their faith in Christ, but for their 'lawlessness' or infidelity to the state religion and national law. Of the religious creed, as Paley said, the Roman emperors and Roman senate were supremely indifferent, but the religion of the country was an integral part of the law of the land, which it is not in Protestant England, Prussia, or America.

Persia (Golden Age of), 1258–1335. From Hulaku to Abu Seyd, distinguished for those celebrated names Naser-ud-din, Jelal-ud-din, Sadi, and Hafiz.

Persian Punishment (The). Flaying alive. See Rawlinson's note to 'Herodotus,' v. c. 25 (vol. iii. p. 191).

Persian War (The). I. A.D. 337–360. In the reign of Constantius II., son of Constantine the Great. In this war the armies of Rome and Persia encountered each other in nine bloody fields, in two of which Constantius commanded in person. In all these battles the Persians were the superiors.

II. A.D. 502–505, between Cabades or Kobad the Persian and Anastasius emperor of the East The Huns and Arabs marched under the Persian standard. Amida stood a siege of three months, in which the Persian general lost 50,000 men; but Persia expiated her loss with the slaughter of 80,000 of the adversary, and peace was concluded in 505 (Gibbon, 'Decline and Fall,' chap. xl.).

Persic Version (The) of the Scriptures. A version of the Pentateuch by Jacob ben Joseph, 9th cent. See 'Scriptures.'

Perspicuous Doctor (The). Walter Burley, born 1275, died 1338. Flourished 1320. He was preceptor to Edward III. Burley attacked the dogmas of Duns Scotus.

Perth (Convention or Treaty of), 18 Aug., 1305. Between Edward I. and the regents of Scotland. This convention, which apparently settled the affairs of Scotland, was scarcely signed when Robert Bruce threw the two countries into war again by the murder of Comyn lord of Badenoch.

Peschit'o (The), or 'Peshitto,' meaning literal or simple. An old Syriac version of the Bible, supposed to have been made in the 2nd and 3rd cents. A.D. by Jewish Christians. It omits the Book of Revelation and four of the Epistles.

Ephrem Syrus (who died 378), is supposed to refer to this book when he speaks of 'Our Version.' See 'Bible.'

Pessimism. The doctrine that nothing can be worse than things now are. The chiefs of this school are Schopenhauer, Lucretius in his poem 'De Natura,' and Voltaire in his 'Candide.' See 'Optimism.'

Pet'alism. Writing the name of a person on an olive-leaf. If 600 signatures were thus obtained in Athens the person was banished. Ostracism was exile by writing the name on a tile or oyster-shell.

Peter (Letter of St.) to Pepin. Forged by Pope Stephen III., rendered desperate by the siege of Rome by Astolph the Lombard king. See Milman, 'Latin Christianity,' vol. iii. book iv. chap xi. pp. 21–23. See 'Literary Forgeries.'

Peter ad Vincula (Saint), or 'Festum S. Petri ad Vincula,' 1 Aug. (Lammas), the day when, it is said, St. Balbina found St. Peter's Neronian chains.

Peter Porcupine, 1784. A pen-name adopted by William Cobbett after his flight from England to avoid appearing before a court-martial for charging four of his officers with peculation. He died 1835 at the age of seventy.

Peter the Thaumatur'gus. Bishop of Argos (date unknown).

Peter the Wild Boy. Discovered in the fields near Hameln in July, 1724, and supposed to be eleven or twelve years of age. He was placed by George III. under the charge of Dr. Arbuthnot. All the words he could utter were Ke Sho (King George), Que Kaa (Queen Caroline), and Hom Hen (Thomas Fen), the name of the farmer, at Northchurch, Hertfordshire, under whose charge he was placed. He went about with a collar on his neck, bearing his name and address. Government allowed Mr. Fen 85*l.* a year for his maintenance. Peter died 1785, being, it is supposed, about seventy-two years old.

Peter's College (St.). Cambridge University, founded by Hugh de Balsham bishop of Ely, 1257.

This is the oldest foundation in the University. It used to be called Peter House.

Peterloo, 16 Aug., 1819. The area before St. Peter's Church (called St. Peter's Field), Manchester, was so called from the monster meeting held there on that day, and presided over by 'Orator' Hunt, against the strict prohibition of the magistrates. The ostensible reason of the meeting was to favour parliamentary reform. Hunt had scarcely begun his speech when several troops of soldiers, with 400 special constables, and the Cheshire and Manchester Yeomanry, appeared. The crowd fled in disorder, many were thrown down, 100 were more or less injured, and six persons were accidentally killed. Hunt and nine others were brought to trial, and charged with treasonable conspiracy. Called 'Peterloo' from the words of Hunt, who said, 'The magistrates desired nothing so much as an opportunity of letting loose the bloody butchers of Waterloo upon them.'

Peter-pence, or 'Rome-scot,' 720. First paid by Ina king of Wessex, discontinued by Edward III. in 1365, and prohibited by act of parliament in 1534

(25 Henry VIII. c. 21). It was one penny per family collected for the pope of Rome. An enormous tax, if we consider the value of money at the time, and to the poor almost crushing. Half-a-crown would have bought a horse or cow, and about 1*s.* would have bought a sheep. Wages for a labourer 1*d.* a day.

At present Peter-pence is a voluntary contribution to the pope.

Petit Fils de la France. Son of Philippe duc d'Orléans, brother of Louis XIV. Philippe himself was entitled Monsieur, his wife Madame, and their daughter Mademoiselle (all without a proper name).

Petit Manteau Bleu (Le). Edme Champion (1764–1853). A man of unbounded benevolence, called Le Petit Manteau Bleu by the poor, from his habit of wearing a short cloak of blue cloth, fastened at the neck by a clasp, and reaching to the loins.

Petit Roi de Bourges (Le). Charles VII. of France (1403, 1422–1461). Called afterwards 'The Victorious,' because he reconquered France from the English. When he succeeded to the crown Bourges was about all that acknowledged his sovereignty.

Petite Paix (La), also called 'La paix fourrée,' and sometimes 'La paix de Longjumeau,' 1568, between the Roman Catholics and the Calvinists. This peace was preparatory to the 'Paix de St. Germain' (q.v.).

Petits Maîtres, 1649. The party of Condé was so called 'parce qu'ils voulaient être maîtres de l'état' ('Siècle de Louis XIV.').

Petition (The Monster), 10 April, 1848. Said to have been signed by six million Chartists. Some 50,000 Chartists, led by Feargus O'Connor and Ernest Jones, intended to march to the House of Commons to present it. About 170,000 special constables were sworn in to prevent a disturbance. When the petition was examined it was found that it did not contain two million names. Many of these names were palpably forgeries, many were mere nicknames, and thousands were copied in the same hand from a directory. The petition altogether was a monster swindle.

Petition and Advice (The), or 'The Humble Petition and Advice,' 1657. Presented by the parliament to Cromwell, praying him to assume a higher title than that of Lord Protector, to govern, as had been done in times past, with the advice of two houses of parliament, and to abolish the odious existing institution of majors-general. Cromwell refused to take the title of king, but consented to establish a second estate, the members of which he addressed as 'My lords,' although only two real peers attended the summons. The petition was first entitled 'A Humble Address and Remonstrance.'

On former occasions he [Cromwell] had relieved himself from [money] embarrassments by the imposition of taxes by his own authority, but this practice was strongly reprobated in 'The Petition and Advice.'—Dr. LINGARD, Hist. of Eng., viii. 7.

Pétition de Droit. One of the common law methods of obtaining possession or restitution from the crown of either real or personal property. It owes its origin to Edward I.

Petition of Right (The), 28 May, 1628, made law by 3 Car. I. c. 1, 7 June, 1628. It prayed that no man hereafter be compelled to give any gift, benevolence, or tax without consent of parliament. That the commissions for proceeding by martial law be annulled. That the king will in future declare his will and pleasure to be that all his officers and ministers obey the laws and statutes of the realm. That no freeman be imprisoned by the king's arbitrary will, but only according to established law. That no householder be compelled to receive any soldier or mariner into his house. See 'Bill of Rights.'

Petitioners. By 13 Charles II. it was enacted that not more than ten persons should be allowed to approach the sovereign or either House of Parliament for delivering a petition, making a complaint, or suing for redress of grievances.

Petitioners and Abhorrers, 1679–1680. Two political parties in the reign of Charles II., the germs of the Whigs and Tories. Lord Shaftesbury, by intrigue, procured from the counties a host of petitions to set aside not only James the brother of Charles II., but also his daughter Mary, who was a Protestant, married to William prince of Orange; and to fix the succession on the Duke of Monmouth, a bastard son of the king (?) A strong party revolted at this injustice, and obtained a host of counter petitions declaring their 'abhorrence' of Shaftesbury's scheme. So that the 'Petitioners' were for setting aside the Prince of Orange, and the 'Abhorrers' were in favour of the prince.

Petrobrusians. The disciples of Pierre de Bruys (2 syl.), who was burnt alive as a heretic at St. Gilles in 1147. They denied the doctrine of transubstantiation, rejected crucifixes, baptized adults who had been already baptized in infancy, and forbade prayers for the dead. The Henricians (q.v.) joined this sect in 1127.

Petroleum Vesuvius Nasby. A pen-name of D. R. Locke. 'Nasby' refers to the battle of that name; 'Petroleum' to the rock-oil fever raging in Pennsylvania at the time when the 'Nasby Letters' were begun; and 'Vesuvius' to the outburst of the petroleum fever.

Pe-tse Dynasty (The). The 2nd dynasty of the Goli Tartars in Eastern China. It gave five kings, and lasted 28 years (550–578), when both the Eastern and Western kingdoms were again united in the imperial line.

Petticoat (A). Carried in the cider riots, 1763. See 'Jack Boot.'

Petty Bag Office (The). In the common law jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery. So called because all original writs relating to the business of the crown were, at one time, kept in a little sack (in parva baga).

Peu'tinger'ian Table (The). 'Tabula Peutingeriāna.' A map of the Roman world constructed about A.D. 226, some say as early as 161. It was discovered at Spires (1500) in an old library by Conrad Celtès, who sent it to Conrad Peutinger the antiquary to publish; but his death occurred before this was done. It was ultimately published in 1598 at Venice under the care of Marcus Welsen. The original is in the Imperial Library of Vienna. See 'Antonine's Itinerary.'

Pezade (2 syl.). See 'Pacata.'

Phalansterians. Disciples of Charles Fourier (1768–1837), who grouped all men in phalanxes. Each phalanstery was to consist of 400 families or 1800 persons, to live under one roof in the centre of workshops, studios, places of amusement, and so on. The whole earth being grouped in phalansteries, the phalansteries themselves are to be united in larger groups under a unitary government. There is to be only one language and one government, and the only army is to be a great industrial army.

Bellamy's 'Looking Backward,' or state of society in 2000, is a slight modification of Fourierism. See 'Communism.'

Phal'aris. The famous controversy between Richard Bentley and Robert Boyle began thus: Mr. Boyle borrowed a MS. from St. James's Library, where Bentley was librarian. It was borrowed that Mr. Boyle might complete his 'Epistles of Phalaris.' Bentley was angry because it was kept so long, and Boyle taking offence, a paper war arose, noted for wit and satire. In 1699 Bentley published a book to prove that Phalaris was not the author of these epistles, to which Boyle replied; but all scholars side with Bentley, who was appointed Master of Trinity for his admirable criticisms. See 'Literary Forgeries.'

Phantastic System (The). Taught by the Docètes (3 syl.). It was this: that Christ was only a phantom, and not a real human being. Like the God which appeared to Adam and Eve, like the Moses and Elijah on the mount, the man Christ was palpable to the eyes, but not to the touch, and his words, like those of the beings referred to, were only 'airy words.'

Pharaoh. Another spelling of Phra, Egyptian for the sun.

Pharaohs of the Bible (The). Josephus ('Jewish Antiquities,' viii chap. 6) says: 'The title of Pharaoh was applied to the kings of Egypt from Menês to Solomon, but not afterwards.' This does not correspond with the Bible; for Jeremiah, xliv. 30, speaks of Pharaoh Hophra, and Pharaoh Necho invaded Judea in the reign of Josiah (2 Kings xxiii.).

According to the tablets discovered in different parts of Egypt, the following seem to illustrate the Bible narratives:

1. The Good Pharaoh seems to be

Sutapepe-Nubti, one of the Hyksos, or shepherd kings; but some Egyptologists think it was Osirtesen II., and say there is a tablet in the sixth year of his reign which records the advent of several Semitics resembling Jews both in dress and physiognomy. Supposed to be Jacob and his household.

2. The Bad Pharaoh seems to be Amen'ophis III. of the nineteenth dynasty, who introduced the heretical worship of Typhor; but after Ramëses II. the Great came a period of confusion, and the Exodus is supposed by many to have occurred in the reign of Arisu, a usurper and a Syrian, about B.C. 1314. No hint of the Exodus, however, can be traced by Egyptologists.

3. Solomon married Abra, the daughter of Pfusënes [Pisham] last of the twenty-first dynasty (1 Kings iii. 1).

4. Shishak (1 Kings xiv. 25), who came against Jerusalem in the reign of Rehoboam, was obviously Shashank I., or Sheshouk, who with 12,000 chariots and 60,000 horse-soldiers invaded Judea. The record may still be seen on the portico of the Bubastis at Karnak.

5. 2 Chron. xiv. 9–15 and xvi. 8, &c., it is supposed, refer to Zerah, fourth of the twenty-second dynasty.

6. Hosea paid tribute to Shabak, founder of the twenty-fifth dynasty, B.C. 716.

7 Shabăkok, called 'So' in 2 Kings xvii. 4, was the successor of Shabak. With this king Hezekiah formed a confederacy against Sennacherib, king of Assyria, 2 Kings xviii. xix. 'So' was succeeded by Tarach or Tirshatha.

8. Pharaoh Necho who invaded Judea in the reign of Josiah was Nechos II. He defeated Josiah, but was himself defeated by Nebuchadnezzar (617–601), 2 Kings xxiii. 29, &c.

9. Pharaoh Hophra is supposed to be Apries, which without the vowel points is PR or PhR (Jer. xliv. 30).

The Sphinx was carved in the third dynasty, founded by Necherophês. The great pyramid was built by Khufu [Suphis or Cheops] who founded the fourth dynasty; his successor Khafra or Khafren [Cephren] built the second pyramid; and his successor Menkâra [Mycerinus] built the third great pyramid.

Ramses II. the Great was the Sesostris of Egypt whose reign is fixed by the calendars representing the heliacal rising of the dog-stars, B.C. 1322.

 Goshen was in Lower Egypt, nearer Palestine than Upper Egypt. There was much marshland there, and both grass and corn would grow.

Pharisees (The), B.C. 160. An ancient Jewish sect who by their verbal criticisms, mystical interpretations and traditions, engrafted on the Mosaic law a host of precepts and observances. They believed in a resurrection, in angels, and spirits; placed great reliance on fastings, ablutions, and long prayers; and paid great attention to their garments, especially affecting very large borders, fringes, or hems. Their chief was Hillel.

'Pharisee' from pharash, to separate.

Phenicians (The), about 1863. An Irish secret society, a branch of the Ribbon Societies (q.v.), their platform being similar to that of the Fenians. See 'Irish Associations.'

Phenomenon, Noumenon (plu. Phenomena, Noumena). Kant used the two words to express object and subject. The Greek word φαίνομαι means to appear, and phenomenon is what our senses cognise. Noumenon is from the Greek word νοῦς, 'pure intelligence'; and a noumenon is an object pure and unbodied, that is divested of everything cognisable by the senses.

Fichte used the words ego and non-ego for subject and object. What the senses cognise as part of ourselves is, of course, part of ourselves; but what exists independent of our senses is no part of ourselves, and this he called non-ego.

Phe'si, φησί (It says). An ecclesiastical school. Hippolytus speaks of Basilidês, and Isidore, with πᾶς ὁ τούτων χορός, as 'Phēsi'; and again he speaks in the same manner of Valentīnus, Heraclĕon, Ptolemy, and πᾶσα ἡ τούτων σχολή. The term is used as significant of the scripture interpretation of a certain school. The Phēsi say so and so = the Ipse-dixit school.

Phid'ias (The French). Pigalle, died 1796. His best pieces are 'Venus,' 'Mercury,' and the tomb of Marshal Saxe.

Phid'ias (The Northern). Albert Thorvaldsen the Danish sculptor (1770–1844).

Philacte'rians or Phylacterians. Necromancers, condemned by the Church A.D. 692. The philacteria were ancient amulets for keeping off or curing diseases. 'Philacteria, id est, X verba legis, aut scriptura vana, quod ligat homo super caballum aut super caput suum' (Du Cange; article 'Phylacteria').

Phil'adelphes (3 syl.). An association of old republicans to which Talleyrand and Fouché belonged, even while they were in the service of the Emperor Napoleon.

Philadelphia Convention (The) 1883, consisting of dynamitards, Fenians, murderers, and all sorts of disturbers of the public peace. Paid agents were continually sent to England to terrorise the British Parliament into granting 'Home Rule' (q.v.) to Ireland for peace sake. See 'Irish Associations.'

Philadel'phians (The), 1821. A branch of the Carbonāri in Calabria, also called the 'Reformed European Patriots.'

Philadel'phic Society (The). A literary and philosophic association at Besançon at the close of the 18th cent. One of its members, General Mallet, made this society a political instrument for the restoration of the Bourbons. Lieut.-Colonel Oudet, another member, classified the Philadelphians into three ranks, each of which was profoundly ignorant of the functions of the other two; then introduced the scheme into the army, and established affiliated societies called 'Les Frères Bleus.' The first movement was the conspiracy of Adjutant-General Arêna. This was crushed, but without Bonaparte being able to trace out the instigators of it. Now Moreau, Lahorie, Cadoudal, and Pichegru joined, and the last two concocted a plan to assassinate the first consul. Several persons were arrested, and Cadoudal, with some few subordinates, was executed. In 1813 the Philadelphians were no longer wanted, and the society lost its political power.

Philadel'phos (Brother-lover). Ptolemy II. of Egypt, so called, murdered all his brothers in order to secure the throne (B.C. 284–246). See 'Philopater.'

Phil'anthrop'ic Society (The), 1788. For the reformation of young criminals. It originated with Robert Young and was incorporated in 1806. Reformatory schools were established at Redhill, in Surrey, in 1849.

Philipp king of Germany (1178, 1197–1208). Brother of Heinrich VI.; succeeded by Otto IV. (son of Heinrich the Lion) who abdicated.

Father, Friedrich I. Barbarossa; Mother, Beatrice daughter of Renaut III. of Burgundy; Wife, Irene Angela, widow of Roger of Sicily. No son. Contemporary with John.

Philippe I. l'Amoureux, of France (1052, 1060–1108). Fourth king of the Capetian dynasty.

Father, Henri I.; Mother, Anne of Muscovy; Wives, Bertha daughter of the count of Holland (mother of Louis VI.), and Bertrade of Montford. Contemporary with Edward the Confessor, Harold, and William the Conqueror.

Hugues Capet was the father of Robert le Pieux; Robert was the father of Henri I.; and Henri I. was the father of Philippe I.

Philippe II. Auguste, of France (1165, 1180–1223). So called because he was the real founder of the French monarchy, as Augustus Cæsar was the real founder of the Roman empire. When Philippe ascended the throne, his whole kingdom was not larger than the county of Yorkshire; but ere he died he had extended its frontiers from the Scheldt to the Mediterranean and from the Rhine to the Atlantic.

Father, Louis VI.; Mother, Alice daughter of Thibaud comte de Champagne; Wives, Isabelle daughter of the Duke of Hainault (mother of Louis IX.), Ingelburge, who was divorced, and Agnes de Meranie. Contemporary with Henry II., Richard, John, and Henry III.

 When Philippe Auguste began to reign all the West of France belonged to England or to Prince Arthur; the South belonged to Aragon; and the East to Germany. All that pertained to France was the Ile-de-France, with portions of Picardy and Orléannois.

Philippe Auguste was the 7th king of the Capetian dynasty: 1. Hugues Capet; 2. Robert le Pieux his son; 3. Henri I. his son; 4. Philippe I. l'Amoureux his son; 5. Louis VI. le Gros his son; 6. Louis VII. le Jeune his son; 7. Philippe II. Auguste his son.

Philippe III. le Hardi, of France (1245, 1270–1285). See 'Philippe le Bel.'

Le fils de S. Louis que, par un caprice inexplicable, ses contemporains surnommèrent le Hardi [the bold], n'avait des qualités de son père que la douceur et la piété. Il pratiquait le jeûne et l'abstinence, et vivait en moine plutôt qu'en chevalier.—BORDIER ET CHARTON, Histoire de France, vol. i. p. 879.

Father, St. Louis (Louis IX.); Mother, Marguerite daughter of the comte de Provence; Wives, Isabel daughter of the king of Navarre, who bore him four sons, and Marie daughter of the Comte de Brabant, who bore him two daughters. Contemporary with Edward I.

Philippe IV. le Bel, of France (1268, 1286–1314). Eleventh king of the Capetian dynasty, in direct descent.

Father, Philippe III.; Mother, Isabel daughter of the king of Navarre; Wife, Jeanne countess of Champagne and queen of Navarre. Contemporary with Edward I., Edward II.

1. Hugues Capet; 2. Robert le Pieux; 3. Henri I.; 4. Philippe I. l'Amoureux; 5. Louis VI. le Gros; 6. Louis VII. le Jeune; 7. Philippe II. Auguste; 8. Louis VIII. le Lion; 9. Louis IX. (St. Louis); 10. Philippe III. le Hardi; 11. Philippe IV. le Bel.

All the three sons of Philippe IV. reigned in succession, as Louis X., Philippe V., and Charles IV., when the elder branch died out. See 'Three Fatal to France.'

Philippe V. le Long (1294, 1316–1322). Brother of his predecessor Louis X. and of his successor Charles IV.

He was the last Capetian king of the direct line, and his reign was a wretched failure.

Father, Philippe IV.; Mother, Jeanne countess of Champagne; Wife, Jeanne de Bourgogne. No son. Contemporary with Edward II.

Philippe VI. de Valois, of France (1293, 1328–1350). Succeeded his cousin Charles IV. le Bel.

Father, Charles comte de Valois, second son of Philippe IV. le Bel; Mother, Jeanne countess of Navarre; Wives, Jeanne of Burgundy (mother of Jean), Blanche. Contemporary with Edward III.

∴ PHILLIPE III. le Hardi had three sons, viz. PHILLIPE IV. le Bel who succeeded him, Charles comte de Valois, and Louis. Philippe VI. de Valois was the son of Charles de Valois, the second son of Philippe III.

Philippe Égalite (1747–1793), duc d'Orléans, guillotined by the Committee of Public Safety. Though a royal duke, he had sided with the Jacobins; though a relative of Louis XVI., he had voted for his execution; and though professing republican principles, he aimed at the crown.

Philippæan Era (The). This era began in June B.C. 323.

Philip'pics. Three orations of Demosthenês the Athenian against Philip king of Macedonia. The first was spoken during the sacred war, when Philip took on himself to be the champion of the Delphic god. Demosthenês wanted the Athenians to side with the Locrians against Philip, but he produced no practical effect.

The second Philippic was soon after the Sacred War, when Philip had become the head of Greece. Demosthenês charged him with perfidy. Philip sent an embassy to complain of this insult, and then it was that Demosthenês delivered his second Philippic directed against the supporters of the Macedonian king (B.C. 344).

The third Philippic was delivered B.C. 341, and was to show the best means of resisting the encroachments of Philip.

Philistines. The inhabitants of the sea-coast of Palestine from Phœnicia to Egypt are always meant when this word is used in Scripture.

Philop'ator (Father-lover). Ptolemy IV. of Egypt, so called, assassinated his father; just as Ptolemy II., called Philadelphos, or Brother-lover, murdered his brothers in order to secure the throne. Philopător reigned B.C. 221–204.

This madman not only assassinated his father, he also murdered his mother, sister-wife (Arsinoé), and brother.

Philosopher (The). I. Marcus Aurelius Antoninus the Roman is so called by Justin Martyr (121, 161–180).

II. Porphyry the neoplatonist (223–304).

III. Leo VI. emperor of the East (866, 886–911).

IV. Alured Anglicānus (died 1270).

Philosopher of Chelsea (The). Thomas Carlyle, who lived at Chelsea (1795–1881).

Philosopher of China (The). Confucius (B.C. 551–479).

Philosopher of Ferney (The). Voltaire, who lived at Ferney, near Geneva, for the last twenty years of his life (1694–1778).

Philosopher of Malmesbury (The). Thomas Hobbes, author of 'Leviathan,' who was born at Malmesbury (1588–1679).

Philosopher of Persia (The). Abû-ebn-Sina of Shiraz (died 1037).

Philosopher of Sans Souci (The). Frederick the Great of Prussia (1712, 1740–1786).

Voltaire calls him over and over again the philosopher prince.

Philosopher of Wimbledon (The). John Horne Tooke, author of the 'Diversions of Purley,' who lived at Wimbledon, near London (1736–1812).

Philosophers (The Five English).
(1) Roger Bacon, author of 'Opus Majus' (1214–1292).
(2) Sir Francis Bacon, author of 'Novum Orgănum' (1561–1626).
(3) The Hon. Robert Boyle (1627–1691).
(4) John Locke, author of a treatise on the 'Human Understanding and Innate Ideas' (1632–1704).
(5) Sir Isaac Newton, author of 'Principia' (1642–1727).

Philosophers (The French). 'At the close of the 18th cent. were mere exponents of public opinion, which they popularised and vitalised. They were preceded by Descartes (2 syl.) the Frenchman, and Leibnitz the German, who taught that all which is real is spirit, soul, or self, and that matter (or the external world) is either a succession of notions impressed on the mind by deity, or unsubstantial images due to the five senses. Locke taught the latter. Early in the 18th cent. the French taught the doctrine of materialism, making the soul a mere function of matter, as light is an effect of fuel in combustion. Helvetius showed the moral tendency and practical bearing of materialism. Still later the existence of the soul was discarded, with the notion of a future state; and the pleasure arising from the practice of virtue was looked on as the great end of man. The name of God was changed into Nature, and the equality of man was made 'an immortal principle.'

The chief 'Philosophers' were Malebranche (1638—1715), whose great work is 'The Search after Truth.' He denied that matter could produce ideas, and taught that intelligence is the function of deity within us.

Condillac (1715—1780) abbé de Mureaux, chief of the Sensational School of philosophy; that is, that intelligence is admitted through the five doors of knowledge called the senses. His chief works are an 'Essay on the Origin of Human Knowledge,' a treatise on 'Sensations,' and another on 'Animals.

Helvetius (1715—1771) maintained that 'self-interest is the spring of all our actions.' D'Alembert, Diderot, &c., were Encyclopedists.

Philosophic Schools of Greece (The). The Academic, the Cynic, the Cyrenăic, the Eleatic, and the New Eleatic, the Epicurean, the Ionic, the Heraclitian, the Megaric, the Peripatetic, the Pythagorean, the Sceptic, the Socratic, the Stoic, and the New Stoic. The Old Eleatic school consisted of speculative philosophers, the New of natural philosophers; the New Stoic school consisted of Christian philosophers. See each in loco.

Philosophical College (The). Wadham, Oxford, was so called when John Wilkins was warden, not only because he himself was a philosopher, but because he invited to it men of a similar turn of mind as Wallis, Wren, Boyle, &c., who met together in his rooms.

Philosophical Radicals (The). The political economists who advocated free trade. Jeremy Bentham was at the head of this school, which was supported by Adam Smith, General Perronet Thompson, C. P. Villiers, John Stuart Mill, Richard Cobden, Sir William Molesworth, the Rev. T. R. Malthus, Dr. Chalmers, John Bright, [Lord] Brougham, &c.

Adam Smith, author of 'The Wealth of Nations'; General Thompson, author of the 'Catechism of the Corn Laws'; Malthus, a writer on 'Population.'

Philosophical Transactions (The). Published by the Royal Society of London. First started Monday, 9 March, 1665, and ordered to be continued the first Monday of every month. The volumes contain memoirs of scientific men, reports of the 'progress of science,' and of 'new discoveries,' &c. The first number was by Oldenburg, and, up to the 47th volume, the publications were left to the secretaries of the society, but since then they have been under the superintendence of a committee of the council.

The society's rooms were first in Crane's Court; in 1780 they were removed to Somerset House; and in 1857 to Burlington House.

Philosophy (The Father of).
I. Roger Bacon (1214–1292).
II. Albrecht von Haller of Berne (1708–1777).
The Father of Roman Philosophy, Cicero the orator (B.C. 106–43).

Philoxen'ian Version (The). A Syriac version of the Old and New Testaments by Philoxĕnus bishop of Hierapŏlis, A.D. 508. About a century afterwards the New Testament portion was revised by Thomas of Harkel [Heraclĕa], and is called the Harklen'sian version.

Phœbus. Gaston III. comte de Foix (1331–1391). So called for his beautiful face and profusion of golden hair.

Phœnician Stone (The). A hoax. In 1824 the learned Raoul Rochette, professor of archæology and keeper of the Cabinet of Antiquities in Paris, received from Malta, 'for the Academy of France,' a stone with a bilingual inscription in Greek, and in what purported to be Phœnician. The stone was dated in 'the 85th Olympiad' (i.e. B.C. 436). Professor Rochette gave the inscription credit for the antiquity it pretended to, and sent a copy thereof to every savant in Europe for decipherment and translation. The giant scholar Gesēnius of Halle, and the hardly less learned Hamaker of Leyden, agreed with Rochette, and published comments upon the stone. Yet it turned out to be an impudent hoax and modern forgery. See 'Literary Forgeries,' &c.

Phœnix of Spain (The). Lope de Vega, 'whom no one could pass or equal in verse or rhyme' (1562–1635).

Phœnix Park Murder (The), 6 May, 1882. Lord Frederick Cavendish, the newly-appointed Secretary for Ireland, and Mr. Thomas A. Burke, the Under-Secretary, were stabbed to death while walking in Phœnix Park, Dublin, by assassins in the employ of the Irish Land League. Carey, one of the gang, gave queen's evidence, and it was found that there were twenty-one persons implicated in the cowardly murder. 10,000*l.* was offered for the arrest of the assassins.

C. S. Parnell, Dillon, and O'Kelly were released from Kilmainham Gaol only four days before this murder. They had been imprisoned by order of Mr. Gladstone for seditious speeches and conspiracy.

Phœnix Society (The), or 'The Phœnix National and Literary Society,' 1858, established in Skibbereen by O'Donovan Rossa to insure the separation of Ireland from the crown of England. See 'Irish Associations.'

The oath was: 'I do solemnly declare in the presence of God that I renounce all allegiance to the Queen of England, and will do my utmost, at every risk, to make Ireland an independent democratic republic. . . .'

Photin'ians. Heretics of the 4th cent. So denominated from Photīnus bishop of Sirmich, who taught that Jesus was born a mere human being, but began to be the Messiah or Christ when the Holy Ghost descended on Him in the Jordan.

Phrenology (Founder of). Gall (1758–1828); with whom Spurzheim (1766–1833) is inseparably connected.

Phrygian Cap (The). See 'Cap of Liberty in France.'

Physcon (Big-belly), Ptolemy VII. king of Egypt (B.C. 145–116). Aged 74.

Physical Club (The). An association in Moscow organised in the reign of Catherine II. (1762–1796). Physical excellence was essential for membership. The club consisted of men and women in the prime of life. 'Husbands introduced their wives, brothers their sisters. The requisites of men were health and vigour, of women youth and beauty.' The members belonged to the best families of Russia. This club was dissolved in the French Revolution, when the police had orders to ferret out all secret societies.

Physical Geography (Father of). Alexander von Humboldt (1769–1859).

Physicians (College of). London, 1510, founded by Dr. Thomas Linacre of Canterbury.

Physico-Historical Society (The), 1745. Afterwards merged into the Royal Dublin Society for the improvement of agriculture, husbandry, and the useful arts.

Phys'iocrates (4 syl.), 18th cent. French political economists who advocated perfect freedom of trade, and insisted that land ought to bear all the taxes of a nation, as land only is naturally productive. The head of this school was Quesnay, but it was supported by Beaudeau, Larivière, Mercier, Mirabeau, Turgot, &c. See 'Economists.'

The term 'real property' applied to land is a phase of the same delusion. All other property may take to itself wings and fly away, not so land; but 1887 and some preceding years have taught us that land does not always pay the expenses of the landlord. Sahara is land, but certainly it would not pay for cultivation.

Physiognomy (Founder of). Lavater (1741–1801) of Zürich, who taught the art of reading character by the expression and marks of the face.

Physiology (Father of). Albert von Haller (1708–1777).

Piagno'ni (The), or 'The Weepers.' The party of Savonarola were so called from the penitential character which they professed. The party of the Medici was called the Arrabbiati or the Enraged.

Piagno'ni Painters (The). Painters of Florence, friends of Savonarola. They were Botticelli, Lorenzo di Credi, Fra Bartolommeo (Baccio della Porta), and his friend Mariotto.

Piano Regolatore (The), 1889. A system introduced by the Italian Government by which the seven hills of old Rome are to be levelled and the valleys between them filled up, to facilitate the construction of squares and rectangular streets.

Piano'ri (Giovanni), 28 April, 1855. Shot at the Emperor Napoleon III. in the Champs Elysées. See 'Napoleon III.'

Piaristes. Called by the French 'Pauvres de la mère de Dieu.' A congregation devoted to the gratuitous education of poor children. Their houses were called 'Ecoles Pieuses.' Joseph Calasanzio started the idea in 1621, by assembling at his own house street arabs. The order of Piaristes was sanctioned by the Pope in 1624. Austria and Hungary are the chief countries where they exist.

Dr. Barnardo with his homes is a familiar example of the same benevolent zeal in our own land. In Dr. Barnardo's homes the waifs and strays are not only educated, but taught to earn their living, and placed out.

Piasts (Dynasty of the), 842–1370. The first dynasty of Poland; so called from Piast, a wheelwright of Cruswitz, chosen duke of Poland, its founder. It gave eight sovereigns, the first five of which were styled dukes; Boleslaus I. assumed the title of king in 1000, and his predecessor Miecislaus I. introduced Christianity into Poland. In 1037 a period of anarchy succeeded, and Silesia was severed from Poland. The descendants of Piast continued to reign in Poland thus mutilated till 1370, giving seventeen more monarchs: and a branch subsisted in Silesia till 1675.

The house of Piast was succeeded by the dynasty of Anjou.

Pica (A), or 'Pie.' A directory of the order to be observed in reciting the daily service.

Incipit ordo Breviarii seu portiforii secundum morem et consuetudinem ecclesiæ Sarum Anglicanæ una cum ordinali, seu quod usitato vocabulo dicitur Pica, sive directorium sacerdotum: Pica de dominica prima Adventus.—DU CANGE, vol. v. p. 288, col. 1.

Picards (The), 15th cent. A Christian sect founded by Picard, who called himself the Son of God and the New Adam. He taught like the Adamites that men and women ought to go about naked, and that God had sent him to restore the 'law of nature.' He also taught the rule of the community of women as wives.

Picares'co Romance. The romance of knavery, like 'The Adventures of Gil Blas.' Begun in Germany in the 17th cent. The romance called 'Simplicius Simplicissimus,' by Christopher von Grimmelshausen, is the best. It gives us a graphic picture of society in the Thirty Years' War.

Pichegru's Conspiracy, 1804. This was a Chouan or royalist conspiracy headed by Pichegru and George Cadoudal. It was discovered. Pichegru strangled himself in prison; Cadoudal and twelve others were guillotined.

Pici'nists, 1774–1780. A French musico-political faction, who contended that pure Italian music is higher art than the mixed German school. In other words, that music is the alpha and omega of opera, and the dramatic part of very minor account. This is the most celebrated of all the contests in musical annals. Niccolo Piccini was the great exponent of the Italian school, and Christopher Gluck of the German school, his adherents being called Gluckists.

Niccolo Piccini of Naples, 1728–1801; Christopher Gluck of Bohemia, 1712–1787. In this paper contest of the two parties at Paris, the ordinary question asked of everyone was 'Etes-vous Picciniste ou Gluckiste?' Arnaud and Suard were Gluckists, but Marmontel and Laharpe were Picciniste. The contest extended to England and raged with undiminished fury. Marie Antoinette, being a German by birth, patronised Gluck, and this was quite sufficient to raise up a host of opponents. Wagner renewed the contention of Gluck, insisting that the dramatic part of opera is quite as important as the musical part.

Picpus (The), or 'Order of Picpus,' 1601. A religious society of the Third order of St. Francis; so called from Picpus, anciently a part of the Faubourg St. Antoine. The order was suppressed in 1790, but was re-established at the restoration in 1814. The members are largely missionaries in heathen lands.

Picts. Ancient inhabitants of the north-east of Scotland. They were a Celtic race. Probably the word means much the same as Caledonians (dwellers in woods). The Scots were a Celtic colony from Ulster, in Ireland, which (about B.C. 400) settled in the south-western parts of Scotland, then called Caledonia. If so, the Picts were the more ancient inhabitants.

As the people were called Picts before the Romans called them Picti (painted people), the Latin word is merely a coincidence of sound, and is wholly without etymological value. The language of the Scoti was Earish (Erse), i.e. Irish or Western, still preserved in the Western Islands and Highlands. These Highlanders bear the same relation to Scotland generally as the Welsh do to the English.

Pietists (The), or 'Separatists,' 1689. A Lutheran sect who preferred private to public worship. Spener of Leipsic was the founder, whose house was Collegia Pietatis, because his disciples met there. Ordained clergymen had no marked precedence, but anyone was allowed to address the assembly, as among the Quakers.

Among the Jews the Chasidim (q.v.) were called 'Pietists.'

Pigeons. The priestesses of the oracle of Dodōna (q.v.), so called by a play on the words peleiai (πέλειαι), 'pigeons,' and palaiai (παλαιαί) old, aged [women].

It is said that Zeus (1 syl.) presented to his daughter Thēbē two black pigeons endowed with the gift of human speech; that one of them flew into Libya, in Africa, and the other to Dodōna in Epirus; and that he commanded the inhabitants of both places to raise a temple to his honour. Hence the temple of 'Jupiter Ammon' in Libya, and that of Dodōna in Epiros. The two black pigeons may have been two gipsies or Egyptian fortune-tellers.

Pigeon's Blood. The poor nobility of Venice were called I Barnaboti from the quarter San Barnabo, where they dwelt. The wealthy nobles were called Blue Blood (Sangue Colombin and Sangue Blò).

Pigott Diamond (The). Brought from India by Lord Pigott, weighs 82¼ carats. In 1801 it was sold in a lottery for 750,000 francs (30,000*l.*); and in 1818 it passed into the possession of Messrs. Rundell and Bridge. See 'Diamonds.'

Pilate (Mount), in Switzerland, has no connection whatever with Pontius Pilate. It is a corruption of 'Mons Pileātus,' the hatted mountain, or mountain with a cap of snow.

Pilati (Acta). I. Said to be Pilate's despatch sent to the Emperor Tiberius of the crucifixion of Jesus. It is a mere forgery. See 'Literary Forgeries.'

II. Eusebius (book ix. 5) speaks of another Acta Pilāti 'full of blasphemy against Christ,' and sent by the emperor to every part of his dominion. Certain women who had once been Christians declared they had themselves been privy to criminal acts. These declarations (says Eusebius) were appended by order of the emperor to the 'Acts' of the procurator.

No doubt Pilate sent a despatch to Rome, but whether either of these 'Acts' is genuine is quite another matter.

Pilgrim Fathers (The). 102 Puritans who went, in 1620, to North America, in a ship called the 'Mayflower,' and colonised what are now the North-Eastern States, called New England, and consisting of (1) Maine, (2) New Hampshire, (3) Vermont, (4) Massachusetts, (5) Rhode Island, and (6) Connecticut. This was the second English settlement in the New World, and was planted at New Plymouth near Boston. The tyranny of the Ecclesiastical Commission raised up a host of dissenters, and in 1580 they chose John Robinson for their leader. Their independence soon drew upon them the heavy hand of the law, and they left the kingdom. The larger part settled at Leyden, whence 102 of them went to America, and many others followed later.

Pilgrimage of Grace (The). The insurrection of 1537 against the 'King's Supremacy,' headed by Lord Darcy and 'Captain' Aske. Some 30,000 men, 'tall and well horsed,' demanded the redress of wrongs, reunion with Rome, the restoration of the Princess Mary to her rights as heiress of the crown, dismissal of Thomas Cromwell the lord chancellor, and restoration of all confiscated church property. The leaders of this rebellion wore for a badge 'the Five Wounds.' The king, Henry VIII., sent an army of 10,000 men against the rebels, and quelled the insurrection. Aske, Darcy, and a large number of others, both priests, nobles, and gentlemen, were executed as traitors.

This rising was supported by the Archbishop of York, and hundreds of priests who marched in the van with crosses, banners, and other ecclesiastical insignia.

Pillar of Northern History (The). 'Rei historicæ columen.' Snorre son of Sturla, or Snorre-Sturleson (1178–1241). His history begins with Odin and continues to his own times.

Pillar of the Doctors (The). 'La Colonne des docteurs,' William de Champeaux (died 1121).

Pillars of Hercules (The). Calpé (now Gibraltar rock), and Abŷla, opposite to it in Africa, which Greek story says were torn asunder and separated by Herculês about B.C. 1220 (while Gideon was Judge of Israel). Before Herculês tore these rocks or mountains asunder the Mediterranean was an inland sea, like the Caspian [hence the name Mediterraneum Mare].

Pilnitz (The Convention of), 27 Aug., 1791. To put down the French revolution by force of arms, restore the king, and dissolve the Constituent Assembly. The Kaiser-King of Germany, the King of Prussia, the Comte d'Artois, the Marquis de Bouillé, and the ex-minister Calonne signed the convention, and threatened France with invasion, unless the demands were at once conceded. Of course the convention was mere waste paper.

Pilot who weathered the Storm (The), 1801. William Pitt was so called on his retirement from office. The nation in 1797 was almost reduced to bankruptcy by war, when Pitt introduced paper payment for the nonce, whereby the nation soon righted itself again.

Pindar (Peter). The pen-name of Dr. John Wolcot (1738–1819).

Pindar (The British). Thomas Gray (1716–1771).

> No more the Grecian muse unrivalled reigns;
> To Britain let the nations homage pay:
> She felt a Homer's fire in Milton's strains,
> A Pindar's rapture in the lyre of Gray.
> Westminster Abbey (on the monument of Gray).

Pindar (The Italian). Gabriello Chiabrera (1552–1637).

Pindar of England (The). Abraham Cowley (1618–1667).

> The Duke of Buckingham preposterously called him 'The Pindar, Horace, and Virgil of England.'

Pindar of France (The).

I. Jean Dorat (1507–1588).

II. Ponce Denis Lebrun (1719–1807). This title bestowed on Lebrun is simply absurd, but the French are not happy in their eponyms, of which they are especially fond. Also called 'The Poet of Liberty.'

Pindari War (The), 1817–18. The Pindaris attacked Madras 1817, the Marquis of Hastings marched against them, and a treaty of peace was concluded 5 Nov., 1818.

Pinda'ris (The) of India were exactly like the Grand Companies of Europe. They were bodies of mercenary horse who served any prince for hire, and in times of peace lived by plunder. In the early part of the 19th cent. the Pindāris aided Holkar, the Mahratta prince, against the British, but wholly without success. See 'Great Company,' 1353.

Pinerolo, or Pignerolo (The Charter or Treaty of), Aug. 1656. A charter granted by Charles Emmanuel II. the duke of Savoy to his Vaudois subjects after the savage attack of the Marquis of Pianezza. The treaty defined where the Vaudois might exercise their worship without being molested, but reserved to the duke himself the right of celebrating mass where he chose. It also confirmed the prerogatives and privileges previously granted, but in 1685 the Duke Victor Amadeus was made by Louis XIV. of France to extirpate, as far as possible, the 'heretics' in his dominions.

Pink (Knights of the), or 'Chevaliers de l'Œillet,' 1793. A society organised to save the queen and the young dauphin son of Louis XVI. It had its ramifications in Germany and Prussia, but its headquarters, of course, were Paris. The attempt to save the queen failed, and the failure was communicated to the conspirators by one of them pulling a pink to pieces and casting the stalk on the ground. See 'Louis XVII.'

Piombi (The). The terrific dungeons of Venice under the leaden roofs. Those under the canals were called I Pozzi (q.v.).

> If he relapsed he was to be imprisoned for at least three years in the Piombi.—Hist. of Venice, vol. ii. p. 107 (Murray, 1838).

Pipe Office (The). An English law office in which a person called the 'Clerk of the Pipe' makes out leases of crown-lands and enters all debts to the crown in the 'Great Roll' made of parchment and kept in the exchequer. Abolished by 8, 4 Will. IV. c. 99.

Piph'les (2 syl.). So the Waldenses (q.v.) of Flanders were called. Etymology unknown, but probably connected with the Greek πιστικός and the Latin pistis, meaning 'the faithful' or 'true believers.' Sometimes called 'Pisti.'

Pisa, Genoa. Those who want to see Pisa must go to Genŏa. (An Italian saying.) In 1282 began the fourth war between Pisa and Genoa. The Pisans were almost extirpated. 3 000 were slain or drowned, and 13,000 were carried prisoners to Genoa, so that there were more Pisan captives in Genoa than there were left in the city itself.

Piscine Baptism. 'La piscine baptismale.' A term derived from piscis, the Latin word for ἰχθύς, a fish, an anagram of 'Iesous Christos Theou Uios, Sotêr' [I–Ch–Th–U–S]. A notarica used by the early Christians under persecution. It is a secret way of saying 'Christian baptism.'

Pishdad'ian Dynasty (The), or 'Paishdadians.' The first dynasty of the Parsees. Firdusi tells us it lasted 2,450 years, and was founded by Kayomurz, who was succeeded by his son Hoshung; Hoshung was succeeded by Tahmuras, who was succeeded by his son Djemshid, who reigned 500 years. After Djemshid came his son Feridoun. Those who seek to reduce mythical history within Bible limits place these kings thus: Kayomurz B.C. 1990; Hoshung B.C. 1960; Tahmuras B.C. 1920; and Djemshid B.C. 1890. Djemshid was dethroned by Zohâk, an Arabian described as a most merciless tyrant, who was slain in a rebellion led by Kâwân the blacksmith, who raised Feridoun to the throne. The Pishdadian kings were succeeded B.C. by the Kaianian dynasty, called by the Greeks the Achimenidês. It was preceded by the Mahabadian dynasty (q.v.). The Pishdads were mythical kings. Capital: first Balk, then Istakar, and then Segestan.

Pisis'tratos of Rome (The). Julius Cæsar (B.C. 100–44).

Pitt Diamond (The), or 'The Regent Diamond,' found in Golconda, the most perfect brilliant in existence, about the size of a pigeon's egg. It was bought in 1702 by Thomas Pitt (grandfather of the great Earl of Chatham) for 20,400*l.*, and sold by him in 1717 to the Duke of Orleans regent of France for 135,000*l.* It weighed originally 410 carats, but was reduced by cutting to 136⅞ carats. This diamond decorated the hilt of Napoleon's sword of state, but now belongs to the king of Prussia. It was stolen by 'an honest factor,' and pawned to Thomas Pitt, who refused to give it back again, and the thief did not dare to vindicate his claim. It came from the mines of Parteal, near Golconda.

> Asleep and naked as an Indian lay,
> An honest factor stole a gem away:
> He pledged it to the knight, the knight had wit
> So kept the diamond, and the rogue was bit.
> POPE, Sir Balaam.

Pitt Scholarship for Classics, in the University of Cambridge. Founded out of a fund raised by subscribers to the statue of William Pitt, 1813. See 'Regius Professor of Greek.'

Pitt's Bridge. Blackfriars Bridge, the foundation of which was laid in 1770, was so called originally, in honour of Pitt earl of Chatham.

Pittsburg, when taken from the French by Brigadier Forbes in 1758, was called by him Fort Pitt, in honour of William Pitt (Earl of Chatham), but when it grew populous it was called Pittsburg, and is now the Birmingham of the United States.

Placards, 1534. So the protestations of the reformers against the mass were called. They were disseminated by thousands by one Féret from Switzerland, and on 18 Oct. the inhabitants of Paris found them attached to every public place, in all crossways, on the doors of churches, and even on the palace walls. François I. was furious, and many reformers were put to death.

Place de Grève (La). The place formerly used in Paris for executions, like our Tyburn; it is in the vicinity of the Hôtel de Ville. Grève means the bank of a river or shore of the sea where 'les eaux sont couverts de gravier et de cailloux roulés.'

Place de Louis Quinze. See 'Place de la Concorde.'

Place de la Concorde. The spot where Louis XVI. was executed, then called the 'Place de la Révolution,' and prior to the revolution called the 'Place de Louis Quinze.'

Place du Carrousel (La). A part of Paris where carrousels or mock tournaments were held, between the reign of Henri IV. and the 18th cent.

Place of Oak-trees (The), in Prussen (i.e. ancient Prussia). The Holy of Holies of the Druids, into which none might enter but the Druid priests. When Adalbert of Prague, a zealous Christian missionary, forced his way into this sanctuary he was instantly put to death.

Placemakers' Bible, or 'The Whig Bible,' so called because Matt. v. 9 is printed 'Blessed are the placemakers [peacemakers], for they shall be called the children of God.' See 'Bibles.'

Placita, A.D. 598. The first French parlements, convened by Clotaire III., were so called. They were ambulatory; that is, held sometimes in one town and sometimes in another.

From 'Placita' come our words plead, pleadings, &c.

Plague of Florence (The). See 'Black Vomit.'

Plague of London (The), 1665. Introduced by some Dutch merchants. It had been off and on in Holland ever since 1654; in Leyden 13,000 died; in 1655, in Amsterdam, 13,287 died of it. It was carried to London in bales of cotton, and 100,000 died in one year. Its symptoms were sudden delirium, when those attacked rolled about as if intoxicated, then followed profuse perspiration. In 1666 it spread to France, but died out in the winter.

The Plague was followed in 1666 by the Great Fire, and when London was rebuilt the streets were made wider, the drainage improved, and thatch for the roofs of houses was forbidden. Before then the Plague was constantly cropping up in London every few years.

Plague of Marseilles (The), 1720–1726. Brought from Syria in a merchant vessel. It spread to Arles, Aix, and Toulon, and above 80,000 fell victims to it. Henri François Xavier de Belsunce, bishop of Marseilles, exerted himself day and night to comfort the afflicted and take them spiritual consolation. By his devotion he gained the appellation of the Good Bishop. After the plague promotion was offered to him, but he resolved to remain bishop of Marseilles. He died in 1755, but it was not till 1853 that the inhabitants of Marseilles erected a statue to his memory.

There have been thirty-three different pests in Europe since the founding of Rome, but a pest of some kind has visited Europe ninety-seven times since the birth of Christ. There were fourteen visitations in the 17th cent., and only eight in the 18th cent. Since then the visitations have greatly declined.

Plaine (La), 1791. The floor of the hall occupied by the National Convention of France. From the floor benches were raised on grades. These grades were called the Mountain. The red-hot Jacobins seated themselves on the raised benches and were called the Montagnards or Mountaineers, and the Girondists occupied the seat below them, called the Plaine. Both these parties formed the côté gauche; the côté droit was appropriated by the Constitutionalists. In 1794 the 'Plaine' was called the Marais (q.v.), or the Marsh.

Plaine des Vertus (The). This plain, which is in France, not far from Châlons-sur-Marne, is notorious for the review held there 10 Sept., 1814, of 160,000 Russian soldiers, before the diplomatic corps of Europe. 'Vertus' is the name of a town. It was taken by the English in 1422.

Plan of Campaign (The), Oct., 1886–1889. A device adopted by the Irish 'National party' for compelling Irish landlords to reduce their rents. The tenants were to offer what they thought proper for the rent of their holdings, and if the agents refused to accept their offer, the tenants were to lodge the money in the hands of trustees of the Land League. If evicted, they were, by boycotting, to prevent any other tenant from taking the farm. The plan was devised by Messrs. Dillon and W. O'Brien. It gave place in July, 1889, to the 'Tenants' Defence League' (q.v.).

The Solicitor-General said, 'One of the principal objects of the Plan was to get wealthy tenants, who could pay their rents, to lodge their money under the Plan, and once having done so they would not afterwards expose themselves to the risk which would follow its withdrawal. The meaning was this: The tenants were to fix their own rents, having first agreed among themselves the amount of reduction they intended to demand. If the landlord refused to grant the reduction, the tenants were to lodge the money as the Plan advised. If evicted, they were by boycotting to prevent anyone taking the farm.' 16 Feb., 1887. Forbidden by the Pope April, 1888.

No greater swindle was ever openly propounded, and, strange as it may seem, there were gentlemen and landlords of England who coquetted with it to gain the Irish vote.

Planets. See 'Bode's Law.'

Plantagenet. Geoffrey son of Fulk earl of Anjou was so surnamed, it is said, because he bore in his helmet a sprig of yellow broom instead of a feather (Lat. planta-genistæ); and this we are told was from penitential humility. Some say he was scourged with a rod of broom for his sins, as Henry II. is represented being scourged with birch-broom for the murder of Thomas Becket.

This Geoffrey married Maud daughter of Henry I., and their son was Henry Plantagenet, who succeeded the Norman dynasty in England. The Plantagenet race was succeeded by the Tudor dynasty. Fulk was son-in-law of Baldwin II. king of Jerusalem, whom he succeeded in 1131.

Plantation of Ulster (The), 1610. The colonising of the six counties of Ulster with Englishmen and Scotchmen. At the death of Queen Elizabeth, Sir Cahir O'Dogherty, chief of Inishowen, broke out into rebellion, but the rebellion was crushed in June 1608, when O'Dogherty fell in battle. Almost all Ulster now lay at the disposal of the crown. The lands of O'Dogherty were given to the deputy, and all the rest was divided into 3 lots. Lot 1 contained 2,000 acres; lot 2 contained 1,500 acres; and lot 3 contained 1000 acres. The parcels of lot 1 were sold to Englishmen and Scotchmen only; the parcels of lot 2 were distributed among servants of the crown. Neither of these could be alienated to the Irish. The parcels of lot 3 were held by Irishmen. The lands of Tyrone and O'Donnell were given by the crown to the corporation of London to be sold to Englishmen and Scotchmen. Husbandry and the arts being introduced, Ulster, from being the most wild and disorderly province of Ireland, became the most civilised, the best cultivated, and the most prosperous.

The chief seat of this enforced colonisation was Londonderry, from the lands given to the Corporation of London. This land is still managed by twenty-six of the Common Council. The charter dates from 1619.

Tyrone [i.e. O'Neill], the largest chieftain of Ireland, wanted to be made king of the whole island, and promised to give all Ireland to Philip II. of Spain, and hold under him as a tributary prince, if Philip would help him to drive out the English. Philip sent money, arms, and men, under Don Juan d'Aguila, but the allied Spanish and Irish army was completely routed. Tyrone and Tyrconnell (O'Donell) soon quitted Ireland. Tyrone (O'Neill) settled in Rome, where the Pope and King of Spain allowed him a pension. O'Neill died there, and his son being assassinated, the race became extinct. Sir Cahir O'Dogherty the young chief of Inishowen now rose in insurrection, and was slain in battle. Thus the lands of O'Neill, O'Donell, and O'Dogherty all lapsed to the crown.

Planters (The). The colonists sent in the reign of James for 'the plantation of Ulster' (q.v.).

Plantin Polyglot Bible (The), 1569–1572. So called because it was printed by Christopher Plantin of Antwerp. It was edited by Arius Montānus. See 'Polyglot.'

Plato (The English). The Rev. John Norris (1657–1711).

Plato (The German). Friedrich Heinrich Jacobi (1743–1819).

Plato (The Jewish). Philo-Judæus (flo. 20–40).

Plato (The Scottish). Dugald Stewart, born at Edinburgh 1753, died 1828.

Plato of the 18th cent. Voltaire (1694–1778).

The sage Plato of the 18th cent.—CARLYLE, Friedrich II. of Prussia (vol. ii. p. 597).

Platonic Puritan (The). John Howe (1630–1706). Author of 'The Good Man the Living Temple of God,' which occupies one of the highest places in Puritan literature.

Platonists. Dr. Joseph Priestley, in his 'Corruptions of Christianity,' maintains that the doctrine of the Trinity is due to Platonism, and it is certain that the Platonists taught a sort of Trinity. There was first the Unity, that abstract existence without form or personality of any kind. From this ens proceeded what St. John calls Logos, and the author of 'Proverbs' calls Wisdom. 'By Wisdom God established the heavens and founded the earth' (iii. 19); and from these two proceeded the Word-Soul, which constitute the Triad. So in Gen. i. we have first God in Unity, then the Word 'God said Let there be' so and so, and then the Spirit which moved on the face of chaos to reduce matter into order. Certainly the Christians of Alexandria were correct in tracing a striking resemblance between the language of Moses, the Christian Trinity, and the Platonic Triad.

Platonists and Cartesians. The new departure in the Church of England in 1666, led by Henry More, and supported by Cudworth, Wilkins, Tillotson, Stillingfleet, Patrick, and others, who extended the principles of philosophy and divinity, and were the fathers of the Latitudinarian school of theology.

Cartesians were followers of the French philosopher Descartes.

Platonop'olis. The city of Plotin the neoplatonic philosopher, in Campania, where he intended to carry out his socialistic ideas and philosophical system. It does not appear that he was able to complete his project, for we hear nothing more about it except that the Emperor Galen granted him permission to build the city.

Plautus (The Portuguese). Gil Vicente (1480–1557).

Plea (The Army's), 1659, was a paper drawn up by the officers of the army left by Cromwell to vindicate their conduct in driving the Rump Parliament from power for a time, and endeavouring to place England under a military government.

Pleas of the Crown (The Four). Murder, fire, rape, and robbery.

Pleasant Willy. William Shakespeare (1564–1616).

Pleiadês, sing. Pleïad. Seven contemporaneous poets. The Alexandrine Pleiadês consisted of Lycophron, Theocritès, Arātos, Nicander, Apollonios, Callimachos, and Philiscos (called Homer the Younger).

The first French Pleiade in the reign of Henri III. was composed of Ronsard, Dubellay, Remi Belleau, Jodelle, Baïf, Pontus de Thiard, and Amadis Jamyn (or else Dorat).

The second French Pleiade, in the reign of Louis XIII., was composed of Rapin, Commire, Larue, Santeuil, Ménage, Dupérier, and Petit.

The Pleiades of Greek mythology were the seven sisters named Electra, Maia, Taygètè (4 syl.), Alcyonè, Celæno, Sterŏpè, and Merŏpè, who died of grief, and were afterwards placed as stars in the back of Taurus.

Pliny (The German). Konrad von Gesner, styled by Boerhaave that 'Monstrum Eruditiōnis.' He wrote the 'Historia Animalium,' &c. (1516–1565).

Pliny of the East. Zakarija-ibn-Muhammed, called Kazwînî, from Kazwîn, the place of his birth (1200–1283).

Plique (Le), or Plica Polonica, 1599. An endemic very common in Poland. 'Les médecins prétendent que le siège du mal est dans les cheveux, qui se mêlent d'abord sans causer beaucoup de douleur; mais ensuite la suppuration s'établit, et fait sortir une innombrable vermine qui cause des tiraillements et de picotements insupportables. La chevelure ne forme plus alors qu'une masse compacte.' It was called by the Poles Gozdziec, and it is said to have been caused by drinking the water of the Borysthênês. This disease is common in India. See 'Plagues,' &c.

Plogpenning, 'Plough-penny.' So Eric VI. of Denmark was called because he laid a tax on ploughs (1274, 1286–1319).

Plon-Plon. The sobriquet of Prince Napoleon Joseph Charles Bonaparte, son of Jerome Bonaparte. It is a euphonic corruption of Craint-plomb (Fear-bullet), given to the prince in the Crimēan war (1854–1856).

Plots (The Three). In the reign of Charles II. called Oates's Plot (q.v.), the Meal-tub Plot (q.v.), and the Rye-house Plot (q.v.), or Oates, Meal, and Rye. Oates's Plot 1678, Meal-tub Plot 1679, the Rye-house Plot 1683.

Ploughgates in demesne. Lands reserved in the lord's own hand, in contradistinction to lands held by homagers, villeins, cottars, and serfs in the manor.

Plug-drawers. A term invented by Peel, applied to stump-orators who drew the plug of their declamation, and let loose the waters of 'radical humanity,' ad captandum vulgus. There are plenty of such plug-drawers still, who let loose their 'humanity' in sympathy with rebels, like the French jury who acquitted the murderer of his father and mother, poor man, 'because he was an orphan.' The Luddite orators, 1811, the Chartist orators, 1848, &c., and the Home Rule orators, 1890, &c., are your plug-drawers who waste their sympathy 'in one weak, washy, everlasting flood.'

Plu'mean Professor of Astronomy and Experimental Philosophy. Stipend 800*l.* a year. Founded in the University of Cambridge by Dr. Plume, archdeacon of Rochester, 1704.

Plymouth Adventurers (The). A company chartered by James I. authorising them to plant all North America from 41° to 45° N. lat., which includes what we now call Pennsylvania, New Jersey, New York, and New England.

Plymouth Brethren (The), 1828. 'Brethrenism' began in Dublin, where certain Christians met together to partake of the Lord's Supper without a minister. In 1832 John H. Darby, a curate of the Anglican Church, joined the society, and afterwards became its head, but in time removed to Switzerland. The members call themselves merely 'Brethren,' but they are sometimes called Darbyites. They have no written creed, but believe Christianity is on its decline.

The religious system of the society is called 'Brethrenism.' They reject clericalism, insist on the equal standing and privilege of every member of Christ's Church believe in the doctrine of election, and deem church-membership necessary for salvation. Called Plymouth because at Plymouth the society was first developed.

Plymouth Sound. James White, member for Plymouth, who spoke with a very loud voice.

Pneumatics, or 'Macedonians,' 4th cent. Those who denied the divinity of the Holy Ghost. Πνεῦμα, the spirit.

Pocket Borough (A). A borough in which the freemen were all controlled by the pocket of the candidate. This was in the 'good old days' before parliamentary reform abolished the freemen's absurd privilege of election.

Pocket Judgment. Statute-merchant is so called. It was a bond of record under the hand and seal of a debtor, authenticated by the king's seal. On failure of payment, execution was at once awarded without further charge or trouble. This process is no longer in use.

Po'codena'rio, or Lack Penny. Maximilian I. (1493–1519); he failed well nigh in all his projects for want of money.

Poet-laureate. Petrarch appears to have been the first of modern poets crowned with laurels, 1341. Warton shows there were royal poets about our English kings before the time of Richard I., whose court poet Blondel is said to have discovered the place of the king's captivity and to have been the means of his release. Chaucer as royal poet was allowed a gallon of wine a day, and before that time a harper to Henry III. had an allowance of wine. Charles I. in 1630 made the office patent and settled both a stipend and wine on the laureate. Till Tennyson was made poet the stipend was 127*l.* plus 27*l.* for the purchase of a cask of canary.

The term arose thus: the king chose a laureated student of Oxford or Cambridge, that is a student to whom a laurel crown had been presented for the best Latin ode in praise of Alma Mater. In France crowning with laurels is continued still.

Poets' Corner (The), in Westminster Abbey, the South Corner. This is merely a popular name. As a Valhalla of British poets, one would be ashamed of the list. The poets represented are: Addison, Beaumont, S. Butler, Campbell, Cowley, Davenant, Drayton, Dryden, Gay, Goldsmith, Gray, Dr. Johnson, Ben Jonson, Longfellow of America, Macaulay, Mason, Milton, Philips, Prior, Rowe, Shakespeare, Shadwell, Sheridan, Spenser, and Thomson.

But there is no memorial to such poets as the following: Akenside, Mrs. Browning, Byron, Burns, Carew, Cartwright, Chaucer, Churchill, Coleridge, Collins, Cotton, Cowper, Crabbe, Denham, Donne, Fletcher, Mrs. Hemans, Herbert, Herrick, Hogg, Hood, Keats, Miss Landon, Lee, Lovelace, Marlowe, Marston, Massinger, Moore, Parnell, Pollok, Pope, Raleigh, Ramsay, Rossetti, Scott, Shelley, Shenstone, Southern, Southey, Waller, Wither, Wolfe, Wordsworth, Young, and several others.

 Why not place the name in a cartouch with date of birth and death? Let first-class men, like Chaucer, Shakespeare, and Milton have a statue; second-class poets, like Dryden, Byron, Wordsworth, &c., have a cameo profile; the rest a simple cartouch with name. And no name inscribed till twenty-five years after death. The cloisters might be utilised for the purpose.

Poetical Milkmaid (The), or 'The Poetical Milkmaid of Bristol,' Ann Yearsley (1756–1806).

Pogon'atus, i.e. the bearded. The agnomen of Constantine IV. emperor of the East (648–685). Greek πωγώνατος.

Poinding. Taking an inventory of the effects of a debtor; taking goods by way of distress; the act of transferring a debtor's goods to his creditors in default or in payment of debt. The same was 'pounding' or putting stray cattle into the parish pound. Ang.-Sax. pynd-an, to confine, to pound, our word 'impounding.'

> The retainers of the law went from place to place, making an inventory of the goods and chattels falling under their warrant of distress, or poinding, as it is called in the law of Scotland. —Sir W. Scott, The Antiquary, chap. xlii.

'Pointed Arrow.' So General Jackson was called by the Indians against whom he fought in 1813 (1767–1845).

Poissy (The Colloquy of), 1561 (Sept. 9 to Oct. 9). A disputation between Catholics and reformers held at Poissy, under the expectation of proving which was right—Catholic faith or that of the reformers. Théodore de Bèze was the chief of the reform representatives, which consisted of twelve pastors and twenty-two laymen. The Catholic disputants were the cardinals of Tournon, Lorraine, Châtillon, Bourbon, Guise, and Armagnac, with about forty bishops and doctors. On the first day Bèze stated the reformers' creed of the eucharist, whereupon Cardinal de Tournon prayed that the blasphemer might be silenced, but no notice was taken of the cardinal's request. On the 16th Sept. Cardinal de Lorraine answered that the church could not err, and the church had decided that the real presence was the right faith. Bèze craved leave to reply, but the prelates rose and the conference was adjourned. Other meetings were held, but on 9 Oct. the conference was broken off, each party being more embittered against the other and more self-opinionated than before.

> Generally called 'Beza' in English.

Poitiers (The Edict of), 8 Oct., 1577, granting to the Huguenots of France the exercise of the reformed religion, but only in the places where it was professed at the time of signing this treaty. Henri III. used to boast of this edict as 'My edict, my treaty.' It never was observed, and never would have been granted except out of spite to the Guises.

Poitou Colic (The), 1572–1606, appeared in France. It is said to have been caused by ergot (a sort of fungus) in the wheat; but some regard it as lead-poisoning. See 'Plagues,' &c.

Poland (Father of). Boleslas I. (960, 992–1025) called the Great, certainly the greatest sovereign of the age.

Poland (The Golden Age of). The reign of Casimir IV. (1444–1492).

Others call the reign of Sigismund I. (1506–1548) the 'golden age of Poland.' Perhaps it would be more correct to join the two and say 1444 to 1548 was the golden age. Lithuania, Smolensk, and the vast territories beyond the Euxine and the Baltic obeyed Sigismund; while his nephew Louis possessed Hungary, Bohemia, and Silesia.

Pole Star (Knights of the), 1741. A military order of Sweden instituted by King Frederick. The decoration is a Latin cross with four crowns; the legend being 'Nescit Occasum,' in allusion to the pole star, which never sets.

Police Strike (The London), 5 July, 1890. The constables at Bow Street and the Metropolitan Police refused to go on duty. They complained of insufficient pay (22*s.* a week), and demanded two-thirds of their pay as a superannuation pension after 25 years' service. The chief commissioner, Sir Edward Bradford, dismissed or removed above 400 of the force, and the strike collapsed.

> At the same time the 2nd Grenadier Guards, some of the London postmen, and telegraph clerks struck for less work and more wages. Probably the insubordination of the Irish Home Rule party was responsible for these disturbances. The Grenadier Guards were relieved of the extra duty which they complained of, but were sent off immediately on colonial service to the islands of Bermuda for 'change of air'; and the telegraph clerks were told that they were free to go with proper notice.

Police System (The), 1814. Originated by Sir Robert Peel, chief secretary for Ireland; perfected in 1836. Providing a complete and efficient constabulary force both day and night for the United Kingdom.

Poliorce'tes (5 syl.), 'Besieger of cities.' Demetrius the Phalērean, historian, philosopher, poet, and king of Macedonia (B.C. 337, 294–287, died 283).

Political Handkerchief (Berthold's), 1831, price 4*d.* Printed and published by H. Berthold, No. 1 Bouverie Street, Fleet Street, and 14 Duke Street, Lincoln's Inn Fields. 'It was a pocket-handkerchief or book printed on cotton to avoid the paper tax. It contained various political articles, as the prophecy of Napoleon on various European States, &c.'

In 1832 an untaxed almanac, price 7*d.*, was printed on linen by John Smith, No. 1 Bouverie Street, &c.

Politiques (Les). 'The Politicans,' the 'malcontents in the religious wars in the reign of Charles IX. and Henri III. The leaders were François d'Alençon (the king's brother), Henri king of Navarre, the Prince de Condé, and the Montmorencys. They were part Catholics, part Huguenots, recommended mutual tolerance, and proposed terms of peace between the Catholics and Protestants. In 1574 some of the Politiques conspired against Charles IX., and two of the conpirators (La Mole and Coconas) were beheaded. At the death of Charles IX. they took up arms, but were defeated by Henri de Guise at Dormans in 1575. The party melted away after the treaty of Beaulieu in 1576.

Called Politicians, because they advocated new maxims of politics and political liberty, such as the lawfulness of deposing bad kings. And called Malcontents, because they were not content with either the Catholic or Protestant party of France.

Polyglot Bibles. 1. The Hexapla, attempted by Origen (220–250); and projected by Aldus 1501.

2. The Complutensian (q.v.), under the patronage and at the expense of Cardinal Ximenês (1502–1517).

3. The Plantin, or Antwerp, printed by Christopher Plantin, and edited by Arius Montānus (1569–1572).

4. The Paris, by Le Jay (1628–1645).

5. The London, edited by Walton (1654–1657), in nine languages—Hebrew, Syriac, Chaldee, Samaritan, Ethiopic, Arabic, Persian, Greek, and Latin.

6. Hutter's, published at Nürnberg (1599).

7. Baxter's, London, 1831. See 'Bible.'

Complutum is Alcālá de Henāres (3 syl.), a town near Madrid in New Castile.

Pomfret Marbles (The). A part of the Arundel collection, given to Oxford University in 1755.

Pons Subli'cius. The first Roman bridge. It was built over the Tiber by Ancus Martius on wooden piles (sublicæ), whence its name.

Pontifical (The). The service-book of the Romish bishops, embracing all that pertains to their several functions, as the 'Ceremonial' describes the various functions of the pope. It is attributed to Pope Gelasius (492–496) and Gregory the Great (590–604). See 'Ceremonial' and 'Ritual.'

Pontifical Indiction (The). Begins 25 Dec., B.C. 3.

Poor Brothers of St. John (The), 1048. Some Italian merchants obtained permission of the Kalif to build a hospital at Jerusalem for the protection of pilgrims. The hospital was dedicated to St. John the Almoner. During the first crusade many of the wounded were taken to this hospital, and after restoration to health dedicated themselves to a life of charity, under the designation of the Poor Brothers of St. John, consisting of knights, clergy, and serving brothers. Their dress was a black robe, on which was embroidered a white cross with eight points. These Poor Brothers were called 'Knights Hospitallers,' from the 'Hospital of St. John the Almoner.' They are also called 'White Cross Knights,' in contradistinction to the Knights Templars, who were Red Cross Knights.

Poor Clares, or Clarisses, 1224. Founded by St. Francis of Assisi, and placed under the charge of Clare or Clarisse of Assisi, his favourite nun.

Poor Knights (The), 1348. Instituted by Edward III. Twenty-four in number, maintained in St. George's chapel. The charity was instituted to provide a comfortable home for valiant soldiers fallen into poverty and decay. The number was increased by James I. to twenty-six, and each knight had a pension of 18*l.* 5*s.*, paid quarterly.

Now called 'Military Knights,' and no longer limited to soldiers who have fallen into poverty and decay, but, like college sizars, often awarded to poor gentlemen still in the service. There are two foundations, the Royal and the Lower. The Lower Foundation consists of five knights, added by Sir Peter Lemaire and Sir Francis Crane.

Poor Law Amendment Act (The), 1834 (4, 5 Will. IV. c. 76). Commissioners appointed for the better administration of the 'Poor Laws.' It repealed the law of settlement, united parishes into unions, each union being placed under a Board of Guardians elected annually by the ratepayers. It created 585 unions, including 13,964 parishes, in England and Wales. Besides these there are 21 unions by Local Acts, 12 by Gilbert's Act (q.v.), and the 89 parishes of the Scilly Isles included in a union. These, with 87 single parishes, make up the whole number of 14,610 parishes. Each union has a clerk, an auditor, a chaplain, a medical officer, relieving officers, a master and matron, schoolmaster and schoolmistress.

The principle embodied in the Act was to make the parish the hardest taskmaster, so as to drive able-bodied men to seek honest work elsewhere, and not hang in laziness on parish relief. The effects have been to reduce parochial expenditure, to diminish crime, and to encourage thrift.

Poor Men of Lyons (The), 12th cent. Religious reformers of the Cevennes, or Mont de Lyonnais, who probably were organised by Peter Waldo, a rich merchant of Lyons. Though they held similar religious views to those of the Waldenses, they must not be confounded with them, seeing the Waldenses existed 850 years before the Lyonists. The Poor Men of Lyons dressed in mean attire, made a vow of voluntary poverty, and during the persecutions of the Waldenses and Albigenses also were involved in the same massacres. Those who escaped the fire and the sword hid themselves in the mountains of Provence and Piedmont, where they lived in concealment till 1545, when those of Provence were extirpated. In 1686–7 the survivors lurking about Piedmont were driven into Switzerland, and there still exist from sixteen to twenty thousand of these reformers.

Poor Priests (The). The preaching disciples of Wyclif, who went about barefoot, in plain frieze gowns.

Pope (The Huguenot). Philippe de Mornay, sieur du Plessis, so called from his 'Treatise on the Sacrament of the Eucharist,' published in 1598. He died in 1623, at the age of 74.

Pope (The Worst). Alexander VI., father of Cesare Borgia, his sister Lucrezia, and several other sons and daughters of inferior notoriety. Simony, treason, murder, poisoning, are amongst the crimes attributed to him (1431, 1492–1503).

Pope Joan (Papissa Joanna). 'John VIII.,' said to have held the chair of St. Peter from 853 to 855, between Leo IV. and Benedict III. To make this statement good the death of Leo IV. is placed in the year 853 (not 855). The tale is that she was an English girl, educated at Cologne, who assumed man's clothes in order to elope with a monk of Fulda. While at Rome she earned such high reputation for her learning that she was chosen to succeed Pope Leo IV., and assumed the name of John VIII. Her sex was discovered by the birth of a child as she was going from the Coliseum to the church of St. Clement. Being strangled, the time of her pontificate was added to that of her predecessor.

PRO.

Anastatius (886), in his 'Liber Pontificālis,' mentions the story, and as this was only thirty years after the death of Leo, if the passage is genuine, it is proof positive of the fact.

Martinus Scotus (1083), in his 'Universal Chronicle,' repeats the story.

Sigebert of Gembloux (1030-1113), in his 'Chronicles,' does the same.

In the 'Augustan Annals' (1135) we are told that this papissa in 855 consecrated Louis II. of France.

Etienne de Bourbon (1225) states the tale as an historic fact.

Otto of Freisingen, and Godefroid of Viterbo, both mention her in their histories.

Martinus Polonus (1278), in his 'Chronicles of the Popes and Emperors,' tells us that John, an Englishman, succeeded Leo IV., and that this pope was said to be a woman, whose sex was discovered by the birth of a child on her way from the Coliseum to St. Clement's Church.

Thomas de Elmham repeats the story in 1423.

Platina (1479), in his 'Lives of the Popes,' repeats the story.

William Occam alludes to the story.

John Huss tells us her baptismal name was not Joan, but Agnes. Others say her baptismal name was Gilberta.

Spanheim (1600-1649) tells the same tale in his 'Exercit. de Papa Fœmina,' ii. 577.

Lenfant (1661-1728) wrote a 'History of the Female Pope.' He was the author of a 'History of the Council of Constance,' a 'History of Pisa,' a 'History of the Hussite Wars,' &c.

Prof. Kist of Leyden believed the tale to be true. Mosheim (1694-1755), in his 'Ecclesiastical History,' seems inclined to credit the story, though he acknowledges that it is doubtful.

Indubitably a statue of Pope Joan occupied a place among the accredited popes in the cathedral church of Sienna. See Pagi, 'Critica,' vol. iii. p. 624.

At least 150 authors, on every variety of subject, in the 13th, 14th, 15th, 16th cents. repeat the tale as an accredited fact.

Till the time of the Reformation it was undoubtedly considered to be a genuine historic fact.

CON.

Allatius, or Allatus, contradicts the story in his 'Confutatio Fabulæ de Johanna Papissa' (17th cent.).

Lequien does the same in his 'Oriens Christianus,' iii. 777 (18th cent.).

Blondel, a Calvinist divine (1649), wrote a book in confutation of the story.

Gibbon (1737-1794), in his 'Decline,' &c., chap. xlix., calls the story a 'fable,' and thinks that the appointment of popes by such prostitutes as Marozia and Theodora may have suggested the tale.

Bayle (1760-1815), in his 'Dictionnaire Critique,' article 'Papisse,' gives arguments pro and con, but decides against the story.

It is said that the clause in Anastatius ('Liber Pontificalis') is a forgery.

Pagi, Muratori, and Leibnitz fix the date of the death of Leo IV. in the year 857.

Photius (9th cent.) and Luitprand, or Liutprand, omit all mention of Papissa Joanna (10th cent.).

'.' Arguments on both sides of the question are given in Cunningham's translation of 'Geiseler Lehrbuch,' ii. 21, 22.

The last person who critically examined the question was Döllinger in 1863.

It is strange that no Catholic of note has written to confute the story, but that the contra has been left to a Calvinist minister, an atheist, and a line or two of Gibbon, an infidel.

After all, it would be well indeed if the worst thing that could be said against the popes of Rome is that once a woman in male attire was mistaken for a man. Undoubtedly for a century, about the same period, there was a succession of popes of most infamous reputation (see 'Popes of the Tenth Cent.'). There was more than one boy pope, and a host of antipopes.

N.B.—I cannot think that Blondel's book has settled this vexed question, or anything like it. Of course the supposed date of Leo's death is wholly worthless unless it can be proved by independent testimony.

Pope of Rome (The). In 597 John IV., the Jejunător, patriarch of Constantinople, assumed the title of Œcumenical Patriarch, or Universal Bishop. This excited the indignation of the bishop of Rome against both the patriarch and the emperor. Soon after this, Mauricius the emperor was murdered and his successor (Phocas), in 602, was induced by Boniface III. to confer on the pope of Rome the title of the 'Universal Bishop,' which occurred in 666.

There seems something ominous in the strange date 666, connecting it with the 666 of Revelation xiii. 18. 'Here is wisdom. Let him that hath understanding count the number of the beast, for it is the number of a man, and the number is six hundred three score and six' (i.e. 666).

'.' Before this the episcopal titles of Papa, Apostolicus, Vicarius Christi, Summus Pontifex, and Patriarcha were very loosely applied to all sorts of bishops, &c.

Popes. Presuming that Peter was in Rome, and that he was the first of the popes, there have been 297 popes, 24 of whom were anti-popes and one female (if indeed 'Pope Joan' was not wholly a myth). Of the rest, 19 quitted Rome, and 35 reigned elsewhere.

Eight of the reigns did not exceed a month in duration, 40 extended over one year, 22 over two years, 54 over five years, 51 over fifteen years, 18 over twenty years, and 9 have exceeded that duration.

Of the 297 popes, 81 were declared usurpers and heretics, 2 were young boys, 64 met with violent deaths (18 being poisoned and 4 strangled).

Independently of the Avignon popes, 26 of the Roman popes were deposed, expelled from Rome, or banished; and 28 maintained their power only by foreign aid.

Very sad indeed is the history of the Popes as Vicars of Christ on earth.

Popes and Kings. The 10th cent. was the era of impious popes and pious kings.

Good Kings, the last quarter of the 10th to the last quarter of the 11th cent.:—

963–969. Nicephorus II., emperor of the east, who united the hero with the saint.
996–1031. Robert the Pious of France.
997–1038. St. Stephen of Hungary.
1000–1030. St. Olaus II. of Norway.
1002–1024. Heinrich II., called the Saint and the Lame of Germany.
1012–1052. St. Boniface II. duke of Tuscany.
1016–1035. Canute the Great of England, a deeply religious man.
1024–1039. Konrad II. the Sage of Germany.
1039–1056. Heinrich III. the Black King of Germany. A model prince.
1041–1066. Edward the Confessor.
1080–1086. St. Knut IV. the Great of Denmark.

Popes of the 10th cent., the darkest period of the papacy. There were twenty-five popes in the century, which gives the average of four years to a pope.

Benedict IV. (900-903). Il ne put corriger la dépravation des mœurs.
Leo V. (903, 40 days), imprisoned by his chaplain

Christophorus, who usurped the office for nine months, and was then deposed.

Sergius III. (904–911), the protégé of Marozia, a licentious woman of Rome. He lived criminally with Theodora.

Anastasius III. (911–913). Rome was still under the influence of infamous women.

Lando (913–914), appointed by the intrigues of Theodora. He died in six months.

John X. (914–928), appointed by the intrigues of Theodora, his courtesan, and cast into prison by the harlot Marozia, daughter of Theodora. John X. died in prison, probably by poison.

Leo VI. (928–929, seven months), probably poisoned by Marozia.

Stephen VII. (929–931). A nonentity.

John XI. (931–936), son of Marozia the harlot. Cast into prison by another son of Marozia, and left to die there.

Leo VII. (936–939). Not a bad pope.

Stephen VIII. (939–942), father of Otho.

Martin III. (942–946). A nonentity.

Agapetus (946–956). Not a bad pope.

John XII. (956–963), grandson of the infamous Marozia, was only eighteen when made pope. His life was so licentious that he was deposed, and probably assassinated. Leo was anti-pope 963–964.

Benedict V. (964–965) was elected pope 964, but was detained at Hamburg by the emperor, and died there.

John XIII. (965–972). He was imprisoned in an insurrection.

Benedict VI. (972–974), strangled in the Castle of Angelo by Boniface VII., who usurped the pontifical office, but was driven from Rome in two months.

Domnus or Donus II. (974–975), died suddenly, probably by foul means.

Benedict VII. (975–983). His dead body was dragged by the heels about the streets, and then flung into the Tiber.

John XIV. (983–985), murdered in prison.

Boniface VII. (984–985), called anti-pope, murdered his rivals Benedict VI. and John XIV.

John XV. (985), died before he was inaugurated.

John XVI. (985–996). A nonentity.

Gregory V. (996–999), driven from Rome by the soldiers of his uncle, John XVII., who usurped the office.

Sylvester (999–1003). A Frenchman of considerable mechanical genius, and accused of magic.

John XVII. (1003), anti-pope, the mere tool of Crescentius the Roman demagogue.

A blacker century cannot be shown than this tenth century of the Roman popes. Of three or four of the names nothing whatever is known. These popes were names and nothing else. See 'Popes (The Boy).'

 Yet was the doctrine of apostolic succession first maintained in this bad era.

Popes (The Boy). John XII. (956–963) was only 18 when he was made pope. Benedict IX. was made pope in 1033 at the age of 10. Both were profligate, extravagant, and licentious. John XII. was probably assassinated; and Benedict IX. was deposed in 1044.

In the Greek Church Theophylactos, a son of Romanus (Emperor of the East), was made patriarch when a mere lad, but it would be hard to find a more infamous character (933–956).

Giovanni de' Medici, son of Lorenzo (afterwards Leo X.), was made a cardinal at the age of 14.

Popes (The Two). While there were two popes, France, Scotland, Spain, Sicily, and Cyprus supported the French pope, who resided at Avignon; but the Italians, with England, Flanders, and the rest of Europe, supported the Italian pope, who resided at Rome. The former were called Clementines and the latter Urbanists, from Clement VII. and Urban VI., the first of the two contemporaneous popes.

Pope's Cap. See under 'Tiara.'

Pope's Kaiser (The), 'Pfaffen Kaiser.' Karl IV. (q.v.), nominated to the crown by Pope Clement VI. without consulting the electors (1347–1378).

Popelitans, 'Populicans,' or 'Poplicans' (q.v.).

Popish Plot (The). I. 1678. A plot which Titus Oates affirmed the Roman Catholics had devised to murder the king (Charles II.), to restore the United Kingdom to the pope, and to massacre the Protestants as they were massacred in France in the St. Bartholomew slaughter. Oates said 20,000 Catholics were in the league. The king believed the whole story to be a hoax, but many strange discoveries were brought to light which gave some colour to a secret plot, and the whole nation was in a panic.

There was a scandalous rumour which charged the king himself, the Duke of York, and Louis XIV. of France with being the secret conspirators. They were quite capable of being so.

II. May 1798. An Irish insurrection in which Wolfe Tone induced the French to lend a hand under golden promises to the Directory. Some 14,000 Irish under the lead of Father Murphy attacked Wexford, and put to death a number of prisoners. They then took Enniscorthy, but being attacked by General Lake, both Wexford and Enniscorthy were retaken. At Scullabogue the insurgents massacred 100 Protestants in cold blood. The massacre of Protestants by the insurgents obtained for the rebellion the name of the Popish Plot, but the leading Catholics protested against the name, and offered their aid to government to put it down. When all seemed over, General Humbert landed from France with 900 men in three French frigates, but was defeated by Lord Cornwallis and surrendered. A few days afterwards Sir John Warren fell in with a French line-of-battle ship and 8 frigates. He captured the ship and 3 of the frigates. Wolfe Tone was executed, and so ended this absurd revolt.

Wolfe Tone was a mere unprincipled adventurer, who offered his services, as a buccaneer both to Pitt and to the Duke of Richmond. Pitt did not condescend even to answer him, and Tone, out of spite, turned 'patriot' (or rebel). Incredible as it may seem, Mr. Gladstone, in 1889, wrote a letter, published in the Scotch newspapers, containing this sentence: 'I am glad an effort has been made to do justice (!) to Wolfe Tone. It is one of the most grievous facts of Irish history that, at the close of the last century, her rebels were in many cases the very flower of her children' (!!). Only read the 'Memoirs' of Wolfe Tone, written by himself, and see if there is one single redeeming feature in his whole life. He was an idle scamp, who deserted his wife, and turned rebel, as he would have turned buccaneer, from the grossest motives. Read 'Nineteenth Century,' May 1890, pp. 733–756.

Popish Wind (A). A west wind. See 'Protestant,' &c.

31 Oct. I was present when James received letters from Newport, informing him, with extravagant exaggeration, of the dispersion of the Prince of Orange's fleet. At dinner he said to the French ambassador, 'At last the wind has declared itself popish. You must know' (he added) 'for these three days I have caused the Holy Sacrament to be carried in procession.'—MISSON.

Pop'licans, 1160. So the Waldenses (q.v.) who passed over to England from Aquitaine were called. The word is a contraction of Populicani, a corrupt form of Publicani, so called because they imitated the publican more than the pharisee who went to the temple to pray.

Popola'ri (The). The Venetian plebeians, exercising small industries.

Porch (The). Zeno's school was so called because the disciples of this Greek philosopher met in the porch Pœcilê. The Stoics were meant (στοά, a porch).

Similarly we have the Garden sect, and so on.

Por'cian Law (The). That no Roman citizen shall be scourged (Acts xvi. 22, 25–30, 37).

Por'phyrogen'itus. So Constantine VII. was called. Gibbon (chap. xlviii.) says the word means 'born to the purple'; but this etymology is by no means certain.

There was an island called Porphȳris between Crete and Peloponnesus; if he was born there the word would mean 'born in Porphyris,' but is it certain he was born there?

Porphyry's 'Oracles of Philosophy' proved by Dr. Lardner to be a literary imposition. See 'Literary Forgeries.'

Porson Prize (The). For the best translation into Greek verse of a given passage from Shakespeare, Ben Jonson, Massinger, or Beaumont and Fletcher. Given in Greek books to an undergraduate of the University of Cambridge. Value about 12*l.* Founded by the trustees of a fund raised for the benefit of Richard Porson, professor of Greek, 1816. See 'Regius Professor of Greek.'

Porson Scholarship for Classics. Value 65*l.* a year, and tenable for 4 years. Founded in the University of Cambridge out of a fund raised for the benefit of Richard Porson, professor of Greek, 1855.

Porson died in 1808, but the fund was left to accumulate.

Port Act (The), 1774. See p. 115, 'Boston Port Bill.'

Port Royal. An abbey founded in 1204 of the rule of St. Benedict; it had for its object the education of youths. In 1625, the abbey being too small, the seminary was transferred to Paris, and on the publication of Jansen's 'Augustinus' (q.v.) became fervent supporters of Jansenism (q.v.) against the Sorbonne (q.v.). From 1636 the monastery of Port Royal was the retreat of scholars who worked with their hands and taught youths. In 1790 the monastery was suppressed with most others, and was converted into the prison called Port Libre.

The most illustrious members were Arnauld, Andilly (two brothers), Lemaistre de Sacy, Nicole, Lancelot, Fontaine, and Lenain de Tillemont. Pascal visited it often, and was a Jansenist. It produced some first-class educational books, and the Bible de Sacy.

Port Royal (Doctrines of the). These doctrines were in accordance with those of the Jansenists. The chief authors of Port Royal in defence of the 'Augustinus' of Cornelius Jansen were the brothers Arnauld, Lemaistre de Sacy and his two brothers, Nicole, Lancelot, Fontaine, Lenain de Tillemont, and Pascal.

Portcullis. One of the four pursuivants of England. See 'Heralds.'

Porte (The). Originally meant Bagdad or its caliphate. Mostasem, last of the Abbasside califs, set in the threshold of the principal gate of his palace at Bagdad a small piece of the famous Black Stone, 'given to Ishmael by the angel Gabriel,' and built into the shrine of Mecca, called the 'Caaba.' This gate was called La Porte by excellence. Mostasem was calif 1243–1258. See next article.

Porte (The), or 'The Sublime Porte,' 1324. The court of the sultan of the Ottoman empire. Orchan, called the 'Padishah' (i.e. the 'Shah defender), succeeded his father Othman in 1324, and built offices for the transaction of public business at the great gate of the palace. In the language of diplomacy ambassadors are distinguished by the court or locality where they perform their functions, and those in Turkey are ambassadors to 'La Porte,' for French was for many years the language of diplomacy. The 'Sublime Porte' means the 'lofty gate.' Bagdad had been called 'The Porte' nearly a hundred years before the reign of Orchan.

Porte Libre, 1790. A prison in Paris, formerly the famous Port Royal monastery.

Porteous Riot (The), 1736. Two smugglers from Fife (Wilson and Robertson) were condemned to death, and confined in the Tolbooth of Edinburgh, popularly styled 'The Heart of Midlothian.' They tried to escape, but Wilson, a strong stout man, got wedged in the gap they had made, and the two prisoners were secured. When they attended service in the Tolbooth church they were guarded by four soldiers. Wilson seized two in his hands and one with his teeth, calling to Robertson to escape. Robertson shook off the remaining soldier, escaped, and was never again captured. When Wilson was executed Captain Porteous was ordered with his city guard to attend, and being assailed by stones he fired on the mob. His men also fired, killing four and wounding eleven of the mob. Porteous was tried for his life and found guilty, but received a reprieve. On 7 Sept., the day on which the reprieve expired, the mob broke into the Tolbooth, seized Porteous, and hanged him in the Grass Market, the place where Wilson was executed, on a dyer's pole, to which a new rope was suspended. This being done, the mob quietly dispersed, and did no mischief to any other person nor injury to any property. (See Sir Walter Scott, 'Heart of Midlothian.')

Portiforium (A). 'Liber vocatus Portiforium antiquum, secundum usum Sarum,' &c. That is, a breviary with running annotations; a portable manual.

Portland Vase (The). The famous Barberi'ni vase purchased from Sir William Hamilton by the Duchess of Portland for 1,000 guineas, and presented in 1810 to the British Museum by the Duke of Portland.

This Greek vase was for more than two centuries the principal ornament of the Barberini palace. The material is glass. It was a cinerary urn, but neither the maker nor date is known.

In 1845 it was wantonly smashed by William Lloyd, but has been very carefully repaired. It is ten inches high, and six in diameter at the broadest part.

Portugal (The Golden Age of). The reign of Emanuel (1495–1521). Vasco da Gama lived in this reign.

Portuguese Livy (The). João da Barros (1496–1570), author of 'Asia Portugueza.'

Positivism. The system of Auguste Comte (1799–1857). Discarding the possibility of knowing the beginning and the end of anything, it concerns itself only with what lies between. It accepts neither atheism, theism, nor pantheism. It may be divided into two parts: the historic conception and the co-ordination of the sciences. The former is this: that the human mind passes through three states, viz. the theological, the metaphysical, and the positive. In all subjects capable of experiment it passes from metaphysics to experimental verification or exact science. In regard to the co-ordination of the sciences the basis is mathematics; then follow astronomy, physics, chemistry, biology, and sociology. Take the last: The science of society is impossible without the science of life. The science of life is impossible without chemistry. Chemistry presupposes physics, physics astronomy, and astronomy mathematics.

Posse Comita'tus, i.e. the power of the county, meaning the persons whom a sheriff is empowered to raise in his county in case of rebellion, riot, or invasion. They are all the able-bodied men between fifteen and seventy years of age. Any peace officer can raise a posse to assist in quieting a rebellion or opposing an invasion.

It used to be customary for the high sheriff to meet the judge or judges a mile from the assize town, accompanied by a train of servants, yeomen, or others on horseback, called his 'posse-men.' After the assize the judges were similarly escorted out of the town; but since the introduction of railways these pageants have been discontinued

Post Office (The), London. Established by ordinance of parliament 1656

Remodelled in Queen Anne's reign 1710 by the Act of Settlement. Cross-posts projected by Ralph Allen, postmaster of Bath, who obtained a licence to establish them, for which he paid the government 6,000*l.* a year, and made a profit of 10,000*l.* annually. At his death the government added the cross-posts to the general post. Rowland Hill's reform was carried into effect in 1839, and the 'penny post' system was introduced.

This Ralph Allen is the 'Allworthy' of Fielding's 'Tom Jones.' A most benevolent man, of whom Pope says:

Let humble Allen, with an awkward shame,
Do good by stealth, and blush to find it fame.

Post Office Orders for the transmission of money were introduced in 1840. These orders require the names of sender and recipient, so a departure has been permitted in Postal Orders, which circulate like small notes.

Post Office Savings Bank, 1861. For investing small sums of money, from 1*s.* to 30*l.*, for which Government pays 6*d.* in the pound interest. Not more than 30*l.* can be deposited in any one year, and interest is not allowed for more than 150*l.*

Postage Stamp (The), 6 May, 1840. Invented by James Chalmers of Dundee [1782–1853]. His tablet records the event: 'To the memory of JAMES CHALMERS, Bookseller, Dundee. Born 1782. Died 1853. Originator of the Adhesive Postage Stamp, which saved the Penny Postage Scheme of 1840 from collapse, rendering it an unqualified success, and which has since been adopted throughout the postal systems of the world. This memorial was erected by his son Patrick Chalmers, Wimbledon, 1888.'

Adopted in America in 1847.

Postmaster. A 'scholar' is so called at Merton College, Oxford.

Postmastership, 1370. The tenure of the rights and privileges of a postmaster; a kind of scholarship in Merton College, Oxford, founded by Dr. Wyllyott for poor students called 'portionistæ,' but called 'postmasters' since 1380. The institution is peculiar to Merton.

Potato Disease (The), 1845. First a brown spot was observable on the skin of the potato; then the spot became darker, the leaves and flowers of the plant shrivelled up, and then in a short time the potato and stalk became putrid.

Potato Famine (The), 1846. The Irish famine produced by the almost utter failure of the potato crop from what was called 'potato-rot.' It is generally admitted that 200,000 persons died of famine in Ireland in the year of the potato-rot.

This fearful calamity has proved one of the greatest blessings to Ireland. 'It hurried on the introduction of free-trade. It indirectly brought about the arterial drainage of many of the main rivers of Ireland. It created the Land Improvement Act. It brought into existence the Incumbered Estates Court, one of the most important acts ever passed in Ireland. It drove some millions of Irish to the other side of the Atlantic. It broke up to a great extent the very small farms of Ireland. It relieved the plethora of the labour market. It removed the needy country gentlemen, and forced them to sell their estates to capitalists. It brought over hundreds of Scotchmen and Englishmen, who have introduced more scientific farming than had been hitherto practised in Ireland. And, in short, it has produced a revolution in the country which has continued to the present day.—W. S. TRENCH, Realities of Irish Life, p. 105.

Potato Snuff-boxes. Snuff-boxes made of mashed potatoes; the material resembled papier mâché. They were adorned with paintings and designs. Such snuff-boxes were common enough in the first half of the 19th cent.

Pothi (The). The Bible of the Sikhs (q.v.).

Potsdam, in Prussia (Treaty of), Oct. 1805. A treaty of alliance solemnised by Czar Alexander I. and Frederick William III. of Prussia by an oath sworn on the tomb of Frederick the Great. The object of this alliance was directed against Napoleon. The result was the battle of Austerlitz on 2 Dec. Russia lost 30,000 warriors, buried under the ice of a lake which broke beneath their feet, and 15 of her generals were taken prisoners, or slain on the field of battle.

Potteries (The). North Staffordshire is so called from the numerous pottery manufactories established there.

Potteries (The Father of the) Josiah Wedgwood (1730–1795).

Pouch (Captain). The assumed name of John Reynolds, head of the Levellers in the Midland counties in the May of 1607. Being captured, he was executed the same year.

Pougatcheff the Pretender. Emilian Pougatcheff, a Cossack of the Don, who had served during the Seven Years' war in the armies of Russia, Prussia, and Austria. On his return to his own country he incited a rebellion in 1773, and assumed to be Peter III., who had been assassinated in 1762. Defeated in 1774 on the banks of the Volga, he was captured, and beheaded at Moscow in 1775. See 'Otrepieff.'

Powis Medal. See under 'Camden and Powis Medals.'

Powys Land. One of the three divisions of Wales made by Roderick Mawr among his sons. Powys Land fell to the lot of Mawr's youngest son, Mervyn. (Powys, in Welsh, means 'the state of being at rest or peace.')

Poyning's Act, or 'Poyning's Law,' or 'Statute of Drogheda,' 10 Hen. VII. c. 22, A.D. 1495, which declared that all general statutes before then made in England shall be of force in Ireland also; and that no Irish act shall be valid unless first submitted to the king and council of England. The Irish parliament might reject a bill so approved, but could not alter it. Repealed 1782.

(Sir Edward Poyning was lord deputy of Ireland at the time.)

He [Charles I.] therefore authorised him to grant the suspension of Poyning's act, and to remove all the penal acts against the Catholics.—HOWITT, History of England, Charles I., p. 253.

Pozzi (The). Venetian dungeons beneath the level of the canals, in the hollow walls of the doge's palace. See 'Piombi.'

Præfectus Præto'rio. In the old Roman Empire. Augustus created two; but Tiberius reduced them to one: Commodus re-established the original number; but Diocletian created four, one for each quarter of his empire. The prætorian prefect was the commanding officer of the prætorian guard. In the second and third centuries they gradually usurped all authority and became virtually the masters even of the emperors. Constantine reduced their civil power, but gave each præfect authority in his own quarter, called his præfecture. The four were then called 'Præfectus prætorio per Gallias,' 'Præfectus prætorio per Illyricum,' 'Præfectus prætorio per Italiam,' and 'Præfectus prætorio per Orientem.'

There were many other officers called præfects: as præfectus annonæ, præfectus classi, præfectus legionibus, præfectus ærario, &c.

Præmunire (Statute of), 27 Edw. III. s. 1, c. 1, A.D. 1353. An act of Parliament specifying what things are to be denounced as marks of contempt of the king's kingship, such as the pope presuming to appoint church dignitaries instead of the sovereign; holding a royal court in the realm—it was for holding such a court as the pope's legate that Cardinal Wolsey was prosecuted—maintaining that the sovereign has no right to the crown, or that someone else has a better claim to it; to assist at the marriage of a royal prince or princess, contracted in violation of the established laws. The offences are short of treason, but show directly or indirectly a contempt for the king or queen. Martin V. called this statute 'execrabile illud statutum.'

'Præmunire' is dog Latin for præmoneri. The writ begins thus: Præmunire facias M or N . . . (i.e. you shall cause M or N to be forewarned that . . . &c.) The statutes are 25 Edw. I. 1306; 28 Edw. III. 1354; 16 Rich. II. 1393; 2 Hen. IV. 1401; 2d Hen. VIII. 1532; 5 Eliz. 1563, and many others. Some were repealed in 1846.

The most important points of these statutes besides those stated above are these prohibitions:

1. To prohibit the introduction into England of papal provisions.

2. To prohibit the intervention of the pope in ecclesiastical elections.

3. To prohibit English subjects being called to Rome on points which may be settled in the royal courts of our own land.

4. To prohibit foreigners being presented to English livings.

Gregory XI. convened a conference at Bruges in 1375 to discuss these statutes.

Prætor. A Roman magistrate with the function of a supreme judge in one of the provinces. He was the chief military, civil, legislative, and financial functionary. His legislative manifesto was called edictum prætōris. There were always at Rome two prætors, the prætor urbānus and the prætor peregrīnus, elected by the centuries. They were seated on a curule chair and arrayed with the toga prætexta.

The 'sella curūlis' was like a camp stool, used by kings, consuls, prætors, and curule ædiles, who carried their chair about with them. Originally they were made of ivory, but latterly they were inlaid with gold.

The 'toga prætexta' was a bordered robe worn by aristocratic children, chief magistrates, dictators, consuls, prætors, and ædiles.

Prætorian Guard (The). Originally the cohorts of the prætor, then the imperial guard. They received higher pay than other soldiers, and enjoyed several important privileges. There were originally nine prætorian cohorts; Vitellius increased the number to sixteen; Septimus Sevērus still further increased the number. For many years they acted as dictators, and their insolence, want of discipline, avidity, and insubordination became proverbial.

Pragmatic Sanction. 'Sanctio Pragmatica.' An ordinance relating to the State or to the Church. The Latin word sanctio means a decree or ordinance with a penalty attached, in other words 'a penal statute.' The word pragmaticus means relating to the state. Hence a pragmatic sanction is a 'penal statute relating to the state.'

In civil law a 'pragmatic sanction' means the response of the king to his council; the response to an individual was called a 'rescript.'

Historically a pragmatic sanction means a statute limiting or defining the power of the pope in foreign countries; or a statute fixing the succession of the crown in a certain line. What is generally meant by the term is the arrangement made by Karl VI. in 1713, whereby the crown of Germany was made hereditary in the house of Austria.

The most important pragmatic sanctions are the following:—

I. That of St. Louis in 1268, forbidding the pope to levy taxes in France, or to interfere in the appointment of the clergy.

This important ordinance did for France what the 'Constitutions of Clarendon' did for England.

The authenticity of this ordinance is doubtful, and certainly it is wholly out of harmony with the sainted king, who was canonised by Boniface III. only twenty-seven years after his decease. It is mentioned for the first time in the fifteenth century in the 'Bibliothèque des Conciles,' and is generally supposed to be a forgery.

II. Of Rense, in 1338, by which instrument an elected king of Germany was made ex officio kaiser or emperor of the holy Roman empire, independent of the pope's sanction, and without the necessity of going to Rome to be crowned by him.

Rens or Rense will not be found in ordinary maps. It is on the Rhine, five miles from Coblentz, and close by is the very famous Thronus Regālis (q.v.).

III. Of Bourges, called the 'Palladium of France,' 7 July, 1438, published by Charles VII. of France. This also had for its scope the limitation of the power of the papal authority in France. It forbade the pope to present to any dignity or any church living in the kingdom. It is called the Magna Charta of the Gallican Church.

It declares the authority of councils to be superior to that of the popes. Insists on the free election of abbots and bishops by the chapters and monks. It suppresses annates or first fruits and other taxes claimed by Rome. It greatly restricted the effects of excommunication and interdicts. François I. in 1516 suppressed this pragmatic sanction, and substituted 'The Concordat of Bologna' instead (q.v.), 1516.

IV. Of the Emperor Karl VI. (17 Apr. 1713), to secure the hereditary succession of the states of Austria in the female line. This was in order to transmit the crown to his eldest daughter, Maria Theresa. It was guaranteed by most of the great powers of Europe, but not by Spain till 1731. Karl VI. died in 1740.

This is the pragmatic sanction of historic eminence, and is meant unless some qualifying date or word is added to restrict it to some other instrument.

V. 1723, whereby Hungary and the Austrian provinces were declared inseparable, and the ruler of both was always to be one and the same person and of the Habsburg dynasty, in the regular order of succession in the male and female lines; but, otherwise, Hungary was to remain perfectly independent, and was to be governed by its own laws.

VI. Of Carlos III. of Spain (1759), to regulate the succession to the throne of the Two Sicilies.

VII. Of Don Ferdinand, 2 April, 1767, declaring all papal bulls and briefs to be null and void in the duchy of Parma and Piacenza, unless sanctioned by a ducal exequatur. Declared void by papal brief 1 Feb., 1768.

Our Constitutions of Clarendon, 1164, compelling the clergy to submit to the civil laws, were virtually a pragmatic sanction.

Prague (Peace of).

I. 1635, between Kaiser Ferdinand II. and the electors of Saxony and Brandenburg.

II. 23 Aug., 1866. At the close of the Seven Weeks' War, Austria was entirely excluded from Germany, and in 1870 the King of Prussia was declared German Emperor in addition to his other titles.

Praguerie (La), 1440. A revolt and conspiracy in France to dethrone Charles VII. and place Louis the Dauphin (Louis XI.) on the throne. The conspirators were Alexander, the natural son of Bourbon, Charles and Louis de Bourbon, Jean d'Alençon, La Trémoille, Dunois, La Hire, and Xaintrailles. Their head-quarters were Prague in Bohemia, whence the name; but the enterprise was badly conducted, and Charles, marching to Prague, crushed out the revolt before the end of six months. The conspirators tendered their submission, and were graciously pardoned.

Prairial 1, 2, 3, An. III. i.e. 20, 21, 22 May, 1795. Noted for the insurrection against the Convention, the last effort of the Jacobins against the Thermidorian reaction. The populace of the faubourg seized the Salle de la Convention, presided over by Boissy d'Anglas, and assassinated the deputy Féraud. The troops being called out dispersed the mob. The convention ordered the arrest of thirteen deputies who had taken part in the plot, six of whom were executed.

Prairial 30 An. VII. i.e. 18 June 1799. When the directors La Réveillière-Lepeaux and Merlin were turned out of office in favour of Roger Ducos and Moulins.

Pras'ina Factio. The Green Coats, a faction of Byzantium; so called from the green-coated charioteers in the circus. They were opposed to the Emperor Justinian, who was a Blue Coat, or favourer of the Venĕta Factio (q.v.).

Prason is the Greek for a 'leek,' and Prăsinus means green as a leek.

Prayer Book of Edward VI. (The First), published 1549. Compiled by Cranmer and Ridley, assisted by other divines. The Communion Service was drawn up for administration to the laity in both kinds; offices for holidays as well as for Sundays, for baptism and confirmation, were included; and the marriage and burial services were considerably altered. See 'King's Primer.'

It began with the Lord's Prayer; it retained prayers for the dead; it enjoined anointing of the sick. In 1550 the Ordination Service was added.

The Second, 1552. The First Prayer Book, revised by Cranmer, Martin Bucer, and Peter Martyr. The opening sentences, exhortation, confession, and absolution were added. The use of oil in baptism was discontinued, so was anointing the sick, and the prayers for the dead were struck out. In 1559 the book was revised, and the Elizabethan version is sometimes called 'The Third Common Prayer Book.' After the Hampton Court Conference (q.v.) in the reign of James I. the book was again revised, and some prayers for special occasions were introduced. In 1662, after the Restoration, when the new authorised version of the Scriptures was adopted, except in the Psalms, where Coverdale's version was followed, the sentences in the Communion Service, the General Thanksgiving, the Form of Prayer to be Used at Sea, the State Services (viz. for Gunpowder Treason, 5 Nov.; King Charles's Martyrdom, 30 Jan.; for the Restoration, 29 May; and the King's Accession) were annexed. The first three of these State Services were omitted by an order in council given by Queen Victoria in 1859.

Preacher (The). Juan Grandé of Andalusia (1546–1600).

Preaching Crosses. Generally either quadrangular or hexagonal, open on one or more sides, and raised on steps. They were used for the delivery of sermons in the open air. St. Paul's Cross was very celebrated, and the collection of sermons preached there is still known and highly appreciated.

Queen Elizabeth, we are told, once went in state to St. Mary's Cross to hear one of the Reformers preach. Besides a vast train of lords and ladies, she was 'accompanied by 1,000 soldiers, ten great cannons, hundreds of drums and trumpets, a party of morris-dancers, and two white bears.' She delighted in loud music, for even when she went to dinner twelve trumpets, two kettle-drums, and various other noisy instruments amused her with thundering uproar.

Preaching Friars, 1215. The idea of this order was suggested by Dominic at the Council of Lateran, with a view of stamping out the Vaudois and other enemies of 'the Church.' At a later period these preaching friars were called Dominicans, from Dominic their founder.

St. Francis of Assisi about the same time founded the order of Franciscans or Minor Friars, worthy rivals of the Dominicans.

Pre-Adamite Sovereign (The). So the bankers of England nicknamed the Georgian sovereigns called in by Mr. Goschen in April 1890.

The pre-Adamite sovereign is now very much in evidence, for everywhere there are notices posted up to the effect that they cannot be received. The Georgian gold is, in fact, as carefully avoided as were French coppers a couple of years ago.—Newspaper paragraph in April 1890.

Prebend, Prebendary. A prebend is a provision in land or money given to a church in præbendam, i.e. for the support of a clergyman whose title is either prebendary or canon. There are numerous honorary prebendaries and canons without any stipend at all, but they are provided with a prebendal stall in the cathedral church of the diocese, and are expected to preach in the cathedral occasionally, or to supply a substitute.

Preceptor. The master of a preceptory, that is, a manor of the Knights Templars. His duty was to take care of the lands and collect the rents. Sometimes the word preceptor is applied to the 'Magni Priores cujusque provinciæ, penes quos erat summa potestas.' Du Cange makes the word equivalent to 'Dominus Princeps, Supremus Magistratus,' and in A.D. 950 to 'Abbas.'

Præceptories were benefices . . . possessed by the more eminent sort of the Templers [sic], whom the Chief Master by his authority created and called 'Præceptores Templi.' — STEPHEN, De Jurisdictione, bk. iv. chap. x. No. 27.

Precious Blood (The Feast of the). The 1st Sunday in July. There are other days dedicated to the Precious Blood—for example, the fourth Friday in Lent. Sometimes Corpus Christi (the Thursday after Trinity Sunday) is so called. Hence the hymn of St. Thomas Aquinas. See 'Sunday.'

Pange lingua gloriosi Corporis mysterium
Sanguinisque pretiosi, quem in mundi pretium
Fructus ventris generosi Rex effudit gentium.

Precis'ian (A), 1572. One of that section of the Puritan party who considered obedience to the civil government a matter of indifference. Or one who professes a precise or thorough puritan code of faith and conduct.

Since that [the burning of Latimer and Ridley] Tony married a pure Precisian, and is as good a Protestant as the best.—Sir W. SCOTT, Kenilworth, ch. ii.

Here is what neither Papist nor Puritan, Latitudinarian nor Precisian, ever . . . makes mouths at.—Ibid. chap. vi.

Precursor Association (O'Connell's), or 'Precursor Society,' 1838. So called because it was designed to be the precursor of the Repeal of the Union. O'Connell said he had 2,000,000 'Precursors' to second his efforts.

Predestinarian Controversy (The), 1594–1600. The question was, which was correct, Calvin or Arminius. Calvin asserted that God from all eternity predestinated certain men unto eternal life, wholly irrespective of the works or faith of those individuals. Arminius asserted that God predestinated certain persons to eternal life because by His foreknowledge He foresaw they would be meet for salvation. The matter was debated at Lambeth Palace, and the result was the nine Lambeth Articles (q.v.), which are doubtlessly Calvinistic.

Those who wish to know what view the Church of England takes on this question, must consult Article XVII. of the Thirty-nine Articles.

Predestinarians. A religious sect, headed by John Calvin. They held that the elect are predestined to be saved, and cannot sin away grace.

The Predestinarians preached that the elect could not sin, nor the regenerate fall from grace. —BLUNT, Reformation in England, p. 158.

Pre-established Harmony. A term used by Leibnitz (1646–1716) to explain the dual nature of man. He supposed there are in man two sorts of monads or protoplasms, one spiritual and the other material, and that they act together by 'pre-established harmony.' He compared man to two clocks, one the mind clock and the other the body clock. The mind clock determines, and the body clock by simultaneous action does the very thing that the mind determined on. Not because soul and body are one, but only because they work together in perfect harmony. Locke denied the fact of 'innate ideas'; Leibnitz maintained that the seeds of ideas are in the mind, as the seeds of plants are in the plants.

Préfet. A French administrator of a department called his préfecture. Each préfet has his sous-préfets with authority in an arrondissement.

Prega'di (The). The Venetian senate, between the Forty and the Grand Council. To this senate was assigned all deliberations upon peace and war, the voting of supplies, and the confirmation of laws. Both the Forty and the Pregadi were elected by the Grand Council (Consiglio Grande).

Pre'latists. So the Scotch, in 1643, &c., called the royalists in contempt, because they tried to force Episcopacy on the people. In 1647 'Presbyterianism was declared to be the established religion of Scotland.'

Premonstratensian Order (The), or 'Norbertines,' 1119. Instituted by St. Norbert in the diocese of Laon, during the reign of Louis le Gros. The spot, which was a meadow, was pointed out to him in a vision, and was therefore called Pratum Monstrātum, in French Pré Montré. They are White Canons of the rule of St. Augustine, wear a white soutane and scapular, and wholly abstain from animal food.

Pre-Raphaelitism, 1849. A school of painting which originated in England with W. Holman Hunt, D. G. Rossetti, Alma Tadēma, and J. E. Millais. So called because it was supposed to be the style of painting anterior to Raphael. Raphael painted as he thought persons and things ought to be. The pre-Raphaelites are supposed to copy nature exactly.

Prerogative Court (The). A court in which wills were proved and administrations taken out. So called because it belonged to the prerogative of the archbishop to take charge of these matters. There was one in the province of Canterbury, and another in the province of York. This jurisdiction was transferred to the Probate Court in 1858.

Presburg (Diet of), 1687. Declared the crown of Hungary no longer elective, but hereditary in the Austrian male line.

Presburg, in Hungary (Treaty of), 26 Dec., 1805. A treaty of peace between France and Austria, soon after the battle of Austerlitz, and breaking up the third coalition against Napoleon. By this treaty Austria ceded Venice to France, and the Tyrol to Bavaria, the ally of France.

Presbyterian Synod of Munster (The). Formed about 1660. See 'Synod of Munster.'

Presbyterians. Christians who disavow the office of bishop and acknowledge instead certain delegated elders or presbyters, of whom the 'minister' of each of the Presbyterian congregations is one. The affairs of each of their congregations are administered by a court, styled in Scotland the 'kirk session,' and consisting of the minister or ministers, and the other elders. The appeal from this court is to the presbytery, which is constituted of the ministers of a certain number of congregations and one 'ruling elder' from each congregation. Further appeal may be made to the General Assembly. Presbyterianism prevails chiefly in Scotland.

The Presbyterian Church of England was founded by the Puritans. There are also Presbyterian Baptists, Reformed Presbyterians or Covenanters, the United Presbyterians, the Welsh Presbyterians, Free Church Presbyterians, and Unitarian Presbyterians.

Presbytery (A). A synod in the Presbyterian Church of Scotland, composed of all the ministers in a given district, the professors of divinity, and an elder from each 'kirk session' (q.v.). The chairman is called the 'moderator.' See 'Provincial Synod.'

Presbytery (The), 1689. The second of the four ecclesiastical governing bodies of the Kirk of Scotland. It is composed of the ministers of several contiguous parishes, who sit in it ex officio, and of an elder from each of the kirk sessions (q.v.) in the district, who is chosen for six months. It licenses and inducts ministers, and has a veto on those presented by patrons. Manses and churches are under their supervision, and an appeal may be made to this body from the judgment of the kirk session. See also 'Synod,' and 'General Assembly.'

Presbytery of Antrim (The). A body of Presbyterians who separated from the 'Synod of Ulster' in 1727, and from the 'Remonstrant Synod' (q.v.) in 1827.

Presentment of Englishry (The). In the case of murder the hundred was fined by the Danes and Normans unless it could be proved that the murdered person was an Englishman.

A presentment is a presumption from observation, as the presentment of a nuisance, the presentment of a libel, upon which the officer of the court frames an indictment. Englishry means the law respecting the English, or the state of being English-born.

Preserver of his Country (The). The Duc de Guise, called 'Le Balafré,' had this title conferred upon him by the Parlement of Paris in 1540.

President. In Oxford University the title of the head of four of the colleges: Corpus, Magdalen, St. John's, and Trinity. In Cambridge University the head of Queens' College is called the president, of King's College the provost, and of all the other colleges the master.

President and Council of the North (Court of). 31 Henry VIII. To try rioters against the suppression of the lesser monasteries. It also included all the powers vested in the king's own council, and had power to arraign all offenders against the king's prerogatives.

Prestation. Road rate. Nominally every ratepayer in France is bound to give three days' labour to keep the parish roads in repair; these are called 'journées de prestation,' and for the most part are compounded for by a money payment. The 'agents voyers cantonaux,' or road surveyors, in each parish determine what must be done.

In Saxon times one of the three exactions of Trinoda Necessitas was 'Bryge-bot,' for keeping roads as well as bridges in repair.

Prester John. Togrul Wang Khan, chief of the Mongol tribe of the Keraïtes, who held his court at Karakorum and established a sovereignty over those pastoral regions. He was slain in battle by his son-in-law Ghengis Khan (12th cent.).

Called Prester because he tolerated and perhaps favoured the Nestorian Christians. Ghengis Khan was called at the time Timurghen, but after the death of Togrul Wang his father-in-law he called himself the 'Great Khan.'—History of Ghengis Khan, chap. i. p. 24-26.

Preston Affair (The). The surrender of Preston, in Lancashire, 13 Nov., 1715, when 1,700 Jacobite insurgents yielded to General Carpenter. Amongst them were Thomas Forster (the commander), Brigadier Mackintosh of Boreland, Lord Derwentwater, Lord Kenmure, and Lord Widdrington with his two brothers (Charles and Peregrine).

The Hon. Peregrin[e] Widdrington, died 4 Feb., 1748-9. . . . he was with his brother in the Preston affair.

A mural monument in the Sherburne Chapel.

Pretender (The), in English history. The Old Pretender was the Chevalier de St. George, son of James II., who 'pretended' that he had a right to be king of Great Britain after the death of his father. The Young Pretender was Charles Edward son of the Chevalier de St. George.

Of course these two princes were rightful heirs to the crown if the crown went by inheritance, but in England it is the people or parliament who appoint the king or queen, and the line from William I. has been broken over and over again; for example, John; Henry IV., V., VI.; Henry VII., and all the Tudors; Richard III.; William III., and all the Hanoverians.

Pretio'sus (The Bull), by Benedict XIII., to explain that of Unigēnītus (q.v.), and the doctrine of grace. So called from the first word in the bull. Benedict was pope 1724–1730.

Prêtre Insermenté (Un). A priest during the French Revolution who refused to take the oath 'à la constitution civile du clergé' decreed in 1790. Hundreds of these priests were put to death, and their names have been duly canonised.

Those who agreed to take the oath were called prêtres assermentés.

Pride's Purge, 2 Dec., 1648. Purging the House of Commons of all members favourable to the king and willing to abet his return to power. This was done by Colonel Pride, who blockaded the house with Rich's regiment of cavalry, and his own regiment of foot. He imprisoned 41 (some say 47) of the leading Presbyterian members in a sort of cellar belonging to the house and called 'Hell'; and next day other members were removed, leaving only 60 to form the house. These 60, being the fag-end of the Long Parliament, went by the name of the 'Rump.' The emasculated parliament complied with the Remonstrance (q.v.), removed the king (Charles I.) to Windsor, resolved on his immediate trial for 'treason against his people,' and nominated a court of 150 commissioners with Bradshaw at their head to conduct the trial. See 'Parliaments.'

Priest of Nature (The). Sir Isaac Newton (1642–1727).

Priests. 'Primi ordĭnis sacerdōtes,' bishops. 'Secundi ordĭnis sacerdōtes,' ordinary priests ('Pontificale Romanum').

Priests

Of the BUDDHISTS are called Bonzes.
Of the GAULS, BRITONS, &c., were called Druids.
Of the JEWS, Cohenim (singular cohen). All of the tribe of Levi.

PRIESTS

Of the HINDÛS, Brahmans.

Of the MOSLEMS, Imâms, Dervishes, &c. In TARTARY, Mullas. N.B. Mollahs are not priests, but Turkish judges.

In Japan there is a spiritual emperor, called the Mikádo, who is also at present (1890) the temporal one.

Priests (Greek). Neōkŏroi. The Eumolpĭdês of Athens were hereditary priests. Each separate divinity had its special priests, as the Idêan Daktūloi, the Korybantês, the Bacchantês (priestesses of Bacchus or Dionȳsos), the priests of Zeus, &c. &c.

The pontiff who presided over the priests of Heräklês was called Dadouchos.

The pontiff who presided over the priests of Pallas was called Stephanoph'oros.

'Parasites' were priests who gathered in the corn and wine for the temple services.

The Korybantês were priests of Rhea. Called at Rome Galli, or priests of Cybêlê.

The Daktuloi of Ida were so called because they were ten in number.

The Technites were sorcerers.

Priests (Roman) were chosen only from the most distinguished citizens, and were divided into three classes:—

(a) The four great colleges, called Pontiffs, Augurs, Epulōnês (4 syl.), and Quindecemviri.

(b) The three inferior colleges, called Arvâles Fratres, Curiōnes (4 syl.), Feciâles (4 syl.).

(c) The priests of special deities, as the Flamens, the Salii, the Lupersi, the Galli, the Pinarii, the Politians, and some few others.

I. The four great colleges:

The Pontiffs, originally four, but subsequently nine. They had the supreme supervision of all the priests, and of all religious rites. The head of the college was entitled 'Pontifex Maximus.'

Augurs included Auspices and Haruspices. 'Augurs'—were those who foretold future events from any sort of prodigy or omen. 'Auspicês' were those who foretold future events from the inspection of birds. 'Haruspicês' were those who foretold future events by inspecting the entrails of beasts sacrificed, or from the smoke and flame of sacrifices, as in the sacrifices of Cain and Abel.

Epulōnes (4 syl.), a college of seven priests, whose duty it was to superintend the sacred feasts (epŭlæ), and more especially the 'epulum Jovis.'

Quindecemviri, a college of fifteen priests, who had charge of the Sibylline books (q.v.).

II. The three inferior colleges:

Arvâles Fratres, a college of twelve priests, who offered sacrifice to secure the fertility of the fields (arva).

Curiōnes (4 syl.), a college of thirty priests, one for each curia or district of Rome. Each curio was expected to perform the sacred rites of his own special curia or district.

Feciâles (4 syl.), a college of twenty priests, whose duty it was to see to the honour of Rome in all dealings with foreign states. They declared war, and dictated terms of peace.

III. Special priests:

Flamens, priests devoted to the service of some particular deity.

Salii, priests of Mars, who had charge of the twelve sacred shields. They were always patricians of high rank, and on the 1st March every year carried the sacred shields through the city in grand procession.

The Luperci were priests of Pan. The great festival was called the Lu'percal. Shakespeare makes Antony say:

You all do know that on the Lu'percal
I thrice presented him [Cæsar] a kingly crown,
Which he did thrice refuse. Was that ambition?
Julius Cæsar.

The Galli, or priests of Cybêle (3 syl.).

The Pinarii, or priests of Hercules, and some few others.

Priest's Hole (The). A secret contrivance in old Catholic mansions for the concealment of the priest in times of persecution. Several still exist as curiosities.

Priests of the Mission. Same as Lazarists. Instituted 1625 by Vincent de Paul; organised for training young missionaries. See 'Lazarus.'

Priests of the Saviours (The), B.C. 307–287, and nominally till A.D. 264. Officers of Athens who superseded the archons eponymic.

Primate of All England (The). The Archbishop of Canterbury.

Primate of England (The). The Archbishop of York.

Prime. One of the eight daily services of the Catholic Church, and second of the four lesser ones, at six in the morning. The first hour of the day. See 'Canonical Hours.'

Primer Seizin. A whole year's profits of an estate paid by a king's tenant on first coming to his new tenement. Introduced by William the Conqueror, and abolished by 12 Car. II. c. 24.

Primitive Fathers of the Christian Church. Those who succeeded the Apostolic Fathers. The latter were born in the first cent., and were more or less contemporary with the apostles. The Primitive Fathers were not born till after the 1st cent., and were not contemporary with the apostles. These nine are the Primitive Fathers, and with Clemens, Hermas, Ignatius, Polycarp (and Barnabas) make up the Fathers of the first two cents. :—

Died	Died
167. Justin Martyr.	253. Origen.
190. Theophilus of Antioch.	258. Cyprian bishop of Carthage.
200. Irenæus.	265. Dionysius of Alexandria.
220. Clement of Alexandria.	270. Gregory Thaumaturgus.
240. Tertullian.

Primitive Methodists, 1810. Reformed Methodists originated in Staffordshire and led by Hugh and J. Bourne, W. Clowes, and others, who thought the Connection too rigid in not allowing camp-meetings and women to preach. They advocate field preaching and street preaching of an emotional character. Sometimes called 'Ranters' by way of disrespect.

Primitive Wesleyans of Ireland (The), 1816. They seceded because they did not approve of the administration of the Lord's Supper by their preachers, but considered that they should receive the holy communion from the hands of a clergyman of the Church of England.

Primrose (The). The flower-emblem of the political adherents of Benjamin Disraeli (Lord Beaconsfield), 1805–1881. The tale is that when young he made a bet of a pair of gloves respecting a wreath of primroses. The point in doubt was whether the primroses were real or artificial. Mr. Disraeli staked that they were real, and won the bet. The lady competitor presented the successful guesser with one of the primroses, and Disraeli, with the gallantry of a young man, vowed he would preserve the flower faithfully and adopt it as his badge. For another derivation see note to 'Primrose League.'

Primrose Day, 19 April. The anniversary of the death of the Earl of Beaconsfield, founded by Sir George Birdwood in memory of the great Conservative leader, who died 19 April, 1881. He suggested to the St. Stephen's Club that the dining-tables of the club should be decorated with primroses on 19 April. Next year it was suggested that an annual festival should be adopted, and Sir George Birdwood made arrangements with a large firm of Covent Garden florists to advertise largely at his expense the supply of primroses to any extent for 19 April. It was a complete success, and was soon followed by the establishment of Primrose Leagues throughout the United Kingdom.

Primrose League (The), 1883. An association of men and women to carry out the policy of Benjamin Disraeli, Lord Beaconsfield: 'The maintenance of true religion, of the three estates of the realm, and of the imperial ascendency of Great Britain.' The lodges are called 'habitations,' and a habitation consists of thirteen or more knights companions, knights harbingers, or knights almoners, and each knight has his squire. The chief ladies are called 'dames' (lady patronesses). A certain number of district habitations form a central habitation, by which the ruling council is elected. The Marquis of Abergavenny was the first 'grand councillor of the league.' See 'Primrose Day.'

The league was first organised in 1884, and inaugurated with a banquet 19 April, under the expectation of a general election, which took place between Nov. and Dec., 1885. The primrose is Beaconsfield's flower, as the violet is the Napoleonic flower.

* * A Primrose Order of Knights existed in Spain at the beginning of the 18th cent. (before 1717).

A rumour was very current for two or three years that the Queen, on the day of Lord Beaconsfield's funeral, sent a primrose wreath on which was written 'His favourite flower,' meaning the favourite flower of the late Prince Consort. Happily this error has been stamped out by the following letter:—

'Windsor Castle, 1 May, 1888.

'Sir,—The Queen did not send a wreath of primroses to Lord Beaconsfield's funeral, and consequently there could have been no inscription of the nature you describe.—I have the honour to be, sir, your obedient servant,

'HENRY PONSONBY.

'To John Churchill Sikes (50 Agate Road, The Grove, Hammersmith, W.).'

Primrose Pilgrimage (The), 19 April. A visit to the statue of Lord Beaconsfield in Parliament Square in order to decorate it with primrose wreaths. Of course it is a Conservative demonstration.

Prince (The). 'Del Principe.' The great work of Niccolò Machiavelli of Florence (1469–1527), setting forth his political principles.

The student of Machiavelli had not studied 'The Prince' in vain.—GREEN, Hist. of the English People, p. 335.

Prince Consort Prize (The). For original historic research. Given every alternate year to graduates of not more than four years' standing. Value about 100*l*. Founded from the surplus of a memorial fund of Prince Albert, chancellor of the University of Cambridge, 1888. See 'Modern History,' &c.

Prince Florizel. George IV. Also called 'Fum the Fourth,' 'The Fat Adonis of Fifty.' But the bitterest satire of all was 'The First Gentleman of Europe.'

Prince Tite. The nickname of George II.

Prince of Fools (The). The manager of the 'Enfans sans Souci.' (q.v.).

Prince of German Poets (The). Goethe (1749–1832).

Prince of Lyric Poets (The). Charles Dupérier, born at Aix (1620–1692). So called by Menage. One of the French Pléiade poets.

Prince of Music (The). J. Pierluigi Palestrina (1529–1594).

Prince of Peace (The). A pun or abbreviation of 'Prince of the Peace.' Manuel de Godoy, duke of Alcudia, the cavalier of Maria Luiza, wife of Carlos IV. of Spain, was so called because he effected the pacification of Bâle, 22 July, 1795 (4 Thermidor, Year III.).

In one year this obscure garde-de-corps received the titles of lieutenant-general, admiral of the Spanish fleet, duke of Alcudia, knight of the Golden Fleece; and on his marriage with the king's niece he was created 'Prince of the Peace.' Born at Badajos 1767, died at Paris 1828.

Prince of Priests (The), 1420. Henry V. of England, who on his wedding tour visited the shrine of every saint on his way. He was most assiduous in his devotions, most profusely liberal in his contributions, and most severe in repressing Lollardism.

Prince of Quarrellers (The). Beaumarchais (1732–1799). A first-rate duellist and universal genius. Now best known by his two comedies, the 'Barber of Seville,' in four acts, and the 'Marriage of Figaro,' in five acts.

Prince of the Youth (The). Gonzalvo di Cordŏva, the great captain (1453–1515).

Prince's Metal. A metal like gold invented by Prince Rupert of Bavaria, nephew of Charles I. It is a mixture of copper and zinc.

Prince's Peers (The), 1456. Tradesmen, farmers, and even mechanics, ennobled for money by Louis the Dauphin (Louis XI.), when he revolted against his father, Charles VII.

Prince'ites (2 syl.). The members of the Agapĕmŏnê, in Somersetshire, established by Henry James Prince. Letters to Prince are addressed 'The Lord.' He said to Mr. Hepworth Dixon, 'You see in me Christ in the flesh, Christ in my flesh.' He calls his wife 'the bride of his soul.' He says 'Christ came to redeem the soul, I am come to redeem the body.' Mr. Prince in 1851 took a party to the Great Exhibition. He drove about like a prince, with outriders bareheaded. Prince was born in 1811.

Principal. In Oxford University; the title of the head of three colleges (Brasenose, Jesus, and Hertford), and of the four halls (New Inn, St. Alban's, St. Edmund, and St. Mary).

Principality (The). In Roman history means the first three centuries of the empire, from Augustus to Diocletian (B.C. 29 to A.D. 287), when the emperor had no other title except princeps. Diocletian introduced the title of Augustus, which had been occasionally loosely applied before his time, but not definitely.

Principia of Newton (The). 'Philosophiæ Naturalis Principia Mathematica,' in three books, by Isaac Newton.

Book I. (1686). The motion of bodies in free space. Every particle of matter attracts every other particle with a force which varies directly as the masses, and inversely as the square of the distance between them.

Book II. (3 months later). Of motion in a resisting medium. Hydrostatics and hydrodynamics. With a confutation of the Cartesian theory of vortices.

Book III. (1687). The solar system. The motion of the moon, the theory of the tides, the proof that comets belong to the solar system.

It is an inquiry into the truth of Kepler's 'Laws of Motion'

Printer's Bible (The). Makes David pathetically complain that the 'printers [princes] have persecuted me without a cause.' See 'Bible.'

Prior (A), or 'Prior of the Arts.' A magistrate in the republic of Florence who superseded the Anziani or seniors in 1282. At first there were three priors, then six, and finally eight.

Priori (Six), 1293. The executive government of Florence placed in the hands of six presidents. Dante the poet was one of the six priori in 1300.

Prisage of Wine (The). The right of taking two casks out of each vessel for the crown.

Priscillianists (The). Followers of Priscillian (4th cent.). A learned Spaniard, bishop of Avila in Spain. Their doctrines were substantially those of the Manichæans, who taught that there were two principles, one of good and the other of evil. Priscillian said that the good principle in its descent from God to Earth fell into the power of the evil principle, and got corrupted. He also taught what is called Docētism; that is, that the actions and sufferings of Christ were not real, but only phenomenal.

Prison Authors and Literature.

BACON (Roger) imprisoned in 1278 in France by order of Pope Nicholas IV. During confinement he wrote his treatise 'On the Means of Avoiding the Infirmities of Old Age.'

BOETHIUS (Anicius Manlius Torquātus Severīnus) wrote his 'De Consolatione Philosophiæ' in his prison at Pavia, about 523; he was beheaded in 524.

BRIENNE (Le Comte de) wrote his 'Memoirs' during his eighteen years' incarceration at St. Lazare. He died 1698.

BUNYAN wrote his 'Grace Abounding' (1666) and Part I. of his 'Pilgrim's Progress' while confined in Bedford Gaol (1660-1672).

 Part I. of 'Pilgrim's Progress' was printed 1678, and Part II. in 1684.

CARLILE (Richard), during his ten years' imprisonment, edited various journals, and won the right of a free press.

COBBETT (William) carried on his 'Political Register' while in prison (1810-1812).

COMBE (William) wrote his 'Tour of Dr. Syntax' during his twenty years' imprisonment in the King's Bench (1743-1823).

COOPER (Thomas), born 1805, wrote in Stafford Gaol the 'Purgatory of Suicides' (1845) in Spenserian verse; published under the patronage of Benjamin Disraeli; and 'Wise Saws and Modern Instances.'

DAVITT (Michael) while confined in Portland wrote 'Leaves from a Prison Diary, or Lectures to a Solitary Audience,' which was published in 1884.

DEFOE wrote his celebrated 'Review' in prison (1704), and again (1718).

DIDEROT was imprisoned at Vincennes in 1749, when he began his famous 'Mémoires.'

HALL (Thomas) wrote in the Debtors' Ward, Winchester, a volume of 'Poems' towards the close of the 18th cent.

HARPSFIELD (Nicholas), Regius Professor of Greek, Oxford, was imprisoned in the Tower in 1562, and died there in 1583. He wrote in the Tower his bulky controversial work entitled 'Dialogi sex contra summi pontificatus, &c., oppugnatores, &c.,' published 1566; and a 'History of the Anglican Church,' published after his death in 1622.

HETHERINGTON in prison composed political and poetical ephemera.

JONES (Ernest) composed in gaol his political novel in which he attacked Feargus O'Connor, and parodied the Chartist agitation (1848-1850).

LOVELACE (Richard) wrote some beautiful ditties to his 'Divine Althea' (Lucy Sacheverell) while in prison for presenting from Kent a petition to the Long Parliament in behalf of the king (Charles II.).

LOVETT composed in prison poetical and political ephemera.

MIRABEAU was imprisoned in Vincennes three years and a half (beginning 7 June, 1777); during which confinement he wrote his 'Lettres à Sophie,' and 'Les Lettres de Cachet et les Prisons d'Etat.' He also translated in prison part of 'The Elegies of Tibullus,' 'Boccaccio's Decameron,' his 'Mémoires du Ministère du Duc d'Aiguillon,' and several other works.

OASTLER (Richard) kept up a fusillade of pamphlets in favour of the Ten Hours' Bill while in the Fleet Prison (born 1789, died 1861).

O'BRIEN (William) wrote the main part of his novel 'When We Were Boys' while imprisoned for inciting to Irish disturbances. It was published in April 1890.

ORLÉANS (Charles d') comte d'Angoulême during his twenty-five years' captivity in the 15th cent. wrote, among other poetry, his charming ode to Spring, beginning 'Le tems a laissié son manteau.'

PAGANO (Mario) wrote his 'Saggi Politici' in prison (1788-1792). He was executed at Naples in 1800.

PAINE (Thomas) wrote the second part of his 'Age of Reason' while imprisoned in Paris by command of Robespierre, 1794-5.

PAMPHILUS bishop of Cæsarea composed his 'Five Books in Defence of Origen' during the two years of his imprisonment. Eusebius completed the sixth book after the death of Pamphilus.

PELLISON wrote his two 'Discours au Roi' and a 'Mémoire' of his friend Fouquet while a prisoner in the Bastille (1661-1666).

PENN (William), 1644-1718, while in the Tower, where he was confined at the instigation of the Bishop of London, wrote his famous 'No Cross, no Crown' (1668-9).

RALEIGH (Sir Walter) wrote his 'History of the World' (down to B.C. 170) during his thirteen years' imprisonment in the Tower (1552-1618). He was beheaded 1618.

SACY'S Bible, the Port Royal translation into French, was made by Isaac Lemaistre [Sacy] (1666-1670) during his imprisonment in the Bastille.

TAYLOR (Robert) composed his 'Devil's Pulpit' while in Oakham Gaol.

THOMAS (F.) of Jesus, while confined in a dungeon in Morocco composed his 'Sufferings of Christ' (16th cent.).

VINCENT composed in prison poetical and political ephemera.

WOLLETT composed his 'Black Dwarf' in prison.

VOLTAIRE in 1717 spent eleven months in the Bastille, during which time he wrote two cantos of his 'Henriade,' and revised his tragedy of 'Œdipe.'

 Luther translated the Bible into German while he was lying perdu in the old castle of Wartburg. This was not strictly speaking a prison, but it was virtually so.

Similarly: The crypt under the church of St. Maria, in Via Lata, is said to have been the place where Paul was held in captivity when he wrote his 'Epistles' to the Hebrews, Ephesians, Philippians, Philemon, and 2 Timothy.

There is also a tradition that St. Peter dictated the 'Gospel of Mark' while a prisoner at Rome; and some say that Luke wrote his 'Acts' in Rome.

Prison Dress. A third-class man, that is, a man who has completed his first year satisfactorily, has black facing to his jacket, and begins to earn something. In twelve months more he is promoted to the second class, and his jacket is faced with yellow. In twelve months more, if still on the good-conduct list, his jacket is faced with blue. If still under prison discipline at the end of four and a half years, he may receive a distinctive blue dress which will entitle him to a bonus of 3*l.* at his discharge. See 'Breeches Martyrs.'

A black facing may earn 1*d.* for 20 good marks; a yellow facing 1 d.; and a blue facing 2 d., credited to him, and given him at his discharge. Twenty good marks may be earned in about two days and a half. This allowance continues till it reaches the sum of 3*l.*

Private Wars. Those everlasting and wretched contests of the middle ages, between different barons, such as our war of the Two Roses, those of the Capulets and Montagues of Italy, the Armagnacs and Burgundians of France, the Guelfs and the Ghibellines, and so on. Charlemagne introduced a law to put a stop to these feuds, but it was powerless. The Church introduced the Paix de Dieu (q.v.), which suspended hostilities on certain days; but St. Louis established the Quarantaine-le-Roi (q.v.), and punished with death those who violated it. See 'Vendetta.'

Privilege of Union in Aragon. A brotherhood or confederacy for obtaining redress of grievances by armed force, as the barons of England obtained Magna Charta from King John. This privilege was granted by Alfonso III. in 1287, and confirmed by Alfonso X. as a right of the nobility.

The law runs thus: 'The duty of subjects towards their king enjoins them not to suffer him knowingly to endanger his salvation . . . or produce mischief to his kingdom. This may be done in two ways: one by good advice . . . and the other by preventing him from running to his own ruin.'

Privy Council (The). The 'Curia Regis' existed under Henry III.; the Concilium Privātum or Privy Council arose in the reign of Henry VI., but it was Charles II. who first appointed a cabinet of fifty members because he found the council unworkable. Its number now is indefinite, the members are 'Right Hon.' for life. It works by committees, except when the sovereign issues 'orders in council.'

In the reigns of James I. and Charles I., the 'Star Chamber' was formed from the Privy Council. The chief committees of the Privy Council are the 'Committee of Trade and Plantations, 1668'; the 'Judicial Committee'; the 'Committee of Education, 1839'; the 'Local Government Board, 1871,' &c.

Privy Council of Ireland (The) consists of some fifty or sixty members. Almost all the judges are members.

Processio Plenaria.

Stent in ordine suo singuli in ecclesiam expectantes donec veniat pontifex cum processione plenaria ad Missam, sicut diebus solemnibus solet cum septem diaconibus, totidemque subdiaconibus et ceroferariis, et duobus thuribulis cum incenso.—Quoted by DU CANGE, vol. v. p. 467, col. 1.

Procession of the Black Breeches (The), 20 June, 1792. Carlyle says in the procession led by Santerre to the Tuileries were 'tricolour ribands streaming from pike-head; iron-shod bâtons; a bull's heart transfixed, and with this inscription, "Heart of an Aristocrat"; and, more striking still, a pair of old black silk breeches, extended on a cross-staff, with this inscription, "Tremble, tyrants; here are the Sans-culottes."' The chapter is headed 'Procession of the Black Breeches' (CARLYLE, 'French Revolution,' last chap. of book v.).

One of the standards consists of a pair of black silk breeches on a pole with the motto, 'Without breeches, but free.'—HOWITT, Hist. of England (Geo. III. p. 617).

They shut their gates after the day of the Black Breeches.—CARLYLE, French Revolution, vol. ii book vi. 4.

Procession to Hernals (The). The estate of the Jörgers, 'where the Catholic doctrine had been first profaned by a Lutheran sermon,' established by the Jesuits in the reign of Kaiser Ferdinand II. (1619–1637).

Processional (A). A book containing all that pertains to ecclesiastical processions (1600).

Proclidæ (Dynasty of the), B.C. 1100–219. One of the two contemporaneous dynasties of Sparta. The other was the dynasty of the Agīdæ. The former received its name from Proclēs, son of Aristodēmus, and the latter from Agis son of Eurysthĕnēs.

Proconsul. In the Roman empire was the quasi-consul of a province. The first was Titus Quintius Barbātus (B.C.

464). Pompey was for three years proconsul of the sea. Julius Cæsar was for five years proconsul of Gaul. As a rule they were avaricious, tyrannical, and immoral. The name is a hissing and a byword.

Proconsuls, 1793. French commissioners appointed by the Convention, with uncontrolled power to arrest persons suspected of being counter-revolutionists, or those who murmured at the new state of things. They had the power of taxing the rich, making compositions with them, and of seizing private horses for the use of the army. These commissioners were most arbitrary and insolent.

Proctors (The), 1629, of our universities. Two annually, elected in Oxford by the House of Convocation, and in Cambridge by the Senate. Their duties are to act as peace officers to maintain good behaviour of all persons in statu pupillari. Each proctor names a proproctor, who (in Oxford) must be an M.A. of three years' standing. The proctors are chosen by cycles. In Oxford from 1620 to 1859 the cycle was 23 years; in 1859 it was extended to 30 years. In Cambridge the cycle is 50 years. (Trinity and St. John's have eleven turns each; Christ's, Clare, Caius, Pembroke, Queen's, and Peter House six turns each; Emmanuel, Magdalene, Jesus, Sidney Sussex, Corpus and St. Catharine's five turns each; Trinity Hall three turns, with the right of nomination if a vacancy occurs within the year; and Downing two turns.

In Oxford the stipend of proctor is 350l. and of pro-proctor 80l. In Cambridge there are two assistant pro-proctors.

Procu'lians. In Latin 'Proculiāni.' A law school so called from Procŭlus, a jurist; opposed to the Sabinians (q.v.). Proculus is often cited, and there are thirty-seven extracts from him in the Digest. The Proculians were 'radicals,' but interpreted law literatim and verbatim. The Sabinians were courtiers and equity lawyers.

Procura'tor. A functionary in the Roman empire created by Augustus. Procurators were of two classes; those in the senatorial provinces, who were proxies of the senate; and those in the great imperial provinces, who were appointed by the emperor. The former were viceroys; the latter were fiscal officers.

Procura'tors of St. Mark. Nine magistrates in the republic of Venice who administered the effects of orphans and of those who died intestate.

Prodigy of France (The). Budé was so called by Erasmus (1467–1540). He introduced into France the study of Greek, and was learned in all the sciences.

Prodigy of Learning (The). Samuel Hahnemann, the German, is so called by J. P. Richter (1755–1843).

Profound Doctor (The). 'Doctor Profundus,' Thomas Bradwardine archbishop of Canterbury (1348–1349).

Egidius de Colonna [Giles of Cologne] is called 'The Most Profound Doctor' (died 1316).

Progresses. Royal visits were so called in the reign of Elizabeth.

Elizabeth was in the habit of making visits to the houses of her nobles. . . . These visits were called progresses.—PRINCE, Parallel History, vol. ii. p. 106.

Progressives. So the Home Rule party began to call themselves in the December of 1889.

Projector (The). John Law of Edinburgh (1681–1729), the projector of the Mississippi Scheme or French bubble company.

Propaganda Fide (The College of the Congregation de), 1622. Established by Urban VIII. A great nursery of missionaries of all sorts and for all parts of the world: Gregorians, Persians, Nestorians, Jacobites, Melchites, Copts, Abyssinians, and Armenians.

Propaganda Fide (The Congregation de), 1572. Originated by Gregory XIII., and instituted at Rome by bull of Gregory XV. in 1622. It has the direction of missions, and consists of thirteen cardinals, three prelates, and a secretary, Propagation of the Faith (Society for the). Established at Lyons in 1829.

Propagators of the Faith. Same as 'Converters' (q.v.).

Prophecy of St. Laser'ian (The). 'The Church of Rome will surely fall when the Catholic faith is overthrown in Ireland.' St. Laserian was an ancient archbishop of Cashel.

Prophesyings suppressed, 1577. Prophesyings, in 1569, were meetings held once a fortnight by the puritans, under the guidance of Cartwright and Travers, and supported by several of the bishops, nominally for the edification of the clergy. They were under a moderator appointed by the bishop of the diocese or his deputy 'to discuss theological subjects and expound scripture.' They were called prophesyings from the text, 'Ye may all prophesy one by one, that all may learn, and all may be comforted' (1 Cor. xiv. 31). Queen Elizabeth, feeling convinced that this platform was a mere pretence, and that the true object of the meetings was political, commanded them to be suppressed. As Edmund Grindal, recently elevated to the see of Canterbury, favoured the 'prophesyings,' he was ordered to 'keep his house,' and never regained the queen's favour.

Prophetess of Exeter (The). Joanna Southcott (1750–1814).

Proprætor. A Roman officer who discharged in a province the functions of a prætor. Like a prætor he was attended by six lictors.

Propre, in English A Proper, is either a 'propre du temps,' a 'propre des saints,' or a 'propre d'une église.' The first is a clause in a liturgy introduced for special days and religious festivals; the second for special saints; and the third for special churches.

In the English Prayer Book there are 'Propers' in the 'Communion Service' for the great festivals, just before the canticle 'Therefore with Angels and Archangels we . . .' In bidding prayers the clause beginning 'and as in duty bound . . .' is a 'proper' of the third sort.

Pro-proctors. Instituted in the Cambridge University by a grace of the senate 29 April, 1818. They are nominated by the colleges according to the cycle of 'Proctors' (q.v.), but appointed by the senate.

6 June, 1878, two 'additional pro-proctors' were added by a grace of the senate. They must be masters of arts of not less than three years' standing, and are in office for one year.

Proscription. In Roman history, a list of persons proscribed stuck up in places of public resort. Sulla was the first to publish 'Tables of Proscription.' The triumvirs (Octavius, Antony, and Lepidus) followed his example. Informers received a part of the confiscated property, so that avarice and private vengeance were rewarded and encouraged.

Proselytes of the Covenant. Such Gentiles as received the covenant or law of Moses.

Proselytes of the Gate. Those Gentiles who worshipped the true God, but received not the law of Moses. The proselytes were only allowed to enter the outer court of the temple. In Solomon's time there were 153,000 of these proselytes who were compelled to hew wood, to draw water, to cut stones, and to carry burdens for the building of the temple (2 Chron. ii. 17, 18). These men were Canaanites who had continued in the country since the time of Joshua. They were proselytes of the gate because they were allowed to dwell 'within the gates' of Jerusalem.

Naaman the Syrian, Nebuzaradan (general of Nebuchadnezzar's army), Cornelius the centurion, the eunuch of Queen Candace (Acts viii.), the Kenites and Rechabites were proselytes of the gate.

Protection of British Industry. Acts of Parliament to compel people to purchase only home produce. This was done by laying a tax on all foreign commodities to make them dearer than similar commodities produced at home. Free trade in corn was introduced in 1846 by the abolition of the Corn Laws (q.v.), and in most other articles since.

In Oct. 1890 came into operation in the United States of North America the 'McKinley Tariff Bill,' which imposed a tax on imported articles of enormous magnitude, 'to protect native industry against foreign competition.' This battle with England will determine once for all whether Free Trade or Protection is the sounder policy.

Protector. In English history a kind of regent. The Duke of Bedford was protector of England under Henry VI.; the Duke of Gloucester [Richard III.] was protector under Edward V. See next article.

Protector of the Commonwealth of England, Scotland, and Ireland. Oliver Cromwell, 16 Dec., 1653. Reinaugurated with all the pomp of a coronation 26 June, 1656; died 3 Sept., 1658, aged 59.

His son Richard succeeded him, but retired into private life in 1660.

Protestant and Popish Wind. In court and city, says Misson, in the reign of James II., an east wind was called Protestant, and a west wind a Popish one.

October 23. James II., being extremely restless and uneasy, ordered a weathercock to be placed where he might see it from his apartment, that he might learn with his own eyes whether the wind is Protestant or Popish. This weathercock, at one end of the Banqueting House, is still to be seen there (1719).—MISSON.

Protestant Duke (The). James duke of Monmouth, said to be a love-child of Charles II. So called because he renounced the Catholic faith in which he had been brought up, and became a Protestant (1619–1685). See 'Monmouth.'

Protestant Flail (A). A kind of life-preserver, worn by timid magistrates in the reign of Charles II. The handle resembled a farrier's blood-stick, and the flail was joined to the end by a strong ligature, so short as to avoid the hand. It was made of lignum vitæ wood.

It [the Protestant flail] was for street and crowd work; and the instrument lurking perdu in a coat pocket, might readily sally out to execution, and by clearing a great hall . . . carry an election, by a choice way of polling, called 'knocking down.'—ROGER NORTH.

Protestant Joiner (The). Colledge, in whose defence Titus Oates appeared in 1681. He was accused of treason, but there was not the slightest proof of the charge. 'State Trials,' vol. viii. p. 628.

Protestant Livy (The). John Sleidan of Cologne (1506-1556). His great work is 'The State of Religion in the reign of Kaiser Karl V.'

Protestant Patent (The), 1859. It granted to the communes of Hungary the free administration of their religious and educational matters.

Protestant Pope (The). Gian Vincenzo Ganganelli, Pope Clement XIV.: so called from his enlightened policy, and more especially for his bull suppressing the Jesuits (1705, 1769–1774).

Protestant Religion (The), 1675. When the Earl of Shaftesbury asked in the House of Lords, 'What is the Protestant religion [of England]?' The Bishop of Winchester replied, 'The 39 articles, the liturgy, the catechism, the canons, and the homilies.'

Not very logical, nor very orthodox. A better answer would have been, 'the Bible, the whole Bible, and nothing but the Bible.' The bishop's response at best can only apply to the Anglican Church, but the Anglican Church is not Protestantism.

Protestants, 1592. Those Christians who belonged to the reformed Church, as Episcopalians, Presbyterians, Huguenots, Lutherans, Calvinists, and all dissenters of every denomination. Called Protestants from those who protested against the decree of the second diet of Speyer, which pronounced Lutheranism to be heretical, and revoked the decree of the previous diet, which conceded liberty of conscience.

The second diet was presided over by Ferdinand, the brother of Karl V., and the dissentients appealed to Karl V.

Protesters. One of the 'religious' parties into which Scotland was divided after the death of Charles I. The other party was called the Resolutioners (q.v.). The Resolutioners adhered to Charles II., but the Protesters were inclined to a union with the republicans. See Sir W. Scott, 'Old Mortality,' ch. v.

Proteus (The German). Melanchthon (1497–1560). So called because he so often changed his religious views. He was a disciple of Luther, but followed Zwinglius in some points and Calvin in others.

Protevangelion (The), or 'Protevangelium.' A gospel falsely ascribed to St. James the Less, first bishop of Jerusalem. It is noted for its minute details of the Virgin and Jesus. Some ascribe it to L. Carinas, who died 362.

> First of all we shall rehearse
> The nativity of our Lord,
> As written in the old record
> Of the protevangelion.
> LONGFELLOW, The Golden Legend.

Proto-Martyr (The).

I. St. Stephen. The first Christian martyr. Stoned to death about nine months after the Crucifixion.

II. Of the British Isles. [St.] Alban, A.D. 285. Condemned to death by Constantius for refusing to offer sacrifice to the gods of Rome, according to the edict of the Emperor Diocletian.

It must not be forgotten that these executions, called 'persecutions,' were political, not religious, except so far as state religion can be so called. Christian persecutions, on the other hand, are religious, not political, except, perhaps, in England, where churchmanship and dissent have a special political bias.

Protonotaries Apostolic. A college of twelve notaries, secretaries of the Roman chancellery instituted by Clement I. to write the lives of martyrs and assist at canonisations.

Proto-Syncell. The first syncell or domestic of the patriarchal palace of Constantinople. He was one of the first ecclesiastical dignitaries of Constantinople.

Proud Duke (The). Charles Seymour duke of Somerset (1662–1748).

Prout (Father). The pen-name of the Rev. Francis Mahōney, a writer in 'Fraser's Magazine,' in the 'Globe' newspaper, &c. (1805–1866).

Provant Rapier. A sword supplied by the provant master, or officer who provided for the soldiers. Such a sword was very inferior to a Tolēdo blade. In 'Kenilworth' Wayland Smith speaks of his sword as a 'poor provant rapier,' and contrasts it with Varney's special Toledo. Similarly we read of 'provant apparel,' that is, apparel provided to soldiers by the provant-master; 'provant-breeches,' &c. Provant also means 'common' or 'ordinary,' as 'provant rogue.' We see also the expressions 'provant breeches,' 'provant swords,' &c., and the person employed to provide soldiers with their kit is called the 'provant master.'

Provedito're (5 syl.). The governor of a province in the ancient republic of Venice. There was the ordinary proveditore, charged with the supervision of streets, buildings, and police; and the marine proveditore, who was to provide for the payment, &c., of the fleet.

Providence. Alexander I. of Russia considered himself 'La Providence libérale of Europe, and the protector of the independence of the peoples'; but his good intentions for mankind took the form of the Holy Alliance, which stifled freedom all over Europe, re-established the old despotisms, and put back the world a generation at least ('Nineteenth Century,' June 1889, p. 834).

Provincial (A). The superior of all the religious houses in a province, subordinate to the general of the order.

By a 'province' is meant a 'division of the order,' containing all the houses of a certain district, or all those which speak the same language.

Provincial Letters or Provinciales, 1656–1657. The famous letters of Blaise Pascal under the pseudonym of 'Louis de Montalte,' in defence of the Jansenists and against the Jesuits, whom he accuses of lax morals, want of piety, equivocation, mental reservation, simony, and so on. The letters are eighteen in number, and one fragment. Lemaistre added a twentieth. They are full of irony, very vigorous, and models of their kind. They were censured at Rome and condemned in France.

The objection that his necessity did not leave him the power to contract freely would apply equally to the discontented servant of the 'Provincial Letters.'—The World (2 May, 1888).

Provincial Synod (A) in the Presbyterian Church of Scotland consists of three or more presbyteries (q.v.) The chairman is called the 'moderator.'

Provincials of Lyndwood (The), 1444. A collection of papal constitutions drawn from the canon law by fourteen archbishops (from Langton 1206 to Chichele 1443). Lyndwood, or Lyndwode, was an ecclesiastical lawyer and bishop of St. David's.

Provisions. Reversionary grants of benefices during the lifetime of present incumbents. This followed as a consequent on the maxim of Clement V. that the pope has the free right of disposing of all ecclesiastical benefices. In consequence of this claim all the best livings of Europe were held by Italians wholly ignorant of the language of the people over whom they had charge. In 1350 Edward III. caused the Statute of Provisors (q.v.) to be passed, which enacted that, if the pope made a reversionary grant to anyone, the king should have the collation of such benefice. Subsequently it was enacted that no alien should be capable of holding any ecclesiastical preferment in England.

Provisions of Merton (The), the day after the coronation of Henry III. This is the first enactment on the English statute-book. 'Provisions' are acts of parliament to curb the arbitrary power of the crown. Merton, in Surrey, is the place where the parliament was held. These provisions are the most ancient body of laws after Magna Charta, and consist of eleven articles.

Provisions of Oxford (The), 11 June, 1258. Sworn to by Henry III. and his son Edward on one side, and by the citizens of London on the other. They provided that a council of twelve 'honest men' shall assist the king as his privy council; that the great officers and treasurer shall give in their accounts at the close of every year; that sheriffs shall be appointed from the chief tenants of each county; that no fee shall be given directly or indirectly for the administration of justice; that three parliaments shall assemble every year.

A 'provision' is an act of parliament to curb the arbitrary power of the crown. These provisions are further noteworthy in that the royal proclamation which ordered their observance was in the English tongue, and this, as far as we know, is the first instance of the use of the English language for such a purpose.

Provisors. Persons in whose favour provisos had been made in the Acts for the Settlement of Ireland after the Restoration. To the English provisors 477,873 acres were awarded, and to the Irish provisors 491,001 statute acres, out of the 7,778,087 acres forfeited under the Commonwealth.

Provisors (Statute of), 25 Edward III., s. 6, A.D. 1350, &c. To prohibit anyone from making a reversionary grant of a benefice, or from receiving any fee or reward out of a living 'as a provision' for foreign cardinals. This act was followed by others of a like character, and the pope of Rome was deprived of presenting to any bishopric or living in England, or of receiving directly or indirectly any portion of the church revenues.

In the 14th cent. in England the imposts and taxes received by the pope were fivefold the amount of those received by the crown.

Provost. In Oxford University; the title of the head of three of the colleges, Oriel, Queen's, and Worcester. In Cambridge University the master of King's College only is called the Provost, the principal of Queen's College is called the President, but of all the other colleges the Master.

Provost and Bailies (The) in Scotland correspond to our English mayor and aldermen. They are chosen by the councilmen, and invested with the powers of magistrates in the burgh. The Scotch Municipal Reform Act passed in 1840 (18 August).

Provost of Paris (The). 'Le Prévôt de Paris,' magistrat d'épée, chef du Châtelet. Charged with the gouvernement politique, and also with the finances of Paris. He is the Viscount of Paris. This officer dates from the reign of Hugues Capet [You Cap-pay].

Provost of the Army. 'Le Prévôt de l'Armée,' a French officer charged to administer justice between military men, to adjust differences between officers and privates, military men and civilians. Also called 'Les Prévôts des Bandes.'

Provost of the Constabulary, or Grand Provost of France (The). 'Le Prévôt de la Connétablie.' This office was in 1572 united to that of the 'Provost of the Hotel' (q.v.).

Provost of the Hotel (The). 'Le Prévôt de l'Hôtel, 1572.' A French officer who joined to his functions that of Provost of France, the chief military commander. The King of the Ribalds was also absorbed in the same office.

Provost of the King's Hotel (The). 'Le Prévôt de l'Hôtel du Roi,' judge in all crown cases. He moved from place to place with the court. The duties subsequently passed to the tribunal of the Maîtres d'Hôtel du Roi, and in 1573 the office was submerged in that of the Provost of France.

Provost of the Marshals (The). 'Le Prévôt des Maréchaux.' The Marshals' Provost adjucated only between the upper officers. Under Charles VI. and VII. this provost was attached to the court.

Provost of the Merchants (The). 'Le Prévôt des Marchands.' Elected every three years. At first these provosts were only excise officers, who visited and taxed ships exporting or importing goods; but subsequently they had the jurisdiction of all mercantile affairs, were charged with public ceremonies, and capitation imposts.

Provvedito'ri (The). Officers appointed for the guardianship of St. Mark, at Venice.

Prox'enus (pl. Prox'enī). The host of a stranger or ambassador. Before public houses of entertainment were known travellers had to depend on the hospitality of strangers, who expected in return similar civilities if required. That the obligation might be recognised, the host and guest parted a white stone, and writing their name on the two halves, the host gave his portion to the guest, and vice versâ (see Rev. ii. 17). In time, certain houses were selected for the entertainment of ambassadors. These public entertainers were called 'Proxĕni,' and voluntary entertainers were called 'Ethelo-proxĕni.'

To him that overcometh I . . . will give a white stone, and on the stone a new name written, which no man knoweth saving he that receiveth it.—Rev. ii. 17.

Prussia. The Elector Friedrich III. raised his electorate to a kingdom in 1701. From this date it has been constantly increasing in power and extent, till in 1866, in a war of seven weeks, it overmastered Austria, and in 1870 in the seven months' war it triumphed over France, when the King of Prussia added to his other titles that of 'German Emperor.'

In 1878 the Queen of England, by the advice of Lord Beaconsfield, then premier, added the title 'Empress of India' to her other titular designations.

Prussia (Titles of the King of [German Emperor], since 1888.

His Imperial and Royal Majesty * * King of Prussia and German Emperor, Margrave of Brandenburg, Burgrave of Nuremburg, Count of Hohensollern, Premier Duke and Sovereign of Silesia and of the County of Glatz, Grand Duke of the Lower Rhine and of Posen, Duke of Saxony, of Westphalia, of Engern, of Pomerania, of Luneberg, of Holstein and Schleswig, of Magdeburg, of Bremen, of Gelderland, of Cleves, of Juliers, and of Berg, Duke of the Wends and of the Cassubes, Duke of Crossen, of Lauenberg, and of Mecklenburg, Landgrave of Hesse and Thuringia, Margrave of Upper and Lower Lusatia, Prince of Orange, Lord of Rügen, of Eastern Frisia, of Paderborn and Pyrmont, of Halberstadt, Münster, Minden, Osnabrück and Hildesheim, of Verdun, Kammin, Fulda, Nassau and Moers, Princely Count of Henneberg, Count of the Marches, and of Ravensberg, Hohenstein, Tecklenburg, Lingen, Mansfeld, Sigmaringen and Veringen, and Lord of Frankfort.

Prussian Boot (The). Prince Bismarck, chancellor of Prussia (1813–), or more correctly the imperious domination and insolent arrogance of the prince chancellor.

In the course of these unfortunate discussions . . . Prince Bismarck himself has revealed a doubt whether all the states of Germany rejoice in the domination of Prussia. The truth is . . . a vast number of Germans do not share the Berlinese idolatry of the Prussian Boot. They know the Boot: they are aware that it has been a serviceable aid to diplomacy; but they do not like it.—Nineteenth Century (Feb. 1889, p. 208).

Prussian Evangelical Church (The), 1828. A union of Calvinism and Lutheranism. Frederick William III., assisted by Bunsen his minister, compiled a new liturgy for Prussia and a new church organisation. The Calvinistic and Lutheran ministers were then invited to conform on a given day, and so many agreed to do so, that the few dissentients were compelled either to conform or to abandon their pastorates.

Prussian Orders. The highest is the 'Black Eagle.'

Pruth (Treaty of the), 23 July, 1711. A treaty of peace between Russia and Turkey, in which Czar Peter the Great was obliged to restore Azof and all of his other dominions on the Black Sea to Turkey.

Pryt'anes (3 syl.). Officers in ancient Greece entrusted with the chief magistracy in Corcȳra, Corinth, Rhodes, and Mitylēnê. At Athens they were of second rank, next to the archons, and acted with them as judges, sitting in the prytanēum or hall of the prytānês. Their number was fifty, and all lived at the public expense.

Prytane'um. I. A common hall in a Greek state for a given district, containing (1) a law court for the prytānês; (2) granaries; and (3) restaurants for citizens and strangers also.

II. The Prytanée Française was the college of Louis le Grand set apart by the republic for a treasury office. In 1803 it was transferred to St. Cyr; and since 1852 to the military college of La Flèche.

Psalmanazar (George). A literary impostor born in France in 1679. He pretended to be a Japanese, born in the island of Formosa; and he wrote for the 'Universal History' what he called a 'History of Formosa,' altogether fabulous, but which thoroughly imposed on the learned world. The man died in London in 1763, but what was his real name nobody knows. See 'Literary Forgeries.'

Psalmo'rum Codex, 1457. The first book printed in movable metal type bearing a date; the printing firm was Fust and his son-in-law Peter Schaeffer See 'Biblia Sacra Latina.'

Psalter na Rann (The), by Ængus, is a hagiography of the saints of all nations including British, Welsh, Irish, and even Egyptian (9th cent.). See p. 7, 'Acta Sanctorum.'

Psalter of Cashel (The). A psalter is a provincial register of events, &c., briefly recorded for a national history. The oldest is the Psalter of Tara, which is lost. The Psalter of Cashel (in verse) was the work of MacCulinan bishop of Cashel and king of Munster, who died in the beginning of the 10th cent.

Psalter of Mainz (The), 1457. The first book ever printed.

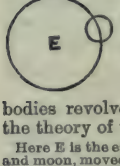
Psalter of Tara (The). The great national register of the ancient Irish in which was briefly entered provincial annals as materials for national history. The Psalter of Tara has been long lost, but parts of the Psalter of Cashel (compiled in the 10th cent.) are supposed to have been transcribed from it.

It began B.C. 900 in the reign of Ollam Fodlah of the family of Ia.



Their tribe, they said, their high degree,
Was sung in Tara's Psaltery.
CAMPBELL, O'Connor's Child.

Psaltery (A). 'Sacbut, harp, and psaltery.' The sacbut is a corruption of sambuc, a stringed instrument, 'genus citharæ rusticæ.' The psaltery is a trapezium with ten or thirteen strings, run over two bridges, struck with a plectrum.

The nablium or psaltery . . . is called in Psalm XXXIII. 2, and CXLIV. 9, a ten-stringed instrument . . . Josephus . . . assigns to it twelve strings. . . . There was another instrument of this kind used in Babylon. It was triangular in form. In Greek it is called σαμβύκη, in Hebrew סַבְּכָא. It had originally only four strings, but subsequently twenty (Dan. iii. 7, 10, 15).—JAHN, Archæologia Biblica, No. 94.

Psylli. Jugglers of Egypt and Libya who pretended to neutralise the poison of serpents, and even to kill them, merely by fixing their eyes on them.

Ptolemaic System (The). Ptolemy of Alexandria about A.D. 160 published his 'Great System,' called by the Arabians 'Almagest.' It presumed that our earth was stationary in the midst of the system, and that the heavenly bodies revolved round it. He adopted the theory of the epicycles.

Here E is the earth. The planets, including sun and moon, moved first round the little circle, and the centre of that little circle described in its revolution the large circle round E. The large circle was called the 'deferent.' Epicycle means 'upon the circle.'

Public Good (The), about 1820–1825. A Muscovite secret league, ostensibly for improving the education of the Russian empire by introducing the English Lancastrian plan, but really a political organisation to republicanise Russia, and introduce a 'constitution.' Colonel Pestel was head of the league, but was aided and abetted by 122 men of rank, among whom were several princes. On the death of Alexander in 1825 the Grand-duke Constantine relinquished the crown to his brother Nicholas, and when the troops were drawn up to administer to them the oath of fidelity, the cry was raised of 'Constantine and the Constitution!' Instantly the leaguers were seized; Pestel and four others were hanged, and 118 were banished to Siberia.

Public Good (League of the). 'Ligue du Bien Public,' 1465. An alliance against Louis XI. It consisted of the Duc de Bretagne, the Duc de Bourbon, the Duc de Calabre, the Duc de Nemours, Charles the king's brother, the Comte de Dunois, the Comte d'Armagnac, and the Comte Dammartin. At the head of the league was Charles le Téméraire. The nominal object of this formidable league was the relief of the people, but the real object was vengeance on the king for taking away from the aristocracy certain privileges. An indecisive battle was fought at Montlhéry in July 1465, after which Louis XI. contrived to break up the league by fair promises, which he never intended to fulfil, and the league was nicknamed La Ligue du Mal Public.

Public Health Act (The), 1875. This act embodies all the sanitary acts passed since 1848, and provides for the removal of all things injurious to health: the overcrowding of houses; the ventilation of factories; and either the consumption of smoke or its being carried high into the air by long chimneys.

Public Orator (The), of our universities. Elected in Cambridge by the senate from one of two persons nominated by the council. In Oxford he is elected by the House of Convocation (q.v.), and he must be either an M.A. or a B.C.L. He writes official letters, delivers in Latin an oration on great public festivals, presents to the vice-chancellor those on whom an honorary degree is to be conferred, and (in Oxford) delivers the Creweian Oration alternately with the professor of poetry. The Public Orator is the official voice of the legislative body.

The first Public Orator of Oxford was appointed in 1584 when Queen Elisabeth visited the university, and his salary was 20 nobles (6*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.*). This has been increased by Lord Crewe's benefaction by 20*l.*, and 180*l.* from the university chest. Total 166*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.*

Public Safety (The Committee of), 1642. A committee appointed by the Long Parliament as its administrative organ. Its guiding spirits were Hampden, Hollis, and Pym. English and Scotch officers were drawn from the Low Countries, and Lord Essex was appointed commander-in-chief, with an army of 20,000 foot and 4,000 horse.

Pucelle (La), or 'La Pucelle d'Orléans.' 'The Maid,' that is, Jeanne d'Arc (1412–1431).

Puck. The nickname of William Ryan, an Irish ruffian of detestable character. Brought to trial in January 1848 for the murder of John Kelly, whom he shot deliberately in the presence of his family and in his own house. He was executed 8 Feb., 1848.

Pudsha Be'gum (East Indies). Queen-mother.

Pueri Regis. King's-men, or vassals of a king, who owed him homage and service. The service was help in time of war. King's-men had their vassals, who were called grafs. The lands held of a lord were called fiefs. The fiefs of king's-men were called immediate, because held immediately under the king.

Every king's-man was expected to furnish the king with a certain number of men in time of war, and every man was to be furnished by the vassal with 'a shield, spear, bow, 12 arrows, and a breast-plate.'

Pugilistic Club in Bond Street (The). In the time of the regency. Of this club not only the chief nobility, but even the Prince Regent and the Duke of York, were members. The ceaseless question was which school of boxing was the better, the Bristolian or the Hebrew. The Prince Regent was a Bristolian, but Frederick duke of York was for the Hebrews. Mendoza was the crack Hebrew prize-fighter; Jem Belcher, Thomas Cribb, and Molineux were the crack Bristolians. The members of the club were called Corinthians. Thomas Cribb was most unwisely attached to the household of the Prince Regent.

The following names are famous in the ring: Jim Belcher (Bristolian) champion (he had but one eye), and his brother Tom, Bendigo, Ben Burns, Cohen, Tom Cribb, champion, Dick Curtis, Figg, Fuller, Gardolio (of the Hebrew school), Bob Gregson (the Pet of Pork), Gully, John C. Heenan (the Benicia Boy), Hudson, Humphries, Gentleman Jackson (Lord Byron was his pupil), Jim Mace, Jack Martin, Daniel Mendoza the Jew, Molineux the Negro, Oliver, Painter, Randal (the Nonpareil) noted for his pink cheeks, Caleb Rann (Mendoza's crack pupil, and called The Pink [of Bow]), Alec Reed, Richmond, Scroggins (a sailor), Tom Sayers (who fought the 'Benicia Boy' in 1860), Slack, Cyrus Smalley (the Sprig of Myrtle), Cribb's crack pupil, Spring (so called by Cribb, but whose real name was Tom Winter), Sutton, Tomkins, Jim Ward (the Nestor of the Ring), &c. The era of boxing was 1719–1860.

Punic Wars (The). Three wars carried on between the Carthaginians and the Romans, in all of which the Romans had the mastery. The first B.C. 263–241; the second 218–216, 215–211, 210–207, 206–202; the third 150–146, which ended in the fall of Carthage.

From Puni (Carthaginians) comes the adjective punic-us; so from mænia comes munire, and from pœna comes punire.

Punjab. Persian for five rivers. The five rivers are the Sutlej, the Beeas, the Ravee, the Chenab, and the Jhelum. These five rivers, uniting in succession, form ultimately a single stream called the Punjnud, which carries the collected water into the Indus.

The united Sutlej and Beeas form the Gharra; and the three rivers Chenab, Ravee, and Jhelum form the Trinab (three rivers). Ultimately the Gharra unites with the Trinab, and flows into the Indus.

Pura'nas, or 'Purani.' Eighteen poems in Sanskrit containing the Hindû traditions of creation, mythology, and the stories of Indian heroes. These poems serve as a commentary on the Vedas (q.v.).

Purchase (The Abolition of), 20 July, 1871. To prevent persons obtaining commissions or grades in the army by money payments. Before this law was passed the price of promotion was:

Lieutenant-colonel	4,500	price 1,300	difference
Major	3,300	,, 1,400	,,
Captain	1,800	,, 1,100	,,
Lieutenant	700	,, 250	,,
Cornet or Ensign	450	,,

Suppose a lieutenant-colonel wished to retire, the senior major might purchase the rank for 1,300*l.*; the senior captain might purchase the majority for 1,400*l.*, and so on, the cornet paying 250*l.* for his lieutenancy, and a new man giving 450*l.* for the vacant cornetcy or ensigncy. Fancy prices were often given as bribes, but always sub rosa.

Purgers, 1793. In the French Revolution the great purgers commissioned by the Convention were—

BARRAS. See 'Fréron.'

CARRIER was sent to extirpate the anti-revolutionists of Nantes, and murdered 32,000 men, women, and children (Prudhomme).

COLLOT D'HERBOIS was sent to extirpate the anti-revolutionists of Lyons, and murdered 31,000 men, women, and children (Prudhomme).

FRÉRON and Barras were sent to extirpate the anti-revolutionists of Toulon.

KLÉBER, Westermann, Moreau, &c. were sent to extirpate the anti-revolutionists of Vendée, and murdered 337,000 men, women, and children (Prudhomme).

LEBON was sent to extirpate the anti-revolutionists of Arras, St. Pol, and St. Omer MAIGNET was sent to extirpate the anti-revolutionists of Orange in Vaucluse.

TALLIEN was sent to extirpate the anti-revolutionists of Bordeaux.

VICTOR HUGUES was sent to extirpate the anti-revolutionists of St. Domingo.

Purification of the Virgin Mary, 2 Feb. Instituted in 542.

Purists. An English translation of Cathări (q.v.).

Puritans, 1565. First applied by way of reproach to the Nonconformists, but subsequently adopted by them. They maintained that they adopted the pure Word of God as their guide, and desired the church to be purified or rid of all things else. They maintained that the Church of England still retained many things not to be found in the Word of God: i.e. the clerical dresses, the book of common prayer, kneeling at the sacrament, the cross in baptism, sponsors, lay baptism, the ring in marriage, bowing at the name of Jesus, episcopacy, forms of prayer, church organs, chanting, and intoning.

The Cathări of the 3rd cent. were 'Puritani.'

Purple (The). 'To be raised to the purple,' in the Catholic Church, means to be made a cardinal; but purple was the colour of the imperial robe of the Romans, and to be raised to the purple or to wear the purple signified to be made emperor or to be emperor. Hence such terms as purpuram adorāre, purpuratōrum socius, and so on.

Purple Cap. In primitive times young women who professed a state of virginity as a religious function had a purple cap, somewhat like a small mitre, given them at their consecration. See 'Cap.'

Purple Laws (The). The Roman rescripts (q.v.), grants, and pragmatic sanctions written in purple ink.

A compound of vermilion and cinnabar. White laws were the edicts of prætors, and red laws the jus civile.

Pursuivants. The four English pursuivants are Rouge-dragon, Portcullis, Blue-mantle, and Rouge-croix.

The four Irish are Athlone the chief, and the other three are pursuivants of St. Patrick.

The chief Scotch pursuivant is entitled Unicorn. See 'Heralds.'

Purveyor, Purveyance. A purveyor was one who provided for the royal household. Purveyance was the providing of necessaries for the sovereign; sometimes they were bought at a valuation, and sometimes they were taken without the consent of the owner and without compensation. Thus, in war, horses, wagons, and food were purveyed.

Eadmer says: 'Those who attended the court plundered and destroyed the whole country through which the king passed without any control. Some . . . when they could not consume all the provisions which they had taken, either sold or burnt what was left. After having washed their horses' feet with the liquors they could not drink, they threw it in the streets.' Time: Rufus.

Pusey and Ellerton Scholarships. Three for Hebrew. Value 50*l.* a year, and tenable for three years, in the University of Oxford. Founded by Philip Pusey, of Pusey, Berkshire; Dr. Pusey, regius professor of Hebrew; and Dr. Ellerton, fellow of Magdalen, in 1822.

Puseyism, 1833. The doctrinal and ritual tenets of Dr. Pusey of Oxford. This party of the Anglican Church was started by Mr. Perceval, who with some others met at the house of the Rev. Hugh James Rose, domestic chaplain to the archbishop of Canterbury. Probably the views of Charles Simeon, fellow of King's College, Cambridge, instigated the movement. The Pusey party was soon joined by many men of great learning, who introduced stricter ritual observances, more frequent services, and enforced the doctrines of apostolic succession, priestly absolution, and church sanctity, in opposition to Calvinism and the 'evangelical' party called Simeonites. A very large number of the Puseyites have joined the Roman communion.

Pushtû. The Afghan language, a dialect of the Persian, but very much changed by copious foreign elements.

Putrid Plain (The). The plain or field in Provence where the battle of Aix was fought B.C. 102. In this battle Caius Marius, the Roman general, almost extirpated the Teuton army led by Teutobod, and the people of Marseilles (we are told) employed the bones of the slain 'to make fences for their vineyards.'

Pyrenees (Peace of the). I. 7 Nov. 1659, between France and Spain. By this treaty it was stipulated that the crowns of France and Spain should never be united under one family. This stipulation was the pretext of the War of the Spanish Succession (q.v.), 1701–1714.

II. 1660. A peace made after the united armies of Mazarin and Cromwell had defeated the Great Condé in the Dunes. This peace stipulated that England should retain Dunkirk; that Spain should cede Roussillon and Artois to France; and that France should restore Catalonia to Italy.

Pyrrhonists. The disciples of Pyrrho of Elis, who died B.C. 280, aged 90. He taught that nothing is what it seems to be, and therefore we know nothing as matter of fact. Pyrrhonism now means religious scepticism.

Pyrrhonists have of late revived in Germany and England.

Pythagore'an Diet (The). Vegetable diet. Pythagoras taught that it is cruel and unjust to put any animal to death for food. And the only animal foods that he would sanction are milk, butter, cheese, and eggs.

Pythagore'an League (The). B.C.* overthrown B.C. 504. The only secret political society of ancient times known of. The ultras of the Carbonari of Naples, in the 19th cent., called themselves Pythagoreans. The object of the Pythagorean league was to introduce the aristocratic element, but at the same time to make it an aristocracy of talent and not of birth only.

Pythagorean Philosophers (The). Of ancient Greece, so called from Pythagoras (B.C. 481–411), a native of Samos, and often called the Samian Sage. His disciples were divided into two classes, the exoterics and esoterics. The latter must have attended his lectures for five years at least. The 'exoterics' were also divided into two classes —those who lived in the college, who were called cænobitæ—and those who merely attended his lectures, who were called acusmatici. The average number of the former was about 600 and of the latter about 2,000. See 'Golden Verses.'

Quaderno de las Leyes nuevas de la Hermandad. The laws of the Her'mandad (q.v.) compiled in 1485.

Quadrages'ima of St. Martin (The). At Milan, in Spain, and in Gaul, the number of Advent Sundays used to be six, beginning on the Sunday after Martinmas, from which it was styled the 'Quadragesima of St. Martin,' or 'Little Lent.'

At Rome the number was originally 5, in the East it was 40 days.

Quadrages'ima Sunday (1st Sunday in Lent), the Sunday next to Ash Wednesday. Quadragesima originally meant the day on which the forty hours' fast is to commence. Gregory I. extended the forty hours to forty days, and, including the four days from Ash Wednesday, the Sunday is forty days before Easter. See 'Sunday.'

Quadrilateral (The). The four fortresses of Italy: namely, Peschiera and Mantua on the Mincio, Verona and Legnano on the Adige. Here the Austrians entrenched themselves after the battle of Solferino, 24 June, 1859; but hostilities were suddenly put an end to by a treaty of peace.

Quadril'ogus. A biography of Thomas Becket, so-called because drawn up from his four contemporary biographers (bk. i. chap. ii.).

Quadrivium. In the 12th and part of the 13th cent. what we now call university students spent four years in the study of the 'Trivium' (q.v.), when they took their degree of Bacheler. The next three years were given to the Quadrivium, which included—

1. Numbers absolute, or arithmetic, chiefly confined to the abacus.

2. Numbers applied to music, chiefly church music.

3. Magnitudes at rest, or geometry, some five or six propositions of Euclid.

4. Magnitudes in motion, or astronomy, which was only astrology, and the way of finding out the movable church festivals.

Quadruple Alliance.

1666. 28 Oct., between the States-General of Holland, Denmark, the Grand Elector, and the Duke of Brunswick-Luneburg, for mutual defence.

1674. Between Denmark, Holland, Germany, and Spain against France; because Louis XIV. had laid claim to Flanders and Franche-Comté. Finding the allies too strong, Louis then abandoned his claim on Flanders, but seized on Franche-Comté, which has ever since remained an integral part of the kingdom, empire, or republic of France.

1718. 2 August, between England, Austria, France, and the United Provinces, against Spain. It was a continuance of the Triple Alliance (q.v.), only with the addition of Austria, the fourth power. The immediate cause of this alliance was the effort made by Cardinal Alberōni of Spain to bring about the union of Spain and France, contrary to the terms of the Treaty of Utrecht, and subversive of the balance of power in Europe. This alliance guaranteed the succession of England in the house of Hanover, and that of France in the house of Bourbon; and it furthermore guaranteed that Spain and France should not be united under one crown. Spain accepted the conditions in 1720, when she resigned Sicily to Austria, and Sardinia was settled on the Duke of Savoy.

1745. Between England, Austria, Holland, and Saxony, in support of Maria Theresa queen of Austria, who was attacked by the King of Bavaria and the King of Prussia (Frederick II. the Great).

1834. Between England, Belgium, France, and Spain; to put down the Carlists in Spain, and maintain Isabella on the Spanish throne.

1840. Between England, France, Portugal and Spain, to support Maria da Gloria on the throne of Portugal, Queen Isabella on the throne of Spain, and to compel Mehemet Ali pasha of Egypt to withdraw from an attack on Turkey by the bombardment of Acre.

Quæsto'res Classici. Roman magistrates who had the charge of the public treasury. Called classics because they were originally elected by the centuries. Their number at first was two; increased to four in B.C. 421; to eight soon after the Punic war; to twenty in the time of Sulla; and to forty in the time of Julius Cæsar.

Quæsto'res Parricidii, i.e. trackers of murder. The most ancient of the quæstorial magistrates of Rome. They were, later on, made public assessors, and ceased to exist in B.C. 366, when their duties were transferred to the 'Triumviri Capitāles.'

Quaker Poet (The). Bernard Barton (1784–1849).

Quakers, 1650. A religious sect founded by George Fox. Their great doctrine is that all religion consists in the inward operation of the Holy Spirit. They have no sacraments, no ordained ministers, are very serious in deportment, sober in dress, reject oaths, refuse the payment of tithes, use thou and thee instead of you, and call the days of the week and the months 1st, 2nd, and 3rd, &c. instead of Monday, Tuesday, &c., January, February, March, &c. They call themselves 'Friends.' The word 'Quaker' is used as a term of disrespect. See 'Nicolites.'

It is said that they were called Quakers because Fox, who had been imprisoned by the Puritans, when brought before Gervas Bennet, bade his judge 'quake and tremble at the judgments of God.' Be this as it may, no body of Christians even approach them in morality.

Quakers' 'Confession of Faith' (The) contains twenty-three articles by Robert Barclay (Evans, 'Exposition,' p. 67).

Quakers of Germany (The). The Moravians (q.v.).

Qualification (Property). Before Locke King's bill in 1859 all members of parliament were obliged to swear that they possessed a clear estate in perpetuity of 501*l.* a year (if a county member), and of 300*l.* a year (if a borough member), unless the son of a peer.

The argument that the abolition of the qualification test would encourage men of straw to set up as candidates at elections was met by the fact that this did not happen in Scotland, where no qualification was required.—HOWITT, History of England (1859), p. 526.

Qualification Act (The). A bill passed in the reign of Queen Anne, obliging every candidate for a seat in the House of Commons to show that he is worth 500*l.* a year in land if for a county, 300*l.* a year if for a borough. Abolished by 29 Vict. c. 22 (1866).

There is another Qualification Act, but that is for killing game, 22, 23 Car. II. c. 25. Abolished by 1, 2 Will. IV. c. 32.

Qualifiers. Officials in the 'Congregation of the Holy Office' (q.v.), whose duty it is to report on each case of suspected heresy for the information of the cardinals.

Quarantaine-le-Roi (La), 1245. An ordinance by St. Louis which rendered it a capital offence for an 'avenger of blood' to seek the death of the offender till full forty days had elapsed. In other words, there was to be a truce of forty days between the offence and the license of the kinsmen of the murdered person to avenge the death. This ordinance put an end to the guerres privées of France.

Quaranti. The forty. Three tribunals of Venice were composed of forty members: (1) The tribunal of appeal from the judgment of the city magistrates; (2) the tribunal of appeal from the sentences of the magistrates extra muros; and (3) the criminal tribunal for all crimes except high treason.

Quare Impedit. A writ to inquire why a bishop has refused to institute to a living a legal presentee.

Pronounce Quair'-re im'-pe-dit.

Quarrel of Friars (The), 1518. So the Lutheran controversy was contemptuously termed at Rome.

Quarta Luna Nati. Born to ill-luck, like Hercules, who was so born. According to tradition Abel was born on the fourth day of the moon, and was slain by his brother on the seventh day of the moon.

Quarter Licence (A). A marriage licence after banns, limited to three calendar months. After the expiration of three months new banns must be asked if marriage has not been solemnized.

Quarter Sessions. A court of justices of the peace held every three months in each county or borough for judicial and other business. The meetings are fixed by statute for the first full week after 28 Dec. (Epiphany), the first full week after 31 March (Easter), the first full week after 24 June (Trinity), and the first full week after 11 Oct. (Michaelmas) Sessions.

The jurisdiction of the Court of Quarter Sessions is confined to criminal business, not including treason, murder, capital felony, blasphemy, perjury, forgery, arson, bigamy, abduction, bribery, sedition, &c.

Quarterings. Subdividing an armorial shield so that the son of an heiress or co-heiress at her death may marshal the coat of their mother or their own paternal coat.

Besides the maternal arms the arms of all those to which the mother was entitled may be quartered according to seniority.

Quartermaster (The). An officer on the staff of each regiment, in which he ranks as lieutenant. His duties are to superintend the quarters, barracks, and kits of the regiment; to assign to each officer his rooms, and act as regimental storekeeper. After ten years' service he may retire with the honorary rank of captain.

In the navy the quartermaster is appointed by the captain, and his duties are to take charge of the stowage of ballast and provisions, coiling of ropes, keeping time by the sand glasses, &c. The ship's quartermaster receives 41*l.* 1*s.* 3*d.* a year.

Quartermaster-General (The). A staff-officer whose duty it is to arrange the marches, quarters, and internal arrangements of the army to which he belongs. His salary is 178*l.* 7*s.* 6*d.* besides his pay.

Quartermaster-Sergeant. A non-commissioned officer whose duty it is to assist the quartermaster. He receives daily 2*s.* 8*d.* in the infantry of the line, 3*s.* 2*d.* in the cavalry, and 3*s.* 9½*d.* in the artillery.

Quartodec'iman Pasch. The Easter of the Quartodecimans (q.v.).

Quartodec'imanism. The heresy of the Quartodecimans (q.v.).

Quartodec'imans (The), or 'Paschites' (2 syl.) 2nd cent. Christians who celebrated Easter on the fourteenth day of the first moon, whether Sunday or not, in imitation of the Jews. In 190

Pope Victor excommunicated all those who held Easter on any day but Sunday. The dispute was not finally settled till 325 in the Council of Nice, which prescribed the rule that 'the festival of Easter shall be held on the Sunday next after the fourteenth day of the first lunar month.'

The Asiatic churches followed the quartodecuman practice, which they traced to the apostles John and Philip.

The Western churches supported their views on the authority of Peter and Paul.

Keperimus quosdam . . . quartodecima luna cum Hebræis celebrare nitentes [i.e. celebrate the 'immolation of Christ'].—BEDE, ii. ch. 19.

Quasimo'do Sunday. The first Sunday after Easter. The introïtus (or beginning of the mass) commences with the word 'Quasimodo.' See 'Sunday.'

Sometimes called 'Dominica in albis,' because the neophytes who had been baptized at Easter wore their white dresses for the last time on Quasimodo Sunday, the octave of Easter Day.

Quatre Nations (Les), 1661. An ancient college of Paris founded by Mazarin for the gratuitous education and bringing up of sixty sons of poor gentlemen of Spain, Italy, Germany, or Flanders. It is now 'Le Palais de l'Institut.'

Quatre Premières Filles de Citeaux (Les). The four chief Cistercian abbeys of France, viz. La Ferté, Pontigny, Clairvaux, and Morimond.

Quatre Temps (Les). The three days' fast (Wednesday, Friday, and Saturday) at the beginning of each of the four seasons. These are ordination times. These fasts were introduced into France in 769, and Gregory VII. fixed the weeks in which the four fasts were to be held; called also Ember-days.

The Greek Church does not keep the Quatre Temps.

Queen (The White). 'La Reine Blanche.' Mary queen of Scots was so called by the French because she dressed in white mourning for her husband, François II. king of France.

Queen Anne's Bounty, 2, 3 Anne, c. 11, 7 Feb., 1704. An act of parliament by order of the queen to appropriate her revenue arising from the tenths and first-fruits to the augmentation of small livings and to aid the poor of the clergy. The income was 17,000*l.* a year, to which parliament added an annual grant of 100,000*l.*, and private individuals have still further increased the fund.

These first-fruits and tenths were originally sent to Rome. Henry VIII. added them to the crown revenue. They are calculated according to the value set down in the 'Liber Regis.'

Queen Anne's Dead. Addison announced this in the 'Spectator' long after it was public property, and in 1889 his letter containing the announcement was sold by Sotheby & Wilkinson at a literary sale.

Queen Bess's Day, 18 Nov., when the pope and the devil were burnt in effigy. In Queen Anne's reign the 'Pretender' was added.

Queen Dick. Richard Cromwell was so called from his want of spirit and manliness (1626, 1658–1660, died 1712).

Queen Eleanor Crosses. Nine crosses erected by the executors of Queen Eleanor, the wife of Edward I. (1) Lincoln, (2) Northampton, (3) Stony Stratford, (4) Woburn, (5) Dunstable, (6) St. Albans, (7) Waltham, (8) Cheap in London, and (9) Charing Cross in London. Of these the crosses at Northampton and Waltham have been restored, and the cross of Charing Cross, pulled down by the Long Parliament 1647, has been built in facsimile in Charing Cross Station. There are two other Queen Eleanor crosses not included in the nine, one at Geddington and one at Newark.

Holinshed's story is contradicted by the MS. discovered in 1841. See p. 287, 'Eleanor Crosses.'

Queen Henry. Henrietta Maria, wife of Charles I., was so prayed for in the royal chapel, her French name Henriette being distasteful to English ears.

Queen Margaret's Cave, Northumberland. After the battle of Hexham in 1464, Queen Margaret and her son Prince Edward were concealed in a cave on the south bank of a little stream which runs at the foot of Blockhill. Here they lay concealed till they escaped to Scotland.

Queen Sarah. The imperious Sarah Jennings duchess of Marlborough, the queen of Queen Anne (1660–1744).

Queen Anne only reigned, while Queen Sarah governed.—Temple Bar, 208.

Queen Square Hermit (The). Jeremy Bentham, who lived at No. 1 Queen Square, London (1748–1832).

Queen Victoria. Her name according to Lodge's 'Peerage' is Alexandrina-Victoria, but according to 'Men of the Time,' Victoria-Alexandrina [Guelf]. Her husband's name was Francis Albert Augustus Charles Emanuel [Wetter]; whence the queen is sometimes jocosely called 'Mrs. Wetter.'

Some add Busiri to the prince's name.

Queen of Beauty (The). The Duchess of Somerset, grandmother of Lady Houghton, who died 1887.

Queen of Hearts (The). Elizabeth Stuart, daughter of James I. of England, was so called by her friends, but her enemies called her the Snow Queen (q.v.). She was not only lovely, but of a most kindly disposition, and was by her own mother called the 'Good Palatine.' She married Friedrich, the elector palatine [king of Bohemia], by whom she had eight sons and five daughters. One of her sons was the famous Prince Maurice, and her youngest daughter was Sophia, mother of George I. (1596–1662).

Queen of Heaven (The).

I. So Kao-tsong emperor of China called his wife (Voo-chee). Kao-tsong reigned in China 650–684.

Voo-Chee was a most infamous woman, the Catharine de' Medici of China.

II. The Virgin Mary is so called by Catholics, but not by Protestants.

Queen of Sheba (The). 'Nicaulis' is the name given in the church of All-hallows, London, where is a large painting on cloth, with the effigy of Queen Elizabeth lying on her tomb. The first two lines of the inscription are :—

Read but her reign, this princess might have been
For wisdom called Nicaulis, Sheba's queen.

 The Arabs call her 'Balkis' or 'Belkis'; the Abyssinians call her 'Macqueda'; others call her 'Aazis.' It is said, on her return to Sheba [or Asal], that she changed her son's name 'Menilek' into 'David.'

Queen of Tears (The). Mary of Modĕna, second wife of James II. of England, who was for ever weeping for the crown which her own ill policy contributed to lose (1658–1718).

Queen of the Adriatic (The). Venice.

Queen of the Ægean. Lesbos.

Queen of the Antilles [An-teel]. Cuba.

Queen of the Desert. The foolish title which Lady Hester Lucy Stanhope tried to assume (1776–1839).

Queen of the East. Zenobia queen of Palmyra (reigned 266–273).

Queen of the Eastern Archipel'ago. Java.

Queen of the Euxine (The). Sebastopol.

Queen of the Lakes (The). Windermere, partly in Lancaster and partly in Westmoreland. The largest lake in England.

Queen of the Mediterranean (The). Carthage, during her maritime supremacy—that is, before the Punic Wars had discrowned her.

Queen of the Mississippi Valley. St. Louis, Missouri.

Queen of the North. Edinburgh.

Queen of the Northern Seas. Queen Elizabeth was so called because of her powerful navy (1533, 1558–1603).

Great Britain, for a similar reason, is called 'Queen of the Ocean' or 'Queen of the Seas.' Hence the pun 'If Britannia rules the waves, I wish she'd rule them a little straighter.'

Tyre was also called 'Queen of the Sea.'

Queen of the South. Queen of Sheba or Saba (q.v.).

The queen of the south . . . . came from the uttermost parts of the earth to hear the wisdom of Solomon.—Matthew xii. 42; 1 Kings x. 1.

Queens' College. I. In Cambridge University, founded by Queen Margaret of Anjou, consort of Henry VI., in 1448, and refounded in 1465 by Elizabeth Woodville, consort of Edward VI. The head of Queens' College is called the president.

II. Oxford, 1340, founded by Robert de Eglesfield, chaplain to Queen Philippa, wife of Edward III. The headmaster is called the provost.

Queen's Day, 17 Nov. The day of the accession of Queen Elizabeth (1533, 1558–1603).

Queen's Evidence, or 'King's Evidence.' The disclosure of a guilty transaction by one of the guilty party on the assurance of freedom from punishment. Such an impeacher of his accomplices is said 'to turn queen's evidence.'

Queen's Gap (The) at Hampden. So called because Griffith Hampden, Esq., cut this passage through his wood when Queen Elizabeth went to visit him.

Evelyn did the same when Peter the Great visited his seat at Wotton, in Surrey.

Queen's Herb (The). Snuff was so called, at least in France, in the 16th cent. in compliment of Catherine de' Medici, who was passionately fond of it.

Queen's Men (Scotch history). See p. 490, 'King's and Queen's Men.'

Queen's Poisoner (The). Master René, employed by Catherine de' Medici, the queen-mother of Charles IX. He poisoned Jeanne d'Albret, mother of Henri [IV.] of France, on her visit to the court to be present at the marriage of her son Henri to the Princess Marguerite, the sister of Charles IX. Jeanne d'Albret arrived at the court on 15 May; fell ill 4 June, died 9 June, being poisoned by a pair of gloves sent to her by the Florentine perfumer.

Queen's University (Ireland), 1850, founded by Queen Victoria.

Queen's Ware, 1763. A durable earthenware first manufactured by Wedgwood, and patronised by Queen Charlotte.

Queenstown (Ireland), 1848. 'Cove' was so named from the visit of Queen Victoria accompanied by Prince Albert, the Prince of Wales, Prince Alfred, the Princess Royal, and the Princess Alice. Just as 'Dunleary' was christened Kingstown in honour of the visit of George IV. in 1821.

Queries (Constitutional), 1750. Papers aimed against the Duke of Cumberland, and distributed through the penny post to each member of both houses of parliament. These papers are generally attributed to Lord Egmont. Burnt by the common hangman.

Horace Walpole says the imputations made in the 'Queries' were: (a) that the Duke of Cumberland had disgraced or dismissed old officers, men of family and property, to make way for slaves, boys, and beggars; (b) that he had acquired absolute power over the army, and was trying to make himself master of the fleet; (c) that he had shown in Scotland an army superior to law; (d) that the right of succession was endangered by him.

Queries (the second paper), 1751, respecting the imprisonment in Newgate of Mr. Murray, M.P., who was accused by the bailiff of threatening his life during the election. Murray refused to receive on his knees the judgment of the house, saying he would kneel to no mortal man or set of men, and was committed to Newgate for contempt, where he remained till the close of the sessions. The 'Queries' condemned the Commons for acting ultra vires.

Qui tam. An action partly at the suit of the crown and partly at that of an informer. So called from the first two words, 'Qui tam pro domina regĭna, quam pro se ipso, sequĭtur.'

Quia Empto'res (The Statute of), 18 Edw. I. st. 1, c. 1, A.D. 1290. Making it lawful for every freeman to sell at pleasure his lands and tenements, or any part of them, under the proviso that the new feofee shall hold them of the chief lord thereof by the same service as the previous one held them. In other words, the sub-tenant was to hold of the lord or proprietor, not of the tenant. Emptōres (3 syl.).

Qui'etists. Those Christians who consider the highest state of man is stoical indifference to all temporal matters, and an unremitted contemplation of religious subjects. Like the Buddhists they place perfection in divine repose. Mme. Guyon, the mystic, was the founder of Quietism in France in the reign of Louis XIV. See 'Molinos.'

The Hesychasts or monks of Mount Athos would pass whole days looking at their own navels. Mme. Guyon of France was a very celebrated Quietist, and so was Molinos in Spain.

Quindecemviri. A college of priests instituted by Tarquinius Superbus to take charge of the Sibylline books, and they alone could consult them. It was Sylla who increased the number to 15; originally there were only 2, and the intermediate number was 10; they wore the toga prætexta, and were elected for life. This college continued to the time of Theodosius.

Quini-sext. A supplemental council to the fifth and sixth general councils. The fifth was held in 553 on the subject of the 'Three Chapters'; and the sixth held in 660 to condemn the Monoth'elites (4 syl.) (q.v.). In 692 some 211 bishops met in a hall (called Trullus) of the imperial palace at Constantinople. It laid down a law respecting celibacy which greatly displeased the Western Church, and prohibited fasting on Saturday even in Lent. The Pope of Rome reprobated the acts of the Quinisext Council, which pronounced the 'Apostolic Constitutions' to be apocryphal.

Quinque five, sex six. The council is by the Greeks called the Πεντέκτη, from πέντε five, and ἕκτος sixth.

Quinquagesi'ma Sunday. The fiftieth day before Easter Sunday, or rather the period when fifty special services will be held before Easter. In all such ecclesiastical terms as Septuagesima, Sexagesima, Quinquagesima, and Quadrigesima, the week is reckoned as a ten-day week, because its octave and two eves are reckoned in. Quinquagesima Sunday precedes Ash Wednesday. See 'Sundays.'

1 Eve of Sunday, 2 Sunday, 3 Monday, 4 Tuesday, 5 Wednesday, 6 Thursday, 7 Friday, 8 Saturday, 9 Octave eve, 10 Octave. So in music 7 notes with the octave of the 1st we call an 'octave,' and the 8 days of the entombment were 1 eve of Saturday, 2 Saturday, 3 eve of Sunday.

Quin'quartic'ular Controversy (The), 1618–1619. The controversy of the five points of dispute between Calvin and Arminius. The Synod of Dort was convened to settle this controversy, but, as it excluded all Arminians, it was a one-sided synod of no authority.

Quin'quartic'ular Grace, consisting of five articles. That is the five articles representing justification and grace, and in which reformers did not agree, but which the Synod of Dort met to settle.

The door was thrown wide by a lackey in lace,
Saying, 'What may you please to want with his Grace?'
'His Grace!' quoth Jerome, for posed was he
To guess of what kind this Grace could be—
Whether Grace preventive, or Grace particular,
Or Grace of that sort called quinquarticular.
THOMAS MOORE, St. Jerome's Visit to Earth.

Quinquatria. A Roman festival of five days in honour of Minerva, opened on the 14th of the calends of April (i.e. 19th March), the birthday of the goddess. On the first day all went to the temple of Minerva to pay their adorations, the next three days were given to games and gladiatorial exhibitions, and the fifth day was devoted to the purification of the sacred trumpets. The festival was a school holiday time.

Quinta'na, or 'Quadrages'ima Sunday,' the 1st in Lent, 'quinta a paschate.'

This is the 'Dominica Brandōnum,' or 'Dominica Barārum.' See 'Sunday.'

Quintus Cur'tius (The Modern). René de Vertot (1655–1735), author of the histories of the 'Revolution of Rome,' the 'Revolution of Portugal,' the 'Revolution of Sweden,' 'History of the Bretons,' 'History of Malta,' &c.

Quinze-Vingts. A hospital founded in Paris in 1254 by St. Louis for 300 'gentilhommes à qui les Sarrasins avaient crevé les yeux,' and whom the king brought home with him from the Holy Land. It stood between the Louvre and the Palais Royal.

Quinze-vingts means 15 twenties, i.e. 300. The French numerals are the very acme of absurdity Can anything exceed the folly of such a number as 'Four-twenty sixteen,' &c.?

Quiri'tes (3 syl.). So the Sabines were called; but when the Sabines became fused with the Romans, the civilians of the united people were called Quirites. The soldiers never by any chance were addressed as Quirites except by way of reproach. A general always addressed his troops as milites (3 syl.); hence Cæsar greatly mortified his rebellious legions on one occasion by calling them Quirites instead of milites.

In 1890 the Duke of Cambridge snubbed the rebellious 2nd Grenadier Guards in a similar way.

Quit Rent. A small rent paid by tenants of old manors to acquit them 'of service.' Also called 'White Rent' (q.v.).

Quo Warranto. A writ demanding to be shown by what right a person holds an office, estate, &c. Regulated by Edward I. Charles II. made great use of these writs to evict Nonconformists, that the old Church livings might return to the Anglican clergy. Corporations were served by quo warrantos, and received back their charters shorn of their privileges.

Quoad Sacra. A term applied in Scotland to auxiliary churches built in large parishes, which already contain parish kirks. These chapels of ease have no territorial jurisdiction, and are usually supported by private or voluntary subscriptions.

Quorndon Pack. Mr. Osbaldeston's pack of hounds, one of the three packs of the old Melton Mowbray Hunt, established in 1759. The other two were the Duke of Rutland's hounds, and the Earl of Lonsdale's pack called the Cottesmore. The Melton Mowbray Hunt is a thing of the past, but the Rutland hounds, the Quorn and the Cottesmore hounds are still celebrated (1890).

Quorndon is in Leicestershire, and Cottesmore Park in Rutlandshire. Quorndon is always shortened into Quorn.

Quorum (A). The minimum legal number of a board, sufficient to discharge the business. Sometimes those who are to form the quorum are selected out of the general number. Thus if the general number is represented by the letters of the alphabet, a statute might direct that the five vowels should constitute the quorum or acting members.

R. Placed against a sailor's name in the muster-book of a man-of-war, stood for 'run' [away] or deserter. Technically they were said to be prickt run, and so long as the letter remained uncrossed, the man was not entitled to bounty-money or promotion. See 'C. P.'

R. The Pope marked with 3 R's. Silvester II. who held the sees of Reims, Ravenna, and Rome.

Race of Stenkil (The). The third line of Swedish kings, so called from Stenkil, who reigned from 1056–1066. This race, which furnished five kings, succeeded that of Ivar, and was followed by the race of Sverker. It continued from 1056–1129.

Race of Sverker (The). In Sweden; so called from Sverker the founder (1129–1155). It succeeded the race of Stenkil, and continued alternating with it from 1129–1250, when the 'Folkungs' or Jarls succeeded.

Racine's Monkey. 'Le Singe de Racine.' So J. G. de Campistron was called (1636–1723).

Radcliffe Library (The). In the University of Oxford, 1747, founded by Dr. John Radcliffe, Fellow of Lincoln. The building is now used as a reading-room in connection with the Bodleian Library (q.v.), and the books on natural science have been removed to the University museum. The librarian has a salary of 150*l.* a year.

Radcliffe Travelling Fellowships. Three of the annual value of 200*l.* each, tenable for three years. Candidates must have passed their B.A. degree, and must travel abroad with a view of studying medicine. Founded in the University of Oxford by Dr. Radcliffe, 1858.

Radical. A political party. The word came into use in England about 1816; the general character of radicalism is democratic and republican.

Radom (The Confederation of), 1767. A confederation of the dissidents of Poland, who applied to Russia for aid against the patriots, called the Confederation of Bar (q.v.). This interference of Russia led to the partition of Poland. See 'Dissidents.'

Russia, glad to have a pretence for getting a footing in Poland, supported the Confederation of Radom. She pressed on the whole line of the Polish frontier with her armies, inundated the kingdom with her troops, and levied contributions for their support, as if she had been in a conquered country. France supported the confederates of Bar.—HOWITT, Hist. of England (Geo III. chap. iv. p. 96).

Radstadt (Peace of), 1714. Between Germany and France. It preserved to France its frontiers, and gave to Germany, Naples, Sardinia, Milan, and the Netherlands all taken from Spain. This treaty ended the war of the Spanish Succession, which had lasted twelve years.

Raffael. See 'Raphael.'

Rag (The). Episcopacy was so called in the 17th cent. by the Presbyterians. The term is a contracted form of 'the rag of the woman of Babylon.'

Though Leighton restored many of the Scotch ministers to vacant parishes, the most violent gloried in the name of Covenanters, and persisted in preaching in conventicles against 'the rag.'—PRINCE, Parallel History, vol. ii. p. 303.

Rag (The). A familiar name of the Army and Navy Club. The rag, of course, is the flag.

Ragged Schools. Opened in London 1838; in Aberdeen 1841. The Union established in 1844.

Ragman Roll (The), 1296. A list of all the Scotch barons and men of note who subscribed the submission to Edward I. It contains the largest and most authentic enumeration extant of the nobility, barons, landholders, burgesses, and clergy of Scotland prior to the 14th cent., and only genuine statistical notices of Scotland of the period. There are four rolls consisting of thirty-five pieces sewn together. A copy is preserved in the Rolls House, Chancery Lane, but the original no longer exists.

Ragman is a corruption of Ragimund, the name of a legate of Scotland who compelled the clergy of Scotland to give a true account of their benefices, that they might be duly taxed.

Ragmans. Long written documents, such as bulls, charters, patents, lists of names, &c. Rymer, in the 'Fœdera,' speaks of literas patentes, vocata ragge- mans, sive blank chartres. Piers Plowman says 'Rede on this ragman, and rewle you theraftur.'

Henry IV. issued a proclamation commanding all the blank bonds, called ragmans, which had been extorted from the people by Richard and his courtiers, to be made null and committed to the flames.—HOWITT, Hist. of England, vol. i. p. 481.

Raid (The), 1468. In Scotch history means the removal to Edinburgh of James III. at the age of fourteen by Robert lord Boyd and his two sons. His guardian Kennedy archbishop of St. Andrews being dead, the estates of Scotland appointed a new regency. The king wished to act for himself, and the Boyds helped him. The parliament sanctioned the raid.

According to Prof. Skeat, raid is from ride. Its usual meaning is a foray, or predatory excursion in border warfare.

Raid of Carlisle (The), 1596, This was the seizure of Kinmont Willie, a noted depredator upon the English border, during a day of truce. Sir Walter Scott of Buccleuch, warden of the Scottish border, held a day of truce for meeting the deputy of Lord Scroope, governor of Carlisle Castle. When the meeting broke up, the English on their return home saw Willie, and took him prisoner. Buccleuch sent a challenge to Lord Scroope, which was insolently declined. Whereupon he assembled his clansmen, forced his way into the castle, and set Willie free. Elizabeth demanded that Buccleuch should be delivered into her hands; this the Scotch parliament refused to do, but Buccleuch consented to appear before the queen to explain the whole matter. The queen was so pleased with his manly bearing and bold spirit, that she dismissed him with tokens of honour and regard.

Raid of Leith (The), 2 April, 1594. An attack of the Earl of Bothwell to get possession of the king's person on his return from church at Leith, on Sunday morning 2 April, 1594. Bothwell failed in this attempt.

In his proclamation, distributed at the raid of Leith, the Catholic lords were designated 'enemies of the true religion, and the practisers for bringing in of strangers; a company of lewd persons crept into the state to the high contempt of God and dishonour of the king.'—Sir W. SCOTT, Hist. of Scotland, xxxviii.

Raid of Ruthven (The), 1582. The forcible detention of James VI. at Ruthven Castle, to which he had been invited in a hunting expedition, by Alexander Ruthven earl of Gowrie. The object of this detention was to compel the king to dismiss his favourites, the Duke of Lennox and Stewart earl of Arran. See p. 380, 'Gowrie Conspiracy.'

Raid, in Scotland, was applied to any assembly met together in arms to enforce their will. Thus the barons who forced from John the Magna Charta would be called in Scotland the Raid of Runnymede.

Raid of Stirling (The), 1585. An armed attack on Stirling Castle, where James Stewart earl of Arran and chief minister of James VI. was cooped up. He defended the castle for a time, but had neither men, arms, nor provisions for a siege. Arran, therefore, fled, and having the key of Stirling Bridge, made good his escape by locking the gates behind him to prevent pursuit. Arran was dismissed the public councils, and lived in private as James Stewart.

Rail Splitter (The). President Abraham Lincoln. So called because at one time he earned his bread by splitting rails (1809–1865).

Railway King (The). George Hudson (1800–1871).

Railway Mania (The), 1845, when all the country went mad on railway speculations. The advertisements of projected railways in the 'Times' newspaper were from 3,000*l.* to 6,000*l.* weekly in the months of September, October, and November. Railways proper (with Robert Stephenson's locomotives) were first opened in England and America in 1830, between Manchester and Liverpool. Brunel introduced the broad gauge in 1833. Railways were not practically introduced into France till 1845, when the Chemin de fer du Nord was opened. The Chemin de fer de l'Ouest was opened in 1846; and that between Paris and Lyons in 1851.

'Chemin de fer' pronounce Shmand fair. 'Shmand' to rhyme with darned (silent).

Rajah of Mattan (The). If the Braganza is not a diamond, the Rajah of Mattan is the largest diamond known. Its original weight was 787 carats; but being given to Borgis, a Venetian, to cut, it was reduced to 379$\frac{9}{16}$ carats. Borgis was fined 10,000 rupees for his waste, and received nothing for his cutting. See 'Diamonds.'

Raleigh Conspiracy (The), 1603. This was the 'Main Plot' (q.v.) to seize James I. and set Arabella Stuart on the throne. Raleigh and others were arrested. Clarke and Watson were hanged; Brooke was beheaded; Cobham, Grey, and Markham were pardoned; and Raleigh was reprieved and released from the Tower 30 Jan., 1616. He then sailed for Guiana, returned in 1618, was again arrested for complicity in the 'Main Plot,' and beheaded 29 Oct., 1618.

Ramadan. The ninth month in the Moslem year. It is a kind of Lent or fast in commemoration of the first revelation received by Mohammed. A strict Moslem must not eat or drink, smoke or bathe, smell any perfume, or even swallow his own spittle till after sunset. This fast is followed by the festival called 'Bairam' (q.v.).

The word 'Ramadan' means the 'hot month,' from the Arabic ramidh, or ramadh, 'to be hot.'

Rambam. A sonant of 'R. M. B. M.,' that is, Rabbi Moses Ben Maimon, born at Cordōva in 1135. He wrote commentaries on the Talmuds (Babylonian and Jerusalem), and a work on the Calendar. He is generally called 'Maimonides,' 'the doctor, the great sage, the glory of the West and light of the East, second only to Moses.'

Rambouillet (L'Hôtel de), 1600. The society which met in the mansion of the Marquis de Rambouillet, Rue St. Thomas, near the Louvre, Paris. The society consisted of the most distinguished persons in the city. The palmy days of these reunions were from 1635 to 1665. Cardinal Richelieu, Prince Condé, and Montausier were among the magnates, while Racan, Voiture, Benserade, Balzac, Ménage, Chapelain, La Calprenède, Scudéry, D'Urfé, Sarrasin, Desmarets, St. Sorlin, and the Abbé Cottin represented the beaux esprits. The ladies who usually attended were the Duchess of Longueville, the Marchioness of Lafayette, Madame de Sévigné, Madame Deshoulières, and the Duchess Montausier (the life and soul of the society). Each guest was nicknamed by some Greek or Roman celebrity, and the ladies were called Les Précieuses. At first this society was the arbiter of taste and literature, but it lapsed into prudery and affectation, gibbeted by the 'Précieuses Ridicules' of Molière.

Ramillies Wig (A). Introduced in the reign of George I., and so named from the famous battle of Ramillies. It had a long, gradually diminishing, plaited tail, called the 'Ramillie tail,' which was tied with a great bow at the top and a smaller one at the bottom. In 1786 the officers of the horse and foot guards were commanded to wear Ramillie periwigs.

This [the buss wig] was the paragon of the three yet remaining wigs of the parish, which differed, as Monkbarns used to remark, like the three degrees of comparison—Sir Arthur's Ramillies being the positive, his own bob-wig the comparative, and the overwhelming grizzle [i.e. buss-wig] of the clergyman figuring as the superlative.—Sir W. Scott, The Antiquary, ch. xvii.

Ramists. Those who followed Pierre Ramus in his new pronunciation of Latin. This novelty especially affected such words as contained qu, pronounced k; as 'quisquis,' pronounced kiskis. This innovation produced riots in Paris, just as Sir John Cheke's innovation in the pronunciation of Greek produced riots in Cambridge a few years before. See 'Greeks and Trojans.'

Sir John Cheke died 1557; Pierre Ramus fell in the massacre of Barthélemi in 1572.

Ramnes. A Roman gentleman. (See Propertius, iv. 1, 31.) A contraction of 'Ramnenses.' Livy (i. 13) says 'a Romulo,' and tells us it was one of the three tribes or centuries into which Romulus divided his people. If 'Roma' is from 'Romulus,' as we are told by Varro, then, with a little shuffling of the cards, we can get 'Romanenses' (natives of Rome), contracted into 'Rom'nenses,' and corrupted into 'Ramnes.'

'Tatienses,' the Sabine tribe, from Tatius the Sabine king (Ovid, 'Fast.' iii. 131). The third century or tribe was called 'Luceres' (strangers). Plutarch says 'a luco, ubi Romuli asylum fuit, ut sint advenæ in hac tribu.'

Ramorantin (The Edict of), 1560. Issued by François II. after the conspiracy of Amboise, constituting the bishops judges of heresy, and depriving Huguenots of the right of holding religious assemblies.

Ramparts. Those great masses of earth, about 7½ feet in height, which are thrown up from the ditch inwards in fortification, in order to give the defenders in a siege a commanding surface for their cannon and musketry. The first range of ramparts is called the body of the place (or enceinte); and all the works between the enceinte and the covered way are called outworks. Those constructed beyond the covered way and the glacis, but within the range of the musketry of the main-works, are termed advanced works; and those beyond that range are called detached works. In the outline or 'tracing of a fortress,' if the angle points outwards towards the country it is called a salient angle; if inwards towards the place fortified, it is a re-entering angle.

Ramsden Sermon (The). On Church Extension. To be preached in full term in St. Mary's Church, Cambridge. Fee, five guineas. A fund was left for the purpose by Mrs. Charlotte Ramsden, of Bath, 1848.

Ranche'ros (The). The half-Indian and half-Spanish breed in Mexico. They form by far the best part of the Mexican army. They are a thin muscular race, temperate, daring, and hardy.

Rank and File. The technical phrase for privates and corporals of infantry, often spoken of as 'Bayonets,' from the instrument which they carry.

Ranstadt (Treaties of). I. 24 Sept., 1706. A treaty of peace between Charles XII. of Sweden and Frederick Augustus of Poland.

II. 22 Aug., 1707, a Convention signed at Alt Ranstadt between Charles XII. of Sweden and the kaiser Joseph I.

Ranters. The Primitive Methodists are sometimes so called. They seceded from the Methodists because, in their opinion, the true spirit of Methodism was no longer preserved in the body. By this they meant that too much attention was paid to formality, and that not sufficient fervour was manifested. Field-preaching and street-preaching of an emotional character was strongly advocated. Hugh and J. Bourne, with W. Clowes, were the chief instruments of this separation.

Ranz des Vaches (The). Simple melodies played on the Alphorn in the Swiss Alps, or sung by the herdsmen, or both, when they drive their cattle to and from the pasture.

Ranzelman (A). A petty magistrate in the Zetland islands, whose office it is to divide the spoil of wrecks cast on the coast.

> The Ranzelman was dividing with all due impartiality the spoils of the wrecked vessel . . . and, if the matter in hand had not been, from beginning to end, utterly unjust and indefensible, discharging the part of a wise and prudent magistrate.—Sir W. Scott, The Pirate, chap. viii.

Rape of the Sabines, 8th cent. B.C. Romulus, wishing to find wives for his new city, invited the Sabines and other neighbouring towns to come and see his consualia, or public games, in honour of the god Consus, and when the spectators were intent on the show, a number of Roman youths rushed in among them, and seized all the marriageable maidens on whom they could lay hands.

> A very similar incident is recorded in Judges xxi. 19–23.

Raphael (The Flemish). Frans Floris. His chief works are 'St. Luke at his Easel,' and the 'Descent of the Fallen Angels,' both in Antwerp Cathedral (1520–1570).

Raphael (The French). Eustace Lesueur (1617–1655).

Raphael the Divine. Raffaello Sanzio il Divino (1483–1520), the greatest of all painters. His first works were under the influence of Perugino, such as the 'Coronation of the Virgin,' in the Vatican, and the 'Marriage of the Virgin,' at Milan. His second class of paintings (1504–1508) were of the Florentine school, of which class is 'St. Catharine,' in the National Gallery, London. The cartoons in Hampton Court are of the third or Roman class.

Raphael of Cats (The). Godefroi Mind, a Swiss painter (1768–1814).

Raphael of Holland (The). Martin van Hemskerck (1498–1574).

Raphael of Opera or of Music (The). J. C. Wolfgang Mozart (1756–1791).

Raphael's Sketch Book ought to be called the 'Venice Sketch Book,' as Morelli has proved them to be sketches by Pinturicchio, the Umbrian artist, before Raphael was born. It is preserved in the Accademia delle Belle Arti, in Venice.

Rapparees, 17th cent. Wild Irish plunderers, so called from their being armed with a rapary, or half-pike. They were especially numerous in the Bog of Allan, if we may trust Lord Macaulay, who, speaking of newspaper leaders, refers to the 'Rapparees of the Bog of Allan' as one of the items which helped to furnish journals in their early days.

They commonly wear little woollen jackets, breeches close to their thighs, and over them a . . . shag rugg, deeply fringed. They go, for the most part, bareheaded, wear their hair long, and count it the greatest ornament. . . . They count it no infamy to commit robberies, and when they go to rob they make prayers to God that they may obtain booty. . . . They also suppose that violence and murder are in no wise displeasing to God.—GAY MIEGE, New State of England (second edition, 1711; Ireland added).

Raskolniks (The), 1654. Russian schismatics who opposed the revised translation of the Bible and Liturgies.

Rat, Cat, and the Dog. William Collingham was author of the rhyme (1483)

The rat, the cat, and Lovel the dog,
Rule all England under the hog.

The rat was Rat-cliffe, the cat was Cat-esby, Lovel was Francis viscount Lovel the king's 'spaniel,' and the hog was the blue boar, the crest of Richard III. Collingham was put to death for his too pregnant wit.

Rats. When the Assyrians, B.C. 692, invaded Egypt, Sethos the king raised an army of artisans and labourers. But no battle was fought; for during the night a swarm of rats gnawed to pieces the quivers, bowstrings, and shield-straps of the Assyrians, who at once fled. In honour of this event Sethos had a statue of himself, holding a rat in one hand, erected in the temple of Memnon.

Was not the rat in the hand of Sethos the water-rat, or ichneumon, the god of the people of Heracleopolis?

Rate in Aid (A), 1849. Sixpence in the pound to be levied in every county of Ireland towards a general fund for the relief of the poor of that country. The potato disease had reappeared, and this rate more equally divided the burden of supporting the poor by placing a portion of it on shoulders better able to bear it.

Rath (A). A hill-fortress, the dwelling of an old Irish chief, built on a natural elevation and surrounded by a rampart. The whole enclosure was the rath, and the chief's dwelling stood within the area. It was made of wood, mud, and hurdles.

Rational School (The), in theology, revived in Germany by Paulus, who produced his 'Commentary of the New Testament' (1800–1804). His object is to show that miracles and all that is beyond man's reason and experience must be discarded.

Rationalism, in theology, is the rejection of everything in religion which cannot be supported by reason, as miracles; and the explaining away of miracles by ascribing the phenomena to natural causes. Thus, in the passage of the Red Sea, the Rationalists maintain that Moses and his host passed when the tide was out, but that Pharaoh and his host were overwhelmed by the returning tide.

Like King John and Lynn Wash.

Rationalists. A fanatical party which arose during the civil war, afterwards called 'Levellers' (1647). John Lilburne (afterwards Colonel Lilburne) was a leading spirit of these republicans. They said the election of Saul by the Jews plainly teaches that kings usurp the place of God, and that lords and princes are denounced in scripture, which teaches the equality of man. Their platform was religious equality; biennial parliaments; six-monthly sessions; a widely extended franchise; and a more equally distributed representation. These Rationalists or Levellers were pretty well the same as the Agitators. See Rom. xiii.

Ratisbon, in Bavaria (Truce of), 15 Aug., 1684. Between France and Spain on the one hand and the kaiser on the other.

Ratisbon Interim (The), in 1541. A provisionary arrangement between the Roman Catholic and Lutheran ad interim—that is, till the matters in dispute could be laid before a general council. In the Ratisbon Interim 3 Roman Catholics and 3 Lutherans were appointed to make provisionary measures of agreement. The Roman Catholic deputies were Eck, Pflug, and Gropper; the Lutheran deputies were Melanchthon, Bucer, and Pistorius. They agreed on all points except the sacraments and the power of the Church.

Raven Knight (The). John Hunyâdi, whose shield had a black raven holding a gold ring in his beak painted on it (1400–1456).

Never before had they witnessed fighting as gallant as that of the Raven Knight at the head of his small troop.—VAMBÉRY, Hungary, chap. IX.

Rawandians (The), A.D. 759. A Saracenic sect believing in metempsychosis.

Rawlinsonian Professorship (The) of Anglo-Saxon, in Oxford University. Stipend 300*l.* a year. Founded by Richard Rawlinson, D.C.L., of St. John's College, in 1750.

Rayleigh d'Isgustin (Sir). A punning toast (Really disgusting, Sir), by way of reproof.

Re Galantuomo, Victor Emmanuel II. (1820–1878), king of Sardinia 1849, king of Italy 1861.

'Here' (said Garibaldi), 'in the presence of our Re Galantuomo, I must be permitted to speak my mind.'—HOWITT, History of England (year 1859), p. 539.

Readers = 'Lectores' in the Greek and Latin Churches, were young men studying for the priesthood. They served as secretaries to the bishops, and were promoted according to merit; some, however, never graduated to any higher degree. Tertullian is the first who mentions this office. The readers had charge of all the sacred books, and acted as messengers. By the Fourth Council of Carthage the bishop, on ordaining a reader, had to place a Bible in the hand of the candidate, and say: 'Receive this book, and be a reader of the Word of God. If thou exercise thy ministry faithfully, thou wilt have part with those who administer God's word.'

The lectors used to read the Epistles till Innocent III. appointed the office of sub-deacon in the 10th cent.; but after that the lector only read the lessons at matins.

Reading (The Council of), 1279. It enacted that two representatives chosen by the clergy of each diocese shall attend the national synod, to consult respecting the redress of grievances, granting subsidies, and whatever else relates to the well-being of the Church. This is called the nucleus of 'Convocation.'

Real Estate. Land and houses, in opposition to personal property, such as cash, jewels, and furniture. The Romans divided property into immovable (real) and movable (personal). Lands and houses are real because they cannot be carried away; personal property can be moved by the possessor from place to place.

Real Laws. Laws for the regulation of property without interfering with the state of persons.

Les lois réelles n'ont point d'extension directe ni indirecte hors la juridiction et la domination du législateur.—STORY, Conflict of Laws, 610.

Real Presence. The dogma that the bread and wine in the eucharist, after consecration, become the veritable and real body and soul, humanity and divinity of Christ. This is called the doctrine of transubstantiation, and is held by the Roman and Eastern Churches. Luther taught the same doctrine with a difference. By transubstantiation is meant that the wine is no longer wine, and the bread is no longer bread after consecration; Luther taught that the bread and wine remained bread and wine, but that the body and soul, humanity and divinity of Christ were incorporated with those elements. This is called the doctrine of con-substantiation. Calvin taught that the body and soul of Christ were taken only by faith, and not substantially by communicants in the eucharist.

Luther's word was impanation. As God was incarnate in Christ, so Christ was impanated, or introduced into the elements of bread and wine, and incorporated with them.

Real Right. A jus in re or right in the thing itself, and not its equivalent; in opposition to jus ad rem, or a right to enforce an obligation or the performance of something.

A servant has a jus in re, a master a jus ad rem. A master must pay his servant wages, and cannot instead of wages substitute work. A servant, on the other hand, must give his master work, and cannot be allowed to pay money instead. Thus a master, by paying a month's wages in advance, can dismiss a servant; but a servant cannot, by forfeiting a month's wages, quit a master's service. The master's obligation to a servant is money; a servant's obligation to a master is work.

Realists. Those who believe in realism, or the independent existence of universals. Tree in the abstract is a universal; an oak-tree, an elm, a fir-tree, are particular trees. Now realists maintain that tree exists in the abstract, and is not the hypothetical creature inferred from particular objects. Nominalists say universalia post rem, universals are à posteriori, and particulars come first. Realists say universalia ante rem, that universals precede sensible objects

In theology we are told that Father, Son, and Holy Ghost are one God. There were certain divines who insisted that these three persons were only three names (nomina) of the same Being, as father, son, and husband are three names of the same person. Other theologians insisted that they are not only three names, but three real persons. Guillaume de Champeaux (1053–1120) was the founder of the realistic school.

There is yet a third sort of realism, or belief—viz. that the phenomenal world has an objective existence, quite independent of our perception thereof. To me or you the phenomenal world is what our senses cognise; but even if we were deprived of our senses, and there was no phenomenal world to us, still (say the realists) the phenomena would exist. This realism is opposed to Berkeley's 'Idealism.'

Traced to its origin we come to Plato and Aristotle. Plato insisted that the divine idea is a real something, a mould or matrix in which creation was fashioned. Aristotle contended that the Divine word was enough; 'he commanded, and it was done.'

 We also speak of realism in art and letters, meaning an imitation of nature, not a fanciful ideal.

Roscelline seems to have raised the question whether the personal distinctions of the Deity are real or only nominal.

St. Anselm of Canterbury, Albertus Magnus, Thomas Aquinas, and Duns Scotus were Realists.

Abelard, William Occam, Buridan, Hobbes, Locke, Bishop Berkeley, Condillac, and Dugald Stewart were Nominalists.

The Realist (as opposed to the Idealist) holds that the phenomenal world has an objective existence. The Idealist contends that it has only a subjective existence. The whole contest may be settled thus: To an individual every phenomenon is only subjective to him; that is, his perception of a phenomenon depends upon his senses, but independent of himself the phenomenon is real, or there is a real phenomenon.

Realm of St. Stephen (The). Hungary.

Croatia is still a member of the realm of St. Stephen.—VAMBERY, Hungary, chap. vii.

Rebecca Riots (The), 1843. A crusade against toll-gates begun in Wales. See next article.

Rebeccaites, or 'Children of Rebecca,' 1839. Welsh rioters who went about destroying turnpike gates. So called from Rebekah, the bride of Isaac. When she left home her father and friends said to her (Gen. xxiv. 60), 'Let thy seed possess the gate of those which hate thee.' See 'Rebecca Riots.'

Also called 'Rebecca's Daughters,' and 'Rebeccas.' The word has been revived of late in reference to illegal fishing.

'Rebekah's Camels' Bible (The), 1823. So called because in Gen. xxiv. 61 the word 'damsels' is misprinted camels. Thus: 'And Rebekah arose, and her camels' [damsels]. See 'Bibles.'

Rebel Crown (The). A silver 5*s*. piece struck at Kilkenny in the reign of Charles I. There are seven varieties, distinguished by the size of the crown, and the shape of the letter S.

Rebellion (The Great). That of the Parliamentarians against Charles I. of England. It began in August, 1642, when Charles set up his standard at Nottingham, and terminated with the Restoration of Charles II., 29 May, 1660.

Rebellion of Paraguay (The), 1750. The Spanish Jesuits succeeded in forming a flourishing colony, amounting to 200,000 individuals, in Paraguay and Parâna, which for a century and a half enjoyed both peace and happiness; then Spain gave up seven districts of Paraguay to Portugal in exchange for certain territory on the left bank of the river Plate, and ordered the colony to remove. The Indians resisted, and this resistance was called rebellion. Ultimately the matter was arranged, and the colony remained undisturbed.

Rebellion of Shane O'Neil, in Ulster, 1561. On the death of O'Neil earl of Tyrone a dispute arose respecting the succession. England acknowledged the eldest son as heir to the earldom, while the sept maintained their right of choosing a chief from any of the family, and selected a younger son Shane O'Neil made good his claim by the sword, and having defeated the lord deputy invaded Connaught. He was defeated by Colonel Randolph in 1566, took refuge in Antrim, and was hewn to pieces, June 1567, in a drunken squabble by his Scotch retainers.

Rebellion of 1715 (The), when the Chevalier de St. George landed in Scotland. James Francis Edward, son of James II., was defeated at Preston Nov. 1715, and the cause was resumed in 1745 by his son Charles Edward. See below, 'Rebellion of 1745.'

These were reasons which unquestionably operated to prevent [in 1708] that bloody retaliation which followed the rebellions of 1715 and 1745.—HOWITT, Hist. of Eng. (Anne, 245).

Rebellion of 1745 (The), when Charles, afterwards the 'Young Pretender,' landed in Scotland. Charles Edward Stuart proclaimed his father 'James VIII. of Scotland,' and defeated the royal troops at Prestonpans (22 Sept., 1745), and at Falkirk (28 Jan., 1746), but was defeated at Cullöden (16 April, 1746), and returned to France. At his father's death (31 Jan., 1788) he became 'the Young Pretender.'

Rechabites (3 syl.). The posterity of Jonadab, son of Rechab, who were forbidden to build houses, to plant vineyards, to possess lands, to dwell in tents, and to drink wine. They continued to observe these injunctions for 300 years. (Jer. xxxv. 6, 7.)

They were probably carried away captive by the Chaldeans, as the title of Psalm lxx. is 'Sung by the sons of Jonadab and the principal captives.' They returned from captivity, and settled in the city of Jabes, beyond Jordan.

Reciprocity Acts, 1823 (4 Geo. IV. c. 77; 5 Geo. IV. c. 1), empowering the king, by order in council, to authorise the importation and exportation of goods in foreign ships, provided the foreign country in whose favour the order is made places British ships on the same footing as its own ships. See 'Navigation Act.'

Reciprocity Treaty (The), 7 June, 1854 (18 Vict. c. 3). Between Great Britain and the United States, regulating British American coast-fisheries, and the navigation of the St. Lawrence and the lakes. Terminated by notice from the United States 17 March, 1866.

Recluse of Edgbaston (The). John Henry Newman, created cardinal (1801–1890), author of Tract No. 90, the hymn 'Lead, kindly Light,' and a dramatic poem called 'Gerontius,' with numerous other works.

Recognition (The Act of), 1531. That the king and not the pope is 'unicus et supremus dominus' of the English Church; not in the same sense as Christ is head of the Church, but in the sense that he is head of all his subjects, with a right to their allegiance, obedience, and submission in all legalised matters.

Thus the Convocation of York, 1534, unanimously agreed that the Pope of Rome has no 'greater jurisdiction in these realms' than any other foreign bishop. In the Convocation of Canterbury thirty-four assented, one doubted, and four denied the Act as interpreted by the Convocation of York. See Article XXXVII.

N.B.—The words 'quantum per Christi legem licet' were afterwards added.

Recognitions (The). Quoted by Origen as a work of Clement's; was a romance in ten books embodying the Christian doctrines and history. It was translated by Rufi'nus into Latin and called 'The Acts and Travels of St. Peter.'

Called Recognitions because it supposes Clement to recognise his father, mother, and brother, who had been lost.

Récollets (Reformed Franciscans). Established in Spain in 1484, introduced into France in 1592, and into Paris in 1603. Like the Soccolanti they adopted sandals. Reformed Clares and Colettes are called 'Recollettines' (4 syl.).

The word is Recollecti, that is recueillis. It has reference to spiritual recollection—that is, the complete devotion of all the powers to a spiritual life.

Reconciliation (The Bill of), 1554. An Act of Parliament repealing the whole ecclesiastical legislation of Henry VIII. and Edward VI. It, however, rejected all proposals for the restoration of church lands, and refused to change the succession from Elizabeth to Philip.

Reconciliation (The Feast of the), 25 Jan. (St. Andrew's Day), 1555. To commemorate the return of England to the see of Rome in the reign of Mary. It was celebrated by a grand religious procession, and ordered to be kept as an anniversary for ever.

When the pope heard thereof he ordered a jubilee in honour of the event.

Recopilacion (The). The code of Castilian law.

The deputies in 1525 obtained a general law, inserted in the Recopilacion, enacting that the king shall answer all the petitions before he dissolves the assembly [Cortes].—HALLAM, Middle Ages, vol. ii. p. 43.

Rector. In Oxford University; the title of the head of Exeter College and Lincoln College.

In the Church of England the rector has the great tithes; a vicar merely represents the owner of a living, and receives either an annual stipend or the small tithes.

Recusants. Persons who wilfully absented themselves from their parish church on Sundays and other days appointed by the ordinary. This absence was made a legal offence by 1 Eliz. c. 2,

A.D. 1558. Popish recusants for wilfully hearing mass were fined 66*l.* 13*s.* 4*d.* (100 marks); and for saying mass double that sum, with a year's imprisonment in both cases. They could inherit no real estate, purchase no land, teach in no school, hold no public office, were not permitted to have arms in their houses, could not appear within ten miles of London under a penalty of 100*l.*, could not travel above five miles from home without a licence, could bring no action at law or equity. These enactments were partly removed in 1791, and more fully by the Emancipation Act of 1829.

Recusants (Statute of), 25 Henry VIII. c. 20, transferred the annates and tenths from the pope to the crown.

Red and Black Lists (The). In the Irish parliament it was customary to publish lists of the Ayes and Noes on every important division. In the Union debates (1799, 1800) this custom was followed. These lists were printed in red and black. Hence the Red and Black Lists are lists of how the Irish members voted on the bills referred to.

Red and Blue Cockade (The), 1789. The cockade given to the French militia at the outbreak of the great French Revolution. Red and blue were the Parisian colours. White was the royal colour. Before the militia (or national guard) was organised the insurgents wore a green cockade (q.v.). The tricolour was adopted after the fall of the Bastille.

Red and Blue Hoods (The). In 1356, during the captivity of Jean le Bon, the Commune of Paris, as opposed to the dauphin (afterwards Charles V.), wore party-coloured hoods, mi-partie (rouges et bleues); but at the death of the provost Marcel in 1358 this faction died away.

Red or Cardinal Band (The), 1572. The companies of assassins organized at Bordeaux for the massacre of the Huguenots at the general slaughter begun on Sunday, St. Bartholomew's Day.

Red Beard.

I. Friedrich I. kaiser of Germany, called Barbarossa (1121, 1152–1190).

II. Horush or Horuc sultan of Algiers (1474, 1516–1518).

III. Khair Eddin sultan of Algiers (reigned 1518–1546).

Red Book (The).

I. In England is a register of all persons under government in every department, legal, civil, military, and naval. This register is termed their 'Blue Book.' The words Red and Blue refer to the colour of the wrappers, but even those parts issued without wrappers retain the generic name. See 'Blue Book.'

II. In China (so called from its red cover), contains the name, birthplace, and other particulars of the 14,000 officials of the Chinese empire. It is in six small volumes, and is printed quarterly.

No individual can hold a magistracy in his own province, and no public officer may make alliances with those under his own government; nor can a son, brother, or other near relative hold office under a near kinsman.

Red Book of Hergest (The). Includes the Mabinogion (q.v.), copies of some of the poems of Taliesin and of Llywarch Hen, a brief chronology from Adam to 1318, and a chronological history of the English to 1376. The MSS. are preserved in the library of Jesus College, Oxford, and are of the 14th cent.

Red Book of Maximilian I. of Germany (The). A manual which Maximilian always carried about him, and in which he set down all the injuries which he received from the French, a nation he hated with deadly hatred.

Red Book of the Exchequer (The). 'Liber Rubeus Scaccarii' (in the Record Office), compiled in the reign of Henry III., 1246, by Alexander de Swereford archdeacon of Shrewsbury. It contains the returns of all tenants in capite in the reigns of Henry II., Richard I., John, and part of the reign of Henry III., certifying how many knights' fees they held, and the names of those who held them. It also contains much other matter from the Pipe Rolls and other sources. It has never been printed (1890). The other book is called the Black Book of the Exchequer, 'Liber Niger Scaccarii.' The Red Book derives its name from the colour of its cover, which was originally a pinkish-red leather.

The Red Book contains the only known fragment of the Pipe Roll of 1 Henry II., and copies of the important Inquisition returned into the Exchequer in 18 John.

Red Books of Spain (The). Similar to our Blue Books (q.v.). All sorts of official reports, papers, and documents printed for government and laid before the legislative houses. Red and blue refer to the colours of the covers. See 'Yellow Books.'

Red Boots (A Pair of). A Tartar phrase referring to a custom of cutting the skin of a victim round the upper part of the legs, and then stripping it off at the feet. A Tartar will say, 'When you come my way again, I will give you a pair of red boots to go home in.'

Red Branch (Knights of the). An early military order of Ireland. So called from their chief seat, 'The School of the Red Branch,' in Emania, adjoining the palace of the Ulster kings. T. Moore refers to these knights in his 'Irish Melodies,' and subjoins a note of explanation:—

Let Erin remember the days of old . . . .
When her kings, with standard of green unfurled,
Led the Red-branch Knights to danger;—
Ere the emerald gem of the western world
Was set in the crown of a stranger.

Red Button (A). A mandarin of the first class, whose badge of honour is a red button on his cap.

An interview was granted to the admiral [Elliot] by Kishen, the imperial commissioner, the third man in the empire, a mandarin of first class and red button.—HOWITT, Hist. of England, 1841, p. 471.

Red Coat in Fox-hunting. Henry II. made fox-hunting a royal sport, and enjoined by mandate that all who took part in that royal sport should wear also the royal livery.

Red Columns of Venice (The). Two magnificent columns of red granite erected in the Piazzetta of St. Mark in 1180. They were brought in 1125 from Palestine by Dominico Michielli, the doge, but for more than fifty years were left on the quay because no one knew how to erect them. At length Nicolo Barattiero, a Lombard, succeeded in rearing them. One column is surmounted with the winged lion of St. Mark, and the other with a full-length statue of St. Theodore, armed with sword and lance, and trampling on a serpent. The space between was the site of executions.

St. Theodore carries his shield on his right arm and his lance in the left hand.

Between the pillars of St. Mark's, where 'tis
The custom of the State to put to death
Its criminals.—BYRON, Marino Faliero, v. 2.

Recanati expiated his treason between the Red Columns.—History of Venice, vol. i. p. 850.

Red Comyn (The). Son of John Comyn of Badenoch and Margery sister of John Baliol.

David Earl of Huntingdon had two daughters—Margery and Isabella.

Margery a son was named Baliol, and Baliol's son was BALIOL (the king). The king's daughter was Margery the mother of John, the 'Red Comyn.'

Isabella (David's younger daughter) was the mother of BRUCE (the Competitor); the 'Competitor' had a son named Bruce, whose son was ROBERT BRUCE, the great hero.

Red Cross (The). The Badge of the royal banner of England till those of St. Patrick and St. Andrew were added.

The fall of Rouen (1419) was the fall of the whole province . . . and the red cross of England waved on all the towers of Normandy.—HOWITT, Hist. of England, vol. i. p. 545.

Red Cross Knights (The). The Knights Templars, whose badge was a red cross on a white robe in contradistinction to the Knights Hospitallers, who wore a black robe with a white cross. See 'Templars.'

Red Cross Society (The), 1870. For the relief of those wounded in battle. It recognises no distinctions of rank, friend, or foe. To be wounded is enough to call forth all its sympathy, all its skill, all its nursing care. The red cross on the field of battle is quite sufficient to command immunity from both belligerent armies. See 'Geneva Convention.'

Red Earl (The). Richard Burke or Burgo (1227–1229), earl of Ulster.

Red Flag (A).

I. In the Roman empire signified war; and when displayed on the capitol it was a call to arms.

 As a railway signal it intimates danger, and warns the engine driver to stop. A green flag is displayed by way of caution, and a white flag signifies that the rails are clear and all things in order.

II. Hoisted by British seamen, it indicates that no concession will be made. Thus, previous to the mutiny at the Nore, the sailors at Portsmouth hoisted the red flag, and when Lord Bridport promised redress the crew of every ship hauled down the red flag.

On the 23rd May [1797] the mutineers hoisted the red flag, and all the ships of war lying near sheerness dropped down the Nore.—HOWITT, Hist. of England, Geo. III. 1797, p. 158.

III. In France. 'Le Drapeau Rouge,' since 1791, has been made the symbol of insurrection and terrorism. By a decree of the Constituent Assembly the red flag was unfurled to indicate that martial law was established, and that all gatherings of the people would be dispersed by force of arms. Usually, a red flag signifies defiance.

Black flag betokens a pirate; white flag, peace; red flag, defiance; yellow flag signifies that the vessel is in quarantine.

IV. A symbol or synonym of radicalism.

Mr. Chamberlain sticks to the red flag, and apparently believes in its future success.—Newspaper paragraph, January 1886.

Red Flag with a White Flag (A) indicates that unless the besieged request peace without delay they will receive no quarter.

De Feuquières planted a cannon on a level with the castle, on the mountain of Guignevert, and then hoisted a white flag, and after that a red one.—ANT. MONASTIER, Hist. of the Vaudois Church, pp. 371-2.

Red Hand of Ulster (The). It is said that in an expedition to Ireland the leader thereof gave out that whoever first touched the Irish shore should be made possessors of the territory. One of the O'Neills, in order to be the first, cut off his hand and threw it on the coast. The badge of the O'Neills is the 'Red Hand.'

Red Hat. First presented by Innocent IV. to cardinals, 25 Dec., 1244, called 'the Sun's birthday,' and red is the symbolical colour of the sun. The notion that it indicates a willingness in a cardinal to shed his blood for the church is mythical.

David Beatoun was born of good family, had been made privy-seal by James V., and was raised to a red hat by Pope Paul III.—PRINCE, Parallel History, vol. ii. p. 81.

Red Heads (The). The regular soldiers of the Persian empire, so called from their red caps.

The Persian word is 'Kuzzilbashes.' They were 80,000 in the reign of Shah Abbas, but were afterwards reduced to 30,000.

Red Hoods. The party colour of Paris. Blue hoods, the party colour of Navarre. Red and blue, the party colour of Charles [V.] when dauphin. White hoods, the party colour of the Burgundians.

Red Hugh. Hugh O'Donell. So called from a red birth-mark on his face (reign of Elizabeth).

Red Indians of Newfoundland. So called because they daub their skin, garments, canoes, weapons, and almost everything with red ochre mixed with grease. Probably red has a religious significance, as the Maōris of New Zealand regard red as a sacred colour. It will be remembered that when the banner of St. Ambrose, the sacred oriflamme of Milan, was taken to a battle-field, it was drawn in a red car by red bullocks harnessed with red trappings.

Whether it was merely a custom, or whether they daubed their skin with red ochre to protect it from the attacks of mosquitos and black flies, which swarm by myriads in the woods and wilds during the summer, it is not possible to say.—Lady BLAKE, Nineteenth Century (Dec. 1888, p. 905).

Red King (The).

I. Otto II. of Germany (955, 973–983).

II. William II. [Rufus] of England (1057, 1087–1100).

III. Amadeus VII. count of Savoy (1360, 1383–1391). See 'Red Beard.'

Red Land (The). The jurisdiction over which the Vehmgericht of Westphalia extended. The court was called a 'Free Session'; the judges were 'Free Grafs' or 'Free Burghers.' See 'Child of the Cord.'

Red Laws (The). The civil code. Juvenal says 'perlege rubras majorum leges' ('Satires,' xiv. 193). The civil laws, being written in vermilion, were called rubrīca, and 'rubrica vetavit' means 'it is forbidden by the civil laws.' The prætors' laws were inscribed in white letters, as Quintilian informs us (xii. 3), 'prætores edicta sua in albo propone bant.' Imperial rescripts were written in purple.

Red-Letter Days. Saints' days, Sundays, and festivals. Non-working days, printed at one time in red letters in almanacs.

Red Peter. Pierce earl of Ormond, deputy to the Earl of Surrey, lord-lieutenant of Ireland in the reign of Henry VIII.

Red Prince (The). Prince Friedrich Karl of Germany (born 1828). So called because wherever he has made his appearance a red-letter day has been added to the fasti of Fatherland. His daughter Louise married the Duke of Connaught. Prince Friedrich Karl was one of the most successful generals of the age.

Red Republicans. Extreme democrats who scruple not to dye their hands in blood. In France they used to wear red caps. This was taken from the old Roman custom of manumission. When a slave was manumitted a small red cloth cap, called pileus, was placed on his head. Their journals had red wrappers. See p. 406, 'Hats.'

The red cap of the French Republicans was a Phrygian cap, but the red cap given to the Roman slave was sack-shaped. See p. 142, 'Cap.'

Red Scarfs (The). The party of Henri and Charles IX.

White scarfs, the badge of the Crusaders, Armagnacs, and Huguenots. Green scarfs, the badge of Mazarin, Isabella, and the Condé family. Tricolour scarfs, still worn in France by the municipal magistrates and the commissaires of police. White knots, the badge of the Burgundians.

Red-Shanks, 1327. So the English called the Scotch, who covered their feet and shanks with the raw hides of the beasts which they looted from the English, wearing the hair inside.

In 1278 the Scots and Redshanks out of the Highlands made a sudden incursion into Ireland, and, committing the most cruel murders and depredations, escaped with their booty before the inhabitants had time to rally in their defence.—THOMAS MOORE, Hist. of Ireland, ch. XXXV.

Red Standard (The). This was the Roman signal for battle.

Red Triumvirate (The), 1849. Three cardinals sent by the pope from Gaëta to Rome after the Restoration to conduct the civil affairs of the Papal States during his voluntary exile. Della Genga was one of the Triumvirate. These commissioners robbed the people to the amount of 35 per cent. of all the money which bore the stamp of the republic, but promised liberal institutions so far as they were consistent with absolute power founded on divine right.

Red Turbans, Green Turbans. The Shiahs or Shiites of Persia wear the red turban, as all the Fatimites of Egypt did, to distinguish themselves from the Sunis or Sunnites of Turkey. The descendants of Fatima in Turkey, called 'emirs' or 'shereefs,' wear green turbans.

Shiites the unorthodox, Sunnites the orthodox party. The former do not allow the Kalifates of Aboubekr, Omar, or Othman.

Reds and Blacks, or 'I Rossi,' and 'I Neri.' The Signory or privy council of the Doge were termed 'I Rossi' (the Reds) from their red robes of office. The Council of Ten was called 'I Neri' from their black official robes.

N.B.—Red, white, blue, and green were livery colours worn in the chariot races of Constantinople, just as light and dark blue are worn as distinctive colours in our university athletic contests, such as boat-racing, cricket, football, &c. In Constantinople the Reds merged into the Greens, and the Whites into the Blues. See 'Blues and Greens.'

Rede's Lecturer (Sir Robert). On natural history, antiquarian history, literature, science, &c., in the University of Cambridge. One lecture to be given in full term. Fee nine guineas. Fund left for the purpose by Sir Robert Rede, lord chief justice of the Common Pleas in the reign of Henry VII. Founded 1524.

Redemptionists (The), 1199. An order of monks, founded by Jean de Matha and Felix de Valois, for the redemption of Christian captives from slavery in Barbary. These monks were originally called Trinitaires, or Religieux de la Ste Trinité. Subsequently they were called Maturins, from a church in Paris (St. Maturin) given to the order in 1226. Suppressed in 1790.

Redemptorists (The), or 'The Redemptorist Fathers,' 1732. A Roman Catholic missionary fraternity founded by St. Alphonso Maria de Liguori. Their object is to supply preachers for rural districts, and to instruct the peasantry.

Also called Liguorists or Liguorians, from Liguori, their founder.

Redpath Boys. An Irish secret society, connected with the Moonlighters and Land-leaguers (q.v.). See 'Irish Associations.'

Reduction of Paraguay (The), 1690. An exchange of territory between Spain and Portugal by which the sovereignty of that country was transferred to Portugal. At the time of these 'reductions' the Jesuits were virtually the dominant power in Paraguay.

Reed (The) connected with the 'Crucifixion' of Jesus was not found by the Empress Helĕna with the three crosses, but was discovered subsequently. It was sent in 614 to Constantinople, when Jerusalem was taken by the Persians. A part of it is said to be in Florence, a part in St. Julian's church of Lunegarde, a longer piece is in the convent of Andeschs in Bavaria, and a still larger piece in the convent of Vatopedi on Mount Athos. We are not, however, told which of the reeds is meant, whether the roseau de la royauté dérisoire, or the reed which held the sponge dipped in vinegar, or whether the same reed was used on both occasions. See p. 231, 'Crucifixion, Relics of the.'

Referendary (A). A public officer whose duty was to procure, execute, and despatch diplomas and charters. The office of grand referendary of France is now merged in that of the chancellor.

Reform Banquet (The), of the 12th arrondissement of Paris, 1848. Organised by 92 members of the opposition, and on Feb. 22 began the 'nouvelle révolution de trois jours.'

Reform Bill (The), 1832. Prepared by Lord John Russell for the better representation of the United Kingdom in the House of Commons.

1. It changed the voters from freemen (q.v.) to persons having stated money qualifications.

2. It disfranchised rotten boroughs and pocket boroughs, such as Gatton and Old Sarum (which had no inhabitants), and gave members to large boroughs, such as Birmingham and Brighton, which were unrepresented.

3. It reduced or increased the number of members according to a numerical scale of inhabitants.

4. It shortened the time of elections.

Reform Club (The) was established in London 20 May, 1835.

Reform League (The), 1866, dissolved 1869. President, Mr. Edmond Beales, a barrister. The ostensible object of the league was the extension of the suffrage, but it is best known by its breaking down the railings of Hyde Park July 23, 1866, in vindication of a public right to enter the London parks and address the people there. The committee of the league had publicly announced their intention of delivering an address in the park, and the authorities of the park ordered the gates to be shut. The mob broke down the railings and forced their way in. In 1872 a law was passed to regulate the right of speaking to the people in public.

Reform Pope (The). John Calvin, 1509–1564. He established a consistory at Geneva invested with power to censure and even excommunicate; and made the church a corporation independent of the state.

Reformatio Legum, 1571. A digest of the ecclesiastical laws of England into a code, begun in 1534, renewed in 1536, 1549, but not completed till the reign of Elizabeth, 1571, when it appeared under the fuller title of 'Reformatio Legum Ecclesiasticārum.' See next article.

Reformatio Legum Eccle'siastica'rum, 1571. The Reformatio legum completed and passed into law in the reign of Elizabeth. This code of ecclesiastical laws deals with the doctrine of the Trinity, the powers of the church, the general councils, heresies, the sacraments, confirmation, ordination, witchcraft, marriage, simony, dilapidations, church parish officers, synods, visitations, excommunication, and ecclesiastical courts. Cranmer was the chief compiler.

Reformation (The). That great spiritual and ecclesiastical 'reform' which took place in Europe in the 16th cent.

In France, 1512, begun by Lefevre and Farel.

In Switzerland, 1516, begun by Zwingli.

In Germany, 1517, begun by Luther.

In Denmark, 1527, introduced by Frederick I.

In Scotland, 1527, introduced by Patrick Hamilton.

In Sweden, 1529, established by Gustavus Vasa.

In England, 1534, begun under Henry VIII.

In Geneva, 1535, established by Farel.

Reformation Tree, or Oak (The). An old oak on Mousehold [heath], near Norwich, under which Robert Ket, the tanner, sat to meet the rebels in 1549. Under this tree the insurgents aired their grievances and concocted their schemes of redress. Here it was that Ket, or Kett, sat as a Judge Lynch to try offenders, and here he and other stump orators addressed the people.

Aldrich the Mayor of Norwich, several clergymen both of the old and new learning, and even Matthew Parker, the future Archbishop of Canterbury, ascended the tree to address the people.
Household, pronounce Muscle; Norwich, pronounce Nor'ridge.

Reformationes. 'Inquisitiones Reformatōrum in provincias missorum. Literæ Philippi VI. Franc. Regis, 1340, vol. iii.' (Du Cange, vol. v. p. 638).

Reformatory Schools, 1834. Schools where young misdemeanants are sent instead of being sent to prison. The greatest reformatory in England is at Redhill.

Reformed Church (Second Parent of the). John the Constant, elector of Saxony (1407–1532). He succeeded his brother Frederick the Wise in 1525, and in 1530 presented to Karl V. (Charles Quint) the Augsburg Confession of Faith, drawn out by Melanchthon.

Reformed Churches. Those of the Zwinglians, Swiss, Upper Rhine Provinces, and Holland, which were 'reformed' without accepting Lutheranism.

There is a German-Swiss 'Reformed Church' and also a Dutch 'Reformed Church' in the U.S.

Reformed European Patriots (The), 1821, or Philadelphians. A branch of the Carbonāri.

Reformed Presbyterian Church (The). A remnant of the old Cameronians, who have more than thirty congregations in Scotland, and about as many in Ireland. There are some also in the United States and in Canada.

Reformed Presbyterian Synod of Ireland (The). Unconnected with the General Assembly, it does not therefore participate in the parliamentary grant.

Reformers (The) of Hungary, 1794. A secret political society to insure the introduction of the principles of the French Revolution. This society was in alliance with the more aristocratic one called 'The Friends of Liberty and Equality.'

Reformers' Bible (The). The 'Black Book.' An exposition of crown revenues, with lists of pluralists, placemen, pensioners, and sinecurists. Effingham Wilson, 1833

Refreshment Sunday. The fourth Sunday in Lent, when the Gospel of the day is about Christ feeding the multitude, and the first lesson (Gen. xliii.) is about Joseph feasting his brother. See 'Sunday.'

Regalia, or 'Right of Regale.' A right in ecclesiastical things claimed by sovereigns as royal prerogatives: such as presentation to benefices, the revenues of vacant benefices and sees, &c. The most memorable conflict on the subject was that between Pope Innocent XI. and Louis XIV., which was only terminated by the death of the pope.

Regality (A). A territorial jurisdiction formerly existing in Scotland, resembling our palatinate. The holder, called a 'Lord of Regality,' exercised the rights of a king in his own jurisdiction. Abolished by 20 Geo. II. c. 50.

Regarders. Forest rangers, who made their regard or range through royal forests.

Regardes. Visitations held by the king's justiciaries to correct encroachments on crown lands, impose and assess fines, determine suit and service, and regulate forest ordinances. The 'Great Regarde' was held once in every fifty years, and was entrusted to the highest baron of the realm, who empanelled juries, summoned witnesses, required the attendance of all forest officers, and made all appointments.

Edward I., Aug. 1282, and Henry VII. undertook these inspections.

And early rising from his couch, with scant reflection done,
Soon from his woodland towers, I trow, had the good Abbot gone,
And with his white-frocked monks that day rode o'er the grassy sward,
Oblivious of the bleating fold, to join the Great Regarde.
Hayward Oaks, at the Regarde of Brian d'Insula, the King's Justiciarie, 1202.

Regent and Non-regent. A regent was a professor or university lecturer. See Rymer, 'Fœdera,' vol. iv page 411, col. 1; and again, p. 413, col. 1. A non-regent is a master of arts or doctor, no longer bound to give lectures. The terms were retained in the University of Cambridge till 1858, though the duties of giving lectures had long passed to what are called 'professors.'

Regent Diamond (The). See 'Pitt Diamond.'

Regent House (The) originally meant the governing body of the university. It was strictly confined to those graduates who were actively engaged in teaching, and those who had ceased to teach formed, in 1400, a second assembly called the Non-regent House, whose consent was needful to the more important graces. The two houses formed the Senate. The master's hood for the regent house was lined with white, for the non-regent house the black hood had no lining. In 1535 professors were substituted for regents as teachers. In 1570 the regency of masters was extended to five years, when a master became necessarily non-regent, and in 1858 both regents and non-regents ceased to exist.

The Regents were Masters of Arts of less than five years' standing, and Doctors of less than two; the non-Regents were Masters of Art of more than five years' standing, with the Doctors of two years' standing, who belonged to either of the houses.

Regent's Park, London, 1838. Planned and given to the public during the regency of George, afterwards the fourth of that name.

Regiam Majestatem. An ancient collection of laws said to have been compiled by order of David I. of Scotland (1124–1153), but probably not older than the reign of our Edward I. (1272–1307).

Regiam Potestatem. A compilation of laws by Ranulph Glanvil, chief justice of England, who died 1190.

Regicides (The). I. In English history the party which favoured the execution of Charles I.

Thirteen suffered death for the part they took in this affair, viz., Axtell, Barkstead, Carew, Clement, Cook, Corbet, Hacker, Harrison, Jones, Okey, Peters, Scott, and Scrope.

II. In Russian history, 1881, means those Terrorists, or political confederates, who combined to assassinate Czar Alexander II.

Régime de la Calotte (Le). The régime of priests. So the priestly administrator of affairs, at the restoration, was called in France.

The calotte is the skull-cap worn by monks over their tonsure.

Régiment de la Calotte (Le). See 'Calottistes.'

Regimen of Factors (The), 1745. The 'Factors' were the dukes of Devonshire, Bedford, Rutland, and Montague with the lords Herbert, Halifax, Cholmondeley, Falmouth, Malton, Derby, and some others of less note belonging to the great Whig party. Subscriptions were given to a large amount for the raising of troops, both horse and foot, to oppose the Young Pretender after his victory at Prestonpans; but the Whig lords, 'fearing that their relations and friends would lose a magnificent job,' proposed in the House of Lords that all the regiments should be paid by the king only.

The 'Regiment-factors,' as they were called, thus loaded the army list with a swarm of lordlings and lazy young fellows of high family, whom the men in various cases refused to follow.—HOWITT, Hist. of Eng. (Geo. II.), 507.

Cholmondeley, pronounce Chum'-ly.

Regiomontanus. A Latinised form of Königsberger. 'Königs-berg' = king's-mount, like 'Regius-mons'; and Königs-berger = Regio-montanus. Regiomontānus was really John Müller of Königsberg, in Franconia (1436–1476), the restorer of the science of astronomy, and archbishop of Ratisbon.

Regiomontanus was also noted for his mechanical toys. Hence, says Sir T. Brown, 'who admires not Regiomontanus—his fly more than his eagle.'

A foolish fashion existed about the time of the Reformation, especially with German and Dutch scholars, of converting their names into Greek or Latin. As Melanchthon for Schwarzerdt, &c., &c. See p. 599, 'Names Classicised.'

Registrar (The), in the Oxford University, is elected by the House of Convocation (q.v.), and must be either an M.A. or a B.C.L. He has to attend all meetings of both Congregations, of Convocation, and of the Hebdomadal Council (q.v.); and registers all acts and documents to which the university seal is affixed. His stipend is 600*l.* a year. See 'Registrary.'

Registrar-General (The), 1837. Appointed under the Great Seal, with his central office at Somerset House. Under him is a chief clerk, six superintendents, and a large staff of clerks appointed by the lords of the treasury. From the office of the registrar-general emanate instructions to all superintendent registrars, registrars of births and deaths, and registrars of marriages. A copy of any registry may be obtained by anyone for 3*s.* 6*d.*, which includes search.

Registrary (The), in the Cambridge University, is elected by the senate from one of two persons nominated by the council. His duties are to attend all congregations of the senate, and to register all Graces (q.v.) in the University Records. This officer, in the University of Oxford, is called the registrar (q.v.).

Registration of Aliens Act (The), 6, 7 Will. IV. c. 11, A.D. 1836. This was the repeal of 7 Geo. IV. c. 54, A.D. 1827, which obliged all aliens or foreigners who visited the British Isles to present themselves at the Alien Office to be registered. By the new act, masters of vessels arriving from foreign parts are required to declare what number of foreign passengers are on board, and every foreigner on landing is required to show his passport to the chief officer of customs at the port of debarkation. This registration and showing of passports is never exacted; and no return is kept of vessels landing, nor have they been registered since 1842.

Registration of Copyright (The), 5, 6 Vict. c. 45, A.D. 1842, authorizing the registration at Stationers' Hall of the title of copyright property. The omission to register will not affect the copyright, but will bar any action being brought for its infringement.

Registration of Death (The), 1874. 37, 38 Vict. c. 88, s. 8 enacts that the death of every person dying in England shall be registered within five days of the decease, and the cause of death stated on a certificate to be handed to the officiating minister before interment. It devolves on the nearest relatives present at the death or in attendance at the time to give the registrar notice and to sign the register. In default of relatives the duty devolves on the occupier and inmates of the house.

Registration of Electors Act (The). 2 William IV. c. 45, s. 26, A.D. 1832, making it requisite for a voter in the election of members of Parliament to be registered before exercising the franchise.

This is sometimes called 'The Registration of Voters Act.'

Regium Donum. An annual grant of public money for the maintenance of dissenting ministers in Ireland. It began in 1672, when Charles II. gave 600*l.* of secret service money to be distributed annually among the Presbyterian clergy in Ireland. William III. in 1690 increased the grant to 1,200*l.* a year. George III. in 1784 raised it to 2,200*l.*, and in 1792 to 5,000*l.* In 1863 the grant was 39,746*l.*: and in 1869 it was abolished.

In 1798 commenced an annual grant to dissenting ministers in England.

Regius Professor of Civil Law (The), in the University of Cambridge, 1540, founded by Henry VIII. Original stipend 40*l.* a year. Present stipend 534*l.* 18*s.*, and 10 guineas a head from each of the students who attend his lectures. See 'Downing Professorship of the Laws of England,' 'International Law, &c.,' 'Chancellor's Medal, &c.,' 'Battie's Scholarship,' 'Browne Scholarship,' 'Craven Scholarship,' 'Whewell Scholarship of International Law.'

Regius Professorship of Civil Law (The), in Oxford University. Founded in 1546 by Henry VIII. at 40*l.* a year. The present stipend is 440*l.* a year.

Regius Professorship of Divinity (The), in the University of Cambridge, 1540, founded by Henry VIII. Original stipend 40*l.* a year, but now considerably augmented. See 'Lady Margaret Professorship of Divinity,' 'Norrisian Professor of Divinity,' and 'Hulsean Professor of Divinity,' 'Crosse Scholarship,' 'Evans's Prize,' 'Jeremie Prize,' 'Burney Prize,' 'Hulsean Prize,' 'Kaye Prize,' 'Norrisian Prize.'

Regius Professorship of Divinity (The), in Oxford University. Founded in 1535 by Henry VIII. at 40*l.* a year. Augmented by James I. in 1605.

Regius Professorship of Greek (The), of the University of Cambridge, 1540. Founded by Henry VIII. The original stipend was 40*l.* a year, but the present endowment includes a canonry of Ely Cathedral. See 'Chancellor's Classical Medal,' 'Porson Scholarship,' 'Davies Scholarship,' 'Pitt's Scholarship,' 'Waddington Scholarship,' 'Scholefield Prize,' 'Porson Prize,' 'Browne's Medals.'

Regius Professorship of Greek (The), in Oxford University. Founded in 1547 by Henry VIII. at 40*l.* a year. Increased in 1865 to 500*l.* a year.

Regius Professorship of Hebrew (The), in the University of Cambridge, 1540. Founded by Henry VIII. Original stipend 40*l.* a year, now endowed with a canonry of Ely Cathedral. See 'Tyrwhitt Hebrew Scholarship.'

Regius Professorship of Hebrew (The), in Oxford University. Founded in 1540 by Henry VIII. at 40*l.* a year. Augmented by Charles I. in 1630.

Regius Professorship of Medicine (The), in Oxford University. Founded in 1540 by Henry VIII. at 40*l.* a year. Augmented by Charles I. in 1630.

Called in the Cambridge University the 'Regius Professorship of Physic' (q.v.).

Regius Professorship of Modern History, &c., in Oxford University. Stipend 620*l.* a year. Founded by George I. in 1724.

In the University of Cambridge there is a Professor of Modern History, who holds his appointment during the sovereign's pleasure. Stipend 871*l.* a year, paid by the University.

Regius Professorship of Physic (The), in the University of Cambridge, 1540. Founded by Henry VIII. Original stipend 40*l.* a year. Present stipend 300*l.* a year and a house in Market Street. See 'Downing Professorship of Medicine.'

Regular Abbot (A). An abbot who discharged the duties of an abbey held by a secular abbot. As a secular abbot is a layman, he is not qualified to undertake clerical duties.

Regular Canons. 'Canonici Regulares,' canons who lived in community, bound by the 'rule' of the house. Secular canons were exempt from the 'rule.'

Regulars (The). I. 'Regular Clergy' (Regulares, from regula, a rule), Catholic clergymen of some monastic order, who live according to the rule of their order, always including obedience, chastity, and poverty. The secular clergy are those, engaged in parochial duties, who are not bound by monastic rules.

Archbishops, bishops, rectors, vicars, and curates are not usually regulars but seculars.

II. In the British army. All troops except the militia, yeomanry, and volunteers. They are regular all the year, and not called out for certain days or weeks only.

Regulation Act (The), 1773. Relative to the East India Company. It established a governor-general and a Supreme Court of Judicature for all British possessions in India; prohibited judges and members of council from trading; forbade any receipt of presents from natives; and ordered that every act of the East India Directors should be submitted to the House of Commons for approval before it was enforced.

Regulators.

I. In 1687. A committee of seven Catholics and Jesuits appointed by James II. to send deputations to different corporations and report on them. The board was at Whitehall, and they were empowered to introduce into the corporations new rules and new men as they thought fit. Of course the object was to prepare for the reintroduction of Roman Catholicism by returning members to the parliament about to be convened favourable to the king's views.

II. In 1770. A body of men who took the law into their own hands, and inflicted bodily punishment according to their own discretion and on their own authority upon offenders. The difficulty of bringing offenders in the back settlements of North America to justice induced orderly people to institute this rough and ready method of proceeding.

III. In 1776. Backwoodsmen collected together by Governor Martin to recover North Carolina in the American War of Independence. They were decoyed into a swamp, and such as escaped made again for the backwoods.

Regulators were, later on, especially active in Texas and California, where the population suddenly outgrew the constituted authorities.

Reichstag, 1871. The diet of the German empire. Since the establishment of the empire under the king of Prussia the legislative council has consisted of one representative to every 100,000 inhabitants. As the entire population is about 47 millions, this will give 470 members to the legislative assembly. The delegates of the confederated governments form the 'Bundesrath,' and whatever passes the two houses and is signed by the king-emperor becomes binding on all the twenty-six states.

Reign of Tears (The), 1871. The French Revolution terminated with the 'Reign of Terror'; the Franco-German war terminated with the 'Reign of Tears' [Thiers].

Reign of Terror (The).

I. In Algiers, 1509. That of Barbarossa, the Turkish chief who put to death Salem-Aben-Toumi, the Arab sheik whom he came to assist against the Christians.

II. 'Le Régime de la Terreur' (from 31 May, 1793, to 27 July, 1794). It began with the triumph of the Mountain over the Girondists in the National Convention, and terminated with the execution of Robespierre. While Robespierre and his Committee of Public Safety (q.v.) dominated, France was filled with scaffolds.

Among its victims were Louis XVI., the Queen Marie Antoinette, the Duc d'Orléans (Philippe Egalité), twenty-one Girondists, and many thousands of others. It lasted 420 days.

III. In Ireland, 1881–1887. Under the domination of Charles Stewart Parnell, M.P. for Cork. Mr. Parnell, in order to obtain the severance of Ireland from Great Britain, was at the head of an organization which terrorized the Irish by shooting at the legs of those who refused to support their league, boycotting them, pouring pitch on the bare heads of their wives and daughters, maiming their cattle, and rendering their lives a ceaseless terror. In 1886 he contrived to get eighty-six of his partisans elected to the Imperial Parliament, and block the business of the house. Some of his American friends tried to terrorize the English by blowing up public buildings by dynamite, and denouncing death on the public servants of Ireland. See p. 679, 'Phœnix Park Murder.'

Reis-Effendi. A Turkish secretary of foreign affairs.

Relics (Christian). Excepting those connected with the crucifixion, which are noticed each in loco, the following may be mentioned:—

The famous Manus de cælo missa, which even Pope Pius IX., in 1859, acknowledged to be genuine (!) William of Oulx was a peasant who had lost his right hand, and for his piety an angel brought him one from heaven. When he died the 'hand' refused to be buried, and persistently pushed itself through the coffin. So the Archbishop of Embrun ordered it to be cut off and stored among the holy relics. This was done, and certain days were set apart when it was to be shown to the people. This is one of the best attested relics of the Catholic Church.

In a monastery of Calabria is the hood which an angel from heaven brought Francis of Paula, and put upon his head.

In half a dozen places is shown some of the milk of Mary while she was nursing the infant Jesus: but we are not informed how this 'spilt milk' was gathered up and preserved.

Part of one of the stones cast at Stephen is preserved at Toul. So Father Benedict informs us in his 'Life of St. Gerard' (1700).

Harmer, in his 'Observations,' tells us he was shown 'a prodigious tooth,' wrapped in three covers of paper, on one of which was written, A tooth of the holy St. Paul

Peter himself told St. Longis where to find one of his teeth. The tooth was taken to Boisselière, and Harduin says that a great crowd of people flocked thither 'pour vénérer ce gage de la protection du prince des Apôtres.'

The girdle of Joseph the carpenter is preserved in Notre Dame, Joinville-sur-Marne; his walking stick at Florence; one of his hammers at the church of St. Anastasia, Rome; and one of his cloaks in the same place.

Brady gives us the following list: One of the coals that broiled St. Lawrence; a finger of St. Andrew, another of John the Baptist, and a thumb of St. Thomas: the hem of Christ's garment touched by the woman suffering from the issue of blood; a lock of Mary Magdalen's hair, with which she wiped her tears from the feet of Jesus; a phial of the sweat of St. Michael when he contended with Satan; some of the rays of the guiding star which appeared to the Wise Men of the East; a rib of the Verbum caro factum; a pair of Enoch's slippers; the pap-spoon of the infant Jesus; St. Michael's sword and buckler; one of the tears shed by Jesus at the tomb of Lazarus; and one of the water-pots used at the marriage feast of Cana of Galilee. See 'Clavis Calendaria,' p. 240.

There was an 'age of relics,' and it would require many pages even to tabulate them. Some could not even be set down without seeming to cast ridicule on a subject far too sacred to be trifled with. They have, however, an historic value, as they show a very important phase of religious thought and pious sentimentality in the middle ages, though in this matter-of-fact age they are much discredited.

Relics not Christian.

In one of the visits of the Prince of Wales to Germany, the English ladies staying at the hotel bought as relics the cherry-stones left by him at dessert. This surely was the very crest unto the crest of snobbism.

At Salamis was shown the sacred stone on which Telamon the father of Ajax sat.

In one of the Spartan temples was suspended one of the eggs of Leda, who had been transformed by Zeus into a swan. Probably it was an ostrich's egg.

At Panŏpēus, in Phocis, was shown some of the clay out of which Prometheus made man, and we are assured that it had a strong smell of human flesh.

Masois, a French architect and archæologist, published in 1819 a work entitled 'The Palace of Scaurus,' in which were plates of the bones of the sea-monster which Perseus slew.

At Ceylon is preserved a tooth of Buddha; doubtless, from its great size, the tooth of some extinct saurian, for no animal with a mouth smaller than a horse could possibly have had such a huge molar.

From 1424, for many years, the Heilthum was exhibited at Nuremberg, the second Friday after Easter, together with the sword of Charlemagne, his crown and sceptre, as well as a piece of the true cross, a nail used at the crucifixion, the lance which pierced the dead body of Christ, part of the manger of Bethlehem, and portions of the several chains with which Peter, Paul, and John were bound.

Relief. A sum of money paid by a vassal to his baron on his coming of age, when he took up his right and paid his fee to the king.

Relief Bill (The), or 'Catholic Relief Bill,' 13 April, 1829. A bill to relieve Catholics from religious and civil disabilities. The same as the 'Catholic Emancipation Act' (q.v.)

The pastoral [of Dr. Doyle] besought the people to promote the end which the legislature contemplated in passing the Relief Bill.—HOWITT, Hist. of Eng. (year 1829, p. 146).

Relief Church (The), 1752. Seceders from the Kirk of Scotland who choose their own pastors.

Relief Synod (The), 1752. A secession from the Scotch Church led by the Rev. Thomas Gillespie, who was afterwards joined by the Rev. Thomas Boston. They allowed greater freedom of communion than any other sect in Scotland, and, next to the Associate Synod, are the most numerous of the Scotch Dissenters.

Reliefs. Fines paid to the lord by a new tenant on his entering on the tenement of his predecessor at death. Introduced by William the Conqueror, and abolished by 12 Car. II. c. 24.

Religieux de Citeaux, 1098. Twenty inmates led by St. Robert from the abbey of Molesme to the neighbourhood of Nuits, in the department of Côte d'Or, and so called from the ci'ernes or subterraneous pits which they found there. Commonly called Cistercians.

Religieux de la Merci (Les), 1218. Confirmed by Gregory IX. in 1235. An order under the rule of St. Augustine for the redeeming of captives.

Religionists (The). So the Huguenots or Calvinists were often called in France.

The universities and colleges . . . invented difficulty upon difficulty against conferring academic degrees upon the Religionists.—FÉLICE, Hist. of the Protestants of France, bk. iii. 7.

Religio'si. Monks or Regulāres (4 syl.) were so called. Nuns were Religiōsæ. Called Regulars because they followed some regŭla or rule; and called Religiosi because their entire life was spent in religious duties or observances.

Religious Peace (The), or 'The Treaty of Passau,' 1552. Imposed on Karl V. by Maurice. It was agreed:

1. That both belligerents should lay down their arms, and assist Ferdinand against the Turks.

2. That the landgraf of Hesse should be set at liberty.

3. That the 'Interim' (q.v.) should be revoked, and Protestants be free till the Diet met, which was to be within six months.

4. That those banished for their alliance with the Smalcaldic League (q.v.) should be recalled and reinstated.

5. That Protestants and Catholics should be on an equal footing.

Religious Peace of Augsburg (The), 26 Sept., 1555. This was supplemental to the Treaty of Passau in 1552. By this 'Peace,' full liberty of worship, granted by the Treaty of Passau, was confirmed. Lutherans and Catholics were declared alike eligible to all offices of state; and every ruler might sanction in his own province whatever form of religion he chose, but all were to tolerate those who held different religious views from those favoured by the state.

Religious Statistics, 1890. Assuming the entire population of the globe to be 1,450 millions, of these, 1,050 millions are non-Christians, 400 millions are nominally Christians.

Religious Wars (The), 1562–1598. In the reigns of Charles IX. and Henri III. of France.

First, 1562–1568. The Catholic leaders were François duc de Guise, St. André, and the Comte de Montmorency; the Protestant leaders were Louis prince de Condé, and the Sire de Coligny. The chief events of this war were the siege of Rouen, the battle of Dreux, and the siege of Orleans.

Second, 1567–1568. The only event of note was the battle of St. Denis, in which Anne duc de Montmorency lost his life.

Third, 1569–1570. The chief events were (1) the battle of Jarnac (1569), in which the Catholics were victorious, and the Prince de Condé, the great Huguenot leader was slain; and (2) the battle of Moncontour, also won by the Catholics.

On 24 Aug., 1572, occurred the great slaughter of the Huguenots, called the Massacre of St. Bartholomew's Eve.

Fourth, 1573. The Catholics besieged La Rochelle, but were obliged to raise the siege.

Fifth, 1575–1576. The Catholic leader was Henri of Guise; the Protestant leaders were the prince de Condé and Henri of Navarre.

Sixth, 1577. The Protestants were overmastered, but Henri III. coquetted with them through fear of the Guises.

Seventh, 1577–1578. In which Henri of Navarre carried Cahors with a coup-de-main, and peace ensued.

The last of the Catholic triumvirate lost his life. The command of the Catholic army was now given to Henri duc d'Anjou.

Remember the Vase of Soissons. Kings never forgive or forget. After the battle of Soissons (A.D. 486), Clovis wished to appropriate a valuable vase, but one of the warriors stepped forwards and broke it to atoms with his battle-axe, saying, 'Thou shalt have thy share only, like the rest of us.' Clovis dissembled his anger, but did not forget the insult; and one day, finding the same warrior had neglected to clean his axe, he snatched it out of the man's hand and split his skull with it, saying, 'Remember the vase of Soissons.'

Remembrance (The). This was the first document which openly avowed an intention of bringing the king (Charles I. of England) to a personal judgment, and of changing the monarchical form of government.

Remembrancer. An officer of the Exchequer, who reminds the lord treasurer and the justices of that court of such things as are to be called on and dealt with for the benefit of the crown. The clerks are called the 'Clerks of the Remembrancers.' The office of lord treasurer was abolished by Act 3, 4 William IV. chap. 99 (28 Aug., 1833), and its duties transferred to the lord high treasurer.

Remembrancers (Clerks of the). First mentioned in 1368. See above.

Reminiscere (5 syl.) Sunday. The second Sunday in Lent, so called in the Catholic Church from the introitus (or beginning of the mass), the first word of which is Reminisce'o.

Remish Bible (The), 1584. A translation of the Bible by the Roman Catholics at Reims. Printed on large paper. The great objection to this version is its retention of so many Hebrew and Greek terms untranslated, as Azymes, Tunike, Holocaust, Prepuce, Pasche, &c. See 'Bible.'

When any doctrine or dispute hangs on the word, without doubt it is better to retain the original Greek or Hebrew, as baptism, schism, and so on.

Remonstrance. From the council of officers, 1648, called for the election of a new parliament; for electoral reform; for the recognition of the supremacy of Parliament; for the change of kingship into a parliamentary magistracy; and that Charles I. should be brought to justice for treason, blood, and ill-government See next article.

Remonstrance (Grand). On the state of the kingdom, 22 Nov., 1641. Clarendon says it was 'a very bitter representation of all the illegal things that had been done by the king [Charles I.] from the first hour of his coming to the crown to that minute.' It contained 206 clauses, and led to the arrest of the five members (q.v.).

Among the charges were these. The war against the French Protestants, the innovations in the Church, the illegal imposition of ship-money, forced loans, the cruelties of the Star Chamber and High Commission, the forcing of episcopacy on Scotland, the forcing of it on the Irish by Strafford, and other illegal proceedings.—HOWITT, Hist. of England, Charles I. chap. iv. p. 220.

Remonstrance (The), 1610. The petition presented to the States of Holland by the Arminians. It contained these five points: (1) Predestination is conditional on faith. Those who believe are predestined to be saved, those who refuse to believe are predestined to perish; (2) Christ died for all, but only believers will receive the benefits of redemption; (3) all must be born again, as no man is otherwise capable of exercising a saving faith; (4) though grace may be resisted, yet without grace no man can think or will any good thing; (5) believers are able by the aid of the Holy Ghost to resist sin.

Remonstrance (The Irish), 1818. In reply to a letter from Pope John XXII. to the Irish clergy, commanding them to censure all those who rebelled against the ruling powers. The remonstrance gives a sketch of Irish history 'for 4,000 years'; expresses irreconcilable bitterness against the English rulers; states that they had given Ireland to Edward Bruce, brother of the Scotch hero; and concludes with a threat of war à outrance against every Englishman who holds an inch of land in the whole island. See 'Irish Associations.'

Remonstrance of Grievances (The), 1640. Sixteen articles. These were Irish grievances laid before the British Parliament, such as the arbitrary decision of pleas by the lord deputy; the perversion of law by the judges; the punishments inflicted for freedom of speech; the exorbitant powers of the court of commission; want of security for persons or property; the increase of monopolies; exorbitant fees extracted by the clergy, and so on.

Remonstrant Synod of Ulster (The), 1830. Formed in consequence of the separation of seventeen ministers with their congregations from the General Synod of Ulster, on the ground that it required from its members in 1827 and 1828 submission to certain doctrinal acts not in accordance with the code of discipline and contrary to previous usage.

Remonstrants, 1610. Arminians were so called from their humble petition or 'remonstrance' against Calvinism, addressed to the states of Holland. See 'Remonstrance,' 1610.

The anti-remonstrants were called Gomarists. The two leaders were Barneveldt (remonstrant) and Maurice of Nassau (Gomarist).

Remonstrators or 'Remonstrants,' 1650. A break from the general body of Presbyterians after the battle of Dunbar. They consisted, at first, of some 4,000 Scotchmen, under Kerr and Strachan, giving out that the defeat of Dunbar was a divine punishment on the Presbyterians for joining with Engagers (q.v.) and Malignants (q.v.) in espousing the royal cause. They were inclined to unite with the republicans.

The royalists obtained the name of Public Resolutioners; their opponents, of Protestors or Remonstrants.—Dr. LINGARD, History of England, viii. 4.

Strachan, pronounce Strawn.

Renaissance Period (The). Began in France with the reign of François I. (1515). In Italy it began under the patronage of the Medici (1453). The Greeks, driven from Constantinople by Mahomet II., took refuge in Italy, and were the chief cause of this renaissance.

In architecture the Gothic was supplanted by the Renaissance, which was itself succeeded by imitation Greek. The Renaissance architecture is conspicuous for its high roofs, crowded ornamentation, fanciful chimneys, statues introduced into walls, parapets, and vestibules, for its doors and windows, and its general bad taste.

Repeal Agitation (Ireland). Organised in 1842; reached its culmination in 1843. Its objects were to agitate for a resident parliament in Dublin, and to sever Ireland from the crown of Great Britain. It was distinguished for its monster meetings under the leadership of Daniel O'Connell; the largest was that held at Tara, in Meath, when above 250,000 persons assembled. Happily at this period the temperance cause under Father Mathew was in full force, so these vast meetings were not riotous. See 'Irish Associations.'

Repeal Association (The). I. 1829. Followed the Catholic Association of 1824 (q.v.). The object was the repeal of the union of the two parliaments effected in 1801. Daniel O'Connell was the great agitator of this repeal. When the Repeal Association was proclaimed in 1830 a new society rose under the name of the Anti-Union Society. See 'Irish Associations.'

II. 1840, or 'National Association for the Repeal of the Union,' set on foot by Daniel O'Connell, who held his monster meetings in 1843.

Repeal Cap (The). Green, gold, and velvet. Green for Ireland. It was worn by O'Connell and his party on their release from prison in 1844.

Repeal Year (The), 1843. So called from the monster meetings held in Ireland for the repeal of the union. The first was held at Trim, in Meath; the largest was that on Tara hill, 15 Aug.,

under the auspices of Daniel O'Connell, and the last was at Mullaghmast, 1 Oct., 1843. See 'Irish Associations.'

Repeal of the Union (between Great Britain and Ireland). Resolutions in its favour passed by a meeting at Dublin, 1 Sept., 1810. Associations organised to promote the repeal in 1829. O'Connell brought forward his motion for the repeal in 1834, but it was rejected by the House of Commons. The National Association for the Repeal was established in 1840, and monster meetings were held for the object on Tara hill in Aug. 1843. In 1881–1890 the question again agitated Ireland under the leadership of Mr. Parnell. See 'Irish Associations.'

Representers (The), 1721. The twelve 'Marrow-men' (q.v.) were so called because they signed a 'representation' or protest against the judgment of the General Assembly on the subject of the book entitled 'The Marrow of Modern Divinity.' See 'Marrow Controversy.'

Republica Parthenope'a, 1799. The republic of Naples was so named by Championnet, who took possession of it.

Neapŏlis was anciently called Parthenŏpé, from one of the syrens who was said to have lived there. Naples, a contraction of Neapolis, means the New City, referring to the new city built by a colony of Cumæans.

Republican Calendar. I. The Months, beginning 22 Sept. Each month 30 days.

AUTUMN.
Vendémiaire (Vintage month) ...	Sept. 22–Oct. 21.
Brumaire (Foggy month)	Oct. 22—Nov. 20.
Frimaire (Sleety month)	Nov. 21—Dec. 20.

Republican Calendar of Brazil, 1890, beginning with Sunday: Humanidi, Maridi, Patridi, Filidi, Fratidi, Domidi, and Matridi. This ridiculous list of names is called the 'Positivists' Calendar,' and the twelve months are equally absurd.

Moses—January	Charlemagne—July
Homer—February	Dante—August
Aristotle—March	Gutenberg—September
Archimèdes—April	Shakespeare—October
Cæsar—May	Descartes—November
St. Paul—June	Frederick the Great—Dec.

Republican Marriages, 1794. A device by Carrier for putting to death those persons in Nantes supposed to be disaffected towards the republic. It consisted in tying men and women together by their hands and feet and casting them into the Loire. No people in the world have shown such refinement of savage cruelty as the French. See p. 236, 'Damiens,' as one example out of many.

Republican Martyr (The). Jean Paul Marat, murdered in his bath by Charlotte Corday (1744–1793).

Requests by the Captain of the Great Assembly in Kent (The), June 1450. A paper of grievances and requests handed in by Jack Cade for the consideration of the king and his advisers. It demanded that the king should resume the crown grants, so that his subjects might be relieved of too heavy taxation; that the false progeny of the Duke of Suffolk be dismissed from the king's council; and that the Duke of York be restored.

Jack Cade was an illegitimate son of the Duke of York.

Rescessory Act (The), 1661. Whereby Charles II. revoked his oath taken in Scotland to be true to the 'Engagement' (q.v.). The revocation was grounded on the plea of moral compulsion.

The Rescessory Act at one blow levelled with the ground every legal prop of the Scottish Kirk.—Dr. LINGARD, History of England, ix. 1.

Rescript (A). The response of a king to an individual on some question officially submitted to him. If the response is made to a council, corporation, or community, it is called a 'Pragmatic Sanction.'

Rescripts (The) are replies of the Roman emperors to questions of law put to them by magistrates and colonial governors. They were written in purple ink. The edicts of prætors were in white, and the jus civile in red ink.

Reservatum Ecclesiasticum. A provision of the religious Peace of Westphalia (1549), whereby the church claimed the territorial property annexed to any dignity if the holder thereof changed his religion. This enactment led to the Thirty Years' War (q.v.).

Residences of the kings of France. See p. 492, 'Kings of France,' &c.

Resolutioners (The), or 'Public Resolutioners,' 1650, who were inclined to treat the conduct of the deceased king, Charles I., with leniency in opposition to the Remonstrants, who 'protested' against his conduct in unmeasured terms. In Scotch law a resolutioner is one who does something prejudicial to an estate, and if found guilty the estate is forfeited and passes to the next heir.

The kingdom of Scotland was divided into Resolutioners and Protesters, the former of whom adhered to Charles II., after his father's death upon the scaffold, while the Protesters inclined rather to a union with the triumphant Republicans.—Sir W. Scott, Old Mortality, ch. v.

Respublica Binepsis, 14th cent. A social order founded by some Polish noblemen, and so called from Binepsis, the seat of its founder. It was a multum in parvo of Poland itself, with its king, council, chamberlain, master of the chase, and other officers. Any of the members conspicuous for a foible was created to some office or title in ridicule thereof. Thus a great lover of hunting was made 'Master of the Chase,' a boaster was made 'Field Marshal.' But no one was allowed to chaff or ridicule these officers. At one time the order contained well-nigh all the court of Poland. The objects of the order were to promote charity, good feeling, and sociability, and to repress immorality and affectations of all kinds.

Restitution Edict (The), 1630. Published by Kaiser Ferdinand II., when the king of Denmark retired from the Thirty Years' War. It enjoined restitution to the Catholics of the two archbishoprics, the twelve bishoprics, and all the parish churches, lands, and other properties which had been confiscated by Protestants since the 'Treaty of Passau.' Compliance with this edict was well-nigh impossible, so the Protestants applied to Gustavus Adolphus of Sweden, and thus began the second part of this long religious war.

Restoration (The).

I. In English history, 29 May, 1660. The restoration of monarchical government interrupted at the death of Charles I. by a Commonwealth. The old form was restored by the recall and return of Charles II., who had been living in exile.

II. In French history. The restoration of Louis XVIII. to the throne after the abdication of Napoleon and his banishment to Elba, 3 May, 1814. On 21 March, 1815, Napoleon broke from Elba, and Louis XVIII. fled; but after the battle of Waterloo Louis was restored a second time, and entered Paris 8 July, 1815.

Restorationists. A religious sect which believes that all persons will ultimately be restored, after a due time of purgation proportionate to their sins. Origen was a Restorationist.

Restorer of Cities, and Father of his Country. Sancho I. of Portugal, who repaired the cities which had suffered greatly in the recent wars (1154, 1185–1212).

Restorer of French Liberty (The). 'Le Restaurateur de la Liberté Française,' 13 Aug., 1789. A title conferred on Louis XVI. when he signed the 19 articles formulated on the 4th by the National Assembly. See 'August 4.'

Restorer of Learning (The). Lorenzo de Medicis the Magnificent (1448–1492). Also called the 'Patron of the Fine Arts.'

Restorer of Letters (The). Alexander Heigius of Westphalia (18th cent.).

Restorer of the Protestantism of France (The). Antoine Court (1696–1760).

Restorers of Astronomy (The) John Müller (better known as 'Regiomontānus,' q.v.), 1436–1476, and his pupil Georg Purbach of Austria (1423–1461).

Resumption Bill (The), 1700 (11, 12 Will. III. c. 2). For the resumption of grants of land in Ireland by William III. to foreigners, as Keppel of Guelderland (Earl of Albemarle); William Bentinck, son of the Earl of Portland (a Dutch favourite of William's), created Viscount Woodstock; Ginckel, another Dutchman, created Earl of Athlone; and Ruvigny, a French Huguenot, created Earl of Galway. To these four foreigners William granted above 300,000 acres of land in Ireland. The land was sold to the highest purchasers, and the money employed in paying the arrears of the army.

He granted also to Elizabeth Villiers, his mistress, above 95,000 acres, valued at 25,995*l.* a year !!

The first duke of Portland was Henry Bentinck, 1716.

Resurrection (The). Tertullian says the Crucifixion occurred on 25 March, and the Calendar of the Arbuthnott Missal places the Resurrection on 27 March. If so the year must have been A.D. 29, when 25 March fell on a Friday.

Tertullian says that Christ suffered under Tiberius Cæsar in the consulate of Rubellius Geminus and Fufius Geminus, in the month of March, at the time of the passover, on the 8th day before the Kalends of April [25 March], on the first day of unleavened bread, on which they slew the lamb at even.—Adversus Judæos, c. 8.

The next year on which 25 March was Friday was A.D. 40, and not again till A.D. 119, 124, 214, &c.

Resurrection Men. Men who stole buried bodies out of cemeteries and churchyards, and sold them to surgeons for dissection. They were also called 'body snatchers.' In 1829 Burke and Hare made themselves conspicuous by this infamous traffic, and added to it the suffocation [burking] of living persons by strangulation, or smothering them by pitch-plasters placed over the mouth and nose. Bishop and Williams, in 1831, burked a poor Italian boy named Carlo Ferrari, and were both executed.

Retreat of the 10,000 (The), B.C. 401–399. Conducted by Xenophon, the historian, who had joined the expedition of Cyrus. In the battle of Cunaxa Cyrus lost his life, and the Greeks were left without a leader. Xenophon volunteered to lead them back to Greece, and has left an historical narrative of this famous retreat, called Xenophon's Anabásis.

Return of the Heracli'dæ (The), B.C. 1103. The migration of the descendants of Herăclês (Hercúlês) and the Dorians to the Peloponnesus, which they conquered. Heraclês was promised the land of Argos by Zeus, but was kept out by Hera (Juno). Five times the descendants of Heraclês attempted to take possession of the promised land, but were driven out four times. The fifth invasion was 110 years after the first by Hyllos, son of Heraclês, and 80 years after the siege of Troy. It was completely successful, and the peninsula was divided by lot among the three leaders (Mythic History).

Revised Bible (The). Published in May 1885. The Revised New Testament was published 17 May, 1881. The work was begun 30 June, 1870, by twenty-five scholars, ten of whom died before the revision was completed, 20 June, 1884. The revisers had eighty-five sessions, which extended over fourteen years. See 'Bible.'

There seems no likelihood that the Revised Bible will ever supersede the Authorised Version. Whatever its critical value, it is sadly defective in style, and is not to be compared to the older book in rhythm and simplicity. It is equally defective in arrangement, and we greatly miss the tables of contents at the heads of the chapters.

Revised Code of 1862 (The). By Lord Sherbrooke. The minutes of the Committee of Council established by government in 1846 on the education of the children of the labouring poor, with government grants based on 'results.'

The three grades of the results are 'fair, good, and excellent,' as tested by government inspectors on examination, and the grant varies accordingly. In 1890 a change was made in the grant by results, by which 'cramming' was greatly checked, and general information was encouraged.

Revising Barrister (A). A barrister annually appointed by the English judges to revise the lists of voters for members of Parliament, and to settle who are qualified to vote.

Revival in Belfast (The), 1859. A strange religious movement in which the preacher produced hysteria, especially among the mill girls. When any girl was 'struck' the preacher evoked from her a wild continued scream, which of course was catching. Those struck were removed from the church to a darkened room, and there told 'what they had seen and heard.' This experience was in all cases a rigmarole based more or less on the Revelation

Revocation of the Edict of Nantes (The), 18 Oct., 1685. It prohibited all exercise of the reformed religion in the kingdom of France. Pastors were to quit France within fifteen days; if, however, they abjured, they were to be endowed with pensions one-third more than their previous salaries, with the reversion of one-third to their widows. If pastors wished to enter the legal profession they might dispense with academic studies. Parents were forbidden to teach their children the reformed religion, and were to bring them to be baptized in the Catholic Church, under a penalty of 500 livres (20*l.*) Refugees who did not return within four months were to suffer confiscation of all their property. Reformers caught in the act of emigrating were to be sent to the galleys (if men), and if women to be imprisoned for life.

By the Edict of Nantes granted by Henri IV. French Protestants enjoyed full freedom of their religion and were placed on the same level in all civil rights as Catholic subjects. It was Louis XIV. who revoked this Edict, whereby 80,000 Protestants fled the country, and 90,000 were slain or driven into the fields houseless and homeless.

Revolt of Egypt (The), 1835. A large body of Egyptians having taken refuge in Syria in 1832, Mehemet Ali sent his son Ibrahim to punish the pacha of Acre for taking them under his protection. Ibrahim was wholly victorious, and, being opposed by a Turkish army, conquered it and took the vizier prisoner. The great powers now interfered, and Syria was added to the pachalik of Egypt, but in 1840 Syria was restored to the Porte by the intervention of the great powers.

Revolt of Hugh O'Neill (The), 1597–1599. After the death of Shane O'Neill, Hugh obtained the title of Earl of Tyrone. He was brought up in the English court, and was apparently in the queen's interest; but immediately he returned to Munster he took up an attitude of open defiance and offered Ireland to the King of Spain. In 1597 he defeated the English forces in Tyrone, but in 1601 he was obliged to surrender to Lord Mountjoy. Being brought to England, O'Neill was pardoned, retired to Brussels in 1607, and died at Rome in 1616.

Revolt of the Desmonds, in Ireland, 1579. Rome and Spain thinking Ireland oppressed by Queen Elizabeth, and hoping, through Ireland, to overthrow the great heretic queen, landed on the shores of Kerry a force of 700 men, which was supported by the Earl of Desmond. The invaders were cut to pieces at Smerwick, and Desmond declared a traitor. He was discovered in a hovel, and put to death by his pursuers.

There is a well-known legend that this old man is not dead, but keeps his state under the waters of Lough Gur, and that every seventh year he reappears fully armed, rides round the lake early in the morning, and will ultimately return in the flesh to claim his own again.

Revolution (The American), 1775. By which the United States of America threw off their dependence on Great Britain.

Revolution (The Glorious), 1688, in English history means the accession of William III., whereby the Stuart dynasty was set aside, and a new dynasty introduced.

William III. was grandson of Charles I., his mother being Mary, eldest daughter of Charles I. He married Mary, eldest daughter of James II. So that the choice of the nation fell on these two from their alliance to the Stuarts both by blood and marriage; but James II. was alive, and his son and grandson were set aside. On the death of William without offspring Anne, another daughter of James II., succeeded.

Revolution (The Great French), 1789–1794. A great reaction against absolutism, which began with the destruction of the Bastille. The king, Louis XVI., was beheaded 21 Jan., 1793. The Christian religion was set aside, and the worship of Reason substituted in its place. The Revolution terminated with the death of Robespierre.

Revolution (The Italian), 1859–1860. In which the various minor sovereigns of Italy were driven into exile, and the whole Italian peninsula (except the Roman and Venetian territory) was subjected to one ruler styled the 'King of Italy.'

The Roman and Venetian territories were added subsequently—the Venetian States in Oct. 1866, after the Seven Weeks' War; and the Papal States in Oct. 1870.

Revolution (Victims of the French). Prudhomme gives the following statistics: 18,603 nobles, priests, artisans, and others; that is 13,623 commoners, 1,467 wives of operatives, 1,278 nobles, 1,125 priests, 750 noblewomen, and 350 religieuses. Besides these 18,603 persons guillotined, we have 403,748 destroyed in various ways at Vendée, Nantes, Lyons, &c. Of these the victims of Vendée were 337,000, of Carrier at Nantes 32,000, of Lyons 31,000; of women who died of grief, &c. 3,748. This does not include those massacred at Versailles, the Abbaye, the Carmelites, the September victims, the victims of the Glacière d'Avignon, of Toulon, of Marseilles, and the whole town of Bedouin.

Revolution of Denmark (The), 8 Sept., 1660. By this revolution the kings of Denmark, who had hitherto been feudal chiefs, elected and controlled by the barons, were made hereditary and unlimited sovereigns, both in the male and female line. By the constitution granted by Frederick III., in 1665, the monarch of Denmark was declared to be hereditary and absolute, holding the whole legislative, executive, and judicial power of the state. It vested in him the unlimited power of appointing all public offices and dignities; of commanding the forces of the kingdom by sea and land; of making war, peace, and alliances. It gave him the supreme jurisdiction in ecclesiastical affairs, subject only to the obligation of professing the Protestant religion as expounded by the Confession of Augsburg.

Revolution of February (The), 1848. By which the Orleans dynasty was overthrown in France. Eighteen years before (1830) the Bourbon dynasty in the person of Charles X. had been overthrown. The revolution of 1848 occurred on 22, 23, 24 Feb.; on the last of these three days Louis Philippe fled from Paris, and abdicated. See p. 538, 'Louis-Philippe.'

Revolution of July (The), 1830, when Charles X. was obliged to flee from Paris, and abdicate.

Revolution of the 17th Cent., 1660, began with the restoration of Charles II. It transferred the crown from Cromwell and his party to Charles; it transferred the power of the crown from the king to the House of Commons; it overthrew Puritanism and introduced freedom of religious thought; it changed the manners and customs of the nation; it changed the fashion of dress and domestic life; it even introduced the study of experimental philosophy in place of dogmatism and tradition.

Revolution Society (The), 1792. A society numbering many of the highest names in the Whig aristocracy, which met on the 4th Nov. to celebrate the anniversary of the landing of William III. This society sent a glowing address to the French National Assembly, which was carried over by Lord Stanhope and Dr. Price. In their address they vowed that they 'would never again fight with France at the command of any despot.'

The 4th Nov. was William's day. He was born 4 Nov., 1650; he took Bonn 4-12 Nov., 1672; he married the Princess Mary 4 Nov., 1677; and the 4th Nov. was the anniversary of his landing at Torbay in 1688.

Revolutionary Army (The), Sept. 1793. A Parisian guard, raised by the Convention at the instigation of Barère, to clear Paris of all enemies of the Republic, or (in other words) to massacre all who differed in opinion from the leaders of the revolution. The property of these victims was seized and confiscated to the state.

Revolutionary Committees (1793) were appointed by the Convention to act under the Committee of Public Safety, to receive denunciations and report them. See 'Revolutionary Tribunal.'

Revolutionary Parties in France between '93 and '95. See 'Partis en France.'

Revolutionary Tribunal (The), March 1793. A court of judgment instituted by the French Convention (q.v.) to quash conspiracies against the revolutionary government. This infamous court sat in judgment on all persons accused of disaffection to the state. During the Reign of Terror, when Fouquier Tinville was 'public accuser,' it acquired a horrible notoriety, being a mere official tool in the hands of Robespierre.

Revolver Boys, about 1885. Irish moonlighters, land-leaguers, and others, supplied with revolvers to shoot at those obnoxious to the secret societies. Generally the legs were aimed at. See 'Irish Associations.'

Rex Gentis Anglorum. The over-king of the English heptarchs, the first being Hengist king of Kent (457), and the last Egbert king of Wessex (who in 827 became bretwalda or king of all England).

Rhapsodists. Greek minstrels who wandered from place to place reciting in musical chant the epic ballads of Homer and other poets. After Peisistratos reduced the Homeric ballads into a connected epic, the occupation of the rhapsodists rapidly declined.

A rhapsody means a single canto, ballad, or part, suitable for one sitting or entertainment.

Rhode Island (U.S. America). So named, in 1663, from the isle of Rhodes in the Mediterranean. There seems no special reason for this name, but it is so called in the charter of Charles II. An old nickname of the people is Gunflints.

Rhodian Law (The). The earliest known code of marine law; it was compiled by the Rhodians about B.C. 900. Probably the marine laws of Justinian were based on the Rhodian code.

Rhodian School of Sculpture (The). Famous for (1) the Colossus, by Charês, one of the seven wonders of the world; (2) the Laocoön group, by Agesander, Polydōrus, and Athenodōrus; and (3) the Farnesian bull, in the museum of Naples. This group represents Zethus and Amphīon binding Dircê to a wild bull in order to revenge their mother. It was the work of Apollonius and Tauriscus, and was discovered in 1546. Called Farnesian because it was set up in the palace of Farnesè at Rome.

Rhone of Christian Eloquence (The). St. Hilary (A.D. 300–368), bishop of Poitiers.

Rhuddlan (Statute of), 10 Edw. I. 1282. In Rhuddlan (North Wales) Edward I. held a parliament, which secured to the Welsh certain rights; and in this town, in 1284, the infant Edward was acknowledged as 'the Prince of Wales.' The statute of Rhuddlan is the statute confirming to the Welsh the rights conferred on them by Edward I. Amongst other grants conferred by this statute, Anglesey was erected into a county.

It is said that Edward was born at Carnarvon.

Rialto (The) of Venice. A contraction of Rivo alto, the deep stream. First the name of an island in the Lagune, called 'Isola di Rialto'; then of the bridge called 'Il Ponte di Rialto,' connecting the island with the opposite shore; and lastly of the exchange called the Rialto which stands on the island, and is so familiar from Shakespeare's 'Merchant of Venice.'

Ribalds (The), 1189. A militia raised by Philippe II. Auguste of France. The captain was called the 'king of the Ribalds,' united by Charles V. of France to the 'Provost of the Hotel.' Disbanded on account of their unbridled licentiousness.

Ribalds or Ribauds, from the Latin ripalis, from ripa, a bank or border. The licentiousness of these soldiers gave birth to our word ribald, obscene.

Prof. Skeat derives ribald from the French riber, to dally with women.

Ribbonism. The political principles of the Ribbonmen of Ireland. See next article.

Ribbonmen, 1808. A secret association among the lowest classes in Ireland opposed to the Orange confederation. It originated in Armagh, spreading into Down, Antrim, Tyrone, Mon'aghan, and Fermānagh (where Protestants most abounded), but either under the same or some other name it had affiliated societies in King's County, Queen's County, Meath, Louth, and Tipperary. The members had their secret signs and pass-words, and though at first confined to the lowest classes, embraced later on farm-labourers, artisans, and even clergymen and merchants. The main object of the society was to prevent landlords from evicting or changing their tenants, or new tenants from taking the farms of evicted tenants. 'Tenant right' or fixity of tenure was also an essential part of their demand which they determined to carry out to the death; and general interference between employers and the employed. Ribbonism was suppressed by Act of Parliament in 1871, but only to break out again under some other name. From 1840 it was in the fullest operation. See 'Irish Associations.'

It is supposed that the name refers to some badge worn by the members.

The Ribbonmen apparently branched from the 'Defenders,' a Catholic counter-organisation to the Orangemen, who were Protestants, and are so still.

The Defenders being proclaimed changed their name in 1806 into 'Threshers,' who for the most part appeared in Sligo, Mayo, Leitrim, Longford, and Ca'van.

Next appear the Ribbonmen in 1808, first in Armagh, and thence spreading north and north-west.

Other societies sprang up in other parts of Ireland, i.e.—

The Carders in East and West Meath, Roscommon, and part of Mayo,

The Shanavests and Caravats in Tipperary, Kilkenny, Cork, and Limerick.

The Phenicians, the Brotherhood of St. Patrick, the Fenians, &c. follow in rapid succession. See each of these.

Rice Christians. Hindûs and Chinese who profess to be converted for the sake of the rice given by the missionaries to converts. Followers of Christ, not for his doctrines, but for the loaves and fishes.

Richard Cœur de Lion. See 'Richard I.'

Richard of Bordeaux. See 'Richard II.'

Richard surnamed Crookback. See 'Richard III.'

Richard I., surnamed 'Cœur de Lion' for his great daring and courage in the Holy Land during the crusade against Saladin. He was the third son of Henry II. of England, and married Berengaria, daughter of Sancho, king of Navarre, but had no lawful issue. Richard I. was the first to adopt the words 'Dei gratia' before his titles. His style was 'Richardus, D.G. rex Angliæ et dux Normandiæ et Aquitaniæ [Guienne], et comes Andegaviæ [Anjou].'

When he travelled through Germany from the Holy Land, he assumed the name of Hugh the Merchant.

The youth who shot him with an arrow discharged from the castle of Chalus was Bertrand de Gurdun or Gourdon. Being asked why he shot the king, the lad replied, 'Because he slew my father and two brothers.' Richard commanded that Bertrand should be set free, but Marcadee, leader of the Brabançons, flayed him alive, and then hanged him.

Richard II., of England, called 'Bordeaux,' because he was born there (1366, reigned 1377–1399, died 1400). He was the only son of the Black Prince and the Fair Maid of Kent (his wife). Richard II. married twice, but left no issue. His first wife was Anne of Luxembourg, daughter of the kaiser-king Karl IV., aged 15. His second wife was a mere child of 7, viz. Isabelle, daughter of Charles VI. of France.

His style was 'Richardus, D.G. rex Angliæ et Franciæ, et dominus Hiberniæ.'

It is generally asserted that when Richard was deposed he was imprisoned in Pontefract Castle, and murdered there or starved to death; but it has been also said that he made his escape, and lived many years disguised as an ordinary man. They say that the person exhibited to the people as the deceased king was his chaplain, Maudelain. This rumour was still rife in the reign of Henry V., when Thomas de Trumpington, in 1415, was induced to palm himself off as the deposed king.

In 1402 the French court sent Creton, the page of Richard II., into Scotland to ascertain if Richard was indeed alive, and Creton declared the Scotch Richard to be an undoubted impostor. The French ordinance for the payment of Craton still exists, and may be seen in the Archæologia. Serle before he was executed confessed that the Scotch Richard was Thomas Warde, Richard's court fool.

Richard III., of England, surnamed 'Crookback' (1452, 1483–1485), was the younger brother of Edward IV., and uncle of Edward V., whom he succeeded. He married Anne, widow of Edward prince of Wales (son of Henry VI.), and was slain in the battle of Bosworth Field.

His style was 'Richardus, D.G. rex Angliæ et Franciæ, et dominus Hiberniæ.'

EDWARD III.'s third son was Lionel, who had a daughter named Philippa. Philippa married Edward Mortimer, and their son was Roger Mortimer.

Roger Mortimer's daughter (Lady Anne) married Richard (son of Edmund duke of York), and their son was the famous Richard duke of York, 'the White Rose,' slain in the battle of Wakefield, leaving behind him two sons, EDWARD IV. and RICHARD III.

Whether Richard III. had a 'crookback' is very doubtful. Shakespeare makes him deformed, but this might be out of flattery to Queen Elizabeth, who was of the Lancastrian or Red Rose House. Stowe says of Richard III., 'He was comely enough, though low of stature.'

Richard IV., of England. Peter or Perkin Warbeck, who was put forward to personate Richard duke of York, younger son of Edward IV., and one of the two princes murdered in the Tower of London in 1492. Charles VIII. of France received the pretender as the true prince and paid him regal honours (1492). Margaret duchess of Burgundy acknowledged him as her nephew in 1493; James IV. of Scotland received him as the prince, and gave him to wife Lady Catherine Gordon, granddaughter of James I. (1493). 'Richard' invaded England in 1496, and assumed the royal title of Richard IV. (7 Sept. 1497), but he soon surrendered, and was committed to the Tower in Oct. 1497. He made his escape on 9 June, 1498, was retaken and put to death 23 Nov., 1499. His wife Lady Catherine received an appointment in the queen's household, was three times married, and died at Fyfield, Berks, 1537.

It is said that Perkin Warbeck was son of John Warbeck, or Osbeck, a renegade Jew of Tournaye, with whom Edward IV. did business. Some, however, maintain that he was the son of Edward IV. and the beautiful Catherine de Faro. Without doubt he bore a striking likeness to the king.

Richmondism. That the higher the price of corn the higher will be the wages of agricultural labourers. This was an axiom of the Chartists. When Joseph Lankaster, in 1844, was arrested for setting fire to wheat-stacks in order to raise the price of wages, the act was called by the free-traders 'Richmondism put in practice.'

Ricimer. A Roman general of Suevian origin, grandson of Walha the Goth. He rose to the highest rank, and for eighteen years was the 'king-maker' of the west. In 456 he dethroned Avitus and gave the crown to Majorian. Majorian being assassinated in 461, Ricimer gave the purple to Libius Severus (467), and married his daughter. In 472 (Severus being murdered) Ricimer placed Olybius on the throne. But the king-maker died forty weeks afterwards.

In the decrepitude of the western empire . . . . the Ricimers and Odoacers put up and pulled down at pleasure a succession of insignificant princes, dignified with the names of 'Cæsar' and 'Augustus.'—PRINCE, Parallel History, vol. ii. p. 627.

Riding the Marches. 'Beating the bounds' of a parish. Saxon mearc, a boundary.

Ridley Hall, Cambridge, 1882. For training young men in the 'evangelical principles' of the Church of England.

Rienzi the Tribune (1310–1354). A man of mean birth invited by Pope Clement VI. to Rome, then in a state of anarchy. Rienzi proclaimed in 1347 a new constitution, drove away the turbulent barons, and put a stop to brigandage. He then received the title of Tribune with dictatorial power, and formed a design of making all Italy one united republic. He lost his popularity and was driven from Rome in 1348, returned in 1352, but was slain in 1354 in an insurrection.

Right and Fact, 1653. This distinction arose from a book called 'Augustinus' by Cornelius Jansen, who died in 1638, just as the book was finished. The Jesuits condemned the book, and Urban VIII. pronounced it heretical. The friends of the book admitted that the five propositions condemned as heretical were in point of right justly condemned, but declared that in point of fact no such doctrines were taught or could be deduced from the book in question. That is, the doctrines condemned by the bull were heretical doctrines, but they were not the doctrines taught in Jansen's book.

In consequence of the bull of Urban VIII. against 'the five propositions,' the Jansenists maintained that though the pope is infallible in points of faith, he is not infallible in points of fact.

Right, Left, Centre (The). In the French Parliament. The Right, i.e. the conservatives or landed gentry. The Left, i.e. the rich wine merchants and other radicals. The Centre, i.e. the moderate party or Laodiceans.

Right-boys, 1787. An offshoot of the White-boys or agrarian rebels, who rose in defence of Irish 'rights,' and waged uncompromising war for a time against the exaction of tithes from Roman Catholics in support of the Anglican church in Ireland, and against various grievances connected with the tenure of lands. See 'Irish Associations.'

Right Honourable. Honourable by legal right. The younger children of earls and the children of viscounts and barons are called 'Honourable,' but have no legal right to the peerage. A peer, being Right Honourable, has such a right. Members of the privy council, even if commoners, and the mayors of London and York are right honourable because they are lords ex officio, and not by courtesy only. The former are, by right of office, 'Lords of H.M. Privy Council,' and the latter are by legal right 'lord mayors of London and York.'

Not only members of the privy council, but all who have been members. The Lord Mayor of Dublin and the Lord Provost of Edinburgh are also called 'Right Honourable.'

Right of Way. The right of passing over or through the grounds of another person, as over a path in a field or park which has been tacitly permitted by immemorial usage.

It is still thought in some places that a funeral procession passing over a field gives a right of way. I know a village where the man who walks at the head of the procession sticks a pin in the gate-post by way of fee or acknowledgment that there is no free 'right of way' through the field.

Rights (The Bill of). The statute 1 William and Mary, st. 2, chap. 2, A.D. 1689, in which is embodied the Declaration of Rights presented by both houses to William and Mary in the banqueting-house at Whitehall, 13 Feb., 1689. The bill contains thirteen clauses: (1) No law shall be suspended or held in abeyance without consent of parliament; (2) it is illegal for the crown to dispense with a law or suspend its operation; (3) courts of commission for ecclesiastical causes are illegal; (4) it is illegal to levy money by royal prerogative or without consent of parliament; (5) subjects shall have free right to petition the king; (6) it is illegal to keep a standing army without consent of parliament; (7) Protestants may carry arms in self-defence; (8) elections for members of parliament shall be free and unrestrained; (9) freedom of debate shall not be tampered with; (10) excessive bail and excessive fines are illegal; (11) jurors shall be duly empanelled and returned, only freeholders shall be jurors for high treason; (12) fines before conviction are illegal; (13) parliaments shall be called together frequently. N.B. It transferred the sovereignty from the king to the House of Commons. See 'Petition of Rights.'

Rights of Man (The), 1795. Published by the Batavian Republic.

1. All men are born with equal rights.

2. Each man has a right to serve God or not as he chooses

3. All the men of a state are eligible to office in that state.

4. Every functionary ought to give an account of his administration.

5. The people have a right to choose and change their rulers and magistrates.

Rights of Man (The Society of the), 1791. The name adopted by the club of the Cordeliers, after Bailly, the mayor, shut them out of their hall, because Danton denounced both him [Bailly] and Lafayette as traitors. The members removed to the Paris tennis-court and changed their name.

Rimbecco. The reproach by the relatives of a murdered man that the next akin has not followed up the blood-feud according to the custom of the vendetta. In Genŏa the uttering of such reproach was punishable, but in Corsica the vendetta is considered so sacred a duty that the rimbecco is practically unknown.

Ring. At Rome the different orders of citizens were distinguished by a ring; in the early days of the republic only senators wore rings of gold, subsequently knights wore them, and later on anyone who chose wore one or more of them. Slaves wore an iron ring. The man in marriage gives the bride a ring to show that he confides in her the seal of his rights in his possessions. A ring with the cross is the symbol of pastoral power; it is given by the pope to cardinals, archbishops, and bishops; sometimes the ring is enchased with an amethyst. The pope's ring, called the 'Fisher's Ring,' with which he signs his briefs, has the image of St. Peter sitting in his boat. At the death of the pope the ring is broken.

Ring (A). Juvenal, speaking of Hannibal, says—

No sword his death, no dart, nor such-like thing,
Rings he at Cannæ reaped, his death a ring.

At the battle of Cannæ 5,630 Roman knights were slain, and three bushels of gold rings were sent to Carthage (B.C. 216). In 183 the great hero poisoned himself with the contents of a ring which he wore.

Ring and Crozier, 1052. First given to a bishop on his consecration by Kaiser Heinrich III. as a symbol of investiture (q.v.). After the settlement of the moot point of investiture, the pope invested the bishop with ring and crozier, and the king invested him with a sceptre. See 'Hallam,' vol. ii. p. 266.

Ring-money. A very ancient coinage in use with the Egyptians. Cæsar mentions both gold and iron rings as used in Gaul and Britain for money. Sometimes a number of these rings were strung together into a chain, one or more being detached when required in payment of service. In 1805 a silver chain of thirty-three such rings was dug up near Inverness, and is now in the museum of the Scottish Antiquaries.

Ring of the Fisherman (The). The papal official seal. See 'Ring.'

Rings. Military encampments. Low Latin, rinca or ringa. The Avars lived in camps called rings, because they were disposed in concentric circles, and when Charlemagne in 796 exterminated these Huns, he took possession of their rings, where he found rich plunder which they had been accumulating for many years.

Rings of the Avars (The). Wooden fortifications which encompassed their villages and districts. Destroyed by Charlemagne, A.D. 796.

Ringan (St.), i.e. St. Ninian.

Their devotion to this church of St. Ninian, or as she was popularly termed, St. Ringan.—Sir W Scott, The Pirate, chap. xxv.

Ripaille Fraternity (The). A brotherhood of aged knights founded by Amadeus VIII., noted for their luxurious living, and giving rise to the phrase faire ripaille, to live jollily. Ripaille is the château of Savoy, and the Duke Amadeus was afterwards Pope Felix V. He abdicated his dukedom in 1434, when he retired to Ripaille, and left it when he was pope, 1440–1449.

Ritchie's Act (Mr.), 1888. The Local Government Act, of which Mr. Ritchie was the sponsor. See p. 220, 'County Councils, 1889,' and p. 529, 'Local Government Act.'

Ritual or Pastoral (The). A book containing directions for all the pastoral duties of the inferior clergy of the Roman Catholic Church, such as the administration of the sacraments and the celebration of the daily services. The book, which contains all that pertains to the celebration of the mass, is usually called the Missal. The two chief rituals are those of Rome and Paris. See 'Ceremonial' and 'Pontifical.'

Ritualism now means that stricter observance of church rites and ceremonies introduced by what is called the 'Oxford Party,' or 'High Church.' See p. 421, and 'Tractarians.'

Ritualism abjured. In 1890 was introduced in Suffolk the 'Besom Pledge,' to sweep from the land ritualism and Romanism. The phrase was suggested by the words of Isaiah, 'I will sweep it with the besom of destruction.'

River of Paradise (The). St. Bernard, abbot of Clairvaux (1091–1153). Also called the 'Mellifluous Doctor.'

Robber Synod (The), A.D. 449. A council held at Ephesus against Flavianus. This council declared in favour of Eutychianism, and was called Latrocinium, or the Assembly of Thieves and Robbers.

Robbers of the Bristol Mail (The). John Hawkins and George Sympson, executed on Hounslow Heath, 1722.

Robe (The), worn by Jesus at the crucifixion (John xix. 23). Two robes claim pre-eminence—viz. 'the holy robe of Trèves' and 'the holy robe of Argenteuil.' The former is by far the more delicate fabric, the latter being a tissue of goat's hair without seam. We are told that the robe of Trèves was the one worn as a shirt, and that of Argenteuil was the tunic for which the soldiers cast lots. Gregory of Tours tells us that this tunic was bought of the soldier who won the lot, and, being packed in a wooden box, was sent to Galatia, then removed for safety to Jaffa, then to Jerusalem. When Jerusalem was taken by the Persians, this tunic was removed to Persia; then, in 627, to Constantinople. It was given by Irene empress of Constantinople to Charlemagne, who sent it in 800 to his daughter Theodrada abbess of Argenteuil. A curé of Argenteuil cut the robe into several pieces, so that it is not now possible to piece the parts together.

The White Robe in which the soldiers of Herod arrayed Jesus is said to be at Venice.

The Purple, or Scarlet Robe, in which he was arrayed by the Roman soldiers, was divided (we are told) between the churches of St. Francis of Philip Anagni, St. John Lateran, and Santa Maria Maggiore. See 'Crucifixion, Relics of the.'

Moscow claims to have a robe of Christ, and so do several other places, as St. Prassada, Rome, St. Roch, &c.

Christ is always represented in the Gospels as a very poor man, but the shirt of Trèves is that of a prince, and must have been of fabulous price. The same inconsistency is remarkable in numerous other sacred 'relics.'

Robe of the Disdain (The). A robe given to the court-bard of Wales, at Christmas, Easter, and Whitsuntide. The bard sat next to the prefect of the palace and received from him his harp. When, however, the bard sang to the troops before a battle, the king himself handed to him his harp, and the queen a gold ring.

Robes of State. Peers have the privilege of wearing in parliament robes of scarlet cloth, differenced by bars of ermine. DUKES have 4 bars on each side; MARQUISES have 4 bars on the right side and 3 on the left; EARLS have 3 bars on each side, but VISCOUNTS and BARONS have on each side 2 rows of plain white fur, not ermine.

Robert Emmett. See 'Sons of Freedom.'

Robervallian Lines, 1646. Certain curves in geometry, invented by Gilles Persone de Roberval, delimiting the boundaries of lines infinitely extended in length, yet equal to other spaces which are terminated on all sides.

Robespierre's Soldiers, 1794. The French soldiers were so called by foreign potentates, intimating that Robespierre was virtually king of France. The term occurs in a proclamation by the Duke of York.

Robespierre's Weavers, 1793. The rowdy women, consisting of fishwives and other females of the lowest grade, who joined Henriot's sans-culottes called the Parisian Guard. This miscellaneous riff-raff lined all the avenues of the chamber during the session of the National Assembly, and never ceased yelling 'Down with the Girondists!'

Robin Bluestring. Sir Robert Walpole (1676–1745), so called because as knight of the garter he wore a blue ribbon. He was also called the 'Grand Corruptor,' because bribery was practised by him on all occasions.

Robin Hood's Day. 1 May, the anniversary of the death of Robin Hood (1247).

Robin of Redesdale, Robert Hilyard, an insurgent in the reign of Edward IV.; executed in 1469. He seems to have been a political tool of the Nevilles, who played him off against the Woodvilles.

Robinsonians. Followers of John Robinson of Leyden, a puritan divine (1575–1625). He seceded from the Church of England in 1604; escaped to Amsterdam in 1608; removed to Leyden in 1609; and conducted the service at the embarkation of the Pilgrim Fathers, 21 July, 1620.

The Robinsonians were only semi-Separatists, the Brownists were rigid Separatists.

Rob Roy. Robert king of freebooters was Robert M'Gregor Campbell, a Highland chief, born about 1657, and died after 1733.

Rock of Lamentation (The). Craigchonichen, in Kincardine, where the Marquis of Montrose fought his last battle, April 1650.

Rockites, in Ireland. Followers of 'Captain Rock,' a name assumed by the leader of the Irish insurgents in 1822. Letters so signed were sent to persons opposed or obnoxious to the league, threatening death, or personal injury, or loss of property, unless the person addressed subscribed to the league, or did something specified, or forbore to do something. The threats held out were not vain words, and a warning from 'Captain Rock' was a real terror. The Rockites made themselves conspicuous in the sanguinary tithe-war (q.v.) 1830–1832. See p. 455, 'Irish Associations.'

Rogation Days prescribed by the first Council of Orleans in 511 are the Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday preceding Ascension Day. The term means the Days of Supplication, and on these days the Catholic Church enjoins that the Litanies be recited or sung in public procession. In the Anglican Church the days are only faintly observed; but 'Beating the Bounds,' or the 'Perambulation of Parishes' was very general to the middle of the 19th cent., and even still survives in some parts of Great Britain.

Rogations (Day of the), 10 May, 1790 (French history). The day selected by the Municipal Council to visit the convents about to be suppressed. Extinct.

Rogations (Fête of the), A.D. 474. Instituted by St. Mamert bishop of Vienne, in Dauphiné, to invoke God's blessings on the fruits of the earth. It is celebrated three days before the Ascension.

Roger Bold. Robert Harley first Earl of Oxford of the name of Harley (1661–1724).

The De Veres were created earls of Oxford in the reign of Stephen, and the earldom became extinct in 1703 on the death of Aubrey de Vere, the twentieth earl.

Rogue-money, Scotland. Imposed by 11 Geo. II. c. 28 (1737), and abolished in 1868. It was an annual cess for defraying the expenses of apprehending offenders, maintaining them in gaol, and prosecuting them.

Roi Panade. Louis XVIII. of France (1755, 1814–1824).

A panade is a pipkin for babies' pap.

Roi de Pâques. The boy or man who draws by lot the bean in the Twelfth-night cake. This person is 'king' for the nonce, according to the rules of the game.

The word pâque in this case means the Epiphany, the 'Pascua de Epifania.'

Roi de Théâtre (Un). Joachim Murat king of Naples, who used to parade the streets of Naples in silks and satins, like a stage-king (1771–1815).

Roi des Halles (Le). François de Vendôme duc de Beaufort (1616–1669), grandson of Henri IV. and Gabrielle d'Estrées, idolised by the common people, and one of the leaders of the Fronde against the court party.

Roi des Versailles (Le). Nickname of M. Thiers the French historian (1797–1877). See 'Attila le Petit.'

Rois Chevelures (Les). The long-haired kings. So the successors of Clodion in Gaul were designated. Clodion introduced from Germany the custom of wearing long hair.

It will be remembered that Homer calls the magnates of the confederate Greek army 'the Long-haired Greeks.' St. Paul denounces long hair for men (1 Cor. xi. 14).

Rois Fainéants (Les), 638–742. Clovis II. and his ten successors. These worthless kings were all parents at 15, and old men at 30, to which age only one of them attained. Clotaire IV. died at the age of 12; Clovis III. and Dagobert III. at 15; Clotaire III. at 18; Chilpéric II. at 20; Clovis II. at 23; Thierry IV. at 25; Childebert II. at 28; and Thierry III. was the only one who outlived the age of 30.

Louis V., the last of the Carlovingian kings, was also surnamed 'Le Fainéant.'

Roll of Arms (The). An heraldic record of arms which goes back to the reign of Henry III. The original vellum roll is lost, but a copy made in 1586 by Glover, Somerset herald, is preserved in the English College of Arms.

Roll of Caerlaverock (The). An heraldic poem in Norman French, reciting the names and arms of the knights present at the siege of Caerlaverock in 1300.

Roll of Court. The court-roll in a manor, wherein the business of the court, the admissions, surrenders, names, rents, and services of the tenants, are copied and enrolled.

Rolls (Master of the). 'Magister Rotulorum.' The chief of a body of officers called 'Masters of Chancery.' He is judge of the Equity court, and ranks next to the Lord Chancellor. The Master of the Rolls has the keeping of the rolls and grants which pass the great seal, and the records of Chancery. Since 1838 he has been charged with the direction of the Public Record Office.

Rolls Court (The). The Chancery Court of the Master of the Rolls in Chancery Lane. The house was originally called Domus Conversōrum, being appointed by Henry III. for the use of converted Jews; but Edward II. converted it into a place for the custody of the rolls. In 1838 the Master of the Rolls was placed in charge of the Public Record Office, and under his superintendence have been translated, printed, and published a large number of MS. rolls; a magnificent historic work, which still goes on with great judgment and activity.

Rolls of Court (The). In Scotch law. The lists of causes depending on the Court of Session.

Rolls of Parliament. The MS. registers of the proceedings of our old parliament.

Rolls of the Exchequer. Rolls relating to the revenue of the country.

Rolls of the King's Court (The). Reports of legal processes from the 6 Rich. I. to 1 John. A very valuable document still extant giving great information on the status of the people, wages paid, their wealth, their legal rights, &c.

Rolls of the Temple, or 'Calves-head rolls,' in which every bencher, barrister, and student is taxed yearly in consideration of a dinner of calves-head, provided in Easter term.

Rolled Bacon. A consignment of dynamite from America to London. So called from being packed in barrels of what was invoiced as 'Rolled Bacon.' Sometimes these consignments were invoiced as 'American Apples' (1884–1885).

Rolliad (The). A series of political satires, the first of which appeared in a London newspaper in 1784, and was a humorous criticism on Colonel Rolle (afterwards Lord Rolle), member for Devonshire. The most important of the series was a pretended review of an imaginary epic poem.

Roman Achilles (The). Lucius Sicinius Dentātus. Assassinated B.C. 450.

Roman Catholic Hierarchy of England and Wales since 1850, constituted by Pius IX. The 'Province of Westminster' consists of the archiepiscopal See of Westminster and fourteen Suffragan Sees of

Birmingham	Northampton
Clifton	Nottingham
Hexham and Newcastle	Plymouth
Leeds	Portsmouth
Liverpool	Salford
Middlesborough	Shrewsbury
Newport and Menevia	Southwark

In 1890 there were 2,635 Catholic priests in Great Britain under the hierarchy, and 1,030 places having churches or chapels, with resident clergy, independent of those places which have weekly services, but no resident priest.

The hierarchy of Scotland was appointed in 1878 by Leo XIII., and comprises (1) the Province of St. Andrews and Edinburgh, with four suffragan sees (viz. Aberdeen, Argyll and the Isles, Dunkeld, and Galloway); and (2) the archiepiscopal See of Glasgow without suffragan sees.

 A glance down this list will give a better history of the Catholic Church than many volumes, whether from the Catholic or Protestant standpoint.

Roman Catholics, or, as they call themselves, 'Catholics.' Those Christians who acknowledge the supremacy of the Church of Rome. They believe that St. Peter was appointed by Christ head of the Apostolic College, that this same apostle founded the Roman diocese, and that the present pope comes in direct line by ordination from the first founder. All Roman Catholics accept seven sacraments (q.v.), believe in the doctrine of transubstantiation, withhold the cup from the laity as unnecessary, admit the infallibility of the pope when he speaks ex cathedra, believe in the doctrine of purgatory, in the efficacy of masses and prayers for the dead, in works of supererogation, the advocacy of saints, the sanctity of relics, and, above all, the power and exaltation of the Virgin Mary, whom they call 'the Mother of God' and 'Queen of Heaven.' In the Eastern rite the cup is given to the laity.

As the Roman Church seceded from the Eastern Church they are in reality schismatics. They rent the robe in two, the Protestants merely tore the rent a little further.

Roman Era (The). This era began 24 April, B.C. 753.

Roman Hercules (The). The Emperor Commŏdus (A.D. 161, 180–192). So he styled himself, and the club and lion's hide were placed by the side of his throne among the ensigns of sovereignty.

Roman Literature (The Four Ages of).

1. The Golden Age, B.C. 217 to A.D. 14. It includes Plautus, Ennius, Terence, Cato, Catullus, Cæsar, Cicero, Nepos, Sallust, Virgil, Tibullus, Propertius, Horace, Phædrus, Ovid, and Livy.

2. The Silver Age (A.D. 14–117), includes Celsus, Persius, Seneca, Lucan, Pliny, Juvenal, Martial, Quintilian, Statius, Tacitus, and Florus.

3. The Brazen Age (A.D. 117–476), includes Justin, Eutropius, Vegetius, Ausŏnius, Macrōbius, Symmachus, Victor, Claudian, and Orōsius.

4. The Iron Age, from 476, includes Sulpicius, Apollinaris, Boëthius, Priscian, Festus, Jornandes, and Cassiodōrus.

Roman Liturgy (The). The oldest forms of this liturgy are to be found in the three Sacramentaries (viz. those of Leo, Gelasius, and Gregory the Great). That of Gregory the Great is most pronounced in the modern Roman missal, brought into its present shape by a commission appointed by the Council of Trent (16th cent.). Revised first by Pius V., then by Urban VIII., and thirdly by Clement VIII.

Said to have been the work of Peter the apostle, but without a shadow of proof. The Roman, the Milan, the Gallican, and the Spanish liturgies are the four chief ones of the Latin Church.

Roman Obedience. In ecclesiastical history means adherence to the Roman pope in opposition to the Avignon pope in the great Western Schism (q.v.). Sometimes it implies adherence to Latin Christianity, instead of Greek, Anglican, &c Roman Republic (The). The name, after the transfer of the seat of government to Constantinople, was confined to the Latin provinces.

Roman Tribes (The). The three original tribes were: (1) The 'Ramnenses,' so called (says Livy, i. 13) 'a Romulo'; (2) 'Tatienses,' from Tatius king of the Sabines; and (3) 'Luceres' (people of the grove), i.e. those received into the grove which Romulus turned into a sanctuary. (Virgil, 'Æneid,' viii. 342.)

Ramnenses. Of course '-enses' is a mere termination, meaning 'a man or men of.' This leaves 'Ram-' as the crude form. 'Rem-us' is another variant. 'Ram-,' 'Rem-,' 'Rom-,' 'Romanus,' with -ensis, will explain the derivation of Livy. We have 'Catanensis' for 'Caithness,' 'Elfin-ensis' for 'Elphin,' 'Imelacensis' for 'Emley,' 'Midensis' for 'Midd,' i.e. 'Meath,' 'Osti-ensis' for 'Ostia,' 'Palensis' for 'Palencia,' 'Sabi-ensis' for 'Siben,' 'Uticensis' for 'Utica,' and hundreds of others.

Roman Type. The upright type used in the printing of this book, first used at Rome in 1467 by Sweynheim and Pannartz. The type previously used was what is called 'black letter.' Sloping letters are called 'italics' (q.v.), and type used in the heading of these articles is termed 'Clarendon type.'

Romans (Emperor of the), and 'Emperor-Elect of the Romans.' See under 'Emperor,' &c.

Romans (King of the), and 'King of Rome.' See under 'King,' &c.

Romans (Last of the).

I. Cato, called 'Uticensis' (B.C. 95–46).

II. Caius Cassius was so called by Brutus.

> The last of all the Romans fare thee well!
> It is impossible that ever Rome
> Should breed thy fellow.
> SHAKESPEARE, Julius Cæsar, v. 3.

III. Rienzi, last of the Tribunes (1310–1354).

IV. Horace Walpole, Ultimus Romanorum (1717–1797).

V. Charles James Fox (1749–1806).

Romance Languages (The) Languages based on the Latin.

1. Italian.
2. The Wallachian or Roumanian.
3. Spanish (mixed with Arabic).
4. Portuguese, a dialect of Spanish.
5. Provençal, south of France, called the Langue d'oc.
6. French, i.e. the northern portion, with Belgium and Switzerland. There are also minor Romance tongues, as Catalan, Valaque, Rhetian, Ladinique, &c.

'Valaque' is the Valacian dialect, 'Rhetian' is the language of the Grisons, and 'Ladinique,' spoken in the Engadine, is the Romance.

Romance of the Rose (The). An allegorical romance in verse begun by Guillaume di Lorris in the latter part of the 13th cent., and continued by Jean de Meung in the former half of the 14th cent. The sequel alone is longer than Homer's 'Iliad.' The part by Guillaume di Lorris contains 4,000 lines; the sequel by Meung contains 18,000.

The poet dreams that dame Idleness conducts him to the palace of Pleasure, where he meets Love, whose attendants are Sweetface, Courtesy, Youth, Jollity, and Competence, who lead the poet to a bed of roses. He singles out one, and was about to pluck it, when an arrow from Love's bow stretches him fainting on the ground, and he is carried off. When he comes to himself he resolves to seek out the rose of his choice, and Welcome promises to aid him; but Shyness, Fear, and Slander obstruct him, and Reason advises him to give up the pursuit. Pity and Liberality now show him the object of his desire, but Jealousy seizes the guide Welcome, and locks her in Fear Castle. Here the original poem ends. It is called the French Iliad.

Jean de Meung, pronounce Jahnd Muhng.

Romanov (The Dynasty of). The second Russian dynasty. The first five of this line of czars were scarcely acknowledged. Boris Godounov usurped the throne in 1598, and till 1613 it was a constant struggle with Poland and Sweden. In 1613 Michael III. [Romanov] put an end to these troubles, and from him dates the third dynasty; but it was still Romanov, and continued to 1762. Peter the Great (1613–1686) was the third successor of Michael, and there were four queens, Sophia, Catherine, Anne Ivanovna (Joanna), and Elizabeth Petrovna. It was succeeded by the dynasty of Holstein-Gottorp.

Romantic School of France (The), or Romanticists, 1830–1840. Lemercier, Victor Hugo, and Alexandre Dumas are the chief exponents of the French Romantic School, which sought to free the stage from the Aristotelian unities, and to introduce the English, Spanish, and German freedom. Delavigne attempted a compromise, and founded the Classico-romantic school of French tragedy. The Romantic School was not confined to tragedy; all poetry discarded the classic affectations introduced at the revolution even into names and dress.

Romantic School of Germany (The), 1800–1810. Its founders were Schlegel, Novälis, and Ludwig Tieck. The next three names of the same school are Hoffman, De la Motte Fouqué (author of 'Undine'), and Chamisso (author of 'Peter Schlemil, the shadowless man').

Novalis is the pen-name of Friedrich von Hardenberg of Saxony.

Rome of the African World (The). Carthage, a long time the rival of Rome.

Though Carthage might yield to the royal prerogatives of Constantinople, and perhaps to the trade of Alexandria or the splendour of Antioch, she still maintained the second rank in the west, as the 'Rome' of the African world.—GIBBON, chap. xxxiii.

Romescot, A.D. 720. When Ina king of Wessex abdicated he went to Rome, where he founded a Saxon school, to provide for which he imposed a penny on every family. This tax was called Romescot, and sometimes Peter-pence, because it was collected on the festival of St. Peter ad Vincula (Sharon Turner, 'History of the Anglo-Saxons').

It was also called Hearth-money, being a tax on each hearth or family. Offa in 790 settled the tax on the pope. It was discontinued by Edward III., A.D. 1365, and prohibited by Act of Parliament, 25 Hen. VIII. c. 21, A.D. 1534.

Romorantin (The Edict of), 1560. A law passed through the influence of Michel de l'Hôpital, chancellor of France, to keep out the Inquisition, which the Guises wanted to introduce. By this edict the crime of heresy was entrusted to the bishops, and parliament was forbidden to interfere in matters of faith.

Romulus (The Second). Marcus Furius Camillus, four times Dictator of Rome; died in retirement B.C. 360. After the Gauls had burnt Rome Camillus both repelled the invaders and restored the city.

Ronsard School (The). A school of French poetry founded by Ronsard (1524–1584); his sonnets were modelled on those of Petrarch; his epic on the 'Æneid' and his odes were in imitation of Horace, Pindar, and Anacreon. Pedantry was the characteristic of this school. Ronsard was the Cowley of France.

Rood of Grace (The). At Boxley in Kent. An image of Christ on the cross, which hung its lip when silver was offered it, but shook its beard merrily when the offering was of gold. At the dissolution of the smaller monasteries in England Thomas Cromwell (1538) had the rood taken to Paul's Cross, and Hilsey bishop of Rochester, before a large crowd of the citizens of London, exposed the wires, wheels, and springs by which this was done, and the image was broken to pieces. See 'Darvel Gatheren,' 'Blood of Christ,' &c.

Root and Branch Party (The), 1640. The Independents in the reign of Charles I., hostile alike to the 'root,' that is Episcopacy, and to the 'branch,' that is Presbyterianism. A compromise was made by 16 Car. I. c. 27, A.D. 1642, when the bishops were deprived of their suffrages in the House of Lords; but the status quo was restored by 13 Car. II. c. 2, A.D. 1661.

Root and Branch Petition (The), 1641. A petition containing 15,000 signatures in favour of the abolition of Episcopacy in England and the establishment of Presbyterianism.

Rope Dancer (The). Yvo de Grantmesnil the Crusader, one of the leaders of Robert duke of Normandy's party against Henry I. of England. Yvo was one of those who escaped from Antioch when it was besieged. He was let down by a rope over the wall, and was hence called 'The Rope Dancer.'

Rope Dancers (The). The deserters from Antioch in the first crusade, who dropped in the night from the walls, and fled. (Gibbon, chap. lviii.)

Rory o' the Hill (Captain), 1880. The signature adopted by the writer of threatening letters to landlords, tenants who paid their rent, those who took the farms of evicted tenants, &c., under the authority of the Irish Land League. See p. 435, 'Irish Associations.'

Like the Fenians, the Land Leaguers wanted to sever Ireland from the British crown. Rory =Roderick, a common name in Ireland, as Rory O'More.

Rosamond. Daughter of Walter Clifford, a Hertfordshire baron, mistress of Henry II. of England, was the mother of William Longsword, who married the daughter of the Earl of Salisbury, and of Geoffrey archbishop of York. She retired to the convent of Godestow, near Oxford, where she died. The tale of the labyrinth and the poisoned bowl forced upon her by Queen Eleanor is not mentioned by any contemporary, and probably is a mere invention of romance.

Rosary (A). Either a sacred office in honour of the Virgin Mary or a string of beads, 15 of which are large ones. The 15 large beads tell off the Pater Nosters; the 150 smaller beads tell off the Ave Marias. Instituted by St. Dominic (1170–1221).

Rosary. The office so called consists of three parts, each of which contains five mysteries. The entire rosary consists, therefore, of fifteen mysteries. The rosary begins by making the sign of the cross thrice: (1) to ward off the devil; (2) to implore the help of the Holy Trinity; and (3) to bring to mind that the cross is man's salvation.

After crossing comes the 'Apostles' Creed,' or Symbol, then the Lord's Prayer, and then 'Hail Mary' is repeated thrice: once in honour of God, the Virgin's 'Father-in-law'; once in honour of the Virgin's son; and once in honour of the Holy Ghost, the Virgin's spouse.

These being done, the rosary proper commences. The rosary proper consists of fifteen decades or dizains, divided into threes, five recounting the 'Five Joyous Mysteries' (q.v.), five recounting the 'Five Dolorous Mysteries' (q.v.), and five recounting the 'Five Glorious Mysteries' (q.v.). In each mystery 'Hail Mary' is repeated 50 times, i.e. 150 times in the three mysteries.

As each mystery begins with a Pater Noster, and as there are fifteen mysteries, it follows that the Lord's Prayer is repeated fifteen times and 'Ave Maria' is repeated 150 times.

There is supposed to be a meditation after the repetition of each mystery, a private prayer, and a doxology.

 There is something revolting in the idea that God is the 'father-in-law' of a peasant girl, that this villager is 'mother of God,' and also the 'wife' of God. It may be logical, but it certainly anthropomorphoses Deity most shockingly.

Rosary (The Festival of the), 1573. Instituted by Gregory XIII. to commemorate the victory of Lepanto, when in 1571 Don John of Austria defeated the Turks.

Rosary (The Greater) includes all the three parts or fifteen mysteries with their component prayers. See 'Rosary, the Office.'

Rosary (The Lesser). Takes in one of the three decades or mysteries. See 'Rosary, the Office.'

That is, five mysteries [the joyous mysteries, the dolorous mysteries, and the glorious mysteries. See under the word 'Five,' p. 329].

Rosary (The Living). A recital by fifteen persons of the entire rosary, each person saying daily one of the fifteen mysteries.

Roscius (The British). I. Richard Burbage (1566–1619).

Richard Burbage is famous as our 'English Roscius.'

II. Thomas Betterton (1635–1710).
III. David Garrick (1716–1779).

Roscius (The Irish). Spranger Barry, the 'Silver-tongued' (1719–1777).

Roscius (The Modern). William Henry West Betty, who appeared at Covent Garden Theatre 1 Dec., 1804, at the age of 13, in the character of Achmet in the play entitled 'Barbarossa.' He received 50 guineas a night for the first three nights, and 100 guineas a night for the next twenty-five nights. In fifty nights with benefits he realised 34,000*l.*, and retired from the stage. He died in 1874, at the age of 84.

He is called sometimes the 'Infant Roscius,' and sometimes the 'Youthful Roscius.' The great Roman comic actor was Quintus Roscius, who died B.C. 62, having realised an immense fortune. His contemporary Æsopus was a tragic actor equally celebrated.

Roscius of France (The). Michel Baron (1653–1729). Roscius was a comedian of Rome, but the word in modern times is generally applied to tragic actors. Shakespeare says: 'What scene of death hath Roscius now to act!' Baron, however, was both a comedian and a tragedian.

Rose. The plucking of white and red roses by the Yorkists and Lancastrians, which (according to Shakespeare) gave the name to the great civil contest in the reign of Henry VI., was paralleled in the French Revolution, when Camille Desmoulins, after addressing the mob, tore a green leaf off a tree and placed it in his hat. 'Others' (says Carlyle, 'French Revolution,' vol. i. p. 160) 'followed his example, until the trees were stripped, and the "wearing of the green" became general.'

Rose of Derrinsalla (The), in Tipperary. She came into the Cleburne family by the marriage of Ellen Palmer to Edward Cleburne (grandson of Richard Cleburne, of Ballycullatan Castle, Tipperary).

Rose of Raby (The). The mother of Richard III. She was Cicely, daughter of Ralph de Neville of Raby, earl of Westmoreland.

Rose of Sharon (The), Cant. ii. 1. Solomon says: 'I am the Rose of Sharon.' Jesus Christ is also called the Rose of Sharon, i.e. the wild rose.

Rose of York (The). The Princess Elizabeth, eldest child of Edward IV. She married Henry VII., and thus united the Rose of York to the Rose of Lancaster.

Rose's Act, 1812, on clerical fees, &c. It directs 'that all customary fees for making entries in the register and giving copies shall remain in force.' In 1836 a uniform scale of fees for searches and certificates was fixed by act of parliament.

Roses (Wars of the), between the Houses of York (q.v.) and Lancaster (q.v.). Began with the battle of St. Albans, 23 May, 1455, and terminated with the battle of Bosworth Field, 22 Aug., 1485. The chief battles were those of Northampton, Wakefield, Towton, Hexham, Barnet, and Tewkesbury. A red rose was the badge of Edmund earl of Lancaster, brother to King Edward I.; and a white rose was the badge of the Black Prince. Tradition says that Somerset, in the Temple Gardens, plucked a red rose, saying, 'Let all the friends of Lancaster follow my example;' and Warwick, the friend of York, plucked a white rose, saying, 'Let all the friends of York wear a white rose for their badge.' The two tales are quite consistent, and it seems that ribbons and rosettes of red and white were worn by the partisans of Lancaster and York.

Rosicrucians. A secret society of the 17th cent., involved in much mystery. Mosheim and others derive the word from ros (dew) and crux (+ symbol of Lvx, light). 'Lux,' we are told, is that which produces gold, and 'ros' is its greatest solvent.

In 1614 appeared a book entitled the 'Brotherhood of the illustrious Order of the R. C.' (Rosy Cross), which is the story of Brother Christian Rosenkreux, a German who is represented as living in the 14th cent., and who was the founder of the society.

F. R. C. stand for Fratres Roris Coacti, the philosopher's stone being supposed to be congealed dew.

That there was a secret society called

Rosicrucians in the 17th cent. may be admitted, but the tale about Brother Rosenkreux is mere romance.

Amongst other foolish things attributed to the Rosicrucians is a belief in the possibility of perpetual motion, and also of a perpetually burning lamp.

Rosin Bible (The), printed 1609. So called because the word rosin is substituted for 'balm' in Jer. viii. 22. Thus: 'Is there no rosin in Gilead?' See 'Bible.'

Roskild (Treaty of), 28 Feb., 1658, between Sweden and Denmark. Charles X. of Sweden had invaded Poland in 1655, and subjugated that country, when Frederick III. of Denmark unwisely espoused the Polish cause. On this interference Charles at once invaded Holstein, overran it, and proceeded to Zealand, which no doubt would have fallen into his power if Frederick had not sued for peace. By the treaty signed at Roskild, the Danish provinces beyond the Sound, Scania, Halland, and Bleking, were ceded to Sweden, together with the district of Trontheim, the northern part of Norway, and the island of Bornholm.

The district of Trontheim and island of Bornholm were restored to the Danes 10 June, 1660, by the Treaty of Copenhagen.

Trontheim, pronounce Tron-yem.

Rosse's Telescope, 1844. A telescope of 6 ft. aperture and 54 ft. focal length, erected by Lord Rosse in his grounds at Parsonstown, King's County, Ireland. The speculum weighs 4 tons. This telescope cost Lord Rosse as much as 20,000*l*.

Rossi (I) and 'I Neri.' See under 'Reds and Blacks.'

Rotten Borough System (The). The old 'free-men system' which held in elections for members of parliament before it was abolished by the Reform Bill. These boroughs were rotten or corrupt because the electors were venal.

Rotten Boroughs. Places which returned members to the House of Commons, the only electors being tenants or subservients of the lord of the soil, who virtually nominated the member, while the electors merely gave effect to his nomination.

Rotulus Wintoniæ. The Winchester Roll. So Doomsday Book was called; because it was anciently preserved under three locks and keys, in the royal treasury of that city.

Rouge-croix. One of the four pursuivants of England. So called from the red cross of St. George. See p. 415, 'Heralds.'

Rouge-dragon. One of the four pursuivancies of England founded by Henry VII. on the day before his coronation. It was the ensign of Cadwaladyr, the last king of the Britons, from whom Henry was crookedly descended. Sometimes Henry VII. used a red dragon as a supporter. See p. 415, 'Heralds.'

Round Table (The). I. A.D. 540. King Arthur is said to have founded this order of knighthood at Winchester. So called because Arthur and his knights sat on state occasions at a round table, in order that no dispute about rank might arise.

II. A.D. 1884. The modern departure of this phrase hails from America, and is in no wise connected with the famous table round of King Arthur. The Chautauqua Reading Circle, near Lake Erie (instituted 1871), has given birth to a large number of similar societies in America and Canada. Members meet together occasionally at each other's houses to talk over given subjects, and these gatherings are called 'Round Tables,' or 'Round Table Conferences.'

I was present at one of Dr. Vincent's 'Round Table Conferences,' which was attended by several hundred members, . . . questions were asked and opinions invited respecting the choice of books, and the best mode of reading them.—Nineteenth Century, Oct. 1888, p. 490.

Round Table Conference (Harcourt's), Dec. 1886 to March, 1887. Held at the house of Sir Wm. Harcourt, where the members assembled. See above. The object was to unite, if possible, the Liberal party, which had been broken up by Mr. Gladstone's Irish policy. Mr. Chamberlain, who had been one of Mr. Gladstone's ministers, had left the party, and was invited by Sir Wm. Harcourt to join the Conference. In March a quarrel between Mr. Gladstone and Mr. Chamberlain broke up the Conference. The members were three Liberals (Lord Herschel, Sir William Harcourt, and John Morley), and two Unionists (Sir George Trevelyan and Joseph Chamberlain).

The platform was to give Ireland an Irish executive, dependent on Irish legislation, with regular departments, including a Home Rule office. Irish members were to be admitted to Westminster to vote on Irish questions. The great stumbling-block was Ulster, the most wealthy and loyal part of Ireland, which strongly objected to 'Home Rule' (q.v.).

The whole history of Ireland shows that the Irish would invite over Spanish or French armies to strengthen their own if they were free to act for themselves, thus rendering the island a perpetual menace to Great Britain. On the other hand, Ireland would lose infinitely by separation; for, if cut off from England, of course no Irishmen could hold office in Great Britain, and Ireland itself would be a poor field for Irish genius and enterprise. Mr. Gladstone's notion of the Irish managing 'their own affairs' is silly, unless he will show that their 'own affairs' do not mean their government, which indubitably the Irish intend by the phrase. There can be no objection to extending County Councils to Ireland, but an Irish parliament is quite another matter.

Round World (The). The rotundity of the world was not believed in by the early Christians, and was thought to be antagonistic to Mosaic teaching. In A.D. 200 Tertullian held that the 'Books of Moses [were] not only all truth, but that all truth was contained in them,' and as the globular form of the earth is not part of that revelation, the tenet is heretical. Lactantius about a century later, referring to the globosity of the earth and its revolution, says: 'Is it possible that men can be so absurd as to believe that the crops and trees on the other side of the earth hang downwards?' And St. Augustine, about A.D. 400, says: 'Is it possible there should be inhabitants on the other side of the earth, since there is no such race mentioned in Scripture among the descendants of Adam?' And then he adds: 'In the day of judgment men on the other side of the earth could not see the Lord descending through the air.' (l)

Cosmas, in the 6th cent., published his 'Christian Topography,' the object of which was to denounce the heathen doctrine of the rotundity of the earth, and to show that the tabernacle in the wilderness is the pattern or model of the universe. 'The earth,' he says, 'is a rectangular plane, 400 days' journey east and west, and half that distance north and south. It is surrounded by mountains, on which the sky rests. The heavens come down to the earth on all four sides, like the wall of a room. All below the firmament is the world, the story above is heaven, and below the earth is hell. Beyond ocean, bordering on the edge, is Paradise. Here, too, on a barren and thorny soil, outside the walls of Paradise, dwelt man from the Fall to the Deluge. The ark floated the survivors across the great ocean belt to the lands which we inhabit. This plain lies a little tilted to the south, so that the rivers (like the Tigris and the Euphrates) running south run rapidly, while those running north (like the Nile) run more slowly, because they have to run uphill.' (l) This notion prevailed for above 1,000 years in the Christian Church.

 Even so late as 25 Feb., 1616, the Holy Office, presided over by the pope, declared it to be absurd and contrary to Holy Writ to teach that the sun does not move from its place, that the earth is not the centre of the universe, that it moves round the sun, and has also a diurnal motion. These heretical notions were laid to the charge of Galileo, and he was threatened with imprisonment unless he abjured them. The judgment is signed by seven cardinals.

Roundabout Raid (The), 1565. A military insurrection headed by Murray, the duke of Chatelherault, Argyle, Glencairn, and Rothes, at the marriage of Mary queen of Scots with Henry Darnley. Mary, arrayed in light armour, and wearing pistols in her saddle-bow, rode at the head of her troops, and the insurgents retreated from place to place to dodge the royal troops, without coming to a combat. Murray applied to Queen Elizabeth for aid, but Elizabeth dismissed the envoys, calling them traitors, and the insurgents dispersed, making the best terms they could, each for himself.

Morton and his associates [after the murder of Rizzio] went to occupy those quarters in Northumberland which had been lately tenanted by the lords concerned in the Roundabout Raid.—Sir W. Scott. Hist. of Scotland, xxviii.

Roundheads (The), 1641. The Independents or Puritans in the reign of Charles I. The royalists were nicknamed 'The Cavaliers.' The former wore their hair short, and dressed with great simplicity; the latter wore their hair flowing over their shoulders, and dressed showily and expensively. The two came into collision about the expulsion of the bishops from the House of Lords. The Roundheads insisted on their expulsion, and the severance of the clergy from all secular and state offices. It was in this brawl that the two parties gave each other the nicknames of Roundheads and Cavaliers.

Clarendon says, when Williams archbishop of York was hustled by the mob, one David Hide, an officer who had been with the army in the North, drew his sword and swore that he would 'cut the throats of those Roundhead dogs,' and by this expression gave the first utterance to the name Roundheads.

Rousseauism. The political theory of Jean-Jacques Rousseau as set forth in the 'Contrat Social' and his 'Discours sur l'origine de l'inégalité parmi les hommes.' In the state of nature man was strong, healthy, contented, and good; all the evils which have befallen him (such as feebleness, sickness, poverty, and inequality of social life) result from civilisation; and the first step to this Avernus is 'the right of property.' His axioms are:—

I. All men are born free, politically equal, and good, and in a 'state of nature' remain so. Consequently, it is their natural right to be free, equal, and good.

II. If all are equal, none have any right to disturb that equality by appropriating property or usurping authority. The former is robbery, the latter tyranny.

III. If so, the spoliation of wealth is simply restitution, and the disregard of all authority not delegated by social contract is simply a vindication of natural rights.

The reply is:—I. No child is born free, but from the moment of birth is under control and restraint.

II. Children are not born equal, but some are stronger and more intelligent than others, so that in the nursery some lead and others follow.

III. They are not born 'good,' in any sense of the word.

IV. In regard to authority, on board ship who would take the votes of the sailors and crew in regard to the steerage or trimming of the vessel? Applied to politics, this practical rule goes far to upset the popular theory of universal suffrage.

V. Historically, no people ever did exist in Rousseau's hypothetical 'state of nature'; such a state of existence is morally impossible.

VI. All nature, from the stars of heaven to the worm and rush, shows the greatest inequality; and as for independence, there is no such thing in heaven above, the earth beneath, or the waters under the earth.

 'Born politically equal' is unmitigated nonsense. Political means that which pertains to civil government, and government of necessity implies rulers and subjects. Some to command, and others to obey.

Rout of Moray (The), 1746. Lord Loudoun, hearing that Charles Edward (the son of the Pretender) was living in easy security at Moray, sent out a nocturnal party to surprise him and carry him off captive; but the 'surprise party' were met in a wood by the Macintoshes, who caused them to retreat. This flight of Lord Loudoun's surprise party is called 'The Rout of Moray.'

Rout of Rosbach (The), 5 Nov., 1757. A household phrase for a disgraceful rout. Its reference is to the battle of Rosbach, won by Frederick II. over the allied Austrian and French army. The Prussian loss was 300, that of the allies was 1,300 slain and 6,000 prisoners.

Routes, Chemins. Routes are high-roads, chemins are common roads. There are two sorts of Routes: (1) Routes Nationales, the great high-roads which lead to Paris, or which join two principal towns, as Lyons and Bordeaux; (2) Routes Départementales, which connect the principal towns of a department one with another.

There are three sorts of Chemins: (1) Chemins de grande communication, the network of the routes départementales. Originally the routes were kept up by government and the chemins by rates; (2) Chemins d'intérêt commun, country roads connecting villages; (3) Chemins vicinaux ordinaires, bye-roads.

Route=root. Chemins, pronounce Shma[r]n.

Routiers. Bands of French adventurers confederated in 1147, soon after the departure of Louis VII. on his crusade. They were so called from the old French word route. These adventurers were put down in 1188 by the Pacifici near Dun-le-Roi. Those who survived enlisted in the militia called the 'Ribalds' (q.v.).

The Pacifici were the 'Confrérie du charpentier Durand du Puy.'

Rowdy Parliament (The), 1887. Lord Salisbury was prime minister and Mr. W. H. Smith leader of the House of Commons. Eighty-one of the Irish members, led by Mr. Parnell, resolved to obstruct the business of the house by long speeches, endless amendments, and disorderly conduct. The most conspicuous in insolence and vulgarity were Dr. Tanner and two members named Healy. A Mr. Dillon, a Mr. Conybeare member for Camborne, and a Mr. Labouchere senior member for Northampton, were also especially conspicuous. Certainly the conduct of the house was never so disgraceful. See 'Parliaments.'

In 1890, in six months, six members of the House made above 750 speeches, or an average of 125 each. Chief of the six were Sir William Harcourt, Mr. Labouchere, and Sir George Campbell. Now in six months, supposing parliament sits five hours a day (with only four days' holiday), this would give them 700 hours for business. Some of the obstructive speeches lasted over an hour. So 750 speeches by six Opposition members in 700 hours certainly look very much like obstruction of public business.

Rowley. Applied to Charles II. Rowley was the name of a goat which used to run about the Priory garden. The animal was lecherous, good-humoured, and familiar, certainly typical of the good-humoured royal libertine.

It is said that a famous stone-horse of that time was called 'Old Rowley.'

Rowley's Poems. A volume of poems said by Chatterton to have been found by him in the muniment room of the church of St. Mary Redcliffe, Bristol, written on yellow parchment in very antiquated style. Horace Walpole believed them to be genuine, but they were the productions of Chatterton himself, a lad only 16 years of age. Besides the poems of Rowley were those of his friend Canynge (15th cent.). See p. 525, 'Literary Forgeries.'

Roxalana. So Elizabeth Davenport (decoyed by Lord Oxford into a mock marriage) was called from 'Roxalana,' in the 'Siege of Rhodes,' her great part.

Roxburghe Club (The), 1812. A literary club founded in London to print, for members only, works hitherto unedited or extremely rare. The idea was started by the sale of the Duke of Roxburghe's library in 1812, which contained several rare books, as an edition of Boccaccio, bought by the Marquis of Blandford for 260*l.*, afterwards purchased by Lord Spencer for 918*l.* 15*s.*

Other similar clubs are the Camden Society, the Percy, the Shakespeare, the Cheetham, the Wharton, the Surtees (in England); and the Bannatyne, the Maitland, the Abbotsford, and the Spalding Club (in Scotland).

Roxburghe, pronounce Rox-burrah.

Royal Academy of Arts (The), 1768. To promote the cultivation of painting, drawing, engraving, sculpture, modelling, and other fine arts. There are forty academicians and twenty associates, and six associate engravers. The first attach to their names the letters R.A. (Royal Academician); the second attach to their names the letters A.R.A. (Associate of the Royal Academy). They first exhibited (1761) in Somerset House. In 1836 they occupied part of the National Gallery in Trafalgar Square; but in 1869 they moved to Burlington House.

That members of the Academy should be allowed to hang on the line eight pictures each is preposterous, and hundreds of excellent pictures are discarded every year for want of room. Two pictures should be the first limit to members, then the best of the pictures of the general public. If room still remained, begin again with the members, and go on to non-members, one each. The exhibition is now a mere clique, and very often most disappointing. We want to see national progress, not what forty men can do (1890).

Royal Arms of Great Britain. Our earliest kings bore for a lion an heraldic figure purely hypothetical—a mixture between a lion and a leopard. Scott, in his 'Talisman,' makes the Duke of Austria refer to the change of this funny animal into a lion.

Edward III. quartered the arms of France with those of England.

Mary united those of Spain, after her marriage with Philip II.

James I. added the arms of Scotland and Ireland; the first and fourth quarters representing France and England, the second Scotland (represented by the lion rampant), and the third Ireland (represented by a harp).

Anne had England and Scotland impaled in the first and fourth quarters, France in the second, and Ireland in the third.

George III. renounced the absurd titular assumption of 'King of France.'

Victoria omitted the arms of Hanover from the escutcheon, because by the Salic law a female could not be monarch of Hanover, and no sovereign of Great Britain ought to covet such a white elephant.

Royal Arms in Churches (The), 1547. Shortly after the date of Henry VIII. General in the reign of Elizabeth (1558–1603).

'Whereas it is generally enjoined by the Great Counsell of England that in all churches thorowout the kingdome of England his Majesties Armes shalbe sett up.'—Parish Register of Warrington, 30 July, 1622.

* * Surely this mixture of 'His Majesties armes and the Tenne Commandments' is only an unseemly recognition of that divinity which doth hedge a king,' and ought to be utterly and entirely discontinued.

Royal Assent (The) in parliamentary matters.

I. To a public bill the words are 'Le roy (or la reyne) le veult.'

II. To a private bill the words used are 'Soit fait comme il est désiré.'

III. To a bill of supply the words used are 'Le roy remercie ses bons sujets, accepte leur bénévolence, et ainsi le veult.' See 'Royal Refusal.'

This was all very well with such kings as George I. and II., who could not speak English, and before them, when the Court thought it more courtly to talk French; but it is now full time to speak English, and to discontinue this ridiculous and superannuated pedantry. Must aristocratic England go to republican France for royal speech? It is full time for English monarchs to speak English to their British subjects (1890).

Royal Assurance (The). In Swedish history. An act passed in 1720, which limited the power of the king. He could in future make no laws without the consent of the states, nor could he proclaim either peace or war. The counsellors of the king were in future to be called the Senate, and the number limited to sixteen. The king was to have two votes and the casting vote in the senate.

Royal Butcher (The). Henry VIII. (1491, 1509–1547).

Royal Chamber (The). A substitute for the Paris parliament which Louis XV. dissolved, and gave to the new chamber full jurisdiction in all civil and criminal matters. The barristers and councillors refused to plead before the Royal Chamber, and the king was obliged to give way.

Royal Collection of MSS. (The), 1757, in the Britsh Museum, presented by George II. These MSS. date from the reign of Richard III. to Charles II. One of the most remarkable is the Codex Alexandrinus, a present from Cyril patriarch of Constantinople to Charles I. It is in four quarto volumes, written on fine vellum in uncial characters, is ascribed to some period between the 4th and 6th cents., and is supposed to be the oldest Greek Text extant. This collection contains many illuminated MSS., the Basilicon Doron of James I. in his own handwriting, several volumes executed for Edward IV., a volume of French romances presented by Talbot earl of Shrewsbury to Queen Margaret, and many other richly illuminated books.

'Royal George' (Loss of the), 1782. The 'Royal George' was an old ship of 100 guns, fitted out at Portsmouth for the relief of the garrison at Gibraltar. Before starting a gang of carpenters were sent to careen the vessel, and heeled her over too far, so that the sea ran into the portholes, and the ship went down suddenly. Admiral Kempenfelt (aged 70) and 900 or 1,000 others were drowned, and not above 300 were saved.

Royal Literary Fund (The), 1790, incorporated 1818 in Great Russell Street, Bloomsbury, London. For the relief of authors and literary men who have published works of merit, but who, from age or infirmity, are reduced to poverty.

Royal Marriage Act (The), 1772. It prohibits any descendant of George II. from marrying till the age of twenty-five without the king's consent. After the age of twenty-five the person must apply to the privy council; and if within a year of such application both houses of parliament assented the marriage might be solemnized.

The bill was introduced because the Duke of Cumberland had recently married Mrs. Horton at Calais, and the Duke of Gloucester had married the Countess-Dowager Waldegrave.

Royal Medals of the Royal Society of London, 1825. Instituted by George IV. for scientific discoveries.

Royal Oak (The). The oak at Boscobel in which Charles II. hid himself in his flight after the battle of Worcester, 1651. From this circumstance oak leaves were worn on the birthday of Charles II. (May 29), especially when he returned to his kingdom, which he did on his birthday 1660.

Royal Refusal (The). In parliamentary matters. The words of dissent are 'Le roy (or La reyne) s'avisera.' See p. 774, 'Royal Assent.'

The last instance of royal refusal to a bill was in 1707, when Queen Anne refused to sign a bill for settling the militia of Scotland.

Royal Salute (A). Consists of 21 guns, i.e. 3×7. Three is the Trinity, seven the sacraments.

Royal Society (The).

I. Of London, founded 1660 for the promotion of mathematical and physical science.

The Copley Medal was instituted in 1709 by Sir Godfrey Copley for scientific discoveries.
The Rumford Medal was instituted in 1796 by Count Rumford for discoveries in light and heat.
Royal Medals were instituted in 1825 by George IV. for scientific discoveries.
The 'Philosophical Transactions' (q.v.) were published 1665, to be continued monthly.

II. Of Edinburgh, founded 1783, on the model of the Berlin Academy, for the investigation and discussion of subjects in every branch of science, erudition, and taste.

The Keith prize was founded by Alexander Keith of Dunnottar.
The M'Dougal Brisbane prize was founded by Sir Thomas M'Dougal Brisbane.
The Neill Prize was founded by Dr. Patrick Neill.
All for communications on subjects connected with the society.

Royal Society of Literature (The). Founded in 1823, and chartered 1826.

Royal Style and Titles of the sovereigns of England since the Conquest.

1066 WILLIAM I.	'Rex Anglorum.'
1100 WILLIAM II.	'Ængelandes King.'
1135 STEPHEN.	'Rex Anglorum, Dux Normannorum.'
1154 HENRY II.	'Rex Angliæ, Dux Normanniæ et Aquitaniæ.'
1199 JOHN.	'Rex Angliæ, Dominus Hiberniæ, Dux Normanniæ et Aquitaniæ.'
1265 HENRY III.	'Rex Angliæ, Dominus Hiberniæ, Dux Aquitaniæ.'
1341 "	'Rex Angliæ et Franciæ, et Dominus Hiberniæ.'
1421 HENRY V.	'Rex Angliæ, Hæres et Regens Franciæ, et Dominus Hiberniæ.'
1429 HENRY VI.	'Rex Angliæ et Franciæ, et Dominus Hiberniæ' (as Henry III.).
1544 HENRY VIII.	'Angliæ Franciæ et Hiberniæ Rex, Fidei Defensor et in terra Ecclesiæ Anglicanæ et Hibernicæ supremum caput.'
1559 ELIZABETH.	'Queen of England, France, and Ireland, Defender of the Faith.'
1603 JAMES I.	'King of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, Defender of the Faith.'
1702 ANNE.	'Queen of Great Britain, France, and Ireland, Defender of the Faith.'
1801 GEORGE III.	'Britanniarum Rex, and of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland King, Defender of the Faith.'
1877 VICTORIA.	'Of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland Queen, Defender of the Faith, Empress of India. Or, 'Victoria, Dei Gratia, Britanniarum Regina Fid. Def.'

Royal [English] Subsidy (The). The interest of a fund formed from a grant by Mary the wife of William III. of England for Vaudois pastors of the valleys and of the Würtemberg colony. This colony consisted of the French subjects expelled from the valleys by the secret treaty of Loretto. See 'Treaty of 1696.' The royal subsidy was augmented in 1770 by the 'National Subsidy' (q.v.).

Royalists and Cardinalists, 1642. The friends and adherents of Cinq-Mars, the friend and favourite of Louis XIII., called themselves Royalists. The adherents of Richelieu, whom the king hated, were called 'Cardinalists.'

Roydamna. The heir presumptive of the over-lord of Ireland. The heirs presumptive of the under-lords or dynasts were called tanists. The heir presumptive was elected in the lifetime of the ruler, and was generally one of the sons, brothers, or cousins of the blood royal. He was ex-officio commander-in-chief of the forces.

Rubens's Women. The portrait of Helena Forman (or Fourment), his second wife, married at the age of sixteen, is introduced into several of his historical pictures; but in the painting called Rubens and his Wife in the Munich gallery the woman is the artist's first wife, Isabella Brandt of Antwerp.

Rubicon (The). Now the 'Pisatello,' a small river which flows into the Adriatic, and separates Cisalpine Gaul from Italy proper. It was an act of treason for a Roman to enter Italy proper with an army; when therefore Julius Cæsar, B.C. 49, crossed the Rubicon at the head of his army, it was a declaration of revolt, and the commencement of the civil war.

From this passage of the Rubicon by Cæsar, the phrase 'To pass the Rubicon' became proverbial, meaning to take a decisive step and abide the consequences, or to enter on an undertaking from which there is no retreat.

Rubric (The). The directions to the minister and congregation given at the heads of divers parts of the liturgy. These were originally printed in red letters, the office itself being in black letters. (Latin ruber, red.)

Rubrics. The Romans called the jus civile 'Rubrica,' because these laws were written in vermilion. The prætors' edicts were written in white, the imperial rescripts in purple ink.

Rudel (Geoffrey). The king of minstrels, to whom Henry II., on one occasion, gave four manors in reward for a song.

Rudmas-day. The feast of the rode or holy cross. There were two of these feasts, one on 3 May (the invention of the cross), and the other 14 Sept. (the exaltation of the cross). The latter is called the Holy Rood-day.

Rudolph I. of Habsburg king of Germany, but never kaiser or 'Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire' (1218, 1273–1291).

Father, Albrecht count of Habsburg; Mother, ——; Wives, (1) Gertrude of Hohenberg, (2) Elizabeth of Burgundy. Contemporary with Edward I.

After the close of the Hohenstauffen dynasty in 1254 to the accession of the Austrian dynasty in 1438, nearly 200 years, the rulers of Germany were promiscuous. After an interregnum of seventeen years came Rudolph I. of Habsburg, Adolph of Nassau, Albrecht I. of Austria, Heinrich VII. of Luxemburg, Friedrich III. of Austria, Ludwig V. of Bavaria, Gunther of Schwarzburg, Karl IV. of Luxemburg, Wenzel [Wenceslaus] the Worthless, Ruprecht the Elector Palatine of the Rhine, and Siegmund of Brandenburg, altogether eleven kings, besides the three nominal ones during the interregnum.

Rudolph II. Kaiser-king of Germany of the House of Austria (1552, 1576–1612).

Father, Maximilian II.; Mother, Mary. It was in honour of this monarch the 'Tabulæ Rudolphinæ' were so named. Contemporary with Elizabeth and James I.

Rudolphine Tables (The). 'Tabulæ Rudolphinæ,' 1627. Astronomical calculations begun by Tycho Brahé, and continued by Kepler under the immediate patronage of Kaiser Rudolf II., after whom Kepler named the work. See 'Ilkanian and Alfonsine Tables.'

Rudolph gave Tycho Brahé an annuity of 1,600l. sterling.

Ruel (The Treaty of), April, 1649. Terms of peace made by Mazarin and Anne of Austria with the Frondeurs or Parlementarians. Scarcely was the treaty signed when the Prince de Condé headed the party called 'La Jeune Fronde.' The queen-mother arrested the Prince de Condé, the Prince de Conti, and the Duc de Longueville while assembled in council in the Palais Royal, and sent them prisoners to Vincennes (18 Jan., 1650). All the nobility flew to arms. Anne of Austria stood out for a time, but Mazarin fled. In the autumn of 1651 Louis XIV. came of age, took the government into his own hands, and the nation quieted down.

Rufus Stone (The). A stone, now enclosed in an iron casing, near a by-road to Bramshaw, to commemorate the spot where Purkis picked up the body of William II. after he was shot. The traditional cottage stands some 100 yards off, in the hamlet of Canterton.

Rule Nisi. An order of the law court that something stated shall be done, unless the opposite party, within a certain time (say three or six days) show cause why it should not be done.

Rule of Faith (The). The dogmas and doctrines binding on Christians: Dissenters say 'the Bible, the whole Bible, and nothing but the Bible is binding as a rule of faith.'

Catholics say the practices and doctrines recorded in the 'Fathers' show the rule held in their days, and this 'tradition' supplements the written Scriptures, the two together making the rule of faith.

The Church of England adds to the Bible the decisions of the first four general councils, and admits other practices 'not contrary to Holy Scriptures,' as the change of the Sabbath for Sunday, infant baptism, &c.

Rule of Monastic Houses. Certain laws to be observed by the order referred to. Originally there were but four orders (Augustine, Basil, Benedict, and Francis of Assisi); but these four have given rise to a large number of subordinate orders.

Every religious order was bound to the four vows of Obedience, Poverty, Charity, and Chastity; but history must very much wrong them if these vows were generally observed.

I. Rule of St. Augustine (The). St. Augustine, bishop of Hippo, in Africa, lived 354–430, and founded a society of hermits; but what is called 'Augustine or Austin Friars' is a society organised in 1256 by Pope Alexander IV., who appointed Lanfranc the 'general.' The Augustine Friars wore originally a gray habit, but afterwards a black and white one, with a leathern girdle about the waist.

There were also Augustine canons.

In 1567 Pius V. made the Augustine friars one of the four mendicant orders, the others being the Dominicans, the Franciscans, and the Carmelites.

In 1574 Thomas of Jesus, a Portuguese, founded the Barefooted Augustines (Augustins Déchaussés).

What is technically called 'The Rule of St. Augustine' is a set of laws appointed to be observed by those who belong to the order; but who was the author of these laws nobody knows. There were, in fact, three sets of rules; the chief items were:

1 Class: Absolute and holy poverty. To possess no worldly goods of any kind. Even articles of personal use to be in common. See IV.

If any novice had property he must sell it all, and give the proceeds to the poor, before he could be admitted into the order. See IV.

Never to receive money from anyone, nor any present except food, which must be taken untouched to the monastery for general distribution. See IV.

2 Class: Monastic duties.

To recite daily the psalms and appointed offices.

To employ the first part of the morning and afternoon in manual labour.

To wash their own clothes.

To observe strict silence at meals; to attend to what was read; and never to eat out of the monastery.

Whenever they left the monastery, to go two together; and not even to go to the baths separately. See IV.

Never to utter an idle word.

Never to receive a private letter.

Never to engage in a lawsuit.

On a Sunday a little wine was allowed.

3 Class: Religious duties.

To love God and their neighbour man.

To attend prayer at the canonical hours.

To sing only what is appointed.

To fast with discretion.

To be modest in look, word, and deed.

Never to look immodestly on any woman, or harbour an immodest thought.

 Augustine himself, one of the four doctors of the Church, is called, 'Le Miroir des prélats, le Maître de la théologie, l'Ornement des évêques, l'Eclat de tout l'ordre sacerdotal, la Lumière des docteurs, le Soleil de l'Afrique, le Bouclier de la foi, le Fléau des hérétiques, le Temple de la religion, le Firmament de l'église, et la Colonne inébranlable de la vérité.'

The following were branches of the Augustine order, and observed the same rule with a difference—viz. the Austin Friars, the Brigettines, Dominicans, Gilbertines, Præmonstratensians or Norbertines, Tabennites, Trinitarians, &c. See those in capitals 'Rule of . . . ' each name.

II. Rule of St. Basil (The). St. Basil lived 329–379. He retired into a desert in the province of Pontus, and founded there a monastery, for the better government of which he drew up a series of laws, called the 'Rule of St. Basil,' even to the present day universally followed by all Oriental monks, even by those who call themselves of the order of St. Antony. There were two sets of rules, the Longer and the Shorter. All that St. Basil himself enjoined are the following:—

No monk of this order to return to his parents without express permission of his superiors.

Use hospitality to strangers, but avoid dainty fare. Let even your hospitality teach your guests temperance and sobriety.

Communicate your most secret thoughts to your superior.

Never omit the service of prime, but always consecrate 'the firstfruits of your thoughts to God.'

St. Basil's day is 14 June.

III. Rule of St. Benedict (The). Absolute and holy humility. St. Bennet or Benedict (480–542) was the founder of the Benedictine Order. Gregory the Great preferred the Benedictine Rule to all others. Some ascribe the rule to Gregory III. (731–741). It contains twelve degrees of humility.

The following are the chief items of the Benedictine Rule:—

The monks to serve by turns in kitchen and at table, and the monks in service to wash the feet of the other monks, and on Saturday to clean the plate and linen; seven hours a day to be given to manual labour, four in the morning and three in the afternoon; service seven times a day; two hours to be given to pious reading.

Total abstinence from meat and fowls. The allowance of bread per day to be 1 lb. and a hemina of wine. Fast all Lent till 6 p.m.; but no voluntary austerities allowed. Perfect silence to be observed at meals.

Avoid singularity, never give way to loud laughter, and never at any time speak in a loud voice.

Always to keep their eyes fixed towards the ground.

Renounce your own will; bear injuries patiently; think meanly of yourself and most highly of God.

Train yourself to continual penitence; do all lowly offices; be modest in look, word, and thought.

Know your own will; obey promptly; show your most secret thoughts to your director. See II., IV.

Never go abroad except in pairs; all to sleep in one dormitory, but never two in one bed; all to sleep in their day-dress and girdle, with a lamp burning in the dormitory all night.

Small offences to be punished by loss of meals, great ones by expulsion from chapel.

No vows to be perpetual.

The dress to be a black gown with wide sleeves and a pointed cowl. Every monk to have two of each, but to prefer old clothes to new ones.

St. Bennet's Day is March 21.

The following observed the Benedictine Rule with a difference—viz.

The Bernardines, Camaldules, CARTHUSIANS, Celestines, CISTERCIANS, monks of Cluny or CLUNIACS, Feuillants, TRAPPISTS, &c. See those in capitals under 'Rule of . . .' each name.

IV. Rule of St. Francis (The). Absolute poverty. St. Francis of Assisi (1182–1226) was the founder of three orders: (1) the Fratres Minōres in 1206; (2) the nuns in 1212; and (3) what was far more important (in 1221) the secular order called Tertiaries—that is, men and women who lived in ordinary life (married and given in marriage), but promised to live religiously, and to abandon frivolity of dress, needless extravagance, and self-indulgence. The Franciscans were allowed to have nothing they could call their own, not even the clothes they wore, their convents or churches. Their right extended only to the use of these things. (See I.) They had to work for their living, and, when provisions ran short, to beg alms; but under no consideration were they allowed to take goods or money. See I. If a novitiate had property he was bound to sell all and give the proceeds to the poor, not one farthing might be invested even for the convent or the order. See I.

There are at present many conventual tertiaries.

The following are the chief of the twelve articles of the Rule of St. Francis:

Never to leave the convent except in twos. See I.

Never to preach without permission of the ordinary of the diocese.

Never to ride on a journey; and never to go into any foreign country.

Never to stand godfather to a child; and never to enter a nunnery.

To fast all Lent, and from All Saints' Day (Nov. 1) to Christmas Day.

To confess to their superior their most secret thoughts. See II., III.

This apostrophe of St. Francis is given in the 'Petits Bollandistes,' vol. xii. p. 29: 'Seigneur Jésus, montrez-moi les voies de votre très-chère pauvreté! Ayez pitié de moi et de ma dame la Pauvreté; car je l'aime avec tant d'ardeur, que je ne puis trouver de repos sans elle, et vous savez, O mon Dieu, que c'est vous qui m'aves donné ce grand amour.'

When some persons complained to St. Francis that his rule was too austere, Mgr. Guérin says (p. 86), 'Ils furent surpris d'entendre la voix de Jésu-Christ même qui lui dit en leur présence ces paroles distinctes: "François, cette Regle n'est point ton ouvrage, mais le mien; j'entends qu'elle soit gardée à la lettre, à la lettre, à la lettre, sans glose, sans glose, sans glose. Si quelques-uns ne la veulent pas garder, qu'ils soient rejetés de la compagnie comme des difficiles, des mutins, des scandaleux, et des incorrigibles. Je sais la capacité de l'homme et je sais les grâces et les secours que je veux lui donner." Ces supérieurs, saisis de frayeur, tombèrent par terre et n'osèrent ouvrir la bouche.' Notwithstanding, the rule was greatly modified by Elias (the successor of St. Francis), and the society was split in two, those who were strict Franciscans and those who followed a greatly modified rule.

St. Francis's Day is 4 Oct.

The following were Franciscans, and observed the Franciscan Rule with a difference—viz.

The Capucins or Capuchins, Clarisses, Minims, Picpus, Recollets, &c.

St. Francis of Paula, who founded the Minims, said that no monk who died without his cord of two knots would ever go to heaven.

Rule of St. Chrodegand [Franciscans], 763. By this rule canons were bound to manual labour, silence, and confession twice a year. Chrodegand's day is 7 March.

Rule of St. Dominic [Augustines]. St. Dominic (1170–1221) was the founder of preaching friars; his rule of abstinence and poverty was similar to that of St. Francis, with this exception—the order might accept small rents in money.

The motto of his order was 'Perfect self-distrust, but perfect trust in God.'

Not only individual monks had no personal property, even the collective society had none. They entirely depended on alms.

St. Dominic's great object was to multiply churches and train zealous preachers.

The occupations of his monks were preaching, contemplation, severe study, and acts of charity. Retirement and self-denial were strictly enforced.

St. Dominic's day is 14 Aug.

Rule of St. Fintan of Leinster, 6th cent. [Benedictines]. The Rule of St. Fintan and that of the Trappists are unusually austere.

The monks of St. Fintan lived only on roots and vegetables, in many cases not even cooked.

They tilled their own land.

St. Fintan's Day is 10 May.

Rule of St. Macarius [Augustines] 304–404.

The monks fasted every day except Sunday, and from Easter Day to Whit Sunday.

They divided the day between manual labour and prayer.

Hospitality was enforced by this rule.

No monk was allowed to speak a word to a stranger without express permission of the superior.

The abbots of this order wore no insignia.

St. Macarius's Day is 2 Jan.

Rule of the Carthusians [Benedictines], 1170, composed by Guido, the fifth prior. They had nineteen articles in their rule:

To fast all Lent till six o'clock at night; never at any time to eat flesh, fowl, or fish. Their bread to be made of bran. Sunday and Thursday their diet to be bread and cheese; Tuesday and Saturday pulse; all the rest of the week bread and water.

Each monk to have a separate cell, where he was to sleep, work, and eat in silence his solitary meals.

Each monk to have a hair shirt at all times.

All to work at agriculture, to be hospitable, and given to hospitality.

Rule of the Cistercians [Benedictines], an order of monks founded by Robert of Molême (1018–1110). The Virgin Mary was the protectress of this order. The Cistercians were reformed Bernardines, who affected the severest simplicity.

The rule enjoined four hours' sleep, four for choir singing, and four for manual labour in the morning.

The diet was roots and herbs, which were not served on a table, but on the bare ground. They slept also on the bare ground.

Rule of the Cluniacs, or 'Monks of Cluny,' founded by St. Hugues, abbot of Cluny (1024–1109). Reformed Benedictines. The rule was very austere. St. Hugues abolished the law of manual labour, but enjoined total abstinence from animal food, and restricted the diet to bread and pulse.

Mgr. Paul Guérin, camérier de sa Sainteté Léon XIII., says in his 'Petits Bollandistes,' vol. v. p. 76, 'Un moine de Cluny, plusieurs disent Hildebrand qui fut plus tard Grégoire VII., vit un jour Jésus-Christ s'asseoir dans une stalle du chœur, à côté de Hugues, et lui dicter les décrets et les règles monastiques.'

Rule of the Norbertines [Augustines]. The monks who followed this rule were called Norbertines, Premonstratensians, or White Canons. Robert Norbert lived 1092–1134.

His rule enjoined total abstinence from flesh, constant fasts, and avoiding linen.

St. Norbert's Day is 6 June.

Rule of the Tabennites. Founded by St. Pachomius (292–348), who was the first to draw up a monastic rule in writing. St. Jerome's version of it is still extant. Mgr. Guérin, camérier de sa Sainteté Léon XIII., says in his 'Petits Bollandistes,' vol. v. p. 526: 'Pacôme allait quelquefois dans un vaste désert, nommé Tabenne, situé sur les bords du Nil. Un jour qu'il y faisait son oraison, il entendit une voix qui lui ordonnait de bâtir, à l'endroit où il était, un monastère destiné à recevoir tous ceux qui y seraient envoyés de Dieu pour le servir fidèlement. Vers le même temps, un ange lui donna la Règle que devaient suivre ses religieux, appelés depuis Tabennites.'

These monks ate in common and in dead silence, having their hoods over their faces that they might not see each other. Their tunic was made of white linen, with a cowl, but no sleeves. Over their shoulders they wore a white goat-skin called a mélotes. They communicated the first and last day of every week. There was not one minute of the day which had not some duty awarded to it. The law of silence was so severe that a monk was allowed to express what he wanted only by signs.

His day is 14 May.

Rule of the Trappists [Benedictines]. The most austere of the Cistercian order, reformed by Jean le Bouthillier de Rancé (1626–1700).

The monks are not allowed to speak either to a stranger or to one another.

They may never visit or even write to their friends or relatives, nor may they receive any communication whatever either from them or of them. If a father or mother, sister or brother, dies, the superior may be informed of it, and all that he says is, 'The prayers of the brotherhood are requested for the soul of one who has departed this life.'

No monk of this order can possess any property of any sort, nor give any at any time to the monastery.

They may never look on a stranger, but are bound to keep their eyes constantly on the ground.

Their diet is weak cider and herb soup, with a raw radish, carrot, or a few lentils: but never meat, fowls, fish, or eggs. On fast days their allowance is two ounces of the coarsest bread.

They work in the fields and lie upon straw.

These monks not only obey the superior, but must obey the slightest sign of a brother-monk instantly, no matter how employed, even if their work is ruined by the interruption.

The very slightest fault is most severely punished, and yet withal they seem cheerful and contented.

In fact, it is not self-denial but self-indulgence, ambition, and uncertainty which are the chief seeds of man's unhappiness.

Rule of the Trinitarians [Augustinians]. Their special function was the redemption of captives. They divided their income into three parts: one for their own maintenance; another for the poor; and the third part for the redemption of Christian captives.

 There are a multitude of sub-orders, but the instances given above will suffice to show the nature of their rules.

Rumford Medal (The), 1796. Instituted in the Royal Society of London by Count Rumford for discoveries in light and heat.

Rump (The). The fag-end of the Long Parliament after 'Pride's Purge' (q.v.), 6 Dec., 1648. It was dissolved by Cromwell, 20 April, 1653. The members of the Rump were only 100, and the usual attendance did not exceed 50. It refused to dissolve, and therefore on 20 April, 1653, Cromwell stationed 50 musketeers within call, and after sitting awhile as if listening to the debate, rose and said, 'Come, come, we have had enough of this. I will put an end to your prating.' The musketeers then entered, and the members rushed out. 'Take away this bauble,' he said, referring to the mace, and locking the door he walked away, and the Rump was dissolved.

In 1849, from 6 to 18 June, was the German Rump Parliament in Stuttgart. We want a Cromwell to stop some of 'the prating' in our present House of Commons (1890).

Rumpers. Members of the Rump Parliament (q.v.).

Rundale (In). In patches: sale of land in small separate patches. Sometimes, in Ireland, half an acre or an acre of land is held in thirty or forty little patches, too small to be enclosed, and thus subject to depredations from cattle. Sometimes the patches are so far asunder, it is no easy matter for a tenant to know what is his and what is another's. This is because he 'conacres' (q.v.) to two or more different farmers.

Running Footmen were footmen who ran in front of their master's coach, to help it out of ruts, and to serve as couriers. The costume was a light black cap, a jockey coat, white linen trousers, and a staff some six feet long. The staff had a ball at the top containing a hard-boiled egg and a little white wine, to serve as refreshment. The last in England was in the service of the Duke of Queensberry (1810), but in Saxony there were running footmen even so late as 1845.

Running Parliament (The). A Scotch parliament, so called from its constantly being shifted from place to place. See 'Parliaments.'

Rupert [Ruprecht] surnamed Klemm, i.e. pinched or straitened in circumstances, last but one of the promiscuous kaiser-kings of Germany (1352, 1400–1410). He married Elizabeth of Nürnberg, and was contemporary with Henry IV.

Rupert (Prince). Grandson of James I. of England. His mother Elizabeth, daughter of James I., married Friedrich V. the elector palatine. Charles I. was his uncle.

Rupert's Land (1670). All the lands that pour water into Hudson's Bay. So called from Prince Rupert, who, with certain specified associates, formed the original Hudson's Bay Company (q.v.).

Rural Dean (A). A person (generally a beneficed clergyman) appointed to supervise in a certain district, called a deanery, the condition of the churches, the church furniture, the glebe houses, the schools, the appliances of public worship, and all other things pertaining to the church services, and to report on all to the bishop as occasion seems fit.

Rural Labourers' League (The), 12 May, 1888. A society which superseded the Allotments Association of 1882; its object being to deal with every practical grievance of the rural population, such for example as footpaths, commons, local charities, allotments, rights of labour, and so on.

Rurik (The Dynasty of). The first Russian dynasty, 862–1598. They were not kings of Russia, but rulers of a part of Russia, over-lords of other princes, and held their courts at Novogorod, Kiev (1154–1240), Moscow (1154–1240), Vladimir (1240–1339), Moscow again (1339–1584). The seventh of the line, Vladimir I. the Great, introduced Christianity; the ninth, Jaroslav I., was a great legislator; Ivan (or John) III. the Great unified the kingdom (1462–1505), and assumed the title of czar. This is called 'The Great Dynasty'; it gave sixty-seven sovereigns, and continued 736 years.

Russell's Cairn. A spot on the farm of Auldton-burn, on the march between England and Scotland, where Sir Francis Russell, eldest son of the Earl of Bedford, was mortally wounded in 1584 by a party of Scotch raiders led by Sir Thomas Kerr, of Ferniherst.

Russia, four dynasties.

1. The dynasty of Rurik (862–1598) gives 67 sovereigns.

2. The dynasty of Godunoff (1598–1613) gives 5 sovereigns.

3. The dynasty of Romanoff (1613–1762) gives 11 sovereigns.

4. The dynasty of Holstein-Gottorp (1762– *)

Russia. The Scythians, we are told, called the Scandinavians Russes, i.e. warriors. This may be, but it is quite certain that the Norwegian Rus means a new or fresh-man; Rus-land the new-man's land; Russia is the freshman's land. The notion that 'Russia' is derived from 'Rurik' is absurd.

Russia (The Seven Crowns of). Three in Europe: Russia proper, Poland, and Finland. Four in Asia: Caucasus, Trans-Caspian, Central Asia, and Siberia. Population about 105 millions.

Russia Company (The). Formed in the reign of Edward VI., and chartered by Mary, in 1555, under the name of the 'Company of Merchant Adventurers of England for the Discovery of Lands, Territories, Islands, &c. unknown or unfrequented.' Their privileges were to have 'a governor, four consuls, and twenty-four assistants; to make laws, inflict penalties, send out ships to make discoveries, take possession of them in the king's name, set up the royal banner of England, and enjoy the exclusive privilege of trading to Archangel and other parts of Russia, not yet frequented by the English.' The company still exists for social gatherings, but not for commercial purposes.

Russian Afghan Treaty, 1881. A treaty between Alexander II. of Russia and the Ameer of Afghanistan, in which the Russian Government engaged to be the perpetual friend of the government of Afghanistan, and to assist it against any enemy which the Ameer might be unable to subdue. The Ameer, on the other hand, engaged not to make war on any foreign power without first obtaining the consent of Russia; and to report to Russia whatever goes on in Afghanistan. The secret object of the treaty was to win the Ameer from the British alliance, and make Afghanistan a standpoint to threaten our Indian empire, if at any time England and Russia should be at war.

Russian Byron (The). Alexander Sergeivitch Pushkin (1799–1837).

Russian Church Catechisms (The). The larger one was the Greek Church catechism prepared in 1642 by Peter Mogilas. The shorter one was the catechism prepared by the order of Peter the Great.

Russian History (Father of). Nestor, a monk of Kiev. His 'chronicle' is from 862–1116. Nestor died in the 12th cent.

Russian Influenza. 20 Jan., 1837, was called Black Sunday, because 1,000 persons died in London of influenza, and numerous churches were closed from want of a congregation. Of the London police force 800 men were incapacitated for duty.

1832 and 1833 were influenza years. The next prevalence occurred in Jan. 1890. It was called 'The Russian Influenza,' and in France, where it was very fatal, it was called La Grippe.

Russian Laws. The code was compiled in 1497, by order of Ivan III. the Great. It was revised and completed in 1550 by Ivan IV. (the Terrible). Called Súdebnik.

The New Code was compiled in 1649 by order of Alexis. It was called the Sobornoe Ulajenie.

The corpus juris (Svod Zakonov) was published 1826–1833.

Ivan III. the Great was the first to assume the title of 'czar.'

Russian Messali'na (The). Catharine, wife of Peter III. of Russia. Her paramour when Peter was alive was Gregory Orloff, officer of the guards.

Russian Murat (The). Michel Miloradowitch (1770–1820).

Russian Rebels. See 'Decembrists,' 'Nihilists,' 'Propagandists,' 'Terrorists.'

Russias (All the).

Baltic Russia, that part which borders on the Baltic Sea.

Black Russia, the western part of Lithuania, which forms the governments of Minsk and Grodno. Called black from the black caps and vestments which the inhabitants used to wear.

Great Russia, the north and middle portions of Russia in Europe; formerly called Moscovia when Moscow was its capital.

Little Russia, the south-west region, the Ukraine.

New Russia, the southern region, comprehending the governments of Kerson, Jekaterinoslav, Tauris, Bessarabia, the territory of the Cossacks of the Don, that of the Black Sea, and all the parts recently added.

Red Russia, the part occupied by the Ruthenians (or Russniaks) and Poles of the Austrian frontier. It is said that they wore a red cap, like the Turkish fez.

White Russia, that part of Lithuania detached from Poland in 1772, forming the governments of Smolensk, Moholev, and Vitebsk. It is said that they wore white caps and dresses; the Austrian soldiers wear white.

Rus is Norwegian for new; Russers=the new men; and Rusland=the new man's land.

Russo-German War (The), 1812–1815, against Napoleon Bonaparte. It began with the Russian campaign of Napoleon, and ended with the battle of Waterloo.

Rustic War (The), 1525. Waged by the Elector of Saxony and the German princes against Munzer and the Anabaptists. The battle of Frankenhausen put an end to the Anabaptist rebellion. Munzer, being taken prisoner, was ignominiously put to death.

Rye House Plot (The), 1683. After the failure of the Mealtub plot, James duke of York was taken into the king's councils, and directed the affairs of government without a parliament. The nation grew alarmed, and a plot was set on foot for the assassination of the king on his way home from Newmarket. As the house in which the king lodged accidentally caught fire, he left Newmarket sooner than was expected, whereby his life was preserved; but the conspirators were hunted up, and amongst others Lord William Russell and Algernon Sidney were executed.

Called the Rye House Plot, because the conspirators met at a farm belonging to Rumbold, a maltster, called the Rye House, on the river Lea, near Hoddesdon, in Hertfordshire, to concert their plans. Whether Lord William Russell was guilty has been much disputed.

Ryswick (Peace of), 20 Sept., 1697. Signed by England, France, Spain, and Holland; 30 Oct., 1697, by the Emperor of Germany. To establish the peace of Europe disturbed by Louis XIV. The treaty consisted of four parts: (1) Between France and England; (2) between France and Holland; (3) between France and Spain; (4) between France and Germany. By the 1st, Louis XIV. engaged to abandon the cause of James II., and to acknowledge William III. as lawful king of England. By the 3rd, Louis restored to Spain Garonne, Roser, Barcelona, Luxembourg, Charleroi, Mons, Courtrai, and all the fortresses he had taken in Namur, Brabant, Hainault, and Flanders.

This important treaty closed the conspiracy between Louis XIV. and the Stuarts, begun at Dover; the object of which was to make England a dependency of France and to restore Catholicism.

Sabathai Sevi (1625–1676). A false Messiah who went to Jerusalem in 1665, and, joining an ally named Nathan, gave out himself to be the Messiah and Nathan his Precursor. He collected a large following, but was arrested by Kiuperli (minister of Mohammed IV.), and, being brought before the sultan, confessed his imposition, consented to embrace Islamism, and became a public laughing-stock.

Sabbatarian Controversy (The), 1630. A controversy in the early part of Charles I.'s reign respecting the observance of the Sunday and its being called the 'Sabbath' or the 'Lord's Day.' The 'Book of Sports' (q.v.), published in the last reign, and appointed by Charles I. to be read in churches, gave great offence. Prynne printed his 'Histriomastix' in ridicule of Sunday sports, and spared neither king nor queen from his merciless castigation. For this he lost his ears, was fined, imprisoned, and struck off the Rolls.

Sabbatarians. Those Christians who observe the seventh day (our Saturday) as the true Sabbath. They are chiefly Baptists, and are sometimes called the 'Seventh-day Baptists.'

There are also Seventh-day Adventists both in America and in Europe.

Sabbata'ti, 12th cent. The Waldenses. Prat'eŏlus says 'quod qui inter eos perfectiores erant, signum quoddam in superiore parte sui sotularis, quod sabbatem appellabant, deferre solebant.' Ebrardus Bethuniensis says: 'Sotulares cruciant, cum membra potius debeant cruciare; calceamenta coronant, caput autem non coronant.' They were also called 'Insabbatati' (q.v.).

It is quite certain that the word is not connected with Sabbath, though it may be with Sabot.

Sabbath, or Day of Rest.
1st day, Sunday—Christians.
2nd day, Monday—Greeks.

3rd day, Tuesday—Persians.
4th day, Wednesday—Assyrians.
5th day, Thursday—Egyptians; Jesids (q.v.).
6th day, Friday—Turks.
7th day, Saturday—Jews.

Sabbat'ical Year (The). Every seventh year, when the Jews abstained from husbandry.

Sab'batum in Albis. The Saturday following Easter Sunday. So called because on that day those baptized on Holy Saturday (i.e. Saturday preceding Easter Sunday) laid aside the white robes or stoles assumed on their baptismal day.

Sab'batum in Traditio'ne Sym'boli. The Saturday preceding Palm Sunday. So called in the Ambrosian ritual, because on that day the Mediolani gave the creed (or symbol) to the catechumens, who appeared in white stoles on Palm Sunday.

Sabbatum Magnum, in the Catholic Church, means the Sabbath which occurs in the Paschal Week. The day when Christ lay in the grave, between Good Friday and Easter Sunday. Of course the day was the Saturday following Good Friday.

Sabbatum Vacat. The fifth Sunday in Lent. 'Diem Dominicum ita dictum, qui Pascha præcedit; quia proprio officio caret. Propterea quod papa, ipso die, occuparetur eleemosyna eroganda' (Du Cange). See 'Sunday.'

Sabbatum XII. Lectionum. 'Ita appellatum Sabbatum Quatuor Temporum, auctor est Amalarius' (bk. ii. ch. 1).

Sabeism. Worship of the sun, moon, and stars. So-called from the Sabeans, a people of Arabia Felix.

Sabel'lianism, about A.D. 252. The heresy of Sabellius of Libya, who maintained that there is but one person of the Godhead. According to Sabellius, Father, Son, and Holy Ghost are not three distinct persons, but only three functions or manifestations of the one God. Before the incarnation there was only the One God; this One God descended into the Virgin and became the Son, and on the Day of Pentecost this son diffused himself on the apostles, and that is the Holy Ghost. So that Father, Son, and Holy Ghost are only three names of the one hypostasis. The Sabellians also believed in the eternity of matter. Condemned by the Council of Alexandria in 261.

According to Sabellius the Son or Word and the Holy Ghost or Comforter are functions or operations of God, as light and heat are emanations of the sun.

 The Orthodox are those who accept the creed of the dominant state church. Heretics are those who choose for themselves their own religious tenets, or form their own opinions of religious truths. (Greek, mid. voice of αἱρέω, to select for one's self.)

Sabian'ism. The religious system of the Sabians. They prayed thrice a day, and the temple of the moon at Haran was the term of their pilgrimage. Their traditions of the creation, deluge, and patriarchs were very similar to the Bible stories; they appealed to the secret books of Adam, Seth, and Enoch; and had a slight infusion of Christianity. It was not, however, as Sale says, 'the primitive religion of the Arabs,' but a graft of Chaldeanism. They are now called Mandæans, or St. John's Christians. The sect still exists (1890).

Sa'bians (The). A people and sect of Turkey. The same as the 'Nabathëans.'

Sabin'ians. In Latin, Sabiniani. A law school which derived its name from Massurius Sabinus, a jurist in the time of Tiberius. He was opposed to the Proculëans (q.v.). The Sabinians were orthodox equity lawyers, attached to the court and aristocracy. The Proculeans were radicals.

Saccharissa. Dorothy Sydney is so called by Waller, who made love to her in vain.

In the meantime Sydney paced to and fro with him [Hugo Warnclife] in the avenue which was called 'Saccharissa s Walk,' in memory of Sydney's beautiful sister Dorothy, immortalised by Waller under that name.—EDNA LYALL, In the Golden Days, ch. x.

Sache'verel (Dr.), 1709–1710. He preached two sermons on passive obedience and non-resistance: one 15 Aug., 1709, at the Derby assizes, before the judge and sheriff, and the other 5 Nov., 1709, before the lord mayor and corporation in St. Paul's Cathedral, on the text 'Perils from false brethren.' The gist of these sermons was against toleration in religion. He was tried in Westminster Hall in Feb. 1710, and condemned. But his sentence was suspension for two years, and the sermons to be burnt by the common hangman.

There was a large mob of Sachēverelites (5 syl.), who went about London pulling down the chapels of Dissenters and burning the hymn-books, Bibles, and furniture. The whole of this disgraceful riot was as much political as anything, the object being to oust the Whigs and bring the Tories into power.

Sacrament of the Mass, or 'Elevation of the Host.' That part of the mass in which the officiating priest holds up the consecrated bread and shows it to the people (A.D. 1373).

Sacramenta'rian Confession (The). The confession of faith presented by the Sacramentarians (q.v.) in the Diet of Augsburg (1530).

Sacramentarians, or 'Sacramentaries,' 1524. Certain reformers who separated from Luther on the doctrine of the eucharist. Luther believed in consubstantiation, but the Sacramentarians rejected the doctrine of a corporal presence, and admitted only a spiritual presence of Christ with the truly devout. Zwingli was a Sacramentarian; so were Carlostadt, Œcolampadius, Muncer, Storck, and Martin Bucer.

M. Félice, in his 'History of the Protestants of France,' tells us that Lutherans were so called. 'Many Lutherans, or Sacramentarians as they were then called, were cast into prison' (iv. p. 34); but whether he means all Lutherans or some is not evident. Certainly Luther's 'impanation' means something added to the bread, or incorporated with it, or the word is senseless.

Sacramen'tary, or 'Sacramentarian.' One who rejects the doctrine of the real presence as taught in the Roman Catholic and Lutheran churches [that is, transubstantiation and consubstantiation].

The only thing which he [the Duke of Norfolk] thought his enemies might bring against him was for 'being quick against such as had been accused for sacramentaries' [1546].—HOWITT, Hist. of Eng., vol. ii. p. 298.

 The book used by Catholics in celebrating mass is called a 'Sacramentary.'

Sacred Art (The). Ars Sacra. Chemistry, which in Alexandria was limited to the priests.

Sacred Band (The). A Theban band of 300 hoplites of the best families, enrolled under Epaminondas. The special duty of this ἱερὸς λόχος was to defend the Cadmea. In 1821, 500 Greek students enrolled themselves into a 'Sacred Band' to resist the Turks. They fought most bravely, but, overpowered by numbers, they were all slain at Dragoschan.

The motto of their standards was 'Death or Freedom,' or 'This, or Upon this' (ἢ τόδε, ἢ ἐπὶ τοῦδε), the motto inscribed in the shields of the ancient Spartans.

Sacred College (The), A.D. 311. The Roman Church agreed to appoint seventy of their clergy into a sacred college. The number was in imitation of the Jewish Sanhedrim and the seventy disciples appointed by Christ. It was composed of six bishops, fifty priests, and fourteen deacons, to be called 'cardinals,' out of which one was to be elected chairman or head of the hierarchy. The assemblies of the college were called conclaves, and each of the members now wears a red hat.

The full number is not strictly kept up. Thus, in 1841, there were but 61 (88 instead of 50 being cardinal priests, and 11 instead of 14 being cardinal deacons).

Sacred Geese. Geese kept by the ancient Romans in the temple of Juno on the Capitoline Hill. These geese are especially noted in Roman story, because when a party of Gauls climbed stealthily up the steep rock, unobserved by the sentinels, and even without disturbing the watch-dogs, the geese gave the alarm by their cackling, and Manlius, being aroused, reached the rampart just in time to push over the foremost Gaul and thus saved the capitol.

Sacred Heart (The). There are two fêtes so called in the Catholic Church: (1) 'Le Sacré Cœur de Jésus,' instituted in 1698, from the revelations of Marie Alacoque, and celebrated the third Sunday after Pentecost, but in 1822 transferred to the second Sunday in July. And (2) the Sacré Cœur de Marie, instituted in 1661, and celebrated 8 February.

We are told as an historic truth that Jesus allowed this visionary to repose on his bosom, and one day said to her: 'Mary, my sacred heart is full of love to man, but to thee especially, to whom I enjoin the privilege of making known the treasures of sanctification and salvation, which alone can redeem from hell.' Then taking his heart, he put it into hers. She saw it distinctly, and says it was like a burning coal. Every Friday this was repeated, till she consented to establish the festival of the Sacred Heart (11). See 'Life and Works of Margaret Mary Alacoque'; BRETON, 'Instruction sur le Sacré Cœur de Jésus,' and 'Les Petits Bollandistes,' vol. xii. p. 421.

Sacred Island (The). Ireland was so called long before the introduction of Christianity into the island. Probably it was the seat of Spanish-Phœnician missions. Festus Avienus says that two days will bring you

. . . . in sacram sic insulam
Dixere prisci . . . .
Eamque late gens Hibernorum colit.

Plutarch refers to the Magi of Ireland, and Diodorus Siculus to its sun-worship.

Sacred Month (The), 1838, of the Chartists. In which the Chartists swore to abstain from all work and all drink, 'in order to secure the charter of their political salvation.' See 'Six Articles, &c.' In some places the 'Sacred Month' began in July, in others in August.

From the despatch of the Sacred Ship (q.v.) to its return was a Sacred Month in Attica.

Sacred Mount (The), or Mons Sacer, a hill about two miles from Rome, commanding the junction of the Tiber and Anio. Called the Sacred Hill because it was here that the Roman army encamped with the intention of forming themselves into a free and independent community when they found that Appius and the senate refused to fulfil the promises twice made to them when enemies were at the gates. Ultimately a compromise was effected, and two popular officers were granted to the revolters. The terms of this treaty were called the Sacred Laws, or Leges Sacratæ.

Sacred Shields (The). Of the Salian priests, in the reign of Numa. These twelve shields, we are told, fell down from heaven, and became the palladium of Rome.

Sacred Ship (The). The ship in which Theseus (2 syl.) sailed to Crete to deliver Attica from the tyranny of Minos. It was preserved ever afterwards, and sent by the Athenians every year to the island of Delos with offerings. From the dispatch of the ship to its return no criminals were put to death.

It so happened that Socratês was condemned to death the night before the sacred ship weighed anchor, and consequently his death was deferred for thirty days, till the ship returned.

Sacred Spring (A). Ver Sacrum, a dedication of all the produce of the spring to the gods. Even the children born during a sacred spring were devoted, and had to leave the city of their birth. It was a Sabine custom; but when Hannibal invaded Italy, Quintus Fabius Maximus advised the Roman senate to decree a 'Sacred Spring.'

Sacred Standard (The). The 'standard of green silk,' unfolded by Mussulmans in times of imminent danger, and said to have been borne by the prophet himself. When Selim I., in 1517, conquered Egypt, this standard went to the Osmanlis, and has ever since been regarded as a palladium. In 1595 it was displayed in the war of Hungary. Mohammed III. confided it to the custody of 300 emirs. At present the sacred standard is enveloped in four coverings of green taffeta, and inclosed in a case of green cloth. In the same case is a small Koran written by the hand of the Calif Omar, and the keys of the Caaba (q.v.).

The pole of the standard is twelve feet high, and is surmounted with a closed hand. In times of peace it is preserved in the 'Hall of the Noble Vestments,' which also contains the prophet's tunic, the sacred teeth, beard, stirrup, sabre, and bow of the prophet.

Sacred War (The). There were two sacred wars in Grecian history—the first from 595 to 586, and the second from 356 to 346, each therefore of ten years' duration. The first of these broke out in Phocis soon after the establishment of Solon's laws in Athens. The Crisseans levied grievous taxes on those who went to consult the oracle of Delphi, and even seized the sacred treasures of that temple. Solon induced the Amphictyonic league to avenge the sacrilege, so the lands of the Crisseans were laid waste. In the ninth year of the war the city of Crissa was taken, and the spoil consecrated to Apollo. As many of the Crisseans had taken refuge in Cirrha, that city was attacked and shared the fate of Crissa; the whole territory of both Crissa and Cirrha was consecrated to Apollo, and was henceforth uncultivated.

The cause of the second sacred war was that the Phocians cultivated a part of the Cirrhæan territory which had been dedicated to Apollo. The offenders were cited before the Amphictyons, and fined, but they refused to pay the fine. War broke out. Thebes, Locris, Thessaly, and several other states joined the Amphictyons; but Athens and Sparta joined the Phocians. At length Philip king of Macedonia joined the Amphictyons, and compelled Phocis to surrender at discretion, B.C. 352.

It was on the interference of Philip of Macedon in this war that Demosthênês spoke his first Philippic and Olynthiac orations.

Sacrifica'ti (The). Those lapsed Christians who, to avoid persecution, consented to offer sacrifice to heathen gods. They were very numerous.

Sacrificial Mass, or Sacrifice of the Mass. 'Missa Perfecta,' τελεία θυσία. The 'Missa Imperfecta' was that in which the body and blood of Christ were not administered. The 'Missa Perfecta' contained the perfect sacrifice. See 'Mass.'

Sacy's Bible. 'Bible de Sacy.' The Port Royal translation of the Bible, so called from Isaac Lemaistre (Sacy), director of the Port Royal monastery. He was imprisoned for three years in the Bastille for his Jansenist opinions, and during his captivity translated the Bible into French (1666–1670). See 'Bible.'

Sacy (now written Sacy) is an anagram of Isaac. See 'Prison Literature.'

Sadducees, B.C. 250. A sect of the ancient Jews who took their name from 'Zadoc,' one of the followers of Antigŏnus Sochæus, president of the Sanhedrim. They rejected tradition, believed only in the pentateuch, disbelieved in a future state, in angels, and spirits. They were very rich and very influential.

Sadle'rian Professorship. Of pure mathematics, in the University of Cambridge, founded in 1710 by Lady Sadler. In 1886 an alteration was made, and the stipend increased to 850*l*. See 'Mathematics (Professorship of).'

Saffron Hue (The). The royal colour of the ancient Irish kings; thus Murkertach is described by the Four Masters (q.v.) as 'a warrior of the saffron hue.'

Henry VIII. forbade by statute any Irishman 'to wear or use any shirt, smocke, kerchor, bendol, neckerchour, mocket, or linnan cap, coloured or died with saffron.' The two chieftains, Lord Roche and the White Knight, having by their incessant quarrels wasted each other's lands, were both seized by order of Henry VIII., and in prison slept amicably in one bed. After a time they were released apparelled as Englishmen, and no longer wearing 'their saffron shirts and kernogho's coats.'

Saffron Veil. The Greek and Roman brides wore a flammeum or yellow veil which wholly enveloped them (Pliny, Natural History,' xxi. 22). When the bride was taken home, it was the husband's part to take off her veil (Lucan, ii. 361).

We call a sweetheart 'a flame.' The coincidence is worth noting, if of no other value.

Sagas, 11th to 16th cent. Poetical compositions by the Scalds or Scandinavian bards. The subjects are mythological and historic traditions of Norway, Sweden, Denmark, and Iceland.

Sage of Syracuse (The). Archimēdēs.

So Tully paused, amid the wrecks of time,
On the rude stone to trace the truth sublime:
When at his feet, in honoured dust disclosed,
The immortal sage of Syracuse reposed.
ROGERS, Pleasures of Memory, pt. 1.

Sahidic Version (The) of the Scriptures, also called 'the Thebaidic,' in the dialect of Upper Egypt, and supposed to be of the 2nd cent. See 'Scriptures.'

Sailor King (The). William IV. of the British Empire (1765, 1830–1837). He entered the navy 15 June, 1779; was captain of royal navy 10 April, 1786; created rear-admiral 1790, vice-admiral 1798, admiral 1799, lord high-admiral 1827.

The great seal of William IV. represents him on horseback with ships in the background; and seated in a chair of state with Neptune and sea-nymphs, Minerva and sailors. Minerva holds a spear and Neptune the trident.

St. Andrew (Order of). Instituted by Hungus king of the Picts. It took its name, because after the battle with Athelstane of England, Hungus and his soldiers went barefooted to St. Andrews, and there vowed that they and their posterity would ever afterwards use his cross as their ensign in every warlike enterprise (Peter Heylyn, 'Cosmography,' p. 340).

St. Augustine's Oak. At Aust in Gloucestershire, where the conference was held in 601 under an oak on the banks of the Severn, to secure the co-operation of the British in the missionary work of St. Augustine, and to effect a complete uniformity of religious usages in the island. The British bishops utterly refused to accept Augustine as their archbishop, or to accept his platform.

His platform was this: (1) To keep Easter on the first Sunday after the 14th of Nisan; (2) to baptise by 'trine immersion;' and (3) to join Augustine in missionary work.

St. Bartholomew's Day, 24 Aug., 1572. A day never to be forgotten, on which at midnight began in Paris the diabolical massacre of the Huguenots. Those employed in this slaughter wore a scarf on their left arm, and a white cross on their hat. For three days and three nights the butchery went on, and as many as 6,000 were massacred in Paris alone. The whole number murdered in France has been estimated at 50,000, some say 80,000. The day after St. Bartholomew's Day the king went in state to Notre Dame to assist at a Te Deum, or service of praise to God, and all the bells of the city rang out their joy peals, but the massacre was still going on and still were heard the shrieks of the dying and the roar of burning houses.

The massacre was planned by Catherine de' Medici, the queen-mother, in the reign of her son Charles IX. It seems past belief, but is nevertheless true, that Pope Gregory XIII. went in solemn state to the church of St. Louis to offer thanksgiving to Almighty God for this butchery; and yet dared to talk of the persecutions of the Roman emperors.

St. Brice's Day, 13 Nov., 1002, noted for the massacre of the Danes in England, at the instigation of Ethelred the Unready.

'St. Cecilia, the beautiful mother of beautiful daughters,' mentioned by Macaulay, was Mrs. Sheridan and her three daughters—the Duchess of Somerset, Lady Dufferin, and the Hon. Mrs. Norton.

St. Germain-en-Laye (The Treaty of), 8 Aug., 1570. Gave liberty of worship in all places under the French crown; it gave furthermore two towns in each province for the celebration of the Protestant service; an amnesty for the past, equal right of admission to all public offices, permission to reside in any part of France, and four hostage towns—viz. La Rochelle, La Charité, Cognac, and Montauban.

St. Guy's Dance, 1374. Same as St. John's Dance (q.v.).

St. Guy's dance is another name for St. Vitus's dance (q.v.).

St. John's Dance, 1374. So the Dancing Mania was originally called. When it appeared at Strasburg in 1418 it was called St. Vitus's Dance. Whether St. John's or St. Vitus's Dance, the saint was the one applied to by the afflicted, who made small offerings on the altar of the favourite saint.

Not St. John the Evangelist but St. John the Baptist, to whose day was transferred several heathen customs. The dancing mania broke out on St. John the Baptist's Day (June 24).

St. Louis. Louis IX. of France (1215, 1226–1270).

St. Margaret's, the church of the House of Commons, is noted in history as being the place where the Commons swore to the Solemn League and Covenant in Sept. 1642. Mr. Nye read the Covenant from the pulpit; all present, consisting of members of both houses, the Assembly of Divines, and Scottish Commissioners, signified their assent to it by holding up their hands. The members afterwards signed the parchment-roll, and then Dr. Gouge implored a blessing upon the act.

St. Mark, Venice.

The glory, nay perhaps the very existence, of St. Mark must pass away for ever. These cities (mentioned in the text) still owed fealty to St. Mark.—History of Venice, vol. i. p. 331; vol. ii. p. 379 (Murray).

St. Mary Overie, Southwark, now St. Saviour's. It was founded by Mary Overie, a nun, on the site of her father's house. John Overie (it is said) was a ferryman, who used to ferry passengers from Southwark to the city and back again.

Shakespeare's brother (Edmond), Fletcher and Massinger (the dramatists) were buried in the churchyard; and there are monuments to Gower the poet, Andrews bishop of Winchester, Lockyer (the quack doctor in the reign of Charles II.), and other historic characters.

St. Nicolas Shambles, London. A flesh-market, east of Greyfriars. So called from the church of St. Nicolas. The Butchers' Hall was close by. The lane of the shambles and hall used to be called Stinking Lane, but is now named King Edward Street.

St. Patrick's Purgatory. The place of penance on an island, now called Station Island, in Lough Derg, Ireland. It was a kind of cave dug up in the reign of Charles I.

St. Petersburg (Treaties of).

I. 30 Oct., 1715, between Peter I. and the King of Prussia, respecting the war in Pomerania.

II. 10 Aug., 1726, between the Czarina Catherine and the King of Prussia.

III. 16 Dec., 1740, a defensive alliance between the regent Anne of Russia and Frederick II. of Prussia.

IV. 4 Feb., 1744, a treaty of alliance between Russia and Poland.

V. 22 May (2 June), 1746, a defensive alliance between Great Britain and Russia.

VI. 9 March, 1759, a treaty between Russia and Sweden to protect the navigation of the Baltic.

VII. 5 May, 1762, a treaty of peace between Czar Peter III. and Frederick II. of Prussia.

VIII. 11 April, 1764, an alliance between the Czarina Catherine and Frederick II. of Prussia.

IX. 20 June, 1766, a treaty of commerce between Great Britain and Russia.

X. 5 Aug., 1772, for the partition of Poland between Austria, Prussia, and Russia.

XI. 1 Aug., 1773, an alliance between Russia and Denmark.

XII. 1 Aug., 1780, an alliance between Russia and Sweden for the protection of commerce.

XIII. 11 Jan., 1787, a treaty of commerce with France.

XIV. 12 July, 1792, a defensive alliance between Russia and the King of Hungary and Bohemia.

XX. 18 Dec., 1800, an alliance between Russia and Prussia.

XXI. 18 March, 1801, a treaty of commerce between Russia and Sweden.

XXII. 8 April, 1805, a treaty for a third coalition against Napoleon, between Great Britain and Russia.

XXIII. 24 March, 1812, an alliance between Sweden and Russia against Napoleon.

XXIV. 1 Aug., 1812, a treaty of peace and union between Great Britain and Russia

St. Salvator's College. Better 'San Salvätor.' See p. 27, 'Andrews, University of St.'

Saint-Simo'nianism, 1814. A non-communistic socialism, in which industry is to be regulated in obedience to a self-constituted authority; production is first to be accumulated to excess, and then distributed in the ratio of merit; all transmission of property is to be abolished; marriage is to be abolished, all grades of rank, all family ties, and each individual is to belong to the one universal family of man. With all this communism there is to be a head called the 'Supreme Father,' whose authority is to be wholly absolute. See 'Supreme Father.'

A scheme which does not contemplate an equal but an unequal division of the produce. It does not propose that all should occupy alike, but differently, according to the vocation or capacity of each individual; the function and salary of each being assigned by the directing authority.—MILL, Political Economy, 258.

St. Simo'nians (The), 1825. The school of the Industrialists (q.v.) founded by St. Simon, for the amelioration of the working classes, perverted after his death into a communistic society, advocating the aristocracy of toil, the perfect equality of man, community of property, and the abolition of inheritance and marriage. Abolished by law in 1833.

'The aristocracy of toil and perfect equality,' indeed! This is mere clap-trap of the silliest kind. Where is the 'aristocracy' of digging a few potatoes, cobbling old boots, or crying 'Dust, oh!'? Stuff! And where is the equality of the infant and its father, the idiot of an asylum and Shakespeare or Newton? It is a mere perversion of language, and most misleading. The very stars differ in glory.

St. Stephen's. The British Houses of Parliament: thus we say, 'The parliaments called by Edward I. were identical with those which still sit in St. Stephen's.' St. Stephen's Chapel was built 1150 by King Stephen, rebuilt by Edward II. and III. and finally destroyed by fire in 1834. It was fitted up for the use of the House of Commons in the reign of Edward IV. In order to enter 'the palace of Westminster,' we pass through St. Stephen's porch into St. Stephen's Hall, and north and south of this hall corridors lead to the House of Peers and House of Commons; hence it is, that, by a figure of speech, the House of Commons is called 'St. Stephen's,' and even the House of Lords is sometimes so called, but not often, as a separate house. The two together are not unfrequently called St. Stephen's.

St. Stephen's originally formed part of the palace of Edward the Confessor

St. Stephen's Crown. The Hungarian crown. St. Stephen (979, 997–1038) received a royal crown from Pope Sylvester II., and the title of apostolic king, which the emperors of Austria bear to the present day.

If Hungarian independence should be secured through the help of Prince Napoleon, the prince himself should accept the crown of St. Stephen.—KOSSUTH, Memoirs of my Exile, 1880.

St. Vitus's Dance. Chorea, a disease marked by an involuntary and irregular contraction of the muscles of the face and limbs; a kind of jerking movement, and in some cases a mere fidgetiness. In Germany the 'dancing mania' was called 'St. Witt's Dance,' in Italy called 'Tarantism' (q.v.).

St. Witt's Dance, 1374. So the dance of the dancing mania was called in Germany. See also 'St. Guy's Dance.'

Sainte Ampoule (La). The cruse containing the sacred oil with which the French kings were anointed at Reims.

Henri IV. and Louis XVIII. were not anointed at Reims. Nor, of course, were Napoleon I. and III.

Saints. Henry Garnet (Father Garnet), the English Jesuit (1555–1606), born at Nottingham, and educated at Winchester, is reckoned among the 'martyrs.' He confessed his implication in the Gunpowder Plot, and was executed for high treason.

Martyrdom and high treason should certainly never be made synonymous terms; yet the name of Henry Garnet is duly enrolled in the hagiography of the Bollandists, under 3 May.

At best the word 'Saint' applied to any man is most objectionable; and Irish agitators have reduced the word 'Martyr' to utter ridicule. If traitors and rebels are 'saints and martyrs,' the title dishonours the head that wears it.

Saka Era (The) of Hindûstan begins from the death of Salivâhana, A.D. 76. The Sakas or Scythians gained a footing in Hindûstan in 76, and gradually extended their empire. They were the ancestors of the numerous tribes of Rajputs from Oude to Marwar.

Sal'adin Tax (The), 1200. A tax imposed on Christendom by Pope Innocent III. for the prosecution of the fourth crusade.

Saladin himself died in 1194.

Sal'adine Tithe (The), 1187. A general tax of the tenth of all movable estate, imposed by the kings of France and England upon all their subjects, whether ecclesiastic or lay, towards the expense of their intended crusade (the third). This tax was sanctioned by the pope and prelates as well as by the kings and barons.

This is the first eminent instance of a general tax. Church property as a rule paid no tax, as it would have been deemed sacrilegious to take church property for civil purposes.

Salic Law (The). The code of the Salian Franks, introduced into France (Gaul) by the Franks. It contained 400 articles, chiefly concerning debt, theft, murder, and battery, the penalty in every case being a fine. The most famous article of the code is Title lxii. 6, according to which only males could succeed to the Salic land or lod, i.e. to the lands given for military service. In 1316, at the death of Louis le Hutin, the law was extended to the crown, and continued to be observed to the end of the monarchy.

Salii (The). Twelve priests of Mars chosen from high patrician families and appointed to guard the twelve sacred ancilia which were kept in the Temple of Mars on the Palatine hill. The great festival of Mars began on 1 March and continued several days. They were called Salii, from salio (to dance), from their dancing in procession. Their dance was called the 'Salic Dance,' and their hymns or chants the 'Salic Songs.'

Varro says a saltando.

Salisbury, or Sarum Missal (The), or 'Salisbury Hours,' A.D. 1078. A liturgy drawn up by Oswald or Osmund bishop of Salisbury in usum Sarum. It was in Latin and based on those of Rome. This Missal was used throughout the whole kingdom.

'Sarum' is the better word, as 'Salisbury' is 'New Sarum.' Our Common Prayer-Book is almost a translation of this Missal, and the Litany is almost word for word the same.

Sallust of France (The). L'Abbé de St. Real (1639–1692), author of 'Spanish Conspiracies against the Republic of Venice,' from which Otway borrowed his 'Don Carlos' and his 'Venice Preserved.'

Salt. At the accession of James I. the people of Grâce Dieu (within the liberties of Waterford) closed their gates against Mountjoy, the English lord-lieutenant of Ireland; but Mountjoy warned the people if they compelled him to enter by force he would utterly destroy the town, and 'spread salt upon the ruins.' In allusion to an ancient custom of drawing a plough over the walls of a conquered city and strewing salt over the place. Thus when Abimelech took the city of Shechem he sowed the place with salt (Judges ix. 15). (See also Judges ii. 9; Psalms cvii. 34; Jer. xvii. 6.)

Salters' Hall Controversy (The), 1719. A Baptist controversy on the question whether toleration is or is not to be extended to Unitarians.

Salvation Army (The), 1873. A home missionary organization set on foot by William Booth, who was called the 'General' of the army. The plan of operation is for a company to march about cities, towns, and villages, singing popular sacred songs and speaking between whiles for about five minutes. The army has also a large number of religious periodicals and small books.

Mr. Booth was a minister of the Methodist New Connexion, which he left in 1861, and began 'revivalistic services' in a tent in Whitechapel. In 1865 his little band of followers called themselves 'The East London Christian Revival Society,' afterwards changed to 'The Christian Mission.' In 1869 the Mission made expeditions to provincial towns. Lastly, in 1873, the name was changed to 'The Salvation Army.'

Their literary organ, called 'The Christian Mission,' first appeared monthly in 1874. In 1879 it was called 'The Salvationist,' and in the same year its title was changed into 'The War-Cry.'

Salvationism, Ecclesiasticism. Ecclesiasticism is dogmatic religion, the doctrine that the church is the ark, out of which there is no salvation. Salvationism is the doctrine that the church is simply a name for all believing Christians, and that salvation is a gift wholly independent of an hierarchy or community of any kind called 'a church.' Ritualists are strong believers in ecclesiasticism; Dissenters and what are called 'Evangelicals' are salvationists.

Samaneans (The), or 'Samanæi,' were distinct from the Brahmins and Gymnosophists (the latter were probably Jains), yet equally austere and living in solitude. They were apparently Buddhist priests. All the worshippers of the Dalaï-Lama have been also called 'Samanēans.'

Not to be mistaken for the Chamaneans. See 'Chamanism.'

Sama'nides (3 syl.). A Persian dynasty while Persia was a province of the Califs. Founded by Ismail al Samāni. Lasted only 97 years (902–999). It succeeded the Sof'farides (3 syl.), and was overthrown by the Ghaz'nevides (3 syl.). It reigned only over Transoxiana, Khorasan, Balkh, and Seistan.

The Samanides reigned over Seistan, Korasan, Balkh, and Tabaristan. The Bowides in 932 obtained a part of Persia. Gibbon (ch. lvii.) says the dynasty lasted 125 years (874-999).

Samaritan Pentateuch (The), 2nd cent. A translation of the Hebrew Pentateuch into the Samaritan dialect. It bears a strong resemblance to the Targum of Onkelos. See 'Scriptures.'

It must not be confounded with the 'Pentateuch of the Samaritans,' which is a copy of the Hebrew Pentateuch in Samaritan characters. The Samaritan Pentateuch is a translation.

Samaritan War (The), A.D. 529. A war carried on by Justinian against the Samaritans, who had risen in arms to retaliate their wrongs. In this war 20,000 Samaritans were slain and as many more were sold as slaves to the Arabs and Persians. Gibbon (xlvii.) says 100,000 Roman subjects were extirpated in this war, by which the fruitful province of Samaria was converted into a wilderness. 'But,' he adds, 'in the creed of Justinian, the guilt of murder could not be applied to the slaughter of unbelievers.'

Samaritans (The). Not Israelites, but Assyrian and Medish colonists sent thither by Shalmanezer, when he had carried the native population to Nineveh. They received 'the books of the law.' The division into Israelites and Judæans had ceased long before the Incarnation.

Sa'mian Sage (The). Pythagŏras of Samos (B.C. 481–411). One of the most astounding geniuses ever born.

Samnite Wars (The). A series of wars between the Romans and the Sam'nites (2 syl.), which lasted, with few interruptions, for fifty-three years. The three great wars were: (1) 343–341; (2) 326–304; (3) 298–290.

Samos'atans. Followers of Paul of Samŏsăta, bishop of Antioch, who denied the doctrine of the Trinity and the divinity of Jesus the Christ. He was excommunicated by the Synod of Antioch in 270. His followers are also called Paulianists, or Paulinists.

Samp'sicera'nus, Alabar'ches, the Jerusalemite. So Cicero designates the haughty Pompey, the great eastern conqueror (B.C. 106–48).

Sampsicerănus was king of Emesa in Syria. Alabarches is an oriental name for a tax-gatherer. Jerusalemite refers to his taking Jerusalem, B.C. 63, when he entered the Holy of Holies out of curiosity and found nothing.

Samson (The Greek). Her'aklês, called by the Romans Her'culês.

Samson (The Italian). Milo of Crotōna, the athlete.

Samson (The Turkish). Ozdemir or the Iron Ogli (16th cent.) So called by Cantemir.

Sancho (The Crowned). Louis XVI. was so called by Camille Desmoulins, 'because he was always thinking of his stomach, and at Varennes lost the time in which he might have escaped by staying to eat pig's pettitoes.' So it is said.

Sanchoni'atho. In nine vols. A literary forgery by Wagenfeld of Hanover, published at Bremen in 1837. It was said that the MS. of this work had been discovered in the convent of St. Maria de Merinhão by a Colonel Pereira in the Portuguese army; but it was ascertained that there was no such convent nor any such colonel, and that the paper of the MS. bore the water-mark of Osnabrück paper-mills. See 'Literary Forgeries.'

There was a 'history' said to be by Sanchoniatho published by Herennius Philon Byblius, a translation from the original Phœnician work, fragments of which are preserved in Eusebius; but considerable doubt exists as to the authenticity of this work also.

Sancy Diamond (The). Picked up on the field of battle near Granson. It belonged to Charles le Téméraire of Burgundy, who was routed there and fled. Sixteen years after the battle it was sold at Lucerne for 1,250*l*. It fell into the hands of the house of Braganza; was subsequently purchased by Nicholas de Sancy [Sahn-se], and under the name of the Sancy diamond was set in the crown of France. During the Revolution it was sold, but Napoleon I. rebought it. In 1825 it was sold to Prince Paul Demidoff for 80,000*l*. The prince sold it in 1830 to M. Levrat, administrator of the Mining Society, but, Levrat being unable to pay the money, it was returned in 1832 to the prince. We next hear of it in Bombay. In 1867 it was transmitted to England by the firm of Forbes & Co. In 1873 it formed part of the crown necklace worn by Mary of Sachsen-Altenburg on her marriage with Albert of Prussia. In 1876 it was worn as a pendant by the Maharajah of Puttiala; but in 1877 it belonged to the Czar of Russia.

Sandal-wood Gates (The), or Sandal Gates' of the temple of the great idol Somnat in Somnauth, in Guzerat. This temple was built in the 5th cent., and in 1024 the city of Somnauth was stormed, the idol was broken by the Sultan Mahmud, and the Sandal Gates were sent to Ghuznee. In 1842 the gates were carried off by the British. Lord Ellenborough, governor-general of India, wanted to restore them to Somnauth, but the British Government would not allow it to be done for fear of provoking religious strife between Mahrattas and Moslems. So they were taken to Agra, where they still are (1890).

The stone idol, Somnat, an avatar of Siva or Mahadeo, was fifteen feet in height, six of which were sunk in the ground. When Mahmud took the town of Somnauth and entered the temple he knocked off the nose of the idol with his mace, and ordered two pieces of the idol to be sent to Ghuznee, where they still are. His next stroke was against the belly of the idol, and the opening revealed an enormous quantity of diamonds, rubies, and pearls. Som-nat=Somalord. Soma was the sacred drink of the gods.

 The old belief or prophecy was that when the gates should leave Ghuznee the Sikh rule would cease. This proved true.

Sandema'nians, 1728, or Glassists, from Mr. John Glass, the founder, expelled from the Church of Scotland for maintaining that national churches are 'kingdoms of this world,' and therefore unlawful. The word Sandemanian is from Robert Sandëman, who published a series of letters on the subject in 1755.

San-kou-e, or 'San-Kou,' (221–817). Three states of China, collectively so called. The source of Chinese romance, and the fount from which they draw their historical plays. In 265 the three states (after being divided for forty-five years) were united under one ruler, who lived at Honan, and the Salic law was introduced; in 416 the Honan state merged again into the Chinese empire.

The 'Three states' were (1) the sixth imperial dynasty; (2) the kingdom of Oey or Wei; and (3) the kingdom of Ou or Woo.

Sanquhar Declaration (The), 1680. A deed renouncing the authority of Charles II., drawn up by Richard Cameron, Cargill, Douglas, and others. So called from Sanquhar, a town in Dumfries.

Sanquhar, pronounce Sang-ker.

Sans-culottes (Les). A name of contempt given to the democrats in the French Revolution; as much as to say, they were only the tag-rags or ragamuffins of society. Subsequently, like the Gueux (q.v.), they gloried in the name, and even affected negligence of dress, going about in a blouse, red cap, and wooden shoes. The red nightcap adorned with a tricoloured cockade was called the 'bonnet-rouge.' Blouse = blooze.

The Sans-culottes had a host of songs and a dance (called the Carmagnole) of their own. Pronounce Lay Sahn' ku-lot'.

Sans-culotte Cabinet (The), 1792. Consisting of Duranthon (minister of justice), De Grave (minister of war), Clavières, a deaf man (minister of finance), Lacoste (minister of marine), Roland (minister of the interior), and Dumouriez (minister of foreign affairs). None of these men, except Dumouriez, was distinguished, and the court called them the Sans-culotte Cabinet from their total insignificance. Pronounce Sahn' ku-lot'.

When Roland presented himself at court, the master of the ceremonies refused to admit him till Roland explained that he was minister of the interior. The astonished master observed to Dumouries, who entered next, 'Ah, sir, no buckles in his shoes!' To which Dumouries in affected amasement replied, 'Bon Dieu! then all is lost!'

Sans-culottides, 1793. The five supernumerary days of the Revolutionary Calendar. Romme divided the year into 12 equal months of 30 days, beginning 22 Sept., 1792. This gives only 360 days. The 5 days over were festival days—1 to Genius, 2 to Labour, 3 to Actions, 4 to Rewards, 5 to Opinion. In leap year a sixth Sans-culottide was added and called the Festival of the Revolution. The Convention Calendar ceased 1 Jan., 1806. The months, beginning with September, were called—(Autumn) Vendémiaire, Brumaire, Frimaire (wine-ary, fog-ary, frost-ary); (Winter) Nivôse, Pluviôse, Ventôse (snow-ous, rain-ous, wind-ous); (Spring) Germinal, Floréal, Prairial (bud-all, bloom-all, mead-all); (Summer) Messidor, Thermidor, Fructidor (reap-time, heat-time, fruit-time).

No one, however, was allowed to hold any opinion on politics, theology, sociology, or indeed any other subject of public interest not in accordance with the Convention. Such is liberty!

The ancient Irish calendar contained only 360 days, the other five or six were days in which they celebrated their Taltine games, i.e. to the sun and moon.

Sans Peur et sans Reproche. Chevalier Bayard is called the knight sans peur et sans reproche (1476–1524).

Pronounce Sahn Puh'r a sahn R'prosh'.

Santa Casa (The). The reputed house of Joseph and Mary in Nazareth where Jesus was brought up. It was transported first in 1291 by angels to Fiume, in Dalmatia, but in 1294 angels removed it to Loreto at midnight 10 Dec. In eight months' time it shifted its place from the laurel grove, which was infested by brigands, to the hill, and in four months more (1295) it again shifted its place from the hill to a heap of stones near the high road leading to Recanati, near the sea-coast, where it is still. See p. 149, 'Casa, &c.'

Pronounce Sahn'-tah Kah'-sah.

Santa Fedis, 1799. Members of the Secret Association of the Holy Faith, organised by Cardinal Ruffo to exterminate all Jansenists, Molinists, Economists, Illuminists, Freemasons, and Carbona'ri. A deadly hatred existed between those societies and the Fedists [Fa-dists]; and the Fedists, in 1816, committed most frightful slaughter, especially on the Carbona'ri and their families.

Santa Hermandad (The), or 'Holy Brotherhood.' An association which executed summary justice on all offenders without distinction of rank. It was established in Spain by Ferdinand the Catholic (1481–1516).

Santo Ben'ito. The robe worn by those who were punished by the inquisitors. It was a straight yellow coat without sleeves, with sundry devices. If it contained only a St. Andrew's cross, the wearer paid a fine and was discharged. If it was decorated with flames made of red serge, but without a cross, the wearer was discharged, but warned if ever he relapsed that he would be delivered to the flames. If besides the 'flames' it was decorated with devils, the wearer was condemned to die.

Santons. A mendicant tribe of Moslems which profess poverty and the complete sacrifice of all temporal interests to devote themselves to spiritual matters. Yet they have not unfrequently filled the chief offices of the state. When acting simply as 'prophets' they live in retired grottoes, like hermits, or in tents. The Osmanli consider Abdal, called 'Santone Kalenderi,' contemporary with Mahomet, as the founder. He never pronounced the name of God, but sounded it on his pipe. See p. 136, 'Calenders.'

Sappho (The English). Mrs. Mary D. Robinson (1758–1800).

Sappho (The French). Mdlle. Scudéri (1607–1701).

Sappho (The Scotch). Catherine Cockburn (1679–1749).

Sappho of Toulouse. Clémence Isaure (2 syl.), who instituted in 1490 Les Jeux Floraux. She is the authoress of a beautiful 'Ode to Spring' (1463–1513).

Sarabaïtes. Monks who live two or three together in one cell.

Hermits or Eremites live alone, Cenobites (3 syl.) live socially in common, in a monastery, or convent, &c. All are Ascetics.

Sarace'nic Empire (The Golden Age of the). That of Haroun al Raschid, i.e. Haroun the Just (786–809).

Sardanapa'lus of China (The). Cheou-sin, the last of the Chăng dynasty (B.C. 1154–1122). Like Sardanapalus, he burnt himself and his queen to death in his palace to escape falling into the hands of Woo-wong. Chopsticks were first used in this reign.

Sardanapa'lus of Germany (The). Wenceslas VI. (or IV.) king of Bohemia and kaiser of Germany (1359, 1378–1419).

Sardin'ians for Sale. 'Sardi venăles' (Livy, xl. 19), rubbish for sale. The Sardinians rose against Rome in the Second Punic War, and again B.C. 181. Tiberius Gracchus checked the insurrection, and so numerous were the prisoners that the market was glutted, and slaves were an unsaleable drug.

Sargon was originally only a high priest for the year B.C. 721, but was afterwards king of Assyria. His name was Sarru-gina, and he was father of Sennacherib or Sin-akhi-erba, who began to reign B.C. 707.

Sarma'tia. Russia in Europe. Russia in Asia was called Scythia.

Sarum Missal (The), or 'Use of Sarum,' compiled by Osmund, 1085. Printed at Paris 1487, and at Rouen 1492. Only one perfect copy is known to exist, and that is in the British Museum.

Mr. Blades gives a description of the Sarum Missal printed at Paris in 1487 ('Athenæum,' 21 March, 1874). There is an imperfect copy of the edition of 1492 in the Bodleian Library.

Sassan'ian Dynasty (The), or the 'Sas'sanides' (3 syl.). A Persian dynasty which succeeded the Arsacides (3 syl.), and was itself succeeded by the Samanides (3 syl.). So named from Sassan, father of Ardeshir [Babegan], called by the Greeks Artaxerxes, the first of the line. It lasted 426 years, and terminated with Yezdijird or Yezdedjerd III. (226–653). Title: Shah-an-Shah (king of kings). Capital: Madan.

This was the most glorious of the Persian dynasties. Artaxerxes or Ardeshir the founder, Shapur I. and II., Baharam I. and V., Khosroo (Chosroes), Noorshirwan, were kings equal to any that history records.

Satire (Father of). Archilŏchos of Paros (B.C. 7th cent.).

Satire (Father of French). Mathurin Regnier (1573–1613).

Satire (Father of Roman). Lucilius (B.C. 148–103).

Satisfaction. In the Scotch Church is about equal to penance in the Roman Catholic Church, any disgrace suffered, or bodily distress inflicted, or sum of money paid, to obtain absolution of sin. Thus in Scotland the 'Stool of Repentance' was called a satisfaction; sackcloth and ashes, money paid ad pios usus, and so on, were satisfactions or atonements for misdeeds.

Saturday Review (The). A London weekly journal, commenced 3 Nov., 1855.

Savage (Richard) claimed to be the son of the wife of Lord Brandon [afterwards Earl of Macclesfield] and Richard Savage earl of Rivers. His mother disowned him, had him baptized 'Richard Smith,' and then committed to the charge of a Mrs. Portlock, a baker's wife (1698–1743).

Savil'ian Professorship of Geometry in Oxford University. Open to all nations. Stipend 675*l.* a year. Founded by Sir Henry Savile (Warden of Merton) in 1619. Remodelled in 1857.

Saviour of the Nation (The). So Cromwell was called after the second battle of Newbury, 27 Oct., 1644, where his valour and military genius were most distinguished.

Saviour of the People (The), or 'King of the Poor.' William Fitz-

Osbert, surnamed Longbeard, executed with great barbarity in 1199.

Savoy Conference (The), 1661, between the Episcopalian and Presbyterian divines of England respecting the Liturgy. There were twelve bishops and twelve Presbyterian ministers, with nine assistants on each side. It was held in the Savoy, London, the residence of the Bishop of London. Richard Baxter was chief of the Nonconformists and Dr. Gunning his chief opponent. The Presbyterians objected to (1) the use of the surplice; (2) the cross in baptism; (3) to calling the baptized regenerate; (4) to the posture of kneeling at the Lord's Supper; (5) to the administration of the eucharist to the sick; (6) to the absolution; (7) to the words sure and certain hope in the burial service; and (8) to subscription to the 'Book of Common Prayer' and the 'Thirty-nine Articles.' The conference ended in nothing.

Saxo Grammaticus, died 1204. He was a Danish chronicler, and wrote in Latin a 'history of the Danish kings and heroes,' beginning from the foundation of the Danish monarchy, B.C. 1038. It is based on the Scaldic lays, Icelandic sagas, and local traditions. Much of it, historically, is about equal in value to Geoffrey of Monmouth's 'British History.'

Saxon Line of Kings. The first dynasty of Germany, 919–1024. It gave five kings—Heinrich I. (Henry the Fowler); Otto I., the Great; Otto II., the Red King; Otto III., the Wisdom of the World; and St. Heinrich II., the Lame. The Saxon dynasty was succeeded by the House of Franconia. In 1133–1137 reigned Lothair II., also of the House of Saxony.

Saxon Mirror (The), or 'Sachsen Spiegel,' between 1215 and 1218. The local laws of Saxony compiled into a digest. In the 15th cent. it had the same authority in Germany as the common law has in our own country. See 'Suabian Mirror.'

Saxony, in Scotch history, means the Lowlands, between the Forth and the Tweed. Hence we read of 'the Picts making raids upon Saxony,' the Picts being the Highlanders south of the Forth.

Saxony (House of). See 'Saxon Line,' &c.

Scalds. Scandinavian poets who wrote about gods, kings, and heroes. Each prince had his scald, who followed him to war to celebrate his deeds of fight. These chants were collected into the Edda and the Sagas.

Scan'dina'via. A name given by the ancients to Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Lapland, Finland, &c., supposed to constitute an island (Plin. iv. 13).

So called from the ancient province of Scandia in the south of Sweden.

Scandinavian Alps (The). The Dofrine mountains, a chain running between Norway and Sweden. The Sneehættan (Snow-cap) is the highest.

Scan'dina'vian Semir'amis (The). Margaret, daughter of Valdemar III., king of Denmark (1353, 1388–1412).

Scarlet and Blue. The colours of the Scotch covenant.

Scarlet Days. Christmas Day, Easter Day, Ascension Day, Whit Sunday, Trinity Sunday, All Saints' Day, the first Sunday in November (the day for the commemoration of benefactors), Commencement Tuesday (the Tuesday next preceding 24 June), and any other days for which the Vice-Chancellor gives notice, are so called in the University of Cambridge, because on those days all doctors wear their scarlet robes.

On all Litany days the doctors and noblemen wear their robes, and the proctors their congregation ruffs.

Scarpine (A). An iron shoe, an instrument of torture, heated red-hot. Also a boot made of wood, torture being inflicted by driving wedges between the leg of the victim and the walls of the boot.

French escarpin, Ital. scarpa.

I was put to the scarpines.
KINGSLEY, Westward Ho! chap. vii.

Sceptics, i.e. men of thought, searchers or examiners into the truth or falsehood of a statement. The Berœans, who searched the Scriptures to see if what was said by Christians was genuine and worthy of credit, were true 'sceptics.' The disciples of Pyrrho are called Pyrrhonists or Sceptics. The most famous sceptics of antiquity were Protagŏras, Gorgias, Pyrrho, Timon, Enesidēmos, Sextus Empiricus, and, of the New Academy, Arcesilas and Carnĕādēs. The most famous sceptics of modern times are Montaigne, Lamothe-Levayer, Bayle, Sanchez, Huet, Berkeley, Hume, Kant, Schulze, &c.

Sceptre depart from Judah (The). 'The sceptre shall not depart from Judah, nor a lawgiver from between her feet, until Shiloh [the Messiah] come.'

The Asmonæan dynasty terminated with Aristobūlus II., whose daughter Mariam'nē was married to Herod the Great, an Idumæan; and in this reign Jesus was born.

Every Jewish ruler up to this time had been of the race of Isaac. And Judah in the prophecy means a Jew, not a particular tribe. Herod was the first Jewish ruler not a Jew.

Herod was an Edomite, and therefore of the race of Esau.

Schamir. A magic stone used by Satan, when compelled to assist in building the Temple. It cut the stones employed in the edifice as a diamond cuts glass; and in consequence 'no hammer, axe, or other instrument of iron' was required.

Schiltrons, hollow squares. The Scotch infantry was disposed in schiltrons at Falkirk, their spears pointed obliquely outwards against the charging cavalry.

Schism Bill (The), 10 June, 1714 (13 Anne, c. 7). Repealed 1718 (5 Geo. I. c. 4). Forbidding dissenters to educate their children. No person, unless he subscribed a declaration that he conformed to the Church of England, and obtained a licence from the archbishop or bishop of the diocese, was allowed to keep a school or become a private tutor. The penalty was three years' imprisonment; and even if licensed, if a teacher of youth neglected to teach the Church Catechism he forfeited his licence, and made himself subject to three years' imprisonment.

Schism of the East, A.D. 862. The separation of the Western Church from communion with the Greek Church. It was provoked by Photius, and consummated in 1053 by the patriarch Cerularius.

Photius patriarch of Constantinople anathematised Nicholas I. 'pope' of Rome, and Nicholas anathematised the patriarch, who advised his clergy to separate from communion with Rome. Photius was a man of extraordinary erudition. Cerularius positively refused all intercourse with the Western Church.

Schism of the Mohammedans (The), A.D. 632, after the death of Mahomet. The question was whether Ali, the son-in-law, or Abou-bekr, the father-in-law, ought to succeed the prophet. Those who thought Ali the proper successor were called Shiites (factions); those who thought Abou-bekr the true Imaum were called Sunnites (traditionists). The Turks, Arabs and Egyptians are Sunnites; the Persians are Shiites. The califs are Abou-bekr, 632–634; Omar, 634–644; Othman, 644–656; Ali, 656–661, &c. The Shiites reject the first three, and begin with Ali.

In India the Moslems are partly Sunnite and partly Shiah.

Schism of the Twelve Tribes (The), B.C. 962, when ten of the tribes revolted from Rehoboam, son of Solomon, and formed the new kingdom of Israel. The tribes of Judah and Benjamin, which remained under Rehoboam, then formed the kingdom of Judah. Each kingdom had its own kings.

Schism of the West (The Great), 1378–1449. A period of seventy-one years, during which time two popes, and sometimes more than two, were elected—one at Rome, and one at Avignon in France, or somewhere else. It began by the Italian cardinals electing Urban VI. in opposition to the French cardinals, who had elected Clement VII. The Roman clergy called the popes who were not of their own election 'anti-popes.'

This 'schism' is not the same as the 'captivity' of the popes, meaning the residence of the popes at Avignon instead of Rome. The 'captivity' began with Clement V., who in 1309 removed his court to Avignon, and ended in 1376 by Gregory XI. removing his court back to Rome. At the death of Gregory XI. the Italian cardinals chose Urban VI. and the French chose Clement VII., and for many years there were two simultaneous popes. See p. 81, 'Anti-Popes.'

Schism of the Western Church (The), 324–334, in the reign of Constantine. The rivalry showed itself in 341.

I. The two churches differed in respect to the doctrine of the Holy Ghost about 400, and in 589 the Latin Church introduced into the creed the phrase 'filioque' (q.v.).

II. In 484, Felix II. bishop of Rome and Acacius bishop of Constantinople excommunicated each other. In 648 Pope Theodore pronounced the patriarch

Paul II. to be deposed. In 867 Photius and Pope Nicholas I. excommunicated each other. In 1054 the legates of Leo IX. went to Constantinople to excommunicate Michael Cerularius, and then Cerularius excommunicated Leo IX.

III. In 588 the Patriarch of Constantinople assumed the title of 'Ecumenical (or universal) Patriarch'; and in 835 the Pope of Rome, by the False Decretals, claimed the right of universal jurisdiction.

Schleswig-Holstein Question (The), 1848. That is, did the two duchies belong to Denmark or Germany? They were at the time parts of the kingdom of Denmark. Holstein belonged to Denmark only as a fief, and, though the duke owed homage to Denmark, he was an independent ruler. In 1846 the King of Denmark, who was then Duke of Holstein, declared the two duchies to be united to the crown of Denmark; but Holstein objected, and appealed to the German Confederation, of which it was a member. In 1848 the king sent troops to put down a revolt in Holstein, and the German diet sent troops to defend the duchy. In 1852 the great powers of Europe signed in London a protocol guaranteeing to Denmark the possession of the duchies, but neither Holstein nor the German diet would consent to the protocol. The quarrel smouldered on till 1863, when Austria and Prussia sent troops into the duchies, and Denmark armed for war; Denmark, of course, was powerless against these two great powers, was forced to crave peace and to give up the duchies. Prussia now quarrelled with Austria, conquered her in war, and the duchies fell to Prussia.

Schleswig-Holstein War (The). I. 1848–52. On the accession of Frederick VII. to the throne of Denmark, the duchies of Schleswig and Holstein revolted, and declared their independence. Prussia entered Holstein, and Denmark defeated the Prussians and Holsteiners near Flensborg, 7 April, 1848. The war continued till the Treaty of London, 8 May, 1852, when Holstein was transferred to the Danes, and Schleswig was declared independent.

II. 1864–1866, Prussia and Austria demanded that Denmark should evacuate Schleswig and abolish the constitution; and Prince Frederick of Augustenburg was proclaimed Duke of Kiel, 30 Dec., 1863. Austria and Prussia both interfered, and hostilities continued till 1864, when, by the Treaty of Vienna, Lunenberg, Schleswig, and Holstein were ceded by Denmark to the two powers. Austria evacuated Holstein 12 July, 1866. After the Seven Weeks' War, 23 Aug., 1866, Schleswig-Holstein was added to the kingdom of Prussia.

No war was ever more fruitful of consequences than this petty Schleswig-Holstein war. Out of it arose the war between Austria and Prussia called the 'Seven Weeks' War,' and the Franco-Prussian war or 'Seven Months' War,' by which Austria was severed from Germany, and Prussia was made the head of the German states. In 1870 the King of Prussia was declared to be the 'German Emperor' also.

Schola Palati'na. The school established by Charlemagne in his own household. It accompanied the court wherever it went, and was attended by the king himself, his sons and daughters, and the high officers of the realm.

Transcribing MSS. was a fashionable occupation of the day, both in the schola palatina and in private families.

Scholars, in the universities of Cambridge and Oxford. Students elected for the most part by competitive examinations in their respective colleges. They enjoy certain emoluments from their college from the time of their election.

At Merton College, Oxford, the 'scholars' are called Postmasters.

At Magdalen College, Oxford, the 'scholars' are called Demies [de-mize].

Scholastic Theology, 'Scholastic Divinity,' or 'Scholastic Philosophy,' may be divided into four periods.

I. The Preparatory period, from the 9th to the 11th cent. This period included Gerbert of Aurillac (afterwards Pope Sylvester II.), Berengarius of Tours, and Lanfranc archbishop of Canterbury.

II. The First period of Scholasticism proper, 12th cent., opened by Roscelinus, who broached the dispute concerning Nominalism and Realism. This period included Peter Lombard (* –1164) and Alexander Hales (* –1245). In this period it was pithy and logical.

III. The Second and Golden Age of Scholasticism, in which Aristotelian metaphysics were applied to the elucidation of Christian doctrines. This period began with Albertus Magnus (1193–1280), who was contemporary with one of the greatest of the Schoolmen, Thomas Aquīnas (1224–1274). John Bonaventura died the same year as Aquīnas.

The great opponent of Thomas Aquīnas was Duns Scotus, a realist (1265–1308); the followers of Thomas Aquinas were called Thomists, and those of Duns Scotus were called Scotists. In this period the school was subtle and sophistical.

IV. The Third period dates from Durandus bishop of Meaux [Mo].

Called 'scholastic' because it was taught in the schools established by Charlemagne.

Scholefield Prize for knowledge of the Greek Testament and the Septuagint. Value about 15*l*. Founded in the University of Cambridge by the friends of the Rev. James Scholefield [Skole-field] regius professor of Greek, 1856. See 'Regius Professor of Greek.'

School Boards. The boards are due to the Elementary Education Act of 1870; the object of which act is to bestow elementary education upon every child in England and Wales. Where there does not exist a sufficient supply for the purpose, 'a school board shall be formed to supply the deficiency.' The boards are elected every three years, and the expenses of the education provided by these boards are defrayed partly by rates and partly by government grants.

The ratepayers appoint the board, but the directors are not paid.

Schoolmen. Those who taught in the schools established by Charlemagne. See 'Scholastic Divinity.'

Schwarz-gelber (Ein). In 1848 the Austrian Imperialists were called 'Black-yellows,' because the imperial cockades, sentry-boxes, and boundary posts were all black and yellow.

Sciences. The six sciences, according to Comte (1797–1857), are mathematics, astronomy, physics, chemistry, biology, and sociology; of these six, according to Comte, the last is the chief.

Sclavonic Version (The) of the Scriptures, by Cyril of Thessalonica and his brother Methodius, in the 9th cent. Translated for the Sclavonians of Moravia. It embraced the whole Bible. See 'Scriptures.'

Scorpion Stanley. So Daniel O'Connell designated Edward Geoffrey Smith Stanley, chief secretary for Ireland in 1830–1832, afterwards fourteenth earl of Derby. Very obnoxious to the Irish agitation from his great firmness in administering the law (1799–1864).

No matter who the chief secretary may be, if he resists lawlessness, rebellion, and crime, he is bespattered as a 'scorpion Stanley,' a 'malignant Forster,' or a 'bloody Balfour.' Such dishonour is the proof and the reward of even-handed justice.

Scot and Lot include at the present day all parochial assessments for the poor, the church, lighting, cleansing, washing, roads, &c. Scot and lot are Swedish terms, both signifying tax, and originally were applied to assessments made for liquidating necessary debts of the crown, levied, not by an equal rate, but according to the capacity of the contributor.

Scota. When the Scotch barons in 1320 answered the bull of Pope John XXII., they began by stating that the Scots were lineal descendants of Scota, daughter of Pharaoh king of Egypt, and were converted to Christianity by St. Andrew the apostle.

Scotch Guard. See p. 357, 'Gardes du corps.'

Scotch Marriage (A). A consent to live together, without any legal or church ceremony.

Consent makes marriage [in Scotland]. No form or ceremony, civil or religious, no notice before or publication after, no cohabitation, no writing, no witnesses even are essential to . . . this contract.—Lord Deas.

Scoti (The). Prehistoric invaders of Ireland, from whom the island was called Scotia. They conquered the five provincial kings and became their overlords. O'Connor ('History of the Irish People,' p. 30) says they were Scythi of the Scandinavian race. See 'Scota.'

Scotia. Applied exclusively to Ireland from the 4th to the 11th cent. The Scoti were a branch of the Teutons. North Britain was called Albany or Albania. It was not till the English, in the reign of Henry II., invaded Ireland that the island forces were called 'Irish.' See 'Scotland.'

Finibus occiduis describitur optima tellus,
Nomine et antiquis Scotia dicta libris.
Donatus.

Far westward lies an isle of ancient fame
By nature blest, and Scotia is her name.

Scotists. A theological school so called from [John] Duns Scotus ('doctor subtilissimus'—'most subtle doctor'). This school was opposed to the Thomists or disciples of Thomas Aquinas. The Scotists were Realists, the Thomists were Nominalists (q.v.). Duns was a Franciscan, and therefore the natural opponent of Aquinas, who was a Dominican.

Scotland (Kings of). See p. 135, 'Caledonia.'

In the 9th cent. Kenneth II. (MacAlpin) united in his own person the two crowns of the Picts and Scots, and was, therefore, in reality the first king of Scotland; but the Scotch annalists count sixty-six kings before Kenneth MacAlpin, and head the list with Fergus, B.C. 850. Omitting all the names up to Fergus II., the list runs thus:—

FERGUS II. ...	410-427
EUGENE I. ...	427-449
DONGARD ...	449-458
CONSTANTINE I.	458-469
CONGAL I. ...	469-501
GONRAN	501-535
EUGENE II. ...	535-568
CONGAL II. ...	568-573
KINATHAL ...	573-580
AIDAN	580-604
(Columba converts the Scots).
KENNETH I. ...	604-606
EUGENE III. ...	606-622
FERCHARD I. ...	622-632
DONALD II. ...	632-647
FERCHARD II. ...	647-668
MALDWIN ...	668-688
EUGENE IV. ...	688 692
EUGENE V. ...	692 699
AMBERCHELET	699-700
EUGENE VI. ...	700-702
(Amberchelet restored, 702-704).
EUGENE VII. ...	704-717

When he became JAMES I. of Great Britain (by royal proclamation).

Scotland. Till the 11th cent. North Britain was called Albany. The name Scotia from the 4th to the 11th cent. belonged exclusively to Ireland. A.D. 258 a colony of Irish-Scots settled in Argyllshire, and gave a line of Dalriadic kings. From the 11th cent. we read of Irish-Scots and Albanian-Scots. The Romans called the southern part of Scotland Caledonia, a name which disappears in the 4th cent.

Quod ut ante undecimum post Christi nativitatem seculum haudquaquam factum, in fine præcedentis capitis declaravimus: ita neminem, qui toto antecedentium annorum spatio scripserit produci posse arbitramur qui Scotiæ appellatione Albaniam unquam designaverit.—USHER, Eccles. Primord. cap. xvi.

Scotland a Fief of England. During the reign of Malcolm I. (successor of Constantine III.), Edmund king of England bestowed on him part of the Cumbrian kingdom [Cumberland and part of Westmoreland]. It was this grant which was the foundation of the claim of homage made by the English kings on the Scottish sovereigns.

Scots, i.e. Irish. A prehistoric colony of Scythians which settled in Ireland about B.C. 400. Subsequently a colony from Ireland went to Argyllshire and reigned there as a race of Scottish kings. The famous Milesians were Scots, and as the Scoti conquered the five provincial kings, and became overlords, Ireland was called Scotia. The Scoti of Caledonia (Scotland) spoke Earish (Ersh), i.e. Irish or Western.

Totam cum Scotus Iernen
Movit et infesto spumavit remige Tethys.
CLAUDIAN, In I. Cons. Stilich. Book I.
When Scots came thundering from the Irish shores,
The Atlantic trembled, struck with hostile oars.

Scottish Crown (The). 'It cam' wi' a lass, and will gang wi' a lass.' So said James V. a few days before his death when informed of the birth of a daughter, afterwards Mary queen of Scots. The Stuarts descended from Margery (daughter of Robert Bruce), who married Walter [the 6th] Steward or Seneschal of Scotland.

MALCOLM IV. was the father of WILLIAM the Lion (who succeeded him), and of David earl of Huntingdon. William the Lion had no issue.

David earl of Huntingdon was the father of Margaret, Isabella (who married Robert Bruce), and Ada.

First take Margaret; she was the mother of Devoirgoil, and JOHN BALIOL was the son of Devoirgoil (great-great-grandson of Malcolm IV.).

Now take Isabella (wife of Robert Bruce); their son was THE BRUCE (Robert I.).

The Bruce (ROBERT) was the father of Margery Bruce (who married Walter the Steward or Seneschal), and their son was DAVID II. (Steward or Stuart in French spelling).

Scottish Petitioners (The), Aug. 1775, who prayed the Virginia convention that they might be allowed to stand neutral in the war between America and Great Britain. The licence was first granted and then revoked, the Scots being largely enrolled in the royal militia.

Scottish Plato (The). Dugald Stewart (1753–1828).

Scottish Security Bill (The), 1704, for the separation of Scotland and England. Authorising the Scotch on the death of Anne to set up a monarch of their own choice, independent of the English choice of a sovereign. The Bill was brought in by Godolphin.

The English tories printed and circulated the Scottish Security Bill to show that the two countries were really separated in the most absolute manner.—HOWITT, History of England (Anne, 194).

Scotus (John), entitled Erigĕna [Erin-gena], an Irishman by birth. Died 875. North Britain was not called Scotland (q.v.) till the 11th cent.

Scourers. A set of dissolute young rips in London in the 18th cent., especially in the reign of Queen Anne, opposed to the Mohocks, but quite as infamous and lawless. They were organised to 'scour the streets of Mohocks,' but like other street bullies they considered it capital fun to break windows, upset sedan chairs, beat quiet citizens, rudely caress young women, and make older ones scream with terror. See 'Street Bullies.'

Who has not heard the Scourers' midnight fame?
Who has not trembled at the Mohocks' name?
Was there a watchman took his hourly rounds,
Safe from their blows and new-invented wounds?
GAY, Trivia, III.

 The nephew of Prince Eugene, who accompanied his uncle on an embassage to Queen Anne, was so savagely assaulted by these street bullies in 1712 that he died from the treatment he received.

Dennham bottled up his wrath till he was out of Newgate; but then, finding it no longer controllable, he joined a band of Scourers, and spent the evening in wrenching off knockers, assaulting defenceless shop signs, frightening the chapmen into fits, and hustling everything that was capable of being hustled (1684).—EDNA LYALL, In the Golden Days, xxxiv.

Scourge (The) used at the Crucifixion, we are told by Alexis Comnēnus, was preserved at Constantinople. See 'Crucifixion, Relics of the.'

Scourge of Christians (The). Noureddin-Mahmûd of Damascus (1116–1174).

Scourge of Europe (The). Napoleon Bonaparte (born 1768, foreign wars 1796–1815, died 1821).

Scourge of Germany (The). So the Swedes were called (1630–1635) for their extraordinary success in the Thirty Years' War.

Scourge of God (The). 'Flagellum Dei.' So a Gaulish hermit called Attila, and the king delighted in the appellation (died 453).

Gensēric king of the Vandals was called 'Virga Dei' (reigned 429–477).

Scourge of Princes (The). Pietro Aretino of Arezzo, a merciless satirist of kings and princes (1492–1557).

Thus Aretin of late got reputation
By scourging kings, as Lucian did of old
By scourging gods.
Lord BROOKE, Inquisition upon Fame

Scourge of Scotland (The). 'Scotorum Malleus.' Edward I. (1239, 1272–1307).

Also called the 'Scourge of Wales.'

Scourge of the Propagators of the Faith (The). The pastor, Charles Drelincourt, who, in his 'Abrégé des Controverses,' refuted the arguments brought forward by the Converters (q.v.) to turn Huguenots to the Catholic Communion (1595–1669).

Scriptores Decem. A collection of ten ancient chronicles of English history in one folio vol. 1652, edited by Roger Twysden and John Selden.

1. Simeon Dunelmensis (of Durham). 'Historia.'

2. Johannes Hagustaldensis (John of Hexham). 'Historia Continuata.'

3. Richardus Hagustaldensis. 'De Gestis Regis Stephani.'

4. Ailredus Rievallensis (Ailred of Rieval or Rievaulx). 'Historia,' being a genealogy of the kings.

5. Radulphus de Dicēto. 'Abbreviationes Chronicorum' and 'Ymagines Historiarum.'

6. Johannes Brompton. 'Chronicon.'

7. Gervasius Dorobornensis (Gervais of Dover). 'Chronica,' &c.: the burning and repairs of Dover Church; lives of the Archbishops of Canterbury; and contentions between the monks of Canterbury and Archbishop Baldwin.

8. Thomas Stubbs, a Dominican. 'Chronica Pontificum Ecc. Eboraci' (York).

9. Guilielmus Thorn Cantuariensis (of Canterbury). 'Chronica.'

10. Henricus Knighton Leicestrensis (of Leicester). 'Chronica.'

8, 9, 10 are chronicles of pontiffs or archbishops.

Scriptores Quinque, or 'Scriptores post Bedam,' 1 fol. vol., containing:—

1. Willielmus Malmesburiensis, 'De Gestis Regum Anglorum,' 'Historiæ

OF THE UNIVERSITY OF CALIFORN

Novellæ,' and 'De Gestis Pontificum Anglorum.'

2. Henricus Huntindoniensis. 'Historia.'

3. Roger Hovedeni (Hoveden). 'Annales.'

4. Ethelwerd. 'Chronica.'

5. Ingulphus Croylandensis. 'Historia.'

Scriptores Tres, or in full thus: 'Britannicarum Gentium Historiæ Antiquæ Scriptores tres.' Then follow the names:—

1. Richardus Coriensis (of Cirencester). 'De Situ Britanniæ.'

2. Gildas Badonicus (of Bath).

3. Nennius Banchoriensis (of Bangor).

Dr. Bertram professed to have discovered these MSS. between the years 1747 and 1757; but J. E. Mayor, in his preface to 'Richardi de Cirencestria Speculum Historiale,' has laid bare this literary forgery. See 'Literary Forgeries.'

Scriptu'ra. A tax on cattle. So called because the collectors 'set down in writing' a description of the number and kind of cattle on which the tax was levied.

Scriptu'ra Thesau'ri Regis. The 'Record of the King's Treasury.' So Doomsday Book was anciently called, because it was kept, together with the king's seal, under three locks and keys in the royal treasury.

Scripture Interpolations. Critics say a 'reading is to be rejected as genuine when there is plain evidence that it has undergone a designed alteration,' such as the following:—

1. From doctrinal reasons: Matt. i. 18; Mark viii. 31, xiii. 32, xvi. 14 to the end; and 1 John v. 7, 8.

2. From moral and practical reasons: as Matt. v. 22.

3. From historical and geographical doubts: Matt. viii. 28; compare Mark v. 1.

4. From a desire of reconciling texts inconsistent with each other: as Mark viii. 31.

5. From a desire to make a discourse more intensive.

6. From the manifest amalgamation of different MSS. or parallel passages.

See Ernesti, 'Principles of Interpretation,' vol. ii. p. 114; Horne's 'Introduction'; Davidson, Michaelis, &c.

Scriptures. To the article 'Bible,' p. 90, add the following:—

The Discharge Bible.
" Ears to ear Bible.
" Rebekah's Camels Bible.
" Rosin 'Bible.
" Standing fishes Bible.
" To-remain Bible.
" Unrighteous Bible.

1 Maccabees, in 16 chapters.
2 " " 15 "

 These and several others are canonical in the Abyssinian Church. Book of Enoch translated by Dr. Kenealy, see p. 296.

2. The following are not even accepted in the Apocrypha. They are called Pseudepigraphœ:—

The 3 and 4 of Maccabees (in the Septuagint Bible).
The Genealogy of Job and his Wife's speech (at the end of the Greek text of the Book of Job).
OLI. Psalm (at the end of the Greek psalms).
A discourse of King Solomon (at the end of the 'Book of Wisdom').
The preface to the Book of Lamentations (in the Vulgate).

3. The following, referred to in the Old Testament, form no part of our Canon:—

The Book of the Acts of Solomon (1 Kings xi. 41).
" of the Acts of Uriah (2 Chron. xxvi. 22).
" of the Chronicles of David (1 Chron. xxvii. 24).
" of the Chronicles of the Kings of Israel (often).
" of the Chronicles of the Kings of Judah (often).
" of the Covenant (Jos. x. 13; 2 Sam. i. 18).

3. The following are sometimes referred to, but are no longer extant:—

The Assumption of Abraham.
" of Moses.
" of the Twelve Patriarchs.
" Book of King Og.
" Creation of Adam.
" Discourses of Jacob and Joseph.
" Generation of the Sons, &c., of Adam.
" Gospel of Eve.

Part II. The New Testament.

The Book of Acts (ascribed to Peter).
The Gospel of Andrew, Apelles, Barnabas, Cerinthus, James the Elder, Judas Iscariot, Lucianus, Lucius, Matthew (the false gospel of), Matthias, Marcion, Nicodemus, Peter (Eusebius vi. 12), Philip, Tatian (The Diatessaron), Thaddeus, Thomas, Valentinus, &c.
The Gospel of Perfection.
" of the Ebionites (4 syl.).
" of the Infancy of Christ.
" of the Nativity of Mary.
" of the Twelve Apostles.
" according to the Egyptians.
" to the Hebrews.
" " to the Syrians.
" The Everlasting Gospel (13th cent.).
The Four Gospels of the Manichæans.
The Hebrew Gospel or Logia of Matthew, referred to by Papias.
The History of Joseph the Carpenter.
The Preaching and Revelation of Peter.
The Protevangelium of James.
Paul and Thekla.

 Irenæus (d. 17) speaks of the multitude of spurious books in the 2nd cent. In the 4th cent. there were at least eighty spurious gospels.

Mahomet apparently derived his knowledge of Jesus from 'the Gospel of the Infancy,' 'the Book of the Nativity of Mary,' and the 'Protevangelium of St. James.'

Part III. Books accepted by the Gnostics, which form no part of our canon.

Book of Adam, Enoch, Moseh, Elijah, Isaiah.
Book of Armagil, Barbelon, Balsamum, Lonsiboras, Matthias, and Glaucias.
Hymns of Marcos.
Prophecies of Barcobas, Barcoph, Cain, Ham, Parchor, &c.
Psalms of Valentinus, Bardesanês.

 Basilides chiefly relied on some prophecies which bore the names of Ham, Parchor, Barcobas, and Barcoph, with an esoteric tradition which he professed to derive from St. Matthias and from Glaucias.—ROBERTSON, History of the Church, vol. i. p. 72.

Part IV. The following, though admitted into our canon, are (on the authority of Eusebius, iii. 2) disputable.

Second and Third Epistles of John.
Second Epistle of Peter.
The Epistle of James.
The Epistle to the Hebrews.

 The Book of the Revelation was long disputed. Jerome, Amphilochius and Sulpitius Severus tell us that in their time many churches did not accept it; and certainly it is not in the catalogue of the Council of Laodicea, or in that of Cyril of Jerusalem; nor in the Codex Vaticanus (q.v.). In more modern times Luther and Lücke deny its authenticity. (This is not the place to enter on the pros and cons of the subject, but simply to state a fact.)

Part V. Parts of our Canonical Scriptures are not to be found in some of the best MSS. It would take up too much space to jot down omitted words and short clauses, and the entire New Testament would be too wide a field. Confining ourselves to the four gospels (except in two cases), it may be remarked:—

I. The Apocalypse is omitted in the Codex Vaticānus, &c.

II. 1 John v. 51, 52 ('the three witnesses') are admitted by all scholars to be interpolated.

III. The Ascension, as described by Mark xii., the last twelve verses, is admitted in the Revised Version to be at least doubtful; and, what is more remarkable still, vv. 51, 52 of the last chapter of Luke are also omitted in many of the best MSS.

IV. In John ix. 35 our version makes Jesus say to the man cured of his blindness, 'Dost thou believe on the Son of God?' but many MSS. read, 'Dost thou believe on the Son of Man?'

The following are omitted in many MSS.:—

Matthew: vi. 15, the last clause of the 'Lord's Prayer'; xvi. 2, 3; xvii. 21; xviii. 11; xix. 9, the latter half.

Mark: x. 44, 46; xi. 26; xv. 28.

Luke: xvii. 36; xxii. 19, 'This is my body,' &c.; xxii. 43, 44; xxiii. 34, 'Father forgive them, for they know not what they do'; xxiv. 6, 12, 51, 52.

John: iii. 13, last clause; iv. 9, last clause; vii. 53; viii. 2-11 (inserted in brackets in the Revised Edition); ix. 36, for 'God' many read man.

Every iota of information on the subject is valuable and important, and the utmost candour should be encouraged. The Bereans were highly commended for searching to see how far the teaching of the Apostles accorded with the written word. Truth fears neither microscope, telescope, probe, nor scalpel.

ANGLO-SAXON version. It is supposed that the Psalter was rendered into Saxon, in 709, by Aldhelm bishop of Sherborne. The Venerable Bede translated the whole Bible into Anglo-Saxon (died 735), and about 200 years later King Alfred translated the Psalter. In 995 it is supposed that Ealfric archbishop of Canterbury translated the Pentateuch, Joshua, Esther, and a part of Kings.

Scrutin d'Arrondissement. Voting by districts.

Scrutin de Liste. Voting in mass.

Scullabogue Barn (Massacre at), 1798, in the Great Irish Rebellion. This massacre by the rebels and that at Wexford Bridge were the most infamous of all the outrages in this fearful rebellion.

Scurvy. At one time very common in England and Holland. It is described by Hippocrătēs as a 'tumour of the spleen produced by drinking cold water.' Pliny calls it stomacace and prescribes the herb 'cochlearia' (herba Britannica) as a remedy. It broke out in the army of Germanicus encamped on the Rhine, and is mentioned by Tacitus. It was accompanied with the loss of the teeth and paralysis in the knees. In Thorstein's expedition to Greenland, in 1002, it carried off Thorstein himself and his twenty-five companions. It caused great ravages in the army of St. Louis. Its first appearance in Germany was in 1481, when it was called Schorbuck (i.e. inflammation or tearing of the bowels). Freind says it was first introduced into Europe in the 15th cent. by the Portuguese, and that it came from the East Indies. In the year 1498 it committed frightful ravages in the crew of Vasco da Gama, when he lost fifty-five of his men; in 1535 it broke out in the crew of Cartier in his voyage to Canada; and in Lord Anson's memorable voyage (account published in 1746) whole crews were prostrated by this scourge.

Poupart the surgeon in 1699 says the plague of Athens described by Thucydides was the scurvy: so also was that described by Lucretius, book xvi.

Scutage, or 'shield money,' a money payment in lieu of knight's service in the field. It consisted of one, two, or three marks (13*s.* 4*d.*) for each knight's fee (i.e. land to the value of 20*l.*, or as much more as the king chose to grant). THE GREAT SCUTAGE, 1159, was a reform passed in the reign of Henry II. soon after the death of Thomas Becket. It greatly diminished the military power of the nobles, and gave the king instead a military force of mercenary soldiers entirely under his control.

As there were 60,000 knights' fees in England, scutage would amount to 180,000*l.*=at least 5½ millions according to the present value of money.

Scythia. Russia in Asia. Russia in Europe was called by the Romans 'Sarmatia.'

Sea of Darkness (The). The Black Sea.

Silesia and Little Poland, thirty days' journey, according to the Greek computation, from the Sea of Darkness.—GIBBON, lv.

Sea-dogs, 1577. Seamen of the southern coast who accepted letters of marque from the Prince of Condé and the French Protestants. These bold freebooters took no heed of the complaints of the French court, nor of Elizabeth's efforts at repression, for the connivance of every man along the coast, even of the crown port-officers, insured them immunity. Francis Drake was a sea-dog, and thought it a glory to sell negroes to the planters, to kill Spaniards, and to sack their gold-ships. Philip of Spain demanded that the freebooter should be given up, but instead of so doing Elizabeth knighted him.

Seagreen Incorruptible (The). Robespierre is so called by Carlyle in his 'French Revolution.'

Not even the Seagreen Incorruptible but shall have some pity.—Vol. iii. book iii. 1.

There is in the Incorruptible Seagreen himself . . . . a heartfelt knowledge of this latter fact.—Vol. iii. book iii. 2.

Seal of Confession (The). 'Sigillum Confessiōnis,' the obligation of a confessor not to divulge to any human being what is told him in the confessional. The custom can be traced to the 5th cent.; but it was made binding by Innocent III. in the 12th cent.

The confessional is the concealed seat on which the priest sits to hear confession in the Catholic church.

Seal of the Three Lions (The). The Anglo-Norman official seal.

A few years afterwards the archdeacon [Becket] was raised to the office of chancellor of England, or keeper of the seal of the three lions, the symbol of Anglo-Norman power.—Cassell's Hist. of Eng., vol. i. p. 183.

Sealed Prayer Book (The). Both the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge and the crown printers are bound by the Act of Uniformity to print the 'Book of Common Prayer' from a sealed prayer-book, a copy of which ought to be kept in each cathedral, and of course where the book is officially printed.

Séance Royale (Une). A variety of the 'Lit de Justice' (q.v.), in which the king of France took his seat and told the parlement what law or laws he requested them to pass. The parlement had no voice in the matter, but simply registered the royal edict.

Seato'nian Prize (The), for an English poem on some sacred subject. Value 40*l.*; given annually to an M.A. of the University of Cambridge. The same person is qualified to take the prize any number of times. Founded by the Rev. Thomas Seaton of Clare College in 1741.

Seceders, 1730. Dissenters from the kirk of Scotland led by Ralph and Ebenezer Erskine of Stirling. They are divided into burghers and anti-burghers, that is, those who did not object to take the 'Burgess oath' (q.v.), and those who refused to take it.

Secession (The), 1733. The body of seceders from the General Assembly of Scotland. See 'Seceders.'

Secession of Non-Jurors (The), 5 March, 1689. Sancroft archbishop of Canterbury and the seven bishops of Bath and Wells, Chichester, Ely, Gloucester, Norwich, Peterborough, and Worcester refused to take the oaths to William and Mary, and were suspended. On 1 Feb., 1691, they were all deprived of their sees.

Secession Synod of Ireland (The), 1780. Formed by seceders from the Presbyterian Assembly of Ireland.

Second Advent Brethren (The). A Protestant religious sect which keeps a watchful look-out for the second coming of the Messiah.

Second Book (The). King Edward's liturgies reformed under Queen Elizabeth. See p. 523, 'Liturgy.'

Second Catechism of Edward VI. (The), 1553. Called 'The Larger Catechism'; ascribed to Poynet bishop of Winchester, but recommended to the young king by Cranmer. It was in Latin and English, in question and answer. It was afterwards revised and enlarged by Noel dean of St. Paul's, and published in 1570. This is not the catechism inserted in our Book of Common Prayer. That formulary was drawn up by Dr. Nowell, afterwards bishop of Ely, and was enlarged by Dr. Overall, at the command of James I., and is based on Cranmer's Shorter Catechism.

According to Canon Luckock ('On the Book of Common Prayer') the greater part is by Nowell. Overall wrote the Explanation of the Sacraments.

Second Founder of Rome (The). Sixtus V., who greatly embellished Rome with beautiful edifices, brought water to the city by an aqueduct 22 miles long, constructed the cupola of St. Peter's, enlarged the Vatican library, fixed the number of cardinals at 70, and recreated both the city and constitution of the Church (1521, 1585–1590).

Second Grand Alliance (The), 7 Sept., 1701, between the kaiser, Great Britain, Holland, Prussia, and Hanover, against Louis XIV. Signed at the Hague. The object was to prevent France succeeding to Spain, and to secure Spain to Germany. If negotiations failed, the allies agreed to make war on France till they recovered Spanish Flanders, the kingdoms of Sicily and Naples, with all other Spanish territories in Italy. No peace was to be made till the absolute severance of Spain and France was effected. See p. 381, 'Grand Alliance.'

Second Plebe'ian War (The), A.D. 126, in Irish history, is the rising of the Attacots or proletariat of Ireland, aided by the sub-kings, to dethrone Tuathal, son of Feredach the Just. Tuathal took refuge with the king of the Picts, but a famine induced the insurgents to invite him back, and he was called Tuathal the Acceptable.

The first plebeian war was the Massacre at Magh-Cru (q.v.).

Second Prayer Book of Edward VI. (The), 1552. The second revision of the 'King's Primer' (q.v.); the first revision was 1549. King Edward's Prayer Book was augmented and revised in the reigns of Elizabeth and James I. In 1662 it assumed the present form of our 'Book of Common Prayer.'

Second Probation. The dernier ressort of the prison governor to an incorrigible offender. It consists of solitary confinement for 9 months, as at the commencement of a sentence, with deduction of one-third of the ordinary prison allowance of food and the loss of all remission marks.

Secret Articles (The), 1647. A secret treaty entered into by Charles I. with the Confederates or Catholics of Ireland. Edward lord Herbert persuaded the Confederates to make a double treaty, one public and one private. In the private treaty the Catholics had large concessions made to them, but if they had been generally known the king's cause would have been greatly prejudiced among Protestants. This secret treaty was accidentally discovered amongst the baggage of the Archbishop of Tuam and published. The king denied its authenticity, but no one believed him, and the documents are preserved still in the public libraries of England.

The secret treaty provided that the members of the Catholic Church should pay their fees to the Catholic clergy, and that the churches then in possession of Catholics should remain so.

Secret Association of the Holy Faith (The), 1799. Founded by Cardinal Ruffo, as a counterpoise to the Carbonāri. This society was sworn to exterminate all Jansenists, Molinists, Economists, Illuminists, Freemasons, and Carbonari. The members were called 'Santa Fedists.'

Secret Chancery (The). A kind of 'Star Chamber' introduced by Alexis Michailowitz czar of Russia. It was a species of state inquisition whereby the czar could get rid of all persons dangerous or obnoxious without any apparent interference on his part.

Karamsin says the Secret Chancery was founded by Peter I., and that the court founded by Alexis was only a private chancery.

Secret Committee (The), 1721. See 'Committee of Secrecy.'

Secret Device (The), 1 July, 1543. A private agreement between Henry VIII. and the Douglas faction to bamboozle the Scotch in regard to the projected alliance between the royal children Edward (son of Henry VIII.) and Mary (daughter of James V.). The promise was that Mary should remain in Scotland till her 11th year, but that an English nobleman and his wife should form part of her suite. The secret device was that Douglas should throw Scotland virtually into the hands of Henry, to get possession of Mary, and to induce Scotland to repudiate her allegiance to the pope.

Secret Select (The), 1837. Persons who hired themselves out to the trades union of Glasgow to assassinate, mutilate, or injure persons obnoxious to the union. They belonged to what was called No. 61, and when the secret committee had resolved upon a deed of darkness the name of one of this No. 61 was written on paper and given to the secretary. The Secret Select being sent for was ushered into a dark room and told what he was appointed to do; then stretching out his hand in the dark, a purse of money was put into it. After the deed of darkness he was smuggled out of the kingdom. See 'Nobs.'

Secret Treaty (The), Jan. 1672, ratified in June, between Charles II. and Louis XIV.

I. Charles should publicly profess himself a Catholic at such time as might appear most expedient.

II. To enable Charles to quash insurrections, Louis should grant him 2,000,000 livres after the ratification of the treaty.

III. Both agree to observe the treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle.

IV. If any new rights on the Spanish monarchy should accrue to Louis, the King of England agrees to aid him in recovering them.

V. Both agree to make war on the United Provinces, and neither shall make peace without the other's consent.

VI. Louis agrees to take on himself the whole expense of the war, but England shall furnish him with 6,000 men.

VII. Charles shall equip fifty ships, and Louis thirty, and the united fleet shall be under the command of James duke of York.

VIII. Charles to receive Walcheren, Luys (2 syl.), and the island of Cadsand as his quota; Louis all the rest.

IX. A mutual treaty of commerce shall be concluded without delay.

No 'right divine' can palliate such infamy.

Secret Tribunal (The). I. A.D. 783, of Westphalia. A kind of inquisition established by Charlemagne to prevent a relapse into paganism.

II. The Vehm-Gericht of Westphalia (12th cent.), recognised 1371; general in Germany 1400, suppressed 1488, but did not wholly cease to exist till 1811.

Its judges and officers were all muffled, its summonses were delivered in secret, and everyone connected with the tribunal was sworn to secrecy. It exerted a wholesome restraint on the unruly barons, for anyone of them might at any time be dragged blindfold before the judges, and hung on the first tree. See 'Red Land.'

It was no single court, but a society, which could hold a court in any place within the Red Land.

Secular Abbots. Laymen who possessed monasteries; their vicars, who discharged the duties of the abbey, were styled 'Regular Abbots.'

Secular Canons. Canons not conventual. Laymen who out of honour or respect are admitted into some chapter of canons. They mixed more or less with the world, but observed the rules of the order to which they attached themselves.

Secular Clergy (The). The clergy generally who live in private houses. Nearly all archbishops, bishops, deans, canons, and parochial clergymen are Seculars, in contradistinction to the Regulars, who, having vowed obedience, chastity, and poverty, live in some religious house, dead to the world and the 'civil law' by their 'entrance into religion.' Called 'Regulars' because they live under the Regula or rule of some religious house.

Secularism, 1846. A system of ethics which teaches that conduct should be based on reason and knowledge, wholly ignoring the Christian doctrine of divine guidance and interference. It regards happiness as the proper aim of man, utility his highest duty, and progress as the only gauge of right living. Of course it considers perfect liberty of thought as essential to progress, and therefore objects to creeds, and what is termed 'orthodoxy,' that is, certain set dogmas and doctrines enforced by the authority of a dominant party. It regards this present life as the main concern of man, experience his best guide, the promotion of the well-being of society his highest duty, the Book of Nature his only Bible, and science its best interpreter. See 'Agnosticism.'

Secularists. Freethinkers who believe that the affairs of this world should be the chief concern of man. They are generally Agnostics, but some are Materialists, and some few are Atheists. However, religious views have no part nor lot in Secularism except indirectly.

Sedan-day, 1 Sept. A school holiday in Hamburg in commemoration of the battle of Sedan in 1870, when Napoleon III. delivered up his sword to William king of Prussia.

Sedantaire, or 'Man of Sedan,' a sobriquet of Napoleon III. after he resigned his sword to the King of Prussia at Sedan, in the Franco-Prussian war, 1870. The pun is Sedan-terre.

Sede'runt (The Acts of). Acts whereby judges are empowered to make rules for the regulation of legal procedure and the expedition of justice in the Scotch Court of Session. Scotch Act, 1540, c. 93.

Sedgwick Prize (The), for geology. Given every third year to any graduate of the University of Cambridge who has resided sixty days during the year of his candidature. Value about 80*l.* Founded in 1865 in honour of the Rev. Adam Sedgwick, Woodwardian Professor (q.v.).

Sedleyan Professor of Natural Philosophy in Oxford University. Stipend 570*l.* a year. Founded by Sir William Sedley, 1621.

Seekers, 1628. A religious sect in New England, which denied the churches and ordinances of Christ.—John Harvard.

II. During the civil wars between Charles I. and his parliament the sect spread into England. They believed that no true church was in existence; that a true church could be founded and administered only by men who had the supernatural gift conferred on the founders and members of the primitive churches. They were 'seeking and waiting' for such manifestation of the Holy Ghost as would render it possible for true churches to be constituted. George Fox was at one time a 'Seeker,' believing, as he said, that 'those who sought the truth would surely find it.' See Barclay,

'Inner Life,' which contains an excellent sketch of the Seekers.

Under the head of Independents. . . . were the Arminians, Millenaries, Baptists, Anabaptists, Familists, Enthusiasts, Seekers, Perfectists, Socinians, Arians, and others.—HOWITT, Hist. of Eng. (Charles I.), chap. vi. p. 278.

Segretario (It). Machiavel is meant, if no proper name is added.

Seiads (The Government of the), 1414, succeeded in Delhi the 'House of Toghlak.' Khiza Khan expelled from the throne Doulat Khan Lodi.

Seicentis'ti. The Italian worthies of the 17th cent., or in the decline of Italian poetry and art. It is applied to the men of note in any debased period. See p. 174, 'Cinque Centisti.'

Seigneur of Sark (The), 1565. Sir Helier de Carteret, appointed by Queen Elizabeth, was the first seigneur. In 1721 Sark passed by sale into the hands of James Milner, and in 1730 passed into the possession of Susannah Le Pelley; but in 1852 the seigneurie was transferred to Mr. T. G. Collings of Guernsey. The parliament or assembly of Sark is called the Chefs Plaids.

Seja'nus of England (The). So Sir John Elliot styled the Duke of Buckingham when he was impeached in 1627, and truly the resemblance between the favourite of Tiberius and the favourite of Charles I. is very striking. Both were equally unscrupulous, both equally licentious, both popular in a way for their dash, beauty, and extravagance; both favourites of two princes: Sejanus of Caius Cæsar and the Emperor Tiberius—Buckingham of James I. and Charles I.; and both met an untimely end.

Select Preachers (of our Universities). Ten clergymen selected to supply the place of those who decline to preach in St. Mary's Church in their regular turn. Five of the preachers are nominated annually by the Vice-Chancellor, the Regius and Margaret Professors of Divinity, and the two proctors. No substitute is permitted except those thus selected.

Select Vestry Act (The), 1663. By which a person was prohibited from being a vestryman unless he abjured the 'Covenant,' swore not to take up arms against the King's majesty, and promised by oath to conform to the Liturgy.

Seleucides (4 syl.), or 'Dynasty of the Seleucidæ,' B.C. 312–64 (247 years). A Macedonian dynasty which reigned in Syria and Upper Asia after the death of Alexander the Great. So called from Seleucus, one of Alexander's generals, its founder. Six of the dynasty were named Seleucus, thirteen were named Antiochus, and three were named Demetrius. It was succeeded by the Arsacïdês.

The 'Era of the Seleucides' begins with this dynasty. Seleukos I. is surnamed Nicâtor (the Conqueror).

Self-denying Ordinance (The). See 'Self-renouncing Ordinance.'

Self-renouncing Ordinance (The), or 'Self-denying Ordinance,' 3 April, 1645. A measure moved by Zouch Tate and seconded by Sir Harry Vane in the House of Commons for the removal of the Earl of Essex from the command of the parliamentary army. Tate said, 'There is but one way of ending so many evils, and that is for everyone freely to renounce himself.' The ordinance was that no member of either house shall hold any office, civil or military, during the war. When the bill passed, Essex, Warwick, and Manchester resigned, and Fairfax was made commander. Cromwell ought to have been excluded as an M.P., but a special exception was made in his case 'for his brilliant achievements.' Cromwell really introduced the measure to the attention of the parliament, for he saw plainly that the aristocracy were only half-hearted in the war. On the death of Essex in 1647 this ordinance fell into abeyance.

Zouch, pronounce Zootch.

Seljuks (The), or 'Seljukian Dynasty.' An Oriental dynasty founded by Togrûl Bey, grandson of Seljûk of Turkestan. He took possession of the empire of the Ghaznevides (3 syl.), and put an end to the Bowides (2 syl.) in Ispahan. The Seljûks of Persia began with Togrûl I. and went out with Togrûl II. It gave twelve sovereigns, lasted 156 years (1038–1194), and was succeeded by the Gourides (2 syl.) or Khans of Kharizm (1155–1225).

It will be seen that the Gourides were for thirty-nine years contemporary with the Seljûks. Togrûl Bey, Alp Arslan, and Malek Shah are kings to be proud of in any nation.

Selkirk Island. Juan Fernandez is so called from Alexander Selkirk, a buccaneer from the fishing town of Largs in Fifeshire, who resided there in solitude for four years (1704–1708). The story of Selkirk probably suggested to Defoe that of 'Robinson Crusoe.'

Selwyn College, Cambridge, 1882. Built by public subscription in memory of George Augustus Selwyn, late bishop of Lichfield, to provide an economical education of 'high culture of the mind combined with Christian training based on the principles of the Church of England.'

Selwyn Divinity School (The). Founded in 1856 by William Selwyn, D.D., of St. John's College, Cambridge. Lady Margaret Professor of Divinity.

Sem'inarists, 1583 (Queen Elizabeth). The name given to the Roman Catholic clergy who were trained at Dr. Allen's College at Douay for the purpose of being sent over to England as missionaries of the Pope. These were afterwards treated by Elizabeth's officers as being on the same footing as Jesuits.

Sem'ipela'gians, A.D. 430. Pelāgius denied the doctrine of original sin, or the taint of Adam. He maintained that all men can, if they choose, keep all the laws of God; that God gives grace to those who deserve it; that good acts are due to the liberty of the will as well as bad acts. The Semipelāgians agreed with Pelagius in the freedom of the will to choose either good or evil, but after having made the choice then they maintained that God's grace is indispensable for justification and righteousness. Man can walk to the palace door, but must be ushered into the presence chamber.

Semir'amis of the North (The).
I. Margaret de Valdemar, queen of Norway, Sweden, and Denmark. She was the daughter of Valdemar III. king of Denmark (1353–1412).
II. Catharine of Russia, a powerful ambitious sovereign, but licentious, sensual, and immoral (1729, 1762–1796).

Semitic Languages (The). Ancient Arabic, Hebrew, Syriac, Phœnician, Chaldaic, Æthiopic, and perhaps ancient Egyptian and Coptic.

Semitic Nations (The). The Hebrews, Syrians, old Æthiopians, Arabians, and Phœnicians. See 'Turanian' and 'Aryan.'

Sempach (Convention of), 1393. An act of confederation between the Austrians and Swiss.

'Semper sub Sextis perdita Roma fuit.'
NERO was the sixth Cæsar. (Julius, Augustus, Tiberius, Caligula, Claudius, Nero.)
STEPHEN VI. (pope 896–897) was a monster. He caused the body of his predecessor to be exhumed; and then, cutting off the head of the dead body with a hatchet, threw it into the Tiber. The people, disgusted, seized him, cast him into prison, and there strangled him.
BONIFACE VI. (pope 896) died within fifteen days.
BENEDICT VI. (972–974) was confined in St. Angelo by Boniface, called 'Antipope,' and died there.
GREGORY VI. (1044–1046) had three rival claimants, and when he had bribed them to retire Kaiser Heinrich III. and his cardinals obstructed all his reforms. Driven to despair, he abdicated.
CLEMENT VI. (1342–1352) resided at Avignon. It was in this pontificate that Rienzi the tribune troubled Rome.
URBAN VI. (1378–1389). With this pontificate began the 'Great Schism of the West' (q.v.).
PIUS VI. (1775–1799) was ill-starred. In France the National Assembly confiscated the property of the church and suppressed all religious orders; in Germany the Congress of Ems abolished the Nunciature; in Naples the papal tribute was withheld; and in 1791 Avignon and Venaissin were added to France. France invaded the papal dominions, Bonaparte attacked the Roman States, compelled Pius to sign the Treaty of Tolentino, by which he gave up the best pictures and statues of Rome, introduced his republic there, and the old pontiff, torn from his palace, was transferred successively to Sienna, Florence, Grenoble, and Valence, where he died at the age of eighty-two.
To Rome if six hath always brought mischance, Three, without doubt, has fatal proved to France. See 'Three Fatal to France.'

Sempro'nian Law (The), B.C. 123. That the state is to furnish corn at a low price to all Roman citizens (25 asses per bushel). At one time it cost the state a million a year to make up this deficit. It was carried by Caius Sempronius Gracchus.

There were several other Sempronian laws, the object of which was to lessen the power of the oligarchy and make the constitution more democratic.

Senate (The) of the University of Cambridge used to be divided into two Houses: (1) The regents or white-hoods, and (2) the non-regents or black-hoods. The Upper or White-hood House consisted of masters of arts of less than five years' standing and doctors of less than two years' standing. The Lower or Black-hood House consisted of masters of arts of more than five years' standing and doctors of more than two years' standing. All doctors of the Upper House and the public orator could vote in either house. This arrangement was wholly changed in 1857–58.

'Regents' originally meant 'tutors, lecturers, and professors.' 'Non-regents' were those who had served their time and were exempt from these duties. Masters of arts took off the white lining of their hoods to show they were no longer regents or tutors and lecturers. The stripping of the white lining has long been discontinued.

The Council of the Senate is called a 'Caput' (q.v.). An assembly in term-time is called a 'Congregation,' but out of term-time it is a 'Convocation.' By a 'Grace' a convocation may be converted into a congregation.

 There is no senate in the Oxford University. See 'House of Convocation.'

Senate (The Present). The legislative body of Cambridge University. Great changes were made in 1857 (19, 20 Vict. c. 88), and in 1882 an entire new code of statutes was approved by Queen Victoria in council. The senate now consists of one house only, which assembles in the senate-house. The members are the chancellor and vice-chancellor, and the following graduates, provided their names remain on the university register, viz.: All doctors of the five faculties (i.e. divinity, law, medicine, science, and letters). There is a Council of the Senate (q.v.), and there is also an Electoral Roll (q.v.).

Bachelors of divinity are members of the senate only in virtue of their M.A. degree.

Senate (The Conservative) of France, 1799. 'Le Sénat Conservateur' created by the Constitution of Year VIII. was not a legislative body. Its duties were to see the laws enforced, and to elect the future consuls. They appointed the tribunes and legislators, and even filled up vacancies in their own body.

The original number of Conservative senators was 60, elected for life; afterwards increased to 137. Under the empire the senate was quite powerless, and in 1814, on the restoration, the senate was replaced by the Chambre des Pairs.

Senate (The French). 'Le Sénat Français' (14 Jan., 1852) was composed of cardinals, marshals, and admirals, of princes over the age of eighteen, and of members nominated by the chef de l'Etat. The number was 150, and the election for life. A decree of the senate was called a sénatus-consulte (plu. sénatus-consultes).

Senate of Lilliput (The). In the reign of George II. (26 Feb., 1729), it was made illegal to print reports of the discussions of the House of Commons. To evade this law the debates were printed under initials, as debates of the 'Senate of Lilliput.'

Senate of Rome (The). Instituted by Romulus to deliberate on peace and war, appoint the imposts, distribute the provinces, render justice, and enact the laws. In the empire it lost all independence, and at the partition of the empire there were two senates—one at Constantinople and the other at Rome. The Roman senate ceased in 552, during the domination of Theodoric.

The original number was 100, called Patres. Tullus Hostilius doubled the number, and Tarquinius Priscus increased the number to 300. Brutus, on the expulsion of the kings, supplied the places of those senators who sided with Tarquin with new men whom he called Conscripti, and the body was addressed as Patres [et] Conscripti. Under the republic the number generally mounted up to 600, and at the death of Julius Cæsar the number was 1,000. Augustus reduced the number to 600. All senators wore the toga, with a large band of purple called the laticlave, from its being embroidered with a wide stripe, or border, Clavus latus.

Senate of Venice, 1178. A committee of 60 chosen from the Great Council (q.v.), which numbered 480 members. In 1435 the number was doubled, and later still it was increased to 300. It was deliberative. The college was executive.

The college consisted of 26 members: the Doge, the privy council of Signory (6), the 8 chief members of The Forty, and 16 representatives of the Senate. See 'Pregadi.'

Sénatus-consulte Organique de la Constitution (Year X.), 2 Aug., 1802. A modification of the Constitution of Year VIII. (q.v.), still less democratic. Instead of three consuls Napoleon was appointed consul for life. In 1804 the consul was emperor.

Sénatus-consulte Organique de l'Empire Français (Year XII.), 18 May, 1804, conferring on Napoleon the power and title of emperor.

From the ANCIENT REGIME five constitutions brought the French back again to a monarchy. A constitutional monarchy, a pure democracy, a directory, three consuls and a conservative senate, a consulate, an EMPIRE.

Seneca (The English). Joseph Hall bishop of Norwich (1574–1656).

Seneca of the East (The). Buzurg-Mihir, who imported into Persia the game of chess and the fables of Pilpay (6th cent.).

Sénéchal (The). A subaltern officer of France who acted as a crown judge; the district over which he had jurisdiction was called a sénéchaussée. These sénéchaussées were established chiefly in the south of France; they were called bailliages in the north. All France was subdivided into sénéchaussées or bailliages.

Every grand feudatory had his sénéchal, who was his major domo. In England a sénéchal is temporarily created for a coronation ceremony, and when a peer is accused of a capital offence.

Sénéchal (The Grand) of France. He was master of the royal household, the chief lord of the treasury, commander-in-chief of the army, and lord chief justice. It was the highest rank in the kingdom, and in the 10th cent. was made hereditary in the house of Anjou. Suppressed in 1191 by Philippe II. Auguste, who divided the dignity and duties between the constable and grand master of the king's palace. See above, 'Sénéchal.'

Senior Students of Christ Church, Oxford, correspond to fellows in other colleges. What in other colleges are called Scholars are termed Junior Students in Christ Church. The head of Christ Church is called the 'Dean.'

Sennacherib, King of Assyria, was Sin-akhi-erba, son of Sarru-gina [Sargon]. He began to reign B.C. 707. He was high priest for eighteen years of his reign. His war with Hezekiah was not the third year of his reign, but his 'third expedition,' and his son Esar Haddon—that is, Asshur-akhi-dinna—did not succeed till B.C. 683.

Sensational School (The). I. A school of philosophy in the latter half of the 18th cent. Condillac (1715–1780) was its chief exponent. This school taught that all the functions usually ascribed to the soul are mere exhibits of the senses. Knowledge is obtained by the senses only; intelligence, conscience, 'mind,' and so on are from the brain. The disciples of this school were of course materialists.

II. In French romance writers, followed the Romantic. The first of the sensational novels was 'Indiana,' by George Sand (Mme. Dudevant, 1804–1877).

Bad as the sensual novels of the 'Sensational School' of France undoubtedly are, the Realistic School is ten times worse. They pander to the most prurient passions of man, and uncover sensuality in all its nastiness; for, laid bare, it is both disgusting and revolting.

Sensualists. In philosophy means those who believe that we depend on our senses for all our knowledge of the material world. These philosophers are also called 'Empirics,' from a Greek word meaning experience. The chief of these philosophers among the ancients were Democritus, Leucippos, Aristippos, Epicūros, and Lucretius; and among the moderns Hobbes, Gassendi, Condillac, Helvetius, Cabanis, De Tracy, Broussais, Hartley, and Priestley. Those who contend for intuitive ideas and an inner sense or perception are called Dogmatists. The system of Sensualists is called 'Sensualism.'

Some rank Aristotle, Bacon, and Locke among Sensualists, but they distinctly teach that the five senses are not of themselves sufficient to explain all ideas.

Cabanis, pronounce Cah-bah-nes.

Separatists (The). I. 1580. Those who withdrew from the Church of England in consequence of the tyranny and dogmatism of the Ecclesiastical Commission. They objected to an established church as contrary to the word of God; to the use of the cross in baptism as a rag of popery; to kneeling at the Lord's Supper as a semi-adoration of the elements; and to the use of the surplice. Persecution greatly increased their number and confirmed their opposition, so that they quickly mounted to 20,000 souls, and became a power in the state.

II. Or 'Pietists' (q.v.), 1689. Founded by Spener of Leipsic.

III. In 1886, &c. Those in favour of giving the Irish a separate parliament, supreme in Irish matters, but subordinate to the British parliament in all matters affecting the United Kingdom. The bill was brought in by Mr. Gladstone, the prime minister, but was thrown out, and led to the break-up of the Whig party, those Whigs and Radicals who opposed the bill being called Unionists. Lord Hartington was the leader of the Whig Unionists, and Mr. Chamberlain of the Radical Unionists. See 'Irish Associations.'

An imperium in imperio is proverbially dangerous, and would be especially so with the impulsive Irish, who are ready to follow any demagogue, and apply to foreign nations for support. What the Irish want is to be a 'separate nation,' and have its voice in the councils of Europe. To effect this it must have its consuls, ambassadors, and army. And fatal collision with England could not be long delayed.

Sepoy War (The), 1857–1858, or Indian Mutiny (q.v.).

September Massacres (The). 2, 3, 4, 5 Sept., 1792, when between eight and ten thousand persons, chiefly noblemen and priests, were massacred in cold blood at the instigation of Marat. See 'Septembrisers.'

September 9. The day appointed for the National Thanksgiving for the king's escape from the Rye-house plot in favour of the Duke of Monmouth and the assassination of Charles II., 1683. Lord William Russell and others were executed as being implicated in this plot.

> You hypocrites, forbear your pranks,
> To murder men and then give thanks;
> Forbear, your tricks pursue no further,
> For God accepts no thanks for murder.
> LUTTRELL'S Journal.

The 'murder' referred to is that of Lord William Russell, &c.

Septembrisers. I. 'Septembriseurs.' Those engaged in the massacres of September (q.v.), Sept. 1792. Three hundred hired assassins wearing tricoloured scarfs round their waists went to Les Carmes, L'Abbaye, and La Force to assassinate those suspected of favouring the royal cause. In Les Carmes 163 ecclesiastics were executed without even a mockery trial. In the other two prisons a few questions were asked. If the judges said à Coblentz the 'suspect' was acquitted, but if the sentence was à l'Abbaye, or à la Force, he was led into the yard and put to death. Truchat stated to the Legislative Assembly that the number which fell in the four days was 4,000, but the real number was double that or more. See above.

Billaud-Varennes promised each of the assassins 24 louis for his work (a total of about 5,000*l.*), but money enough could not be raised, and the sum of 1,463 livres (70*l.*) is set down in the books of the Commune as still due. This surely is some blunder, for it is incredible that the government should be unable to lay hands on such a paltry sum of money.

II. The revolutionary mob of France in the first revolution was so called because they began their annual calendar in September instead of January.

Certainly it was most unscientific to begin the year in September, when its end is so near at hand for all nations north of the equator.

Septennial Act (The), 1 Geo. I. c. 38, 7 May, 1716, extending the duration of parliament to seven years, instead of three, as it had been since 1641. By this act it was provided that the interval between two parliaments should in no wise exceed four years.

Sep'tuagesima Sunday. Seventy days before Easter, Church way of reckoning, which gives ten days to the week. Thus: 1 eve of Sunday, 2 Sunday, 3 Monday, 4 Tuesday, 5 Wednesday, 6 Thursday, 7 Friday, 8 Saturday, 9 eve of the Octave, 10 the Octave. See 'Sunday.'

So the entombment was 1 eve of Saturday, 2 Saturday, 3 eve of Sunday. Septuagesima, often, but incorrectly, pronounced Sep'-t'a-jes'y-may.

Septuagint (The). A Greek version of the Scriptures, and called 'the Alexandrian.' It was produced in the reign of Ptolemy Philadelphus (B.C. 284–247). The Pentateuch, which contains many Coptic words, was probably the work of Egyptian Jews. See 'Scriptures.'

No one believes the tradition repeated by Philo, Justin, Clement of Alexandria, Epiphanius, and others: That Ptolemy, by the advice of his librarian, employed seventy-two men of learning to translate the Hebrew Scriptures into Greek. The seventy-two met in the Isle of Pharos, and in seventy-two days produced that translation. It is furthermore added that each of the seventy-two was shut up in a separate room, and when they delivered in their translations all most minutely agreed. Not a word, not a letter differed.

Richard Simon informs us that it was called the Septuagint, because it was approved and authorised by the Jewish Sanhedrim. The language is Greek, but many of the words are Aramaic. Often, but incorrectly, pronounced Sep'-t'a-jint.

Seraphic Doctor (The). John Bonaventura (1221–1274). A Franciscan, chiefly distinguished for his adoration of the Virgin Mary. He distorted everything, by the help of allegory and analogy, to Christian theology. This Doctor Seraphicus is placed by Dante among the saints in Paradise.

Serbo'nian Bog (The). The lake Serbōnis in Egypt, near the isthmus of Suez, and the border of Syria, which, when the south wind prevailed, was covered with sand, and looked like dry land. Artaxerxes Ochus lost troop after troop in this bog, on his way to Egypt.

Serene Highness (His Most). In Germany is the title of the collateral branches of the sovereign or emperor. In the reign of Louis XIV. the title was given to the Prince de Condé.

Ser'geanty. Service rendered to the crown for lands. It was divided into Grand Sergeanty and Petit Sergeanty. The service in Grand Sergeanty was personal service, as following the king in battle. The service of Petit Sergeanty was some real or nominal payment by way of rent.

Pronounce Sar'-jent-ty.

Serpent, as a Standard (The). The kings of Assyria and of Babylon adopted as a standard a 'Great Red Dragon,' and Cyrus introduced a similar standard into the armies of the Medes and Persians. See Ezek. xxix. 3.

One of the Roman standards was a serpent. The Tartars carried a serpent standard, and it will be remembered that a serpent was the standard of the tribe of Dan, allusion to which is made in Gen. xlix. 17.

The ancient Britons adopted the dragon both as a crest and as a standard. Geoffrey of Monmouth tells us: 'When Aurēlius was at Winchester there appeared to him in the sky a star of wonderful magnitude and brilliancy, from which there darted forth a ray ending in a fiery dragon.' He adds that 'Uther had two golden dragons made, one of which he presented to Winchester and the other he carried with him as a royal standard.' A rattlesnake flag, with the motto 'Don't tread on me,' was one of the first standards adopted in the American revolution.

Probably this is a pure invention of the romancing chronicler to account for the title of pendragon given to King Uther. But dragon is the British word for 'leader,' and pen-dragon means simply 'leader-in-chief.'

The Greek δρακων is derived from δρασσω, to be active, and the Welsh dragon is allied to the word draig, lightning. Both express the essential characteristics of a good general, quick-eyed and quick in execution. Probably the astronomical symbol of the planet Jupiter (a serpent on a cross), and the coiled dragon at the base of Satan, refer to similar vigilance and activity.

Serpent Homer (The). A copy of Homer's 'Iliad' on a roll of serpent skin 120 feet in length. This ancient MS. was kept in the royal college of Constantinople, but was lost in a fire which destroyed the library. See Gibbon, chap. liii.

Serpent of Old Nile (The). Cleopatra queen of Egypt (B.C. 69, 51–30).

Serventese. A popular sort of mediæval ballad like 'Chevy Chase,' divided into stanzas.

Poemata in quibus Servientium seu Militum facta et servitia referuntur.—DU CANGE.

Serve'tus (Michael). The learned theologian, who embraced the Arian doctrine, persecuted to death by Calvin. He published a book anonymously, but Calvin ferreted out the author, and had the book burnt at the gallows. Not long afterwards, as he was passing through Geneva in disguise, Calvin had him arrested, and acted as informer, prosecutor, and judge, and Servetus was burnt to death by a slow fire. No more infamous act ever disgraced the memory of man (1509–1553).

Service Book (The), 1637. So the Scotch called the Common Prayer Book, which Charles I. tried to force the people of Scotland to use in their places of worship.

The term was common enough in England also, but they were more often called 'Uses' (q.v.). These eleven were consulted by the Commissioners who compiled our Common Prayer Book, viz. the Missal, the Graduale or Grayle, the Processionale, the Ordinale, the Portiforium or Breviary, the Legenda, the Pica or Pie, the Finale, the Antiphonarium, the Manuale, and Pontificale. See each of these words in loco.

Servile or Slave War (The). The first in Sicily, B.C. 133–131; the second in Sicily, B.C. 103.

Ser'vites (2 syl.), or 'Servitors of the Virgin.' A religious order founded in Florence in 1232. Called 'White Mantles' from their dress. The order still subsists in Italy, but was abolished in France 1274.

There are a few houses of Servites in the United States; also some of Servite ladies (nuns). There is one house of Servites in England (Fulham Road, S.W.), one of Servite Sisters (St. Anne's Road, Stamford Hill, N.). 1890.

Servitors. Students of Christ Church College, Oxford University, received at reduced fees, like the 'Bible Clerks' of Oriel College, Oxford, and the sizars of Cambridge. At one time each fellow had his servitor to wait on him at dinner, and these servitors dined on what was left at the fellows' table.

Servus servi. A slave's drudge, who helped him to cultivate his peculium (q.v.).

Since the time of Gregory the Great the pope has styled himself Servus servorum Dei (the drudge of God's ministers).

Sessional School (The Edinburgh), 29 April, 1813. A normal or training school to educate teachers in the principles and art of teaching. This was the first of the training colleges in Great Britain, but they had been established in France in 1795, and in Germany even earlier (1748). See 'Normal Schools.'

The Sessional Schools were in 20 Feb., 1838, adopted as an appendage of the ecclesiastical establishment under the name of the General Assembly's Normal Institution.

Sestiere (A) (plural Sestieri). A division of the city of Florence for legislative purposes. It was a sixth part, and each sestiere elected two anziani or seniors. In 1282 the city was divided into quarters, and the anziani were superseded by priors (q.v.).

Sethos. King of Egypt, 19th dynasty, father of Sesostris, reigned five centuries before the Christian era. There is a statue of this king holding a rat in his hand, and containing this inscription: 'Learn from my example to honour the gods.'

The explanation given is this, according to Herodotus: His soldiers refused to contend with Sennacherib the Assyrian, and Sethos invoked the god whose minister he was to aid him. At night a crowd of rats invaded the Assyrian camp and gnawed the bowstrings of the sleeping men, so that next morning Sennacherib was obliged to draw off his army. No doubt this account is wholly mythical, and the rat held in the king's hand was the god he 'delighted to honour.'

Settlement (The Act of). The statute 12, 13 William III. c. 2 whereby the crown was limited to the family of William. If William and his successor Anne died without issue the succession was to pass to the descendants of Princess Sophia, a daughter of James I., provided they were Protestants (1702). This, of course, is the ground of the Hanoverian Succession. See 'Act of Settlement.'

Settling Day. The day on which stockbrokers settle or balance time bargains (q.v.). Once a fortnight.

Seven. A magic number in Brussels. Seven noble families, springing from seven ancient castles, supplied the stock from which was selected the seven senators who composed the upper council of the city. There were seven great squares and seven gates (Motley, 'Dutch Republic,' chap. i.).

Seven a Sacred Number.

Pythagoras, 500 years before the Christian era, tells us that the number 7 belongs especially to sacred things.

Hippocrătês (B.C. 460–357) divided the life of man into 7 ages, a division adopted by Shakespeare.

The Egyptian priests enjoined rest on the 7th day, because it was held to be a dies infaustus. In Egyptian astronomy there were 7 planets, and hence 7 days in the week, each day ruled by its own special planet. The people of Peru had also a 7-day week.

The Persians and Mexicans have a tradition of a flood from which 7 persons saved themselves in a cave, and by whom the world was subsequently repeopled.

The Jews considered 7 the perfect number: hence we have the 7 days of the creative week; 7 days' respite before the flood came; 7 of all clean animals saved in the ark; the years of famine and plenty were in cycles of 7; every 7th year, like every 7th day, was a sabbath; the feasts of unleavened bread and of tabernacles lasted 7 days; the golden candlestick had 7 branches; 7 priests blew with their trumpets when the walls of Jericho fell down, after being encompassed for 7 days, and 7 times on the 7th day; Jacob served 7 years for each of his wives; Samson kept his nuptials 7 days, was bound with 7 green withes, and 7 locks of his hair were cut off; Nebuchadnezzar was a 'beast' for 7 years; and the furnace for the three Jews was heated 7 times more than it was wont; the righteous are like gold 7 times purified in the furnace.

In the New Testament nearly everything occurs by sevens: there were 7 churches in Asia; 7 spirits symbolised by 7 candlesticks; 7 stars; 7 seals; 7 vials.

3×7 is an important factor among ourselves: thus, 3×7 constitutes a royal salute; 3×7 is the time that man 'comes of age,' &c. The 7th son of a 7th son was at one time supposed to possess wonderful powers. Man consists of 7 parts (2 legs, 2 arms, a stomach, chest, and head), and his head has 7 apertures (2 for the eyes, 2 for the ears, 2 for the nose, and one for the mouth).

Seven Articles of Islâm (The). 1, There is one only God; 2, Mohammed is his prophet; 3, Prayer is the key of paradise; 4, almsgiving; 5, fasting the whole month of Ramadán; 6, a pilgrimage to Mecca; and, 7, observance of the festivals, viz. the first three days of Shawál (which immediately follow the month of Ramadán) and the three or four days beginning on the tenth of Dsu'l Heggeh.

Friday is the sabbath, but, service being over, the rest of the day is at every man's disposal.

Seven Bibles (The). 1, The Christian's Bible; 2, the Korân or Mahometan's Bible; 3, the Eddas of the Scandinavians; 4, the Try Pitikes or Tripitaka, i.e. 'Triple basket' (viz. the Soutras or discourses (literally 'strings'), Vinaya or discipline, and Abhidharma or metaphysics); 5, the Chinese five kings (viz. Yih-king, cosmogony, Shu-king, or deliberations of the 'ancient kings,' the Shi-king, or book of psalms, the Le-king, or book of rites, the Chun-tsien, or history of China); 6, the Three Vedas of the Hindûs; and, 7, the Zendavesta of the Persians. Of these the Korân is the most modern.

The five kings do not mean five monarchs, but five webs of cloth or five warps.

Seven Bishops (The), committed to the Tower by Chief Justice Jeffreys, 10 June, 1688, were Sancroft archbishop of Canterbury, Lloyd bishop of St. Asaph, Ken bishop of Bath and Wells, Turner bishop of Ely, Lake bishop of Chichester, White bishop of Peterborough, and Trelawney bishop of Bristol. These seven bishops were deputed to wait on James II. and inform him that the bishops of the diocese declined to read the king's Declaration of Indulgence according to his command, or to instruct their clergy so to do. The object of the declaration was the removal of all disqualifications from Roman Catholics in church and state offices. The bishops, when brought to trial, were acquitted, and this tyrannical proceeding was the last offence which brought about the overthrow of James II. The declaration was to be read in London 20 May and elsewhere 27 May, 1688.

Seven Bodies in Alchemy (The). 1, the sun is gold; 2, the moon is silver; 3, Mars is iron; 4, Mercury is quicksilver; 5, Saturn is lead; 6, Jupiter is tin; and, 7, Venus is copper.

The bodies seven, eek, lo hem heer anoon:
Sol gold is, and Luna silver we threpe,
Mars yren, Mercurie quyksilver we clepe,
Saturnus leed, and Jubitur is tyn,
And Venus coper, by my fader kyn.
CHAUCER, Canterbury Tales (Prologue to the 'Chanounes Yemanes Tale').

Seven Champions of Christendom (The). 1, St. George of England; 2, St. Andrew of Scotland; 3, St. Patrick of Ireland; 4, St. David of Wales; 5, St. Denys of France; 6, St. James of Spain; and, 7, St. Anthony of Italy.

Seven Clerical Orders (The). Ostiarii, lectors, exorcists, acolytes, subdeacons, deacons, and priests. Bishops are dignified priests.

Docendum igitur erit hosce omnes ordines septenario numero contineri, semperque fia a Catholica Ecclesia traditum esse: quorum nomina hæc sunt: Ostiarius, Lector, Exorcista, Acolytus, Subdiaconus, Diaconus, Sacerdos.—Cat. Concil. Trident., pt. ii. c. 24.

St. Calus, who succeeded Eutychiânus in 283, made it a law of the church that all clerici should pass through the seven inferior orders before they were capable of being ordained bishops.—PRINCE, Parallel History.

Seven Corporal Works of Mercy (The). 1, to bury the dead; 2, to clothe the naked; 3, to feed the hungry; 4, to give drink to the thirsty; 5, to harbour the houseless; 6, to visit those in prison; and, 7, to administer to the sick. See 'Seven Spiritual,' &c.

Seven Crosses (The). Seven crosses mark the tomb of a bishop, five of a priest, and one of an ordinary Christian.

There are also seven forms of the ecclesiastical cross.

The Greek cross, the oldest form. Symbol of the word LVX., lux (light).

The Latin cross.

The Maltese cross.

St. Andrew's cross, or reliquary cross.

The Lorrainese cross, or cardinal's cross, carried before a cardinal. The pope's cross has three transoms.

The Tau or Egyptian cross, or the marking cross.

Constantine's cross ☧, i.e. XP, for Chr[istos].

Some other forms are occasionally seen, as the 'Lambeaux,' which is a Maltese cross on a Latin stem, standing on a lambel with three pendants. The rectoral cross consists of two spears crossed; the Agnus Dei cross is a spear armounted with a Maltese cross; and the heraldic crosses.

Seven Days' King (The). Masaniello (i.e. Tommaso Aniello), born 1622. Headed a revolt against the Duke of Arcos, at Naples, 7 July, 1647, forced him to abolish the tax on provisions, and for seven days was master of Naples. He was most arrogant and bloodthirsty, and was assassinated 16 July.

He is the hero of two operas: one by Caraffa called 'Masaniello,' and the other by Auber (libretto by Scribe) called 'La Muette de Portici.'

Seven Deadly Sins (The). Covetousness, envy, gluttony, lechery or lust, pride, sloth, wrath. See 'Seven Virtues.'

Seven Deposed Ministers of Scotland (The), 1843. A Mr. Edwards was presented to a church in Scotland, and, being refused ordination by the presbytery of Strathbogie, he appealed to the civil court and gained the verdict; whereupon seven ministers united in ordaining him, contrary to the principle of the 'veto' (q.v.) adopted in 1834. These seven ministers were now deposed by the presbytery, their churches declared vacant, and Mr. Edwards was deprived of his licence as a minister. The seven ministers petitioned the House of Lords, which justified them, and insisted on their restoration. This split up the Church of Scotland, and the seceding members formed what is called the 'Free Church of Scotland' (q.v.).

Seven Dolours (The), 1725. 'The seven dolours, or sorrows, of the Blessed Virgin' is a modern festival of the Catholic Church celebrated on the Friday preceding Palm Sunday. They refer to: 1, the prediction of St. Luke (ii. 34); 2, the flight into Egypt; 3, the loss of Jesus in Jerusalem; 4, the sight of Jesus bearing his cross; 5, the sight of Jesus on the cross; 6, the piercing of his side with the lance; and, 7, the burial. The festival was instituted by Pope Benedict XIII. See 'Seven Joys,' &c.

Instead of piercing the side we have the betrayal in the right place in some lists; and instead of the burial is given the Ascension, 'Let not your hearts be sorrowful, &c.' No. 1 was not a sorrow, but a prediction only; the 'sorrows' were the incidents which fulfilled it.

Seven Gifts of the Holy Ghost (The). 1, counsel; 2, the fear of the Lord; 3, fortitude; 4, piety; 5, understanding; 6, wisdom; and, 7, knowledge.

Philip said to the eunuch, 'Understandest thou what thou readest,' this is the first step to a knowledge of God.
'The fear of the Lord is the beginning of wisdom,' this is understanding carried into practice.
'I know whom I have believed,' this is the experience of a ripe Christian.

Seven-hilled City (The). 'Urbs Septicollis,' Rome, built on seven hills: 1, the Palatīnus; 2, the Capitolīnus; 3, the Quīrinālis; 4, the Cælius; 5, the Aventīnus; 6, the Viminālis; and, 7, the Esquilīnus.

Seven Joys of Mary (The). 1, the annunciation; 2, the visitation; 3, the nativity; 4, the adoration of the wise men; 5, the presentation in the temple; 6, finding Christ among the doctors; and, 7, the assumption. See 'Seven Dolours,' &c.

Strange that the 'resurrection' should be omitted. One would have supposed it would have been the joy of joys next to the nativity.

Seven Liberal Sciences (The). Divinity, astronomy, geometry, music, law, physic, and rhetoric.

Seven Men of Moidart (The), 1745. The seven persons who accompanied Charles Edward, the young pretender, on his expedition to conquer Great Britain and win back the crown abandoned by his grandfather James II. So called because their first muster in Scotland was at Kinloch Moidart, Inverness-shire. They were the old marquess of Tullibardine (called by the Jacobites the duke of Athol), Sir Thomas Sheridan (Charles Edward's tutor), Sir John Macdonald, Kelly (the nonjuring clergyman), Francis Strickland, Æneas Macdonald (banker in Paris), and Buchanan.

Seven Months' War (The), the Franco-Prussian War. War was declared by Napoleon III. against Prussia 19 July, 1870, and peace was signed at Frankfort 10 May, 1871. The first half consisted of a series of battles won by Prussia; the second half consisted of a series of sieges, ending with the siege of Paris, in all of which Prussia was successful.

The day after the battle of Sedan, Sept. 1, Napoleon III. surrendered his sword to the king of Prussia. On 18 January, 1871, Wilhelm I. king of Prussia was created emperor of Germany, and on 28 January Paris surrendered to the conquerors.

Seven Mortal Sins (The). Pride, wrath, envy, lust, gluttony, avarice, and sloth.

Seven Nations of Canaan (The). The Hittites, the Girgashites, the Amorites, the Canaanites, the Perizzites, the Hivites, and the Jebusites.

The Canaanites were also called the Philistines, and by the Hebrews 'Cherethites,' because they were supposed to be a colony from Cherith (Crete). The people called themselves Palisthines, and their country Palisthan (whence Philistines and Palestine).

Seven Orders of the Anglo-Saxon Church.

1. The ostiary, a kind of sexton, whose duty it was to ring the bells and keep the church doors.

2. The exorcist, whose function was to exorcise those possessed.

3. The lector, or 'reader,' who read the lessons at church.

4. The acolyth, or 'acolythist,' who held the candles while the priest read the Gospel in the celebration of the mass.

5. The subdeacon, who prepared the holy vessels, and attended on the deacon at the altar.

6. The deacon, who assisted the priest, laid the oblations on the altar, baptized children, and gave the eucharist to the laity.

7. The priest, or 'presbyter,' who preached, consecrated and administered the elements, &c. Bishops and archbishops are merely grades of the priesthood.

The Catholic Church has the same seven orders.

Seven Preexistences (The). Subscribed to by the Daruschists. They are Law and Throne of Glory, which existed before the creation of the world. The other five existed in contemplation only, viz. the Fathers, Israel, the Sanctuary, the Mersiah, and Repentance.

Seven Religions (The), according to the Ismaëlites, are these: (1) that of Adam and his companion Soos (Seth); (2) Noah, with Shem; (3) Abraham, with Ismaël; (4) Moses, with Aaron; (5) Jesus, with Simon; (6) Mahomet, with Ali; (7) the Chief, or Master, in whom culminated 'the Sciences of the Primeval Onea.'

Seven Sacraments (The), of the Roman Catholic Church: (1) Baptism; (2) Confirmation; (3) the Lord's Supper; (4) Penance; (5) Holy Orders; (6) Matrimony; and (7) Extreme Unction. Of these, Confirmation and Orders can be administered only by bishops.

Baptism, Matt. xxviii. 19; Eucharist, Matt. xxvi. 26; Confirmation, Acts viii. 17; Penance, Matt. xvi. 19; Orders, Tim. iv. 4, 22; Matrimony, Eph. v. 32; Extreme Unction, Mark vi. 13, James v. 14.

Seven Sciences (The). The Trivium and Quadrivium—viz. grammar, rhetoric, and logic, music, arithmetic, geometry, and astronomy. Called by mine host of the Black Bear the 'seven damnable sciences'; theology being held by the church the one and only true science ('Kenilworth,' chap. iii.).

Seven kinds of Sectaries (The), in New England in the 17th cent. Gortonists (who, it is said, denied the humanity of Christ); Papists (who consider their own merits and works equal with Christ's invaluable death and suffering); Familists (looking for rare revelations, and forsaking the sure revealed word); Seekers (who deny the churches and ordinance of Christ); Antinomians (who deny the moral law to be the rule of Christ); Anabaptists (who deny the civil government to be proved of Christ); Prelatists (who will have their own injunctions submitted unto in the churches of Christ) (John Harvard, 1628).

Seven Sisters (The). I. The old yew-trees, close to Fountain Abbey, at least 1,200 years old. Only two now remain, one of which is 25 feet in circuit.

II. 1513. Seven cannons cast by Robert Borthwick, master of artillery, and employed by the Scotch in the battle of Flodden Field. An official report says they were 'the neatest, the soundest, the best fashioned, the smallest in the touch-hole, and the most beautiful of their size and length ever seen.' Borthwick fell on the field while directing their operations.

Seven Sleepers (The). Noircarmes and his six officers in the siege of Valenciennes (1566) were so called, on account of the sleepy way in which they conducted the siege (Motley, 'The Dutch Republic,' pt. ii. 9).

Of course, the legendary seven sleepers referred to in the Koran XVIII., the Golden Legends, and Gregory's 'De Gloria Martyrum' were seven noble youths of Ephesus who fled in the Decian persecution to a cave in Mount Celion, and slept for 230 years. Their names are differently given.

Seven Spiritual Works of Mercy (The). (1) to admonish sinners; (2) to bear wrongs patiently; (3) to comfort the afflicted; (4) to counsel the doubtful; (5) to forgive offences; (6) to instruct the ignorant; and (7) to pray for the living and the dead. See 'Seven Corporal, &c.'

Seven times Christ spoke on the Cross.

1. Father forgive them, for they know not what they do.

2. To day shalt thou be with me in paradise.
3. Woman, behold thy son.
4. My God, my God, why hast thou forsaken me?
5. I thirst.
6. It is finished.
7. Father, into thy hands I commend my spirit.

Seven Towers (The), or 'Heptapyrgium,' of Constantinople, clustered in the southern end of the wall, not far from the gate of Marmora. Within these Seven Towers is the Golden Gate. The Seven Towers were used as a state prison.

Supposing the top margin of this page to represent the port of Constantinople, the bottom of the page would be the site of the Tower of Marmora, and a little higher up would stand in a cluster (on the right hand side) the Seven Towers and Golden Gate. And about as far from the top margin as the Seven Gates would be from the bottom margin would stand the palace of Constantine. The wall connecting these is called the Western Wall.

Seven United Provinces (The). Seven provinces of the Netherlands under the yoke of Spain, leagued in 1579 under the leadership of William the Silent (prince of Orange-Nassau), aided by Count Hoorn and Count Egmont, to throw off their subjugation. In 1609 they succeeded in establishing themselves into a republic, by an armistice for twelve years. The struggle was renewed and carried on till 1648, when all the powers acknowledged the independence of the provinces by the Treaty of Münster.

The seven provinces were (1) Holland; (2) Zeeland; (3) Utrecht; (4) Guelderland, with Zutphen; (5) Over-Yssel; (6) Friesland; and (7) Groningen, with Drenthe. In 1795 the United Provinces became the Batavian Republic, paying 8½ millions sterling for a French army of 25,000 men, and in 1806 Louis Bonaparte was made king of Holland. In 1830 Belgium was broken off and the Netherlands became an independent kingdom.

Seven Virtues (The). Faith, hope, charity, prudence, justice, fortitude, and temperance.

The first three are called the 'Holy Virtues.'

Seven Weeks' War (The). From 8 June to 26 July, 1866, between Prussia and Austria for German supremacy. Italy was allied to Prussia. Prussia declared the Gastein Convention invalidated 4 June, and the Prussian troops entered Holstein 8 June. Hostilities between Austria and Italy ceased 25 July, but the Bavarians were defeated 26 July, and a preliminary treaty was agreed to by the belligerents. The Treaty of Prague was signed 23 Aug., 1866, and the Treaty of Vienna between Italy and Austria on 3 Oct. By these treaties, Austria was entirely excluded from Germany; Prussia was placed at the head of the German states; and Venetia was added to the new-formed kingdom of Italy.

The battles were (1) Custozza (24 June), won by Victor Emmanuel; (2) Langensalza (27 June), in which Hanover, an ally of Austria, was defeated: (3) Nachod, same day, won by the Crown Prince; (4) Trautenau, same day, won by Prince Friedrich Karl; (5) Munchengrat, won 28 June; (6) Skalitz, same day; (7) Sadowa, won 3 July; (8) Olmütz, won 15 July; (9) Lissa, Austrians defeated Italians 20 July; and (10) the defeat of the Bavarians, 26 July.

Seven Whistlers (The). The 'Gabriel Hounds,' a yelping or whistling sound heard in the air, and supposed to forebode bad luck. Called 'Gabriel Hounds' from the notion that they are the souls of the unsaved hunted by Gabriel, and shrieking from the smart of his whip as he lashes them along.

N.B.—The cry really arises from birds, such as teal, widgeons, and wild geese, flying by night to new feeding grounds.

Seven Years' War (The), or 'Third Silesian War,' the third period of the War of the Austrian Succession between Maria Theresa of Austria and Friedrich II. of Prussia. The object was to determine to which of these two crowns should Silesia belong. It was divided into seven campaigns.

First campaign, 1756. Dresden captured by Friedrich II. Battle of Lobositz indecisive. The Saxons surrendered.

Second campaign, 1757. Three battles won by Friedrich; those of Prague, Rosbach, and Leithen; one lost, that of Kolin.

Third campaign, 1758. Battle of Zorndorf won by Friedrich; that of Hochkirchen lost by him.

Fourth campaign, 1759. Both Kunersdorf and Maxen were won by the Austrians.

Fifth campaign, 1760. Both battles (Leignitz and Torgau) won by Friedrich II.

Sixth campaign, 1761. In which the French allies of Austria were defeated.

Seventh campaign, 1762. The Prussians victorious throughout. Peace of Hubertsburg, and end of the war (15 Feb., 1763).

The Seven Years' War began because Prussia claimed Silesia. After seven years' fighting, and the loss of a million lives, Silesia was handed over to Prussia; but what was far more important is this: at the beginning of the war Prussia was only an insignificant kingdom; at the close of it, it was one of the great powers, and the rival of Austria.

In 1866 another contest arose between the two rival powers. This contest did not last seven years, but only seven weeks, and Austria yielded the palm to Prussia. After the Franco-Prussian war, in 1870-1871, the King of Prussia was universally acknowledged to be 'the German Emperor' also, and Austria was a separate dominion.

Seven Years' War with Sweden (The), 1563-1570. Erik XIV. of Sweden remonstrated with Frederick II. of Denmark for continuing in the national arms 'The Three Crowns,' commemorative of the Calmar Union. As Frederick gave no satisfactory answer, Erik retaliated by inserting the arms of Denmark in the royal banner of Sweden. The King of Poland and the city of Lübeck made common cause with Denmark. The Swedes, weary of the useless war and disgusted with their king, deprived him of his crown (1568) and confined him in prison, where he was poisoned by his brother and successor John, Feb. 1577. The first act of the new sovereign was to put an end to the war, but negotiations drawled on till 1570, when a treaty of peace was signed at Stettin by the belligerents.

Seventeen Provinces (The) of Karl V. (Charles-quint): Franche-Comté, Flanders, Artois, Malines (Mechlin), Anvers (Antwerp), Hainaut, Namur, Brabant, Limbourg, Luxemburg, Holland, Zeeland, Gueldre-with-Zutphen, Utrecht, Over-Yssel, Friesland, Groningen. Afterwards Cambray was added. In 1609 these provinces were divided into two parts, one of which was called the seven provinces of Holland, or the 'United Provinces,' and the other ten formed the Spanish Netherlands.

Seventh Day Baptists (The). A section of the Christian Baptist sect founded for the express purpose of restoring the Jewish sabbath, or making Saturday 'the Lord's Day.' There are also 'Seventh Day Adventists' both in America and in Europe.

Seventy (The). I. The Jewish Sanhedrim or national council, which consisted of a president called Nasi, a deputy, sub-deputy, and seventy ordinary members. Their place of meeting was called The Pavement. The seventy sat in the form of a crescent, thirty-five on each side of the throne.

II. A.D. 32. The seventy sent forth by Jesus to spread his mission. They were to go two by two, without purse, scrip, or change of shoes, but were endowed with the power of working miracles.

III. The seventy elders who were appointed to assist Moses in the wilderness (Num. xi. 16, 17).

Seventy Years' Captivity (The). I. B.C. 584-515. The captivity of the Jews in Babylon, which lasted seventy years. They were carried into captivity by Nebuchadnezzar, and released by Cyrus. Also called 'The Babylonish Captivity.'

II. 1305-1376. The time when the popes fixed their chair at Avignon, in France. It began with Clement V., and led to the Great Schism of the West (1378-1429).

Seventy Weeks (Daniel's). Supposing it to begin with the decree of Darius given to Ezra B.C. 491, and seventy weeks to mean 70 times 7 years (i.e. 490), this would bring us to the birth of Christ, 'when a finish was made to transgression, and an end put to sins by the reconciliation of the Messiah, the prince.'

Several Lands, lands enclosed, and separate from common lands. 'Nos pascua et campos seorsim ab aliis separatos Severels dicimus' (Minsheu, Dictionary, 1617).

My lips are no common, though several they be (i.e. My lips are not common property, though they are not inclosed or hedged in).—SHAKESPEARE, Love's Labour's Lost, iii. 1.

Severians, a religious sect of the 2nd Christian cent. So named from Severus their leader. They were exaggerated Encratites (3 syl.) who abstained from marriage, animal food, and wine; denied the salvation of Adam and Eve, and taught the existence of æons (Eusebius, book iv. 29).

Seville (Treaty of), 9 Nov., 1729, between Great Britain, France, Holland, and Spain. In 1731 the kaiser joined, and the five powers coalesced in the Treaty of Vienna.

Sex Viri (The). In the University of Cambridge. There are two courts, one to hear accusations against members of the University not in statu pupillari; and the other a court of discipline for those who are in statu pupillari. The latter court consists of the chancellor and six heads of houses appointed by grace of the Senate. The former, also elected by grace, held office for two years. The Sex Viri can deprive of a degree, but there is the liberty of appeal to the Senate.

Sexages'ima Sunday, 60 days before Easter. In all such ecclesiastical terms as Septuagesima, Sexagesima, Quinquagesima, and Quadrigesima (Sunday), the week is reckoned as a ten-day week, because the octave and the two eves equal ten. See 'Sunday.' Thus:

1 eve of Sunday, 2 Sunday, 3 Monday, 4 Tuesday, 5 Wednesday, 6 Thursday, 7 Friday, 8 Saturday, 9 Octave Eve, and 10 Octave. So in music, 7 notes with the octave of the first note we call an 'Octave,' and the 8 days of the entombment were 1 eve of Saturday, 2 Saturday, 3 eve of Sunday.

Sext (The). A continuation of the Decretals of Raymond de Penafort. Like the Decretals, the Sext is in 5 books. It was compiled by order of Boniface VIII., and contains the rescripts from Gregory IX. to Boniface VIII. See 'Decretum.'

The 3rd part of the Corpus Juris Canonici is the Extravagantes Communes, containing the Clementines and Extravagantes Joannis (i.e. Clement V. and John XXII.).

Sforza the More, or 'Moor.' Ludovico Sforza was called 'the More,' from morus, a mulberry. Either from a mulberry-spot or stain on his right arm, or from his armorial bearing (1451–1508).

Sforzes'chi (The), 1409. The partisans or company of Sforza, formed after the death of Barbiano. See 'Bracces'chi.'

Shadower (The). Apollodōrus, the Athenian painter (* –440 B.C.). Zeuxis was his pupil.

Shah (The). A diamond about half the size of the Orloff, given to the Emperor of Russia by Prince Cosroes, younger son of the Abbas Mirza, when he was in St. Petersburg. It weighs 86 carats, but is without a flaw or cloud.

Shah-zada, a king's son (Afghanistan).

Shakers, 1747. Reformed Quakers, led by James Wardley and his wife. They believe that the second coming of Christ is at hand. They are Unitarians, deny the doctrine of original sin, and the eternity of punishment. They say that baptism is the resurrection, and after baptism there is no marriage or giving in marriage, hence the married are then divorced, and the single must remain so. Anne Lee was their apostle, whom they called 'Mother'—that is, the mother of all living in the new creation. They are called Shakers from the shaking of their bodies in religious exercises. 'The fundamental principles of Shakerism are virgin purity, non-resistance, peace, equality in inheritance, and unspottedness from the world.'

The Lord promised He would shake the earth with terror (Isa. ii. 19). 'In that day there shall be a great shaking in the land of Israel' (Ezek. xxxviii. 19, 20). 'I will shake the heavens and the earth.' 'I will shake all nations, and the desire of all nations [Anne Lee] shall come.' 'Yet once more I will shake not the earth only, but also heaven' (Heb. xii. 26).

Shakespeare (The Spanish). Calderon [de la Barca], 1601–1687.

Shakespeare Cipher (The). In 1886 Mr. Donnelly, of Hastings, Minnesota, U.S., gave out that he had discovered by ciphers that Lord Francis Bacon was the author of the plays attributed to Shakespeare. The 'cipher' he referred to consisted of the blunders in pagination, hyphenation, bracketing of the great Folio edition of 1623, to which must be added capitalling words without any ostensible reason (thus the word Bacon is capitalised even in such compounds as 'Bacon-fed'), and in the use of italics. In regard to italics he says: In '1 Henry IV.' there are 7 italic words in the first column, p. 53; by multiplying these 2 ciphers we get $53 \times 7 = 371$, and the 371st word is 'Bacon.' Again. On p. 67 of the same play the first column contains 6 words in italics, and $67 \times 6 = 402$, which word is 'St. Albans.' In this sort of way Mr. Donnelly reads a minute history of Lord Bacon in cipher, and affirms that all the blunders and irregularities of the printed plays were designed. The secret writing was adopted out of fear of the jealousy of Queen Elizabeth, who looked on some of the plays, as for example 'Richard II.,' as no better than high treason.

Shakespeare du Boulevard, Guilbert de Pixérécourt (1773–1844).

Shakespeare of Divines (The), Jeremy Taylor, bishop of Down (1618– 1667). So called by Emerson from the fertility of his mind and the extent of his imagination.

Shakespeare of Eloquence (The), the Comte de Mirabeau (1749–1791). So called by Barnave.

Shakespeare of Germany (The). August Friedrich Ferdinand von Kotzebue (1761–1819).

We may parody the words of Coleridge on Klopstock, the German Milton, 'A very German Milton indeed.' Certainly Kotzebue is a very German Shakespeare indeed.

Shakespeare of Harmony (The). Richard Wagner (1813–1864).

This is a very exaggerated comparison.

Shakespeare of Painting (The). Salvator Rosa (1615–1673). So called by Garrick.

Shakespeare of Prose Fiction (The). Richardson the novelist (1689–1761). So called by D'Israeli.

Shaking Hands.

To confirm a bargain, mentioned 2 Kings x. 15.

As a salutation, mentioned by Homer, by Aristophanês ('Nubes,' 18), and by Virgil ('Æn.' i. 403).

In modern times the custom is English; most continental nations salute with kisses.

Shalmaneser, that is, Shalman of Assyria, son and successor of Tiglath Pileser. He reigned 14 years (A.M. 3276–3290, i.e. B.C. 724–710).

Sham'anism. The religious doctrines of the ancient Hungarians, and of many modern North Asiatics. The Shaman worshippers adored one supreme god called Isten with sundry inferior spirits, as the gods of the mountains, the woods, the springs, the rivers, fire, thunder, and so on. They offered sacrifice, especially white horses. Their priests were called Táltos, Kam, or Shaman, who were like the Roman augurs.

Shan'avests and Car'avats, 1808, the Ribbon-men of Tipperary, Kilkenny, Cork, and Limerick. They were rival factions. See 'Irish Associations.'

Neither the persons executed for these outrages nor anyone else could tell what was the dispute. It was notorious who were Caravats and who were Shanavests, and this was all.—ARNOLD.

Shâng Dynasty. See 'Chang.'

'Sharp Knife.' So General Jackson was called by the Indians against whom he fought in 1813 (1767–1845).

Shas'tras. A compilation of books in Sanskrit, containing the Upa-Vedas, the Up-Angas, and the Ved-Angas (q.v.), books upon the religious tenets of the Hindûs, their laws, the sciences, and the Sanskrit language, with two heroic poems. The Shastras teach that there is one supreme god called Brahm, but a triad deity consisting of Brahma, Vishnu, and Shiva.

She - majesty - generalissimo (The). Marie Henrietta, wife of Charles I., so called herself in 1643. At the death of Charles she married Lord Jermyn, and died 1669, at Colombe Castle, near Paris.

It is said she had a child by Lord Jermyn while Charles was alive.

She-wolf of France. I. Isabelle, wife of Edward II. who, according to a tradition, being in love with Mortimer, murdered her husband by thrusting a red-hot iron into his body. Hence Gray says, 'She-wolf of France, who tear'st the bowels of thy mangled mate.' She was the daughter of Philippe IV. of France.

II. Margaret wife of Henry VI. is so called by Shakespeare, '3 Hen. VI.' act i. sc. 4. She was the daughter of René le Bon, titular king of Sicily, but was brought up in the French court. In the war of the Two Roses she sided with the Lancastrians or Red-Rose faction. She is generally called Marguerite d'Anjou.

As a rule the French wives of our English sovereigns have not turned out well.

Sheb'sen. A Jewish sect founded by Sabathai Sevi of Smyrna (1625–1676). He proclaimed himself to be the Messiah, and found numerous followers in Germany, Poland, Italy, and Holland; but Sultan Mohammed IV. cast him into prison. They put a mystical meaning on the Bible and rejected wholly the Talmud. The last of the sect died in 1791.

Sheepshanks Exhibition. Astronomy. For undergraduates in the University of Cambridge. Value about 50*l.* a year, tenable for three years. The successful candidate must be or must become a student of Trinity College. Founded by the Rev. Richard Sheepshanks, fellow of Trinity, 1858.

Sheffield Trade Outrages, 1866–1867. Mainly connected with the Saw-grinders', Saw-makers', and Saw-handle-makers' Unions, and brought to a head in Oct. 1866 by the murder of one Fearnehough of Hereford Street, whose house was blown up with gunpowder because he refused to conform to the rules of the union of his trade. A reward of 1240*l.* was offered for the discovery of the perpetrator of this outrage, but without effect. At length the government sent down three Royal Commissioners to inquire into the matter, and they sat for twenty-five days, from 3 June to 8 July, 1867. Their report states that there were sixty unions in Sheffield, thirteen of which encouraged outrages.

Several centuries ago the artisans of Sheffield had their trade laws, which in 1624 were revised. By these laws—

Every artisan was bound to contribute to the union of his trade.

The number of men allowed to be employed was stated, their wages fixed, and the masters allowed to be employers were named.

The enforced holidays were every Monday, a month at Christmas time, and twenty-eight days from 8 Aug.

No person was allowed to work without serving a seven-years' apprenticeship.

The chief of the gang of outragers was William Broadhead, an innkeeper, at whose house the committee met, and his tools were Samuel Crookes (employed to shoot people and throw gunpowder into obnoxious houses) and James Hallam, who revealed the whole matter.

Charles Reade, in his novel 'Put Yourself in his Place,' gives a most powerful and graphic description of the organisation, management, and doings of these unions.

Sheik ul Gebel (The). Hussun Subah, called the 'Old Man of the Mountain' (q.v.).

Sheldo'nian Theatre (The), 1669. Erected by Gilbert Sheldon, archbishop of Canterbury and chancellor of the University of Oxford. It corresponds with the Cambridge Senate-house (q.v.).

Shemham-phorasch (The). A talisman made of parchment on which the sacred names were written.

A juggler came to Albert duke of Saxony and offered to impart to him the gift of infallibility. 'Well,' quoth the duke, 'that I may make sure of it, I will make the first trial on you.' So saying, he drew his sword and so hacked the impostor that not even the Shemham-phorasch could cure him.

Shepherd Earl of Cumberland (The). Henry de Clifford, the tenth baron by writ (died 1523). His mother, to save him from the Yorkists, sent him to be brought up by a shepherd; but in 1485 Henry VII. 'restored him in blood and honours,' and he was summoned to Parliament the same year (15 Sept.). His son and successor was the first to discontinue the de before the name.

Henry de Clifford was not earl of Cumberland The first Clifford who bore that title was Henry Clifford his son, created earl of Cumberland 18 July, 1525, 'uppon the joyefull newes of the Emperours victorie at Pavie, in Italy.'

Shepherdess of Dauphiny (The). Isabeau Vincent, who was only sixteen when she first appeared as a Camisard prophetess. She could neither write nor read, but was believed to be a worker of miracles, and prophesied 'without the slightest appearance of convulsion, and with a scarcely perceptible movement of the lips.'

Shere or Sheer Thursday. Maundy Thursday, or day preceding Good Friday. The Northern 'Skyre Thursday,' Icelandic 'Skíri-þórsdagr,' Maundy Thursday. Anglo-Saxon scir, sheer; Icelandic skíra, to cleanse. See Skeat, 'Etymological Dictionary,' article Sheer. Miles Phillips (1583) quaintly says: 'In olde fader's dayes the people wolde that day shere theyr hedes, and clyppe theyr berdes, and polle theyr hedes, and so make theym honest ayenst Ester day.'

Sheridan's Begums Speech, 1787. One of the impeachments of Warren Hastings, governor-general of India (1774–1785). This speech lasted five hours, and produced such an effect that the house arose and adjourned till the next day. It is said that Sheridan wrote the best comedy ('The School for Scandal'), made the best speech (the third charge against Warren Hastings), and composed the best convivial song ('Here's to the Maiden of Bashful Fifteen') in the language. See 'Hastings' and 'Begums.'

Sheriff is a 'shire-reve' and the chief officer of the county, who does all the crown business thereof. The judges, on the morrow of St. Martin (12 Nov.), meet in the Exchequer and propose three persons for each county, whose names are presented to the sovereign, who pricks one of them, and the person elected remains in office for one year or till a successor is appointed. The sheriff superintends the election of knights of the shire, coroners, and verderers. He is in the commission of the peace, and is ex-officio the first man in the county.

Every sheriff appoints a deputy or under-sheriff. It is customary for the high sheriff to receive and escort the judges to the assize court; and in cases of disturbance it is his duty to summon the posse comitatus (i.e. all the people of the county) to assist him in keeping the peace.

Some cities (like Norwich) are both cities and counties, and then the borough sheriff is part of the municipal corporation (addressed as Mr. Sheriff So-and-so). The county sheriff is termed the 'high sheriff.'

Sheriff-tooth. A tenure by the service of providing entertainment for the sheriff at his county court. A tax for the sheriff's diet. Obsolete.

Sherrardian Professorship (The) of Botany in Oxford University. Stipend 200*l.* a year. Founded by Dr. Sherrard in 1728.

Sherwood Forester (The). Dr. Spencer T. Hall.

Shibboleth. When the Ephraimites, after their defeat by Jephthah, tried to pass the Jordan, a guard stationed on the banks of the river tested everyone who came to the ford by asking him to pronounce the word 'Shibboleth,' which the men of Ephraim called sibboleth. Everyone who said 'sibboleth' was immediately cut down by the guard, and there fell in one day 42,000 Ephraimites (Judges xii. 1–6).

Shield of Rome (The). Quintus Fabius Maximus, died 203, called the Lingerer (Cunctator), and the Lamb (Ovicula) for his mild apathetic disposition.

Shi'ites (2 syl.), or 'Shiahs.' A Musulman sect opposed to the Sunnites. They recognise Ali as the real successor of Mahomet, and his descendants as the true imams. The word means heretics, and of course was given to them by the Sunnites, who call themselves the Orthodox party. The Musulmans of Persia, and some of those in India, Mesopotamia, Syria, and north of Asia are Shiites; but those of the Ottoman empire, Arabia, Egypt, Afghanistan, Malaya, &c., are Sunnites.

In India the majority are Sunnites.

Shin'toism. A religious system which prevails, side by side with Buddhism, in Japan. It is a 'religion of reason,' requiring no temples, but having a sanctuary into which nobody but the Mika'do and his priests ever enter. The Shintos profess to worship nature, ancestors, and the Mikado. Their code of duty is to obey natural instincts and the laws of the state. Since 1868 Shintoism has been restored in Japan, and now overpowers Buddhism.

Shintoism is a sort of Agnosticism, which it resembles in many respects. Neither doctrine nor dogma can find place in either system, nor anything that does not commend itself to reason.

Ship Money. A tax to supply and fit out ships to protect our coast and our merchant vessels from corsairs and hostile states. In 1007 all proprietors of 310 hides of land were taxed to equip a fleet against the Danes. Queen Elizabeth required various ports to fit out a certain number of ships against the armada. Charles I. levied ship money to restore the palsgrave to his throne. The attorney-general Noye put the king up to the dodge, and it was given out that our commerce needed protection from pirates, Turkish corsairs, and the French and Dutch mariners; so all the counties were taxed without consent of parliament, and the king was furnished with 218,500*l.* for his personal use, the tax being a money payment of 3,300*l.* per ship, instead of ships themselves. It was first levied on London in May, 1634; in the spring following on other maritime counties; later on it was demanded from the inland counties. In 1636 the judges determined it was legal, but so great was the outcry that it was abolished (17 Car. I. c. 14).

Ship of Fools (The), or 'Narrenschiff,' 1494, by Sebastian Brandt, a Strasburg lawyer (1458–1520). An allegorical satire in verse, in the Suabian dialect, and divided into 110 chapters, immensely popular at the time. It does not attack religious and moral delinquencies so much as social gaucheries. The tale is, a transport-ship of this world, laden with fools, and bound for Fools' Paradise (Narrgonia), was capsized by Antichrist. The voyagers, tossed on the surface of the waves, sought safety, some by prayer, some by scrambling into a crazy boat, and some by clinging to parts of the wreck. The sea was also strewn with books of an heretical character. The moral to be drawn from this allegory is that the abuse of printing will wreck the earth. The superstitious, he says, waste their lives watching the jumps of grasshoppers, knights enter church with hawk and hound, tradesmen have no honesty, manners at table are most gauche—carvers choose the best parts for themselves, some eat too fast, some talk too loud, and some engross the general conversation.

In 1860 an English translation by R. H. Mackenzie was published, with illustrations by Crowquill, and in 1880 another by Thomas Roscoe.

Shire'men (2 syl.), now called earls. In Saxon times they had shires committed to their supervision.

Shire-mote was an assembly in Anglo-Saxon England of the county or shire, held twice a year, and presided over by the shire-reeve or sheriff. In this court all the rights of the crown and church, connected with the shire, were settled, and all disputes about land were adjudicated. Our county courts are shire-motes, and the judge or presiding magistrate of these courts is a shire-man. The shire-motes were often held under a tree in the open air. In these motes the king's writs were published; demands of aid were announced, the presentment of criminals was received, local jurors were pricked, the taxes of each district were adjusted, and appeals from the 'soke,' or lesser courts of the hundred, were heard. It was inferior to the Witenagemote, but superior to the Folk-mote (q.v.).

Shorn Moss (The), in Weardale, Scotland. A pathway cut through a great bog, which was filled with fagots, over which the Scotch army made a backward movement when they wished to retreat from the army of Edward III. in 1327.

Short Parliament (The), or the Three-week Parliament. From 13 April to 3 May, 1640. There were three shorter ones, but this Three-week Parliament was called the 'Short Parliament' because it was followed by the 'Long Parliament.' See 'Parliaments, the Six Short.'

The Scots had made demands for triennial parliaments and for freedom both of elections and of debate, but the Earl of Strafford advised that the rogues should be whipped back into their senses, and the king summoned a parliament to raise money to stamp out 'the Scotch treason.' The new parliament distinctly declared that redress of grievances must precede a grant of supplies, and the parliament was summarily dissolved. It was the last that Charles I. dissolved.

Short Swords of Livonia (The), or 'Order of Christ,' 1205. Instituted in Livonia by Albert bishop of Riga, and incorporated with the Teutonic Knights in 1237.

Shortest Parliament (The). 7 days, from 21 to 28 March, 1681. The fifth and last of Charles II. It was held at Oxford. See 'Parliaments.'

Shrove Tuesday. The day before Ash Wednesday, the first day of Lent. So called because Catholics confess on that day and obtain absolution. To shrive is to absolve from sin.

Sibylline Prophecies. Twelve in number, manifestly a clumsy forgery of the 16th cent. They are as follows:—

1. The Agrippĭnan, Sibylla Agrippīna: 'Jesus Christ shall be outraged and scourged.'

Emblem, a whip.

2. The Cumæan, Sibylla Cumæa: 'God shall be born of a pure virgin, and commune with sinners.'

Emblem, a cradle.

3. The Cumānian, Sibylla Cumāna: 'Jesus Christ shall descend from heaven, and live in poverty on earth.'

Emblem, a crown.

4. The Delphic, Sibylla Delphĭca: 'The prophet born of the virgin shall be crowned with thorns.'

Emblem, a crown of thorns.

5. The Erythræan, Sibylla Erythræa: 'Jesus Christ, son of God, the Saviour of the world.'

Emblem, a horn.

6. The Europæan, Sibylla Europæa: 'A virgin and her son shall flee into Egypt.'

Emblem, a sword.

7. The Hellespontic, Sibylla Hellespontĭca: 'Jesus Christ shall suffer shame upon the cross.'

Emblem, a T (tau).

8. The Libyan, Sibylla Libўca: 'The day shall come when men shall see the universal king.'

Emblem, a lighted taper.

9. The Persian, Sibylla Persĭca: 'Satan shall be subdued by the true prophet.'

Emblem, a lantern, and a dragon under the sibyl's feet.

10. Phrygian, Sibylla Phrygĭca: 'Our Lord shall rise again.'

Emblem, a cross and a banner.

11. The Samian, Sibylla Samia: 'The rich one shall be born of a pure virgin.'

Emblem, a rose.

12. The Tiburtine, Sibylla Tiburtĭna: 'The Highest shall descend from heaven, and a virgin shall be shown in the valleys of the desert.'

Sibylline Verses. These go back probably to the 2nd cent., when enthusiasts of Alexandria 'prophesied' oracularly. Whatever merit might be attached to the originals, it is quite certain the 'prophecies' were interpolated and falsified to assist the views of those interested in the propagation of the Christian faith. The utterances of these sibyllists form a special department of early ecclesiastical literature, and are a mixture of Jewish, Pagan and Christian doctrines.

Sibyllists. Those Christians who corroborated the Christian religion by references to what they termed 'Sibylline prophecies.' These verses were the forgeries of a Jew of Alexandria, added to from time to time by Christians, as they wanted to corroborate certain doctrines.

It is most regretable that for many centuries the Catholic clergy and their learned adherents thought it no shame to interpolate, mutilate, and falsify books at pleasure, in order to make them instruments of ecclesiastical dogmas and traditions. But so it was, and they actually defended the practice, as it 'caught men by guile,' as St. Paul did.

Sicilian Expedition (The), B.C. 415–410. In the seventeenth year of the Peloponnesian War, Alcibiădēs induced the Athenians to send a powerful armament to Sicily in order to re-establish the Ionian interest in the island. A magnificent fleet was equipped, and a large land force prepared, but the expedition was most disastrous; the fleet was ruined, and most of the land forces were either slain or taken prisoners. The Lacedæmonians joined the Syracusians against the Athenians. This terrible affair was the Moscow of Athenian greatness.

Sicilian Ox (The). Thomas Aquīnas (1224–1274). Called ox from his great size, and Sicilian because he was a native of Naples and allied to the Sicilian kings.

Sicilian Table (A) A table spread with aldermanic luxuries. Mithæcos tells us that the Sicilians were as remarkable for their luxurious living as the Spartans for their simplicity of diet.

Sicilian Vespers (The), 30 March, 1282 (Easter Monday). The massacre of the French in Sicily out of hatred to Charles of Anjou, king of the Two Sicilies. A Sicilian bride, going to vespers, happened to pass with her train by a house where some Frenchmen were holding the festival of Easter. One of them, named Drouet, advanced towards the bride under pretence of seeking for arms (which no Sicilian was allowed to carry), and in so doing behaved rudely to her. A young Sicilian instantly stabbed him with his sword. This led to a riot, in which the Sicilians put to death 8,000 of the French. A war ensued in which Charles of Anjou was over and over again defeated, and he died in 1285.

It is somewhat remarkable that a similar outrage occurred on the 4th of April, the same year, at Catania. In this case the young Frenchman was Jean Viglemada, the young lady was Julia Villamalli, whose husband was slain by the libertine.

Sicilies (The Two). The island of Sicily is one, and the kingdom of Naples is the other. United under Roger II. 1130. In 1062 Robert Guiscard and his brother Roger commenced the subjugation of Sicily, and in ten years drove the Saracens out of the island, when Roger was made count of Sicily (1072). He died 1102, and was succeeded by his son Roger II. Meantime Robert Guiscard, as sovereign of Naples, Puglia, and Calabria, added Corfu and a great part of Romania to his dominions. He died 1185, leaving his son, Roger Bursa, his successor. Roger Bursa died 1130 without issue, when his cousin Roger II., count and king of Sicily, succeeded to the kingdom of Naples, and called himself king of the Two Sicilies.

After the Sicilian Vespers in 1282 Sicily was severed for a time from Naples; but the kingdom of the Two Sicilies was restored, and was at last destroyed by Garibaldi in 1860.

Corfu, pronounce Kor-foo.

Sicyon'ian School of Painting (The). Chief representatives were Eupompos, Pamphilos, and Apellēs.

Sicyon'ian School of Sculpture (The). Chief representatives were Euphrānon and Lysippos. The characteristics of this school were the representation of heroic strength and the forms of athletes. Alexander allowed only Lysippos and Apellês to represent him.

Side'tes (3 syl.). Antĭŏchus VII., so called from Sidê in Pamphylia, where he was brought up (B.C. 137–128).

Sidmouth's and Castlereagh's Five Acts, Nov. and Dec. 1819. I. An Act to prevent the training of persons to the use of arms; II. An Act to punish blasphemous and pernicious libels; III. An Act to authorise magistrates to seize arms collected and kept for purposes dangerous to the public peace; IV. An Act to prevent seditious assemblies; V. Castlereagh's bill for stamps on newspapers. Called 'The Five Acts' by the partisans of Sir F. Burdett, William Hunt, and William Hone, because they aimed especially to cripple them in their proceedings.

Castlereagh, pronounce Castle-ray.

Sidney Sussex College, in Cambridge University. Founded by Lady Frances Sidney, countess dowager of Sussex, in 1594.

Sidonian Era (The). This era began Oct. B.C. 110. See 'Era.'

Siege or Obsidional Pieces. Coins for the nonce issued by Charles I. during the parliamentary wars. They were, for the most part, articles of silver clipped into pieces, and stamped with some rude device of a castle the letters O B S, the date, and the nominal value of the piece.

Siete Partidas (Las), 1260. A code of Alfonso X. which in 1501 became the universal law of the land.

No deputies were present from the kingdom of Leon in the cortes of Alcala in 1348 where the code of the Siete Partidas first obtained a legislative recognition.—HALLAM, Middle Ages, vol. ii. p. 80.

Sigillum Confessionis. 'The Seal of Confession,' the obligation of a confessor under no condition whatsoever to divulge to any living creature the secrets of the confessional. This rule of secresy may be traced back to the 4th cent., but was not rendered obligatory till the 12th, when Innocent III. made its violation the most heinous of offences, and he who was proved guilty was punished by the severest penalties which the church could inflict.

Sigismund, properly 'Siegmund.' 'The Light of the World,' last of the promiscuous kaiser-kings of Germany (1368, 1410–1437). In this reign Huss and Jerome of Prague were burnt alive as 'heretics.' The house of Habsburg succeeded him.

Father, Karl IV. (the pope's kaiser); Mother, Anne of Schweidnitz; Wives, (1) Maria of Anjou, queen of Hungary, (2) Barbara called the Messalina of Germany. Contemporary with Henry V. and Henry VI.

Wenceslaus the Worthless was his brother.

'Sigismund was called 'Supra Grammaticam,' from his bad Latinity. Being one day reminded of a solecism, he replied: 'Ego sum Imperator Romanorum et supra grammaticam.'

Signory (The), or 'Signoria,' of Venice, 1178. The privy council of the doge; it consisted of six members, one for each district or sestiere. The college consisted of twenty-six members, viz. the Doge, the Signory, the three Capi dei Quaranta (chief members of the Forty), and sixteen Savii chosen by the Senate.

In Florence it consisted of eight priors with a Gonfalonier of Justice, who dwelt at the public charge in the palazzo, and held office for only two months.

Signs removed, 1766. Shop signs projecting over the footpaths were ordered to be removed from the streets of London, because their dripping in rainy weather and thaws was a nuisance to passengers.

Si-Han, or Western Hân. The first sixteen kings of the Hân dynasty of China (B.C. 202–25). These were about the best of the Chinese emperors. The second half of the dynasty was the Tong or Eastern Hân.

'Si j'avance, suivez-moi; si je recule, tuez-moi; si je tombe, vengez-moi.' The address of Henri de Larochejaquelein in the Vendean war 1794.

Sikhism. A compromise between Brahmanism and Mahometanism, advocated by Nânak (1469–1539) of Lahore. To him succeeded nine pontiffs called gurus (or teachers), the last of whom was Govind, who was assassinated in 1708. See 'Sikhs.'

It was Govind who called the Sikhs 'singhs,' or 'lions.'

Sikhs, 1494, i.e. disciples [of Nânak the Neo-Brahman]. Nânak of Lahore (1469–1539) was their first pontiff, or 'guru,' and was succeeded by nine others. The sixth, named Har-govind, rebelled against the Great Mogul and the tenth, or last guru, named Govind, taught that the duty of a sikh is 'to be humble and sincere, to eschew superstition, to practise strict morality, and to live by the sword.' On the decline of the Mogul empire, the power of the sikhs rapidly increased, and in 1764 they assumed the state of a distinct nation, or rather federation of twelve states. In 1805 Runjit Singh became head of the federation. After the death of Runjit Singh, a series of battles occurred against the British—as that of Moodkee, 18 Dec., 1845; that of Ferozeshah, 21, 22 Dec., 1845; Aliwal, 28 Jan., 1846; Sobrāon, 10 Feb., 1846; Chillianwallah, 13 June, 1846; Goojērat, 21 Feb., 1849, when the Punjab was annexed to British India.

The Sikhs worship one God, without image or mediator; they eat all kinds of meat except beef, the ox being too useful to be eaten. They dress in blue, even to their turbans; but other Hindûs consider blue to be unlucky. Their sacred book is called 'Pothi,' which means 'Bible.'

Silent (The). William I. the stadtholder of the United Provinces.

Our own king, William III., like his father and grandfather, was noted for his silence. After the battle of Wierden, in 1672, one of his officers asked him what next. 'Can you keep a secret?' asked William. 'Yes,' said the officer. 'And so can I,' replied the Prince, drily.

Silent Week, or 'Holy Week'—that is, the week beginning with Palm Sunday and ending with Holy Saturday. So called because no bells are rung in churches during the Hebdomada Muta.

Silent'iary (The). Anastāsius I., emperor of the east (491–518), was so called because he had been the chief officer whose duty it was to maintain peace and silence in the precincts of the palace.

Sile'sia was divided into three governments—viz. Liegnitz, Breslau, and Oppeln. At the death of Kaiser Karl VI. numerous claimants put in claims for parts of the empire. Prussia demanded Silesia; Sardinia demanded Milan; Spain demanded Bohemia and Hungary; and Bavaria claimed the whole empire.

Maria Theresa, daughter of Karl VI., was Queen of Hungary, and nominally Kaiserin. It was from this sovereign that Friedrich the Great claimed Silesia, and, after seven years' war it was added to the kingdom of Prussia.

In 1537 the Duke of Leignitz made an agreement with the Elector of Brandenburg that if either died without issue, the survivor should have both realms. In 1675 the Duke of Leignitz died without issue, but Kaiser Leopold I. claimed the dukedom as a forfeited fief. At the death of Karl VI. the Elector of Brandenburg (then Friedrich II. the Great, king of Prussia) claimed Silesia as his right, and this led to the three Silesian wars (1740–1763).

Sile'sian Poets (The), of the 17th cent. Martin Opitz (1597–1639), 'the father of modern German poetry'; Paul Flemming (1609–1640), the 'German Herrick'; Andrew Gryph (1616–1664), the 'father of the modern German drama'; and Gaspar Lohenstein (1635–1683), the 'blood and thunder' dramatist.

Sile'sian Wars (The). Three wars between Maria Theresa of Austria and Friedrich II. the Great of Prussia, for the possession of Silesia. First war 1740–1742, when, by the treaty of Berlin, Silesia was handed over to Prussia. Second war: Prussia having made alliance with France broke the treaty, and a second war broke out in 1744. This was concluded by the treaty of Dresden, 25 Dec., 1745, when Silesia was again confirmed to Prussia. The Third was the Seven Years' War, and consisted of seven campaigns (1756–1763). By the Peace of Hubertsburg Silesia was finally confirmed to Prussia.

Field-Marshal Daun was by far the best general on the Austrian side, and Friedrich II. the Great on the Prussian side.

Silk Armour. A sort of armour worn by timid magistrates in the troublous times of Charles II. It consisted of a doublet and breeches of quilted silk, so closely stitched, and of such thickness, as to be proof against either bullet or steel; while a thick bonnet of the same materials, with ear-flaps attached to it, and resembling a nightcap in shape, completed the equipment, and assured the wearer security from head to knee. Roger North describes this sort of armour, and Sir W. Scott avails himself of North's description in 'Peveril of the Peak,' chap. xxxii.

Silken Lord (The). Lord Thomas Fitzgerald (1513–1536), son of the Earl of Kildare. So called from the richness of his caparisons. He threw up his office of vice-deputy of Ireland in 1534, and was hanged at Tyburn for treason 3 Feb., 1535. Also called 'Silken Thomas.'

During his confinement he was lacking in the commonest necessaries of life; and the 'silken lord,' bare-footed and bare-legged, was indebted to the charity of his fellow-prisoners for the few tattered garments that hardly covered him. 'I have never had since I came into pryson eny other garment but a syngyll fryse gowne, nothyr hosyn, dublet, shoys, nor shyrt but on—and so I go barefoote and barelegys, and shuld have don styll, but that som pore prysoners have geven me old hosyn and shoys and shyrtes."—Letter to Rothe, S.P. civili.

Silly. Nickname of the Duke of Marlborough, from his constant use of this word when he disapproved of a suggestion: as 'Will your Grace besiege Lisle?' 'Oh, silly.' 'Will you besiege Ypres?' 'No! silly, silly!' (1650–1722).

Silly Billy. I. The nickname of William IV. of Great Britain, sometimes called The Sailor King, because he was lord high admiral of the navy (1765, 1830–1837).

II. William Frederick duke of Gloucester, chancellor of the university of Cambridge. He was the son of William Henry, a younger brother of George III., and died 1834. He married his cousin Mary, a daughter of George III.

It is said that William duke of Gloucester was shown one day over an asylum, and one of the inmates said 'Why, here is Silly Billy.' The duke in amusement said to the keeper, 'The man knows me.' 'Yes,' said the keeper, 'like all lunatics he has his lucid intervals.'

Silver Book (The). The MS. of the four gospels in Mæso-Gothic by Ulfilas bishop of the Goths in the 4th cent., preserved in the library of Upsâla, in Sweden. All the letters are silver except the initials, which are gold. The leaves are vellum; some purple, and others of a violet colour.

Silver Captain (The). Admiral Sir Henry Digby, who, 14 Oct., 1790, fell in with a Spanish vessel while shaping his course for Cape St. Vincent. It is said that each captain received 40,000*l.*, and each seamen 200*l.* as his share of this prize, and 63 artillery wagons were employed to convey the treasure to Plymouth citadel.

Another account states that each midshipman received 10,000*l.* as his share of this rich prize.

Silver Casket (The), 1568. A casket found in Edinburgh Castle after Mary (queen of Scots) delivered it up to Murray and Sir John Balfour. This casket contained letters of the queen to Balfour, and love sonnets. When Mary fled to England, and was in the hands of Elizabeth, commissioners were appointed to examine into the recent murder of Lord Darnley (Mary's husband), and this casket with its contents was laid before them. The originals have disappeared, but copies of the letters and sonnets are still extant. Whether these copies have been tampered with is a question sub judice, but they certainly are most discreditable to Mary

Silver Code (The), or 'Codex Argentëus' (q.v.). See 'Silver Book.'

Silver Crown (The). The crown of the King of Germany. As king of Lombardy, he was crowned with the iron crown (q.v.), and as kaiser of the Holy Roman Empire he was crowned with the imperial crown, which was a small episcopal mitre cleft in the front and not at the sides. He was crowned with the silver crown at Aix-la-Chapelle; with the iron crown at Monza; and with the imperial crown at Rome.

The kings of Germany did not go to Rome to be crowned latterly. Karl V. was the last kaiser who received his imperial crown from the hands of the pope.

Silver Hand. I. Nuad, the chieftain who led back the tribe of the Danaans from Scotland to Ireland, from which they had migrated. Nuad of the Silver Hand had an artificial hand made of silver by Cred the goldsmith, to supply the loss sustained from a wound received in the battle of Moytura. Miach son of Dian Kect set it on the wrist. So says O'Flaherty, 'Ogygia,' part iii. chap. x.

The battle of Moytura was long a favourite theme of Irish song. In the library of Stowe are five metrical chronicles of this famous fight.

II. An order instituted by Abd-el-Kader for 'the most worthy.' The hand was fastened to the camel's bridle. The order contained three ranks or degrees, the highest having seven fingers, and the lowest five. See 'Golden Hand.'

Silver People (The). So the Arabs call the inhabitants of the Tell, or cultivated lands of the northern slope from the Mediterranean to the Atlas mountains; the inhabitants of the towns they term the Gold people; and those of the Sahâra they call the Camel people.

Silver Stick. An officer of the Second Life Guards, who carries an ebony staff surmounted by a silver head, and relieves Gold Stick when on duty in attendance on the royal person. For particulars see p. 871, 'Gold Stick.'

Silver Tongue. Daniel Finch 2nd earl of Nottingham (1647–1730).

Silver-tongued (The). Spranger Barry, the Irish Roscius (1719–1777).

Simcha Thora (joy for the law). Last of the eight days of Succoth, or Feast of Tabernacles, held by the Jews in the month Tisri (Sept.). This day was, and still is, a day of joy.

Simeons of Van or Ormia (The). One of the three branches of the Nestorians. The other two are the 'Elijahs of Mosul,' and the 'Josephs of Amîda.'

Simmes' Hole. See 'Symmes' Hole.'

Simnel Conspiracy (The), 1486. A plot concocted by Richard Simons, a priest of Oxford, to palm off his ward, Lambert Simnel, a lad of about 11 years of age, and the son of an Oxford joiner, as Edward earl of Warwick, son of George duke of Clarence, and heir to the throne of England. Supported by many of the Anglo-Irish lords in the Pale, he was crowned in St. Mary's Abbey by the Bishop of Meath, with a diadem borrowed for the occasion from a statue of the Virgin Mary, as 'Edward VI., king of England and France, and lord of Ireland.' He invaded England, and was made prisoner by Henry VII. at the battle of Stoke near Newark; but, instead of being put to death, he was made turnspit boy in the royal kitchen, and afterwards falconer.

Simon the Righteous (Sir). Simon de Montfort earl of Leicester, and brother-in-law of Henry III. (1200–1265). He was very popular, and his death was deemed almost a martyrdom, for few kings have been more detested than Henry III. and his father John.

Simo'nians (The). So called from Simon Magus, who believed that the body of Jesus Christ was not a real body, but a mere phantom, like any other visible form of God or angel spoken of in the Old Testament.

Simon'ides (Constantine L. Philip). A literary impostor (1824–1867). While on a visit in the monastery of Khosos in Mount Athos, he fell in with some Greek MSS. greatly damaged by mildew, and taught himself Greek manuscript writing. He soon afterwards succeeded in imposing spurious MSS. on the learned of Athens and Constantinople, but, being detected, he fled to England. In 1854 he offered some genuine MSS. to the British Museum, and then tried to pass off his forgeries; but was found out by Sir Frederick Madden, and of course foiled However, Sir T. Phillips bought of him a spurious MS. of Homer on serpent's skin, which he professed to have belonged to Chios Hipparchos, son of Pisistrătos. He then sold some genuine MSS. to the Bodleian, but was again detected when he offered his forgeries. Some time after he sent to Berlin a palimpsest MS. in Greek of Egyptian kings, said by him to be the work of Uranios of Alexandria. Professor Dindorf began to publish this work, but Ehrenberg discovered that it was only a bad translation of the writings of Bunsen and Lepsius. Simonidès was now imprisoned, but, being released, retired to Alexandria, where he died of leprosy. See 'Literary Forgeries.'

Si'nait'ic MS. (The) of the Bible. So called from the place where it was discovered by Dr. Tischendorf, at St. Catherine Convent, foôt of Mount Sinai, in May 1844. On his first visit the monks allowed him to take away eleven sheets. At his second visit only one sheet remained, the rest having been used for lighting fires. Fifteen years later he was shown a bundle of waste paper, which to his delight contained parts of the Old Testament and all the New. This MS. is now preserved in the library of St. Petersburg. The date is supposed to be the middle of the 4th cent. See 'Vatican MS.' and 'Alexandrine MS.'

Singeing the King of Spain's Beard, 1587. So Sir Francis Drake called his raid upon Spain when the Armada was in active preparation. On 18 April he entered the road of Cadiz and destroyed upwards of 80 vessels; he then ran over to Cape St. Vincent, and demolished above 100 more, with 4 forts; and he next captured in the Tagus the magnificent ship called 'St. Philip.' All these vessels were designed to take part in the invasion.

Singh (a lion). An Indian title of royalty. In 1695 Govind abolished the system of castes, and changed the title of sikh (deist) into 'singh,' as Runjeet Singh of Lahore.

Single Bill Session (A). The autumn session of the British parliament in 1884, called by Mr. Gladstone to pass his Franchise Bill, rejected by the House of Lords in the preceding session the same year.

Single-speech Hamilton, 1755. This speech was delivered by William Gerald Hamilton upon the king's (George II.) speech demanding subsidies for Hesse and Russia. Legge and Pitt ranged themselves against the king, and even against their colleagues in the ministry. In the Commons the debate began at 2 and continued till 5 next morning (15 hours), the longest except one up to that period. The longest was on the Westminster election in 1741. Hamilton spoke in favour of the subsidies, and in 1761 was made Secretary of State (Ireland), and in 1763 Chancellor of the Exchequer in Ireland.

His speech in 1768 against Lord Townshend's proposal to tax America by import duties was both far-seeing and eloquent.

Singular and Invincible Doctor (The). William of Ockham or Occam, who died 1347.

Sinking Fund (The), 1716. Established by Sir Robert Walpole. It was to consist of the surpluses of the other funds, and to be employed in reducing the national debt.

The other funds were the South Sea Fund, established in 1711; the Aggregate Fund, established in 1714, and the General Fund, established in 1716.

Sino'pe (3 syl.), 30 Nov., 1853. The Russian admiral Nachimoff signalled to the Ottoman squadron to surrender. The Russian force was ten times as strong as the Turkish, and, as the Turks did not surrender, Nachimoff set the whole fleet on fire, and then, entering Sinope, set that on fire also. This butchery was called by the Russians a 'brilliant victory,' for which they 'thanked the Lord of battles' in solemn religious thanksgiving.

Sintu'ism. The primitive religion of Japan. It recognises a supreme deity (Tien)—i.e. heaven or the sun—and a host of inferior gods; deifies great men, and renders divine homage to virtue. The priests abstain from animal food. The Sintû religion teaches that there is a supreme god from whom issued two creator gods. Then succeed seven gods, the last of which created a part of Japan by dipping his spear in the ocean. Sintûism existed 600 years, at least, before the advent of Christ.

The word Sin means a 'hero,' and Sintû-ism means 'hero-worship.'

Sir Bullface Doubleface. Sir Norton Fletcher, for eleven years Speaker of the House of Commons.

Sir Dynamite, 1885. The signature of threatening letters issued by the Irish Land League. See 'Irish Associations.'

Sirdar (India). A general, a chief. The generalissimo is the Sirdar-i-sirdar.

Sirventes (2 syl.). Lays of war and chivalry by the Provençals or troubadours. The erotic poems were called 'Chanzos.'

Sister Reform Association, 5 July, 1819. A society of women at Blackburn to co-operate with the men in bringing about parliamentary reform. These associated women took upon themselves to instil into the minds of children what we now call radical ideas.

Sisters of Charity (The), 1634. Unmarried Christian women associated to nurse the sick, and relieve the sufferings of all inmates of hospitals. The society was founded in France by Vincent de Paul and the widow Legras. It was suppressed at the revolution, but restored by Napoleon in 1807, under the presidency of the empress-mother.

Si'vanism. The religion of the votaries of Siva. One of the three great divisions of the Hindû sects.

Six Acts (The), Nov. and Dec., 1819. The first by Lord Eldon, the last by Castlereagh, and the others by Lord Sidmouth. [Castle-ray.]

1. 29 Nov. An act to prevent delay in the administration of justice in cases of misdemeanour. (Eldon.)

2. An act to prevent the training of persons to the use of arms. (To continue till 1822.)

3. An act to punish blasphemous and pernicious libels. (Sidmouth. Aimed at W. Hone. To continue till 1822.)

4. An act to authorise magistrates to seize arms collected and kept for purposes dangerous to the public peace. (Sidmouth. To continue till 1822.)

5. 17 Dec. An act to prevent seditious assemblies (like those in St. Peter's Field, Manchester—see 'Peterloo'). (To continue for five years.)

6. An act for stamping newspapers.

Six Articles (The). A statute enacted in 1541 (33 Henry VIII.) commonly called 'The Bloody Statute.' Its object was to compel all British subjects to a uniform profession of six church dogmas, viz.: (1) The real presence of Christ in the eucharist; (2) the all-sufficiency of communion in one kind only; (3) the unlawfulness of the marriage of priests; (4) the indissoluble obligation of vows of chastity; (5) the propriety of retaining private masses; and (6) the obligation of auricular confession. Refusal to subscribe to these six articles was punished by death or imprisonment at the king's pleasure. Repealed in 1549. See p. 48, 'Articles on Theology.'

Six Articles of the People's Charter (The), 1838. (1) Manhood suffrage; (2) voting by ballot; (3) equal electoral districts; (4) annual parliaments; (5) no money qualification for members; (6) paid members.

Six Chroniclers (The). Dr. Giles compiled and edited six Old English Chronicles for Bohn's series in 1848.

1. Ethelwerd's 'Chronicle.'
2. Asser's 'Life of Alfred.'
3. Geoffrey of Monmouth's 'British History.'
4. Nennius's 'History of the Britons.'
5. Gildas Badonicus (i.e. of Bath).
6. Richard of Cirencester, 'On the Ancient State of Britain.'

The last three belong to Dr. Bertram's 'Scriptores Tres' (q.v.).

Six Days' Battle, A.D. 327. The battle between Colla usurper of Ulster and Muredach Tiry the rightful successor. 'Six successive suns went down on this fight.' Muredach was the conqueror.

Six Errors, 1418. The 'Six Errors' ascribed to John Huss, and exposed to public view at the chapel of Bethlehem. (1) That he denies to the priesthood the power of absolution; (2) he condemns the doctrine of absolute obedience in all things to a superior; (3) he maintains that an unjust excommunication is not binding; (4) he condemns as heretical all simony, of which offence he charges many of the clergy; (5) he asserts that prayers for the dead are useless; and (6) that money charged for ransoming souls from purgatory, for prayers for the dead, and for the sale of pardons are simply devices invented by the avarice of the clergy.

Six Nations (The), or 'The Indians of the Six Confederated Nations on the South-East of the Great Lakes,' called by the French the 'Iroquois,' viz.: The Mohawks, Oneidas, Onandagos, Cayugas, Sennekas, and Tuscaroras. In 1783 the flight of the Mohawks and Cayugas to Canada broke up the confederacy, and rendered the name no longer applicable.

The British, after the battle of Bunker's Hill, secured the Six Nations as allies.—GREEN, Hist. of the English People.

Six Sages of Venice (The). The doge's privy council. Every matter was first submitted to this grand jury, and, if approved, was next sent to the Forty, who were the council of state; and was finally sent to the 450 representatives who formed the legislative assembly, the members of which were annually chosen in the six quarters of the city.

Six-stringed Whip (The). The Six Articles (q.v.) were so called from their severity. Penalties were imposed for writing or even speaking against them.

Six unlucky to Rome. See p. 808, 'Semper sub Sextis, &c.'

Three is the French Fatal Number. See p. 819, 'Fatal Three.' To which might be added:

LOUIS III. the Blind. Had his eyes put out by Bérenger, who usurped the crown (888-923).

CHARLES III. le Simple. Was deposed in 887; reigned a short time with Eudes, but at the death of that prince had to abandon Normandy (Neustria) to Rollo; was imprisoned in the Château de Péronne, and died there (879-929).

PHILIPPE III. le Hardi. Went to Sicily to avenge the Sicilian Massacre (q.v.), was attacked by an epidemic, and died (1245-1285).

HENRI III. le Mignon. Beneath contempt, was assassinated by J. Clément (1551-1589).

NAPOLEON III. Being utterly vanquished by the allied Germans, resigned his sword, died in England, and with him ended the French empire.

There was neither a Jean III. nor a François III

Si dicitur semper sub sextis perdita Roma,
Francia sub tribus indubitanter perdita semper.

Old Rome found 6 her number of mischance,
But 3 the fatal numeral of France.

Sixteen (The). The standard-bearers of Florence. See under 'Gonfalons.'

Sixteen (The). 'La faction des Seize.' An insurrectional committee formed at Paris during the League (q.v.) consisting of 16 members, one to each of the 16 'quartiers de Paris,' Bussy-Leclerc being the principal. In 1587 to 1588 the Sixteen drove Henri from Paris and prepared the Day of the Barricades. In 1590 they offered great resistance to Henri IV. In 1591 they declared for Charles duc de Guise (son of Henri, 'Balafré'); but Mayenne sent Bussy-Leclerc to the Bastille, and the power of the Sixteen ceased.

Sixty Club (The). An Athenian club containing 60 members, who held their weekly meetings in the Temple of Herculês, in the time of Philip of Macedon.

Sizars, in Cambridge and Durham Universities, are students similar to the 'Servitors' of Christ Church, Oxford, and the 'Bible-clerks' of Oriel, Oxford, received at reduced fees. They are generally sons of the poorer clergy.

Sizings, in University parlance, means an allowance of food. Sizars have this allowance free. There are other privileges allowed them. Sometimes their rooms are free. There used to be duties attached to these sizarships, such as waiting on the Fellows, whence they dined at the Fellows' table (free) after the Fellows had left. In some cases they had to read the Bible lessons at chapel. The duties are now nil, but in some colleges they still dine as before.

Ski' Thursday. Maundy Thursday, that is, the day before Good Friday, meaning pure, clean, in allusion to the words of Christ when he washed the feet of his disciples. 'Ye are clean, but not all' (John xiii.). The Icelandic skirdagr, 'clean day,' our Anglo-Saxon scíne, brightness, splendour, our modern sky and shine. Corrupt for 'Skire Thursday.'

Skinless Prince of Wales (The). Richard, afterwards Richard II., son of Edward the Black Prince, was born absolutely skinless, according to a volume in French and Latin on 'Magna Charta' (1556). Under the head Nomina Regum et eorum coronatio we read this observation: 'Richardus II., filius Ed. principis Walliæ, natus sine pelle, et nutritus in pellibus caprarum, incepit regnare XXIII Junii, anno domini MCCCLXXVII.'

Skioldungs (The). A semi-historical race of kings in Denmark, so called from Skiold, son of Odin, who, at the death of his father, established a colony of Goths at Ledra, in Zealand, and ruled there as a chief, B.C. 40–28. From Skiold descended the Skioldungs, which furnished Denmark with 35 kings, the last of whom was Horda Knut II. (Harde Canute), 1047. The Skioldungs were succeeded by the Estrithides.

Magnus king of Norway laid claim to the crown of Denmark; but it was agreed between him and Horda Knut that whichever survived the other should have both kingdoms. Horda Knut died first, but the right of Magnus was disputed by Svend Estrithson, founder of the second dynasty. See 'Ynglinga.'

Skirmishing Fund (The), for the use of the Fenian organisation. Michael Davitt was charged with appropriating this money for the purpose of outrage and crime in Ireland. The verdict of the three Royal Commissioners in 1889 was—

We have shown . . . that Mr. Davitt was a member of the Fenian organisation and was convicted as such—that he received money from a fund which had been contributed for the purpose of outrage and crime, namely the Skirmishing Fund. It was not, however, for the formation of the Land League (q.v.) this fund was raised, but for the promotion of the agitation which led up to it.

Skotkönung, i.e. the tax-king. Olaus II. of Sweden was so called, because of his grant of an annual tribute to the pope, called Romskot or Rome-tax. He was also called 'the Fat' and 'the Saint' (992, 1000–1030).

Slade Professorship of Fine Art. I. Founded 1869, in the University of Cambridge, by Felix Slade. The professor must give 12 lectures a term free of charge.

II. Founded 1869, in the University of Oxford, by Felix Slade, who bequeathed for the purpose the sum of 12,000*l.* Chair held for three years, but the holder is eligible for re-election.

Slaughter of the Innocents (The). The murder of the children of Bethlehem and its coasts from two years old and under by order of Herod the Great, in order to cut off Jesus, who was born in Bethlehem about the same time Jesus escaped the slaughter because Joseph, from a warning dream, fled with him and his mother into Egypt. See p. 572, 'Massacre of the Innocents.'

Slave-carrying Act (The). Commanding that a certain given space between decks shall be allowed for each slave, and a certain stated supply of food and water shall be compulsory.

Slave Emancipation Act (The), 1807 (47 Geo. III. c. 36). African slavery abolished by the United States in 1808; in France, 1815. Traffic in slaves declared to be felony by 51 Geo. III. c. 23 (1811); declared to be piracy by the United States in 1820; by Venezuela in 1825; by Brazil in 1850.

Slave Kings of Delhi (The), A.D. 1186. This was 'The First Gaurian Dynasty' (q.v.).

Slave Ship. The first English slave ship in 1562 commanded by Sir John Hawkins was named the 'Jesus,' and Queen Elizabeth allowed Sir John to wear as his crest a manacled negro slave.

In heraldic language 'a demy Moor in his proper colour, bound with a cord.'

Slave Trade (Abolition of the), 47 Geo. III. c. 36 (25 March, 1807); declared felony 14 May, 1811.

Slavery has existed from the earliest ages. It spread from Chaldæa into Egypt, Arabia, and all over the East.

It existed in Greece in Homeric times, and Lacedæmonian lads were trained to ill-treat, deceive, and murder slaves. On one occasion as many as 3,000 slaves were massacred in one night by way of amusement.

Alexander, when he destroyed Thebes, sold the entire population, old and young of both sexes, for slaves. This was B.C. 335.

Among the Jews slavery was recognised by the Mosaic laws. Abraham had his slaves, and so probably had the antediluvians. Among the Jews slaves were either captives taken in war, or purchased as Joseph was, or born slaves, or men reduced to slavery for debt, theft, or some other offence. Masters had full power over their slaves, to scourge them, or even put them to death; but a bought Hebrew slave had to serve for only six years, when he became free (Exod. xxi.). If, however, he wished to remain in servitude, the master bored his ear with an awl (Deut. xv. 17), and he continued in his service till the year of Jubilee. Girls were sold for concubines; a man might sell himself or his children, and kidnapping was not uncommon among the Jews.

Slavery abolished in the United States, 31 July, 1865, the close of the American Civil War. Disputes respecting slavery gave rise to the secession of the Southern States in 1860. In 1861 President Lincoln allowed each state to maintain and regulate its own laws about slavery, but 6 March, 1862, he proposed the entire abolition of slavery in all the United States. The northern states ultimately prevailed, and slavery was abolished by proclamation of the President, January 1863. At the close of the civil war it was wholly abolished.

No compensation was given to the slave-holders, but it cost them 400 millions sterling; it cost the Federals in war against the Union 940 millions sterling. Total, 1,400 millions sterling.

It was abolished in Vermont in 1777, in New York 4 July, 1827.

Slavery in Ancient Greece. I. ATHENS. If they lived under the government of a master slaves in Athens were called oikéται (domestics); but after their freedom was granted them they were called δοῦλοι, and sometimes νόθοι (bastards, i.e. not genuine free-born citizens).

Slaves in Argos were called Gymnitæ.
" Crete were called Clarotæ and Mnoitæ.
" Sicyon were called Corynephori (κορυνηφόροι) club-bearers in battle.
" Sparta were called Helots (Εἵλωτες). See 'Slavery,' note.
" Thessaly were called Penestæ (πενεσταί), Thessalian serfs, said to be from Penestia, a district of Macedonia, but more likely from πένομαι, to work for one's living, whence πένης, a day labourer.

 Our English word 'slave,' we are told, means Slavonian, and comes to mean a bondman because the Italians at one time bought Slavonians for serfs. Vossius derives the word from Slaef, now Sklâve, one of the Slavonic tribes reduced to slavery by Charlemagne. Probably, however, it is connected with the Latin servus (one who serves), Ital. schiavo, French esclave.

II. SPARTA. Slaves in Sparta were called 'Helots.' The tale is that the people of Helos, B.C. 883, refused to pay the Spartans tribute, so the Spartans in vengeance destroyed their city, reduced all the inhabitants to abject slavery, and degraded their name by calling all slaves 'Helots.'

This is most improbable. The town was called Ελος, which could not possibly be perverted into Ελωτες, Helots. The verb ἁλίσκω (an infinitive of αἱρέω) means to seize, to take captive, and the tale referred to is most likely an etymological myth. There are thousands of such like etymologies.

 In the Peloponnesian War the Helots behaved with such bravery that they were rewarded with liberty, B.C. 424. But, alas! for the villainy of the Spartans, 2,000 of the bravest and best were murdered. See p. 872, 'Massacre of the Helots.'

Slavery in Ancient Rome. Men became slaves among the Romans in three ways: (1) being taken captives in war; (2) by sale and purchase; and (3) by way of punishment. The children of slaves were all born slaves.

Slaves were always sold naked. Those not warranted sound wore a cap, and were called pilati. Those from beyond seas had their feet shaved and ears bored. Some slaves were domestic servants, some followed trades, and some were instructed in literature and the arts. Masters had absolute power over their slaves; they might scourge them, and even put them to death. We are told that C. Pollio threw such slaves as offended him into his fish-ponds, to lampreys, B.C. 42. They were extremely numerous. Indeed Cæcilius Isidōrus left 4,116 slaves to his eldest son, B.C. 12.

Slavery in England. Captain [Sir] John Hawkins was the first Englishman who made a traffic of slaves. He procured negroes on the coast of Africa, and sold them in the West Indies, Oct. 1563.

In 1786 England employed 130 slave ships, and carried off annually some 40,000 slaves, and in 1833 the number of slaves in British colonies exceeded 770,000.

European avarice has been glutted with the murder of 180 millions of our fellow creatures. For every slave procured 10 are slaughtered in their own land by war, a fifth die on the passage, and a third in the seasoning.—COOPER, Letters on the Slave Trade.

Lord Mansfield's Judgment. The famous judgment of Lord Mansfield, 22 June, 1772, that 'slavery cannot exist in England.'

The case tried in the court of King's Bench was this: a poor slave named Somerset, brought to England, was, from ill-health, turned adrift by his master. Mr. Granville Sharpe took pity on him, fed him, housed him, and restored him to health. His old master now came forward, and claimed his slave as his own, but Mr. Sharpe resisted the claim, and law proceedings were taken by the master for the recovery of his property. Lord Mansfield was the judge, and gave judgment in favour of the slave, as English law does not recognise such a status.

Abolished in the British Colonies, 28 Aug., 1833 (3, 4 Will. IV.). By this Act slavery was abolished in British colonies, and the slave-owners were compensated for their loss by a grant of 30 millions sterling voted by the British Parliament.

1 Aug., 1834, as many as 770,280 slaves were bought off and set free.

Slavery in France. The holding of negro slaves was regulated in the reign of Louis XIV., 1685, by Colbert's 'Black Code.'

Abolished in the French Colonies. Slavery was abolished in French colonies by the National Assembly, 15 May, 1791. It was restored by Napoleon I. in all French colonies except Hayti, 1804; but was again abolished by the Provisional Government, 1848.

Slavery abolished in other Colonies.

In Danish colonies in 1848.

In Dutch colonies in 1860.

In Swedish colonies in 1746.

The trade in slaves was abolished by Austria in 1782.

Slavon'ic Liturgy (The). The Liturgy used in the Russian and Russo-Greek Church. It is also called the Liturgy of Constantinople.

Slavon'ic Nations (The). Poland, Russia, and Bohemia. See 'Celtic Nations,' 'Teutonic Nations.'

Slingsby Lawrence. The pseudonym adopted by G. H. Lewes in his play called 'Speculation' (or the 'Game of Speculation').

Sloane Collection (The), in the British Museum Library, consists of 4,100 volumes, chiefly MSS., on natural history, voyages, travels, and medicine. Also thirty volumes of Dr. Sloane's correspondence. Some of the drawings of animals are both rich and accurate, and two volumes of the insects of Surinam are from the pencil of Maria Sibylla Mérian, the great Swiss artist and naturalist. Collected by Dr. Hans Sloane.

Slobodisza (Battle of), 1665. Won by Sobieski, the Polish general, over the Cossacks.

Smalkal'dic League (The), 1530. A league signed at Schmalkald in Germany by the Protestant princes, by which they bound themselves and their heirs, for ten years, to assist each other by arms and money in defence of the reformed religion, and to act unitedly in all religious questions and movements.

Smalkaldic War (The), 1546–1547. Charles V., being threatened by the Turks, tried to win over the Protestant states to support him in the war, but they thought this a ripe time to stand at bay, and raise the standard of revolt. Charles put the Smalkaldic League to the ban of the empire, raised a new army, and marched against the revolters. In April 1547 was fought the battle of Mühlberg, in which the Protestants were defeated, and the Elector of Saxony and the Landgrave of Hesse were taken prisoners. This is called 'The First Religious War of Germany.'

Smallest Bible (The) in the world was one printed 1875.

In 1889 was printed at the Oxford Press the 'Finger Prayerbook,' weighing only three-quarters of an ounce. A 'Finger New Testament' was published in 1890.

Smallpox, called by the French 'la petite vérole,' is said to have appeared in Europe in the 10th cent., being introduced from the East by the Saracens; but it was not common till the 16th cent., when it was introduced by a negro slave in the suite of Panfilo de Narvaez, who commanded the expedition against Cortez in Mexico. Robertson reports that it proved fatal to fifty per cent. of those attacked. Dr. Guy, 'Public Health,' p. 197, says, 'Smallpox certainly attacked the Arabian army at the siege of Mecca in 569, and soon after reached Alexandria. By the 8th cent. all Europe was infected by it. . . . Anglada proves that the disease had shown itself in France and Italy as early as 570.'

It appeared in England and in Rouen in 1521. In Normandy four men called marquers were employed to look after the sick of each house. They wore a blue gown with a white cross. In 1520 and 1528 it broke out afresh in Italy, and was especially fatal in Rome. Paul Jove and Theodor Zwinger tell us that a Greek, named Demetrius, authorised by the magistrates, had an ox led through the streets, one horn being cut off, and a filet hung on the other horn. After it had promenaded the town, it was slain, and the smallpox disappeared. See 'Plague,' &c.

This was evidently a parody of the Jewish scapegoat.

Severe attacks occurred in 1174, 1365, 1440, 1556, 1564, and 1613.

In 1720 there died in Paris of smallpox 20,000 persons; in 1733 the inhabitants of Greenland were reduced by it from 30,000 to 7,000; in 1789 it committed great ravages in Russia; in 1743 as many as 75,000 died of it in Messina (Sicily). Baldwin king of Jerusalem died of it.

 The Chinese tried inoculation in the 11th cent.; and Timotheus, a Greek, in 1713 communicated this safeguard to the Universities of Oxford and Padua. It was first tried in England in 1721.

Smectym'nuus, 1641. An anagram of the five Puritan divines who controverted Bishop Hall's two books, entitled 'Episcopacy by Divine Right,' and 'An Humble Remonstrance.' Their names are Stephen Marshall, Edmund Calamy, Thomas Young, Matthew Newcome, William Spurstow.

Smith (King). Louis Philippe of France, who assumed the name of Smith when he fled to England.

'Mr. Smith!' exclaimed the king. 'That is curious indeed, and very remarkable that the first to welcome me to England should be a Mr. Smith, since the assumed name by which I escaped from France was Smith; and look! this is my passport made out in the name of Smith.'—The Times, 6 March, 1848.

Smith's Prizes for mathematics. Two of 23*l.* each for commencing bachelors of arts in the University of Cambridge. Founded by the Rev. Robert Smith, D.D., master of Trinity, 1768.

Smiths and Artists (Patron Saint of). St. Eloi (588–659), master of the mint in the reign of Clotaire II. Eloi = Eligius.

There was also a Nonne, a prioresse,
That of hire smylyng was ful symple and coy,
Hire grettest ooth nas but by Seynt Eloy.
CHAUCER, Canterbury Tales (Prologue, 118, &c.).

Smock Marriages. Marriages in which the bride divested herself in church of all her clothes except her 'smock,' under the notion that the husband would not then be responsible for any of her debts.

When a man designs to marry a woman who is in debt, if he take her from the hands of the priest clothed only in her shift, it is supposed he will not be liable to her engagements.—BRAND, Popular Antiquities (Vulgar Errors).

Sneakers, 1741. Those lords who refused to vote on the motion for the removal of Walpole from the ministry and counsel of the king. The motion was made in the Commons by Pulteney, and in the Upper House by Carteret, supported by the Dukes of Argyll and Bedford, the Earls of Sandwich, Westmoreland, Berkshire, Carlisle, Abingdon, and Halifax; and the Lords Haversham and Bathurst.

Sneezing and Yawning. The European custom of saying 'God bless you' when a person sneezes, and the Catholic custom of making the mark of the cross on the mouth when a person yawns, dates from A.D. 589, when a plague broke out in which people expired either sneezing or yawning. Pelagius died of the affection in 590.

The Catholic custom of making the sign of the cross when a person sneezes or yawns is attributed to Gregory of Tours (544–595). The ancient Romans considered sneezing a bad omen, and to avert the threatened evil cried Absit omen. Aristotle tells us that sneezing was accounted sacred among the Greeks (τὸν πταρμὸν θεὸν ἡγούμεθα); and Casaubon proves out of Xenophon that the Greek soldiers worshipped sneezing as a god, and averted evil consequences with the prayer, Ζεῦ σῶσον (God bless me). Ammian, in an epigram upon a man who had a very long nose, says:

Οὐδὲ λέγει, Ζεῦ σῶσον, ὅταν πταρῇ, οὐ γὰρ ἀκούει
Τῆς ῥινὸς, πολλὴ γὰρ τῇ ἀκοὴ σύνεγγυς.

He never says 'God bless me!' when he sneezes,
Because his ear so far is from his nose
It cannot catch the sound.

Several of the native Indian tribes look on sneezing as ominous, and utter their Absit omen or Ζεῦ σῶσον also. The Germans say 'Gesundheit' ('health') when one sneezes.

Snow King (The). So the German Catholic party named Gustavus Adolphus king of Sweden, who in 1630 interfered in the Thirty Years' War. They called him the 'Snow King' because he came from Sweden, the land of snow, and they thought he would melt away like Frederick V. of Bohemia, nicknamed the 'Winter King' (q.v.).

At Vienna he (Gustavus Adolphus) was called 'The Snow King,' who was kept together by the cold, but would melt and disappear as he approached a warmer soil.—Dr. CRICHTON, Scandinavia (Gustavus Adolphus II., 61).

Snow Queen (The). I. Christina queen of Sweden (1626, 1633–1689).

II. Elizabeth queen of Bohemia. She was crowned with her husband Friedrich V. elector palatine, 25 Oct., 1619, but fled in Nov. 1620. She was queen during the winter 1619–20.

Soapy Sam. Samuel Wilberforce, bishop of Oxford, and afterwards of Winchester (1805–1873). It is somewhat remarkable that the floral decorations above the stalls of the bishop and principal of Cuddesdon were S. O. A. P. (the initials of Sam. Oxon and Alfred Pott). When Soapy Sam went to inspect the building he was dismayed at seeing his sobriquet thus perpetuated.

Someone asking why the Bishop of Oxford was so called, the bishop himself replied: 'Because I am often in hot water, and always come out with clean hands.'

Socage. Tenure by fixed and determinate service. Almost all free lands in England are held by socage tenure.

Soccolanti (The). An order in the Catholic Church akin to the Franciscans. It was established by St. Paulet de Foligny (Foligno) in 1568. St. Paulet was a hermit who, seeing that the mountaineers in his neighbourhood wore wooden sandals or sabots (Ital. socco), adopted them himself, and hence his followers were called the Soccolanti.

Social Circle (The), 1790. A society founded by the Abbé Fauchet, having for its object the establishment of 'truth, liberty, and happiness.' Fauchet was elected 'Attorney-General of Truth'; Paris was appointed the centre of civilisation, and the Palais Royal was to be the place of assembly. At the inaugural address, 13 Oct., some 5,000 persons attended, and nearly double that number on 22 Oct., the day of the second meeting. This society soon gave way to the Theophilanthropists (q.v.).

Social Democratic Federation (The), 1886. The heads of which were Hyndman, Burns, Champion, and Williams. They inaugurated their society by riots, and frightful destruction of London club and shop property in the second week of February.

Social Reform Committee (The), 17 May, 1888. To push forward social reforms.

Social Science (The National Association of), 1857. For the promotion of cheap popular literature, called Sixpenny Science, because that was the price of the treatises produced once a fortnight.

Social War (The). I. B.C. 358–353. A war between Athens and her allies. Artaxerxes supported the allies, and Athens was compelled to make a disadvantageous peace.

Another (B.C. 220–217) between Philip of Macedonia and the Ætolians. A peace was patched up by Philip, who was the conqueror.

Social = confederate, and social war means war of several confederate or associated states.

II. B.C. 90–89, between the eight allied nations called the Italian Confederation and the Romans. The complaint was that they furnished two-thirds of the army, and were yet treated as aliens.

This war is also called Bellum Italicum and Bellum Marsicum from Pompædius the brave Marsian general. It is said that 300,000 men in the vigour of life fell in this war.

Socialism. A system for the regulation of labour by co-operation without competition. Louis Blanc was the father of the system, and his 'Organisation du Travail' was published in 1840. In this book he denounces the plan of 'individualism,' and advocates 'solidarity,' in which each workman is to be paid according to his need—a bachelor 2 francs a day, a married man 2½, and a man with a family 3 francs. In 1848 national workshops were tried in Paris on the Louis Blanc principle. Government was the employer of labour, and private enterprise was abolished as far as possible. It was soon found that the national workshops were overcrowded, work was ill-done, idle hands multiplied, and profitless work had to be invented to keep the men out of mischief. Some 1,500 tailors were set to work in the Hôtel Clichy at 2 francs a day, but the scheme was a total failure.

Plato's 'Republic' is an ideal communism. Minos and Lycurgos were communists. The early Christians had 'all things in common,' but the notion of government being the sole employer of labour, and paying each, not according to the work done, but according to individual necessity, was left to the device of Louis Blanc.

Bellamy's novel entitled 'Looking Backward' is based somewhat on the same idea.

Società degli Arcadi, or the 'Arcadians,' 1690. A literary society of Rome in which each member was called a shepherd of Arcady. Founded by J. M. Crescimbeni with the view of introducing 'good taste.' A history of the Arcadians was published by the society.

Société des Egalitaires (La). See 'Society of the Rights of Man.'

Pronounce So-ce'-a-tay days a-gal'-e-tare'.

Société des Familles (La). See 'Society of the Rights of Man.'

Pronounce So-ce'-a-tay day fah-meel'.

Société des Saisons (La). See 'Society of the Rights of Man.'

Pronounce So-ce'-a-tay day Say'-zon (n nasal).

Société des Travailleurs (La), 1825. The 'Industrialists' (q.v.), after the death of St.-Simon. The foundation departed from its original principles, and became communistic, advocating the absolute equality of man, the community of property, and the aristocracy of toil. Abolished by law in 1833.

Société en Commandite. A limited liability partnership. A sleeping partner puts money in a concern, and is responsible only to the amount he agrees to be responsible for.

Society for Constitutional Information in London (The), 1792. A corresponding society with the Jacobins of Paris. Its real object was to establish a republic in Great Britain. It numbered among its members several red-hot Americans.

Society for Constitutional Information in Sheffield (The), 1792. A society in strong sympathy with the French Revolutionists. In May it called on the 'Society of the Friends of the People' (q.v.) to establish a convention in London; but the latter society announced that they had no other object in view except parliamentary reform by strictly legal means, and that this end once secured they should forthwith dissolve themselves.

Society for Promoting Christian Knowledge (The), 1699. In 1701 a branch called the 'Society for the Propagation of the Gospel in Foreign Parts' was established. These societies distribute bibles and common prayer-books at very cheap rates, and sometimes gratuitously. The original society limits its operations to home, the branch society extends to the colonies.

Society for Promoting the Education of the Poor (The), 2 Dec., 1811, in Ireland. Commonly called the Kildare Place Society. A voluntary institution for the instruction of children, the instruction to be uninfluenced by religious distinctions. The Bible was not to be made a class book for teaching reading and spelling, and when read by pupils sufficiently advanced was to be without either note or comment. No religious catechism was to be taught, and no book introduced of a controversial character, that 'the religious tenets of the pupils might not be disturbed or interfered with.' A public grant was given in 1819, but withdrawn in 1830.

Society of Grütli (The). Mentioned in the report of the government of Zürich, 1844, as then existing in Switzerland. Its object was the abolition of the federation principle in the Swiss constitution.

Grütli is a meadow in the canton of Uri, at the foot of the Seelisberg, and is famous for the oath sworn on the night of 7 Nov., 1307, by Werner, Stauffacher, Walter Furst, and Arnold Melchthal to liberate Switzerland from the Austrian yoke.

Society of Jesus (The). The title under which the Jesuits were originally enrolled by Paul IV. in 1540. See 'Jesuits.'

Society of Progress (The). A secret democratic society of France in the reign of Louis Philippe. By the decree of 10 April, 1834, secret societies were forbidden, and therefore when a particular society was pounced upon and declared illegal, it changed its name and was reorganised. The interdiction of these secret societies led to the riots of Lyons and Paris (9, 10, 11 April, 1834), and prepared the way of the revolution of 1848.

Society of United Irishmen (The), 1793–1800. This egg was hatched by the French Revolution, and the Irish came nigh to rival the French in savagery and lawlessness. The ostensible object of the society was parliamentary reform, but its real design was anarchy. The soldier was taught to betray the king, the servant to rebel against his master, and the tenant to cheat his landlord. Magistrates, witnesses, jurors, all who attempted to support the laws were marked for destruction. Assassins spared neither sex nor age, and spread terror and dismay throughout the island. In 1796 a communication was opened with the French Directory, who promised invasion, and in December a French fleet anchored in Bantry Bay, but was forced to retire; a second attempt was equally abortive; at last by vigorous measures the rebellion was stamped out, and in 1800 the Irish parliament was abolished. See 'Irish Associations.'

Society of the Black Pin (The), or 'Conjuration de l'Epingle Noire.' A French secret society which arose from the Carbonari after the unsuccessful outbreak of 24 June, 1817.

Conspiration qui se forma sur la Restauration, et dans laquelle les conjurés avaient pris pour signe de ralliement une épingle noire.—LITTRÉ, vol. ii. p. 1468, col. 2.

 There was another secret society at the same period called 'The Society of the Red Pin, or La Conjuration de l'Epingle Rose.'

Society of the Friends of the People (The).

I. 28 April, 1792. An English parliamentary reform society, supported by the Lords Lauderdale, John Russell, Dare, Stanhope, and Fitzgerald. Many of the members were enthusiastic admirers of the French Revolution.

II. 1793. A society organized in Scotland in sympathy with the French revolutionists. Their standing toast was 'George the Third and Last, and damnation to all crowned heads.'

Society of the Rights of Man (The). 'La Société des Droits de l'Homme.' A secret political society formed in France during the reign of Louis Philippe. By the decree of 10 April, 1834, secret societies were interdicted in France, and therefore when a society was dissolved by the government it was soon re-organised under another name. Thus we have 'La Société des Familles,' 'La Société des Saisons,' 'La Société des Travailleurs,' 'La Société des Egalitaires,' and so on, all of republican or communistic tendencies. The prohibition of secret societies led to the revolution of 1848 and the expulsion of Louis Philippe from the throne.

Socinians. The followers of Faustus Socinus, an Italian (1539–1604), nephew of Lælius Socinus. He taught that God is one person, and denied the divinity of the Word and Holy Ghost, which he called 'expressions' and not 'persons'; he also taught that Jesus is no mediator, but only a perfect example of holy life; he furthermore taught that the punishment of hell is not eternal.

Socinians and Unitarians differ considerably in their views of Jesus Christ. The Socinians say he ought to be worshipped not as God, but as the Saviour of the world; and though a man, yet was He born through the operation of the Holy Ghost. The Unitarians admit neither of these dogmas. There are many Unitarians in England, but probably no Socinians. Trinitarians believe in the triple personality of the One God; Socinians and Unitarians both believe in the single personality of the One God.

Socratês (The English). Dr. Johnson is so called by Boswell (1709–1784).

Mr. South's amiable manners and attachment to our Socratês at once united me to him.—Life of Johnson.

Socratês (The Mad). So Plato denominated Diogenês the cynic (B.C. 419–324).

Socratês of the Musulmans (The). Abou-Hanifa, born at Cousa, died in prison at Bagdad in A.D. 757. He was chief of the Han'ifites (3 syl.).

Sodality of the Blessed Sacrament (Brothers of the). Certain fanatics which sprang up at Caen, in 1659, and gave out that their smell was so nice they could distinguish a Jansenist by the mere scent, and that all the clergy in Caen, except two, were Jansenists.

Sodor. A small village in Iona or St. Columba's Isle, corruptly called 'Icolmkill.' Magnus king of Norway, in 1098, obtained possession of this isle, with the rest of the Hebridês, and united it to the Isle of Man under one bishop. In 1333

England took possession of the Isle of Man.

Sodor and Man. The Hebridês were called by the Norsemen the 'Sudrejar,' i.e. 'Southern Islands,' corrupted and shortened into 'Sud'ar,' 'Sodor.' The bishop of Sodor and Man is (titulary) bishop of the Hebridês and the Isle of Man. See 'Orkney Islands.'

Sœur Louise de la Miséricorde. Mdlle. de la Vallière, the mistress of Louis XIV., was so called in her retirement (born 1644, mistress of the king 1661, retired 1674, died 1710).

Soffa'rian Kings (The), or 'Sof'farides' (3 syl.). A Persian dynasty which supplanted the Ta'herides (3 syl.) in many of their possessions. The founder was the brigand Yacoub the Soffar (or blacksmith). Yacoub reigned thirty years (872–902), and was succeeded by the Samanides (3 syl.).

The Ta'herides (3 syl.), Sof'farides (3 syl.), Sam'anides (3 syl.), and Bou'ides (2 syl.), were concurrent with the Califs, and reigned only over parts of Persia, as Seistan, Khorasan, Balk, and Tabaristan.

Sofi or Soffee Dynasty (The). See 'Suffavean.'

Soissons (Plot of the Comte de), 1641. Louis de Bourbon, comte de Soissons, had been proscribed by Richelieu for rebellion, and had taken refuge at Sedan, then the principality of the Duc de Bouillon. Here he entered into a plot with Spain, assembled troops, and assumed a defiant position. Richelieu sent an army against him; gave him a crushing defeat at Marfée, near Sedan; Louis de Bourbon was shot, and the plot fell through. See p. 752, 'Remember the Vase of Soissons.'

Soke or Soc. A privilege of administering justice and of executing laws in Anglo-Saxon times. The lord had the liberty of holding a court or mote of his 'soc-men' or tenants, who held under him by a fixed determinate service called 'soccage.'

Soldier. About 1214 Philippe II. Auguste of France kept a large standing army, and the pay was called their solde; hence 'sold-at,' and 'sold-ier,' a military servant who receives government pay.

Soldiers' Friend (The). Frederick duke of York and Albany (1763–1827), second son of George III., made colonel in the British army 1780; commander-in-chief in Flanders 1793; commander-in-chief 1798.

Sol'ecism. An impropriety in language, either of syntax or idiom. The Athenian colonists of Soloi, by their long expatriation, forgot their pure native language (Suidas, 'Soloi').

Solemn League and Covenant (The). I. 3 Dec., 1557, whereby the Scotch reformers bound themselves to stand unflinchingly to the Calvinistic reform, and to fight, if necessary, in its defence. The bond was signed by the Earls of Glencairn, Argyll, and Morton, Lord Lorn, Erskine of Dun, and many others, who assumed the title of 'Lords of the Congregation.' And from this hour to flinch or fall from the covenant was an unpardonable sin in Scotland.

II. 1 March, 1638, the Scotch agreed to join the parliamentary army against the king (Charles I.) provided both popery and episcopacy in the two kingdoms were extirpated. The league was modified 25 Sept., 1643, by Sir Harry Vane, and the terms were 'the kirk should preserve its purity and freedom, and the church of England should be reformed according to the Word of God.' Charles I. in 1647 coquetted with the league, promising to establish presbytery and to concur in the extirpation 'of the sectaries'; but he dallied too long and disgusted the league. Charles II. subscribed to the league 16 June, 1650; but it was declared to be illegal by 14 Car. II. c. 4.

The Solemn League and Covenant, the Magna Charta of the Presbyterian Church.—Sir W. Scott, Old Mortality, ch. xxxvii.

III. 1774, a confederation entered into at Philadelphia to abstain from the use of English goods. This was in abhorrence of the Boston Port Bill (q.v.), which the colonists described as 'a barbarous, cruel, bloody, and inhuman murder.'

'Solicitudo Omnium Ecclesiarum,' 7 Aug., 1814. A bull issued by Pius VII. for the rehabilitation of the Jesuit order.

Solomon Avon, 3 November, meaning the Eve of the Summer-close

'Avon' a corruption of even or eve, and 'Solomon' a corruption of the Irish samhuin = end of summer.

Solomon of China (The). Tae-tsong (* , 626–650), one of the most enlightened monarchs that ever reigned. He was the son of Kao-tsou, founder of the Tang dynasty (q.v.). This reign was the Augustan age of China. His wife was a lady also of singular wisdom and virtue.

Tae-tsong may be favourably compared with Antoninus the Roman emperor.

Solomon of his Age (The). Robert I. of Naples, 1309–1343. Pious, generous, and just; a great patron of learning and promoter of science. He died at the age of 64.

Solon of French Prose (The). Balzac (1596–1655), famous for his 'Letters.'

Solon of Parnassus. Boileau (1636–1711) was so called by Voltaire. He was the Alexander Pope of France, and his 'Art of Poetry' obtained for him Voltaire's cognomen.

Somnauth Proclamation (The), 1843, by Lord Ellenborough, governor-general of India. A pompous and foolish declaration that he restored to the Temple of Somnauth the sandal-wood gates which had been taken away 800 years ago. Now these gates were in ruins, and the people to whom they were promised had become Mahometans, who hated the Hindû religion of the Temple of Somnauth. So that the gates were worthless, and the Mahometans to whom they were promised would feel insulted, not honoured, by the gift. Again, the Hindûs, being a subjected race, the restored trophy of their subjection would be no more acceptable to them than to their conquerors.

Besides, it had been foretold that the restoration of the gates would be a forerunner of the end of the Sikh dominion. This prophecy proved true.

Son of Heaven (The) and 'The Ten Thousand Years' are the titles of the emperor of China.

Sons of Freedom (The). A Fenian organisation in North America opposed to Donovan Rossa. These 'Sons of Freedom,' also called 'The Robert Emmett,' have their head centre resident in Philadelphia. See 'Irish Associations.'

Sons of Liberty (The), 1765. An association of the colonists of North America, called into existence by Lord Grenville's Stamp Act. They combined to throw off allegiance to Great Britain and make North America independent. The association began in New York and Connecticut. The term 'Sons of Liberty' was suggested by a speech of Colonel Barré's.

The 'Daughters of Liberty' mutually bound themselves to drink no tea and wear no article of apparel imported from England while the import duties were unrepealed.

Sons of the Precept. Jewish children, who at the age of 13, having learnt the law and their daily prayers, were made answerable for their sins; for which, up to that time, their fathers had been held responsible. This evidently is the fons et origo of the Christian rite of confirmation.

Son'derbund (The), 1846. A league of the seven Catholic cantons of Switzerland [Friburg, Lucerne, Schwytz, Unterwalden, Uri, Valais, and Zug] to resist the federal diet, which had proclaimed the Jesuits, the Liguorians (q.v.), and other religious congregations. Sonderbund means 'separate league.'

Sonna (The), or 'Suna,' i.e. tradition. A collection of the Mahometan traditions, forming a supplement to the Koran. Those who accept these traditions are called Sonnites.

At the end of 200 years the Sonna or oral law was fixed by the labours of Al Bochasi, who had discriminated 7,275 genuine traditions from a mass of 300,000 reports.—GIBBON, chap. l.

Sophis (The), or 'Sophees,' i.e. Mystics. A Moslem sect inclined to pantheism. They look on the Koran only as a book of morals. The sect was founded in the 8th cent. by Abu Said Abul Cheir. The system is called Sophiism or Sopheeism. The four stages are (1) Humanity or obedience to the established religion; (2) the Path, i.e. of piety, virtue, and fortitude; (3) Knowledge, when man is equal to the angels; and (4) Truth or union with deity.

To a Mahometan the word Sophi is about equal to 'infidel.'

So'phive'an (or Safawi) Dynasty (The), 1499–1736. Founded in Persia by Ismail grandson of Sheik Sophi u Dien Izhak, a lineal descendant of Ali. These kings were called saints.

'Saints' applied to these 18 kings seems like a mockery. (3) Tamasp was poisoned; (3) Ismail II. his fourth son murdered all the princes of the blood royal and died of intoxication or poison; (5) Mohammed Murza was deposed; (6) Mir Hamzah was assassinated; (7) Ismail III. was assassinated; (9) Sefi, the Nero of Persia, had not one redeeming point; (11) Soliman was dethroned; (12) Tamasp was deposed and murdered; (13) Abbas III. was an infant set aside by the Affshars.

Sorbonne (The), 1252. The college founded in Paris by Robert de Sorbon (in the reign of St. Louis) for secular ecclesiastics (q.v.), who lived together in common, and devoted all their time to the study of theology. From the 14th to the close of the 17th cent. this college enjoyed a European reputation; its decisions on religious questions were deemed final; and it went by the flattering name of the Perpetual Council of the Gallic Nation. It is now used as a university, where the course in instruction includes, besides theology, science and general literature.

Soro'res de Pœnitentia. The same as the Beginæ (q.v.). They are spoken of in the bull of John XXII. (7 Kal. Martii, anno 3).

Sortês Bib'licæ, introduced during the reign of Charlemagne, was a method of telling fortunes by opening a book containing the Four Evangelists and the Psalms. The book was opened at random, and the finger laid promiscuously upon a passage, which was supposed to be prophetic. In the age of Clovis the book of the Acts of the Apostles was similarly employed. The Greeks used the poems of Homer and the Latins the 'Æneid' of Virgil as books of fate.

Sortês Sancto'rum. Consulting the Bible to know whether or not to do some stated thing, or how it will turn out if done. The Bible is opened at random, and the finger laid at random on any point. The passage pointed out is the answer. Mr. Berridge consulted the Bible on the question whether he should marry, and his finger touched Jer. xvi. 2: 'Thou shalt not take thee a wife.' I myself in a fit of curiosity consulted the oracle as to whether or not I should publish my 'Dictionary of Miracles,' and my finger touched Ezra iv. 22, 'Take heed now that ye fail not to do this.'

In the reign of Charlemagne, the Sortês Sanctorum was confined to the Four Evangelists and the Psalms. In the reign of Clovis the Acts of the Apostles.

Sortês Virgilia'næ. Consulting the Æneid of Virgil in the manner described in Sortês Sanctorum (q.v.).

In Persia the works of the poet Hafis are employed in a similar way. The Greeks used the Epics of Homer.

Sosii (The), the publishers. The Sosii were two brothers, booksellers and publishers of Rome in the time of Horace.

He [Carlyle] could not throw his thoughts into a shape for which the Sosii of the day would give him money.—J. A. FROUDE, Thomas Carlyle, vol. ii. p. 114.

Soter (Preserver). Ptolemy I. king of Egypt was so called by the Rhodians B.C. 304, because he rescued them from Demetrios, surnamed Poliorkêtês, king of Macedonia, by whom they were besieged.

Poliorketes means the taker of cities by sieges. Demetrios the besieger. It is rather remarkable that this very Demetrios was called Soter (Preserver) by the Athenians. 'Soter,' pronounce So-teer.

Sothic Period (A), 1461. Egyptian years. So called from Sothis, the Egyptian word for the Dog-star, and the Sothis or Canicular period began with the heliacal rising of the Dog-star.

Soulouque (2 syl.). A nickname given to Louis Napoleon at the coup d'état of 1851. Soulouque was the negro who was president of St. Domingo, called himself emperor, and established in that island (1849) a parody of Napoleon and his empire in France. By 'Soulouque' was meant that Louis Napoleon was making a burlesque imitation of his uncle; but the coup d'état proved a reality, and the second empire is not to be despised either in its duration, its power in Europe, or its influence on France. Certainly Napoleon III. was an Augustus of Paris, for he beautified it more than any of its crowned heads, and kept it tolerably in hand.

Soul-shot, 'Pecûnia Sepulchrâlis,' or 'Symbolum Animæ,' a mortuary or oblation made at a person's death. In Saxon times it was a funeral fee, and became a right settled on the church. It differed from a 'corse-present,' which was an oblation made at funerals.

Southcott (Joanna), 1810, declared herself about to be the mother of the promised Shiloh. She wrote a vast quantity of 'prophecy,' and sold seals which were to secure salvation to the purchasers. We are told that more than 100,000 persons believed in her, and a cradle of most costly materials was made for the expected babe, but in 1814 she died. Some, however, believed that she would rise from the grave and restore all things.

South-sea Bubble (The), 1720. The scheme of Sir John Blount, a leading director of the South Sea Company, to pay off the national debt (about 31 millions sterling) within twenty-six years. The proposal was accepted by the House of Commons 1 Feb., 1720, when 100*l.* stock rose to about 1,000*l.* By August 1,000,000*l.* of the new stock was subscribed for, but by the close of the month the stock began to fall. 22 Jan., 1721, Knight, the cashier, absconded, carrying the register of the company with him. The conduct of the company was inquired into by the House of Lords in June 1721. See 'South Sea Company.'

Blount's scheme was to buy up the unredeemable annuities, which amounted to 800,000*l.*, and reduce all the different public securities into one uniform fund, making the best arrangements he could with the present holders. See 'Committee of Secresy,' 'Assiento,' and 'Mississippi Bubble.'

South-sea Company (The), 9 Anne c. 21, 6 May, 1710. A company projected by Robert Harley for the purpose of relieving the nation of its floating debt, which amounted at the time to ten millions. The plan was to sell this debt to a number of merchants, who were to be guaranteed 6% interest, and to have a monopoly of the South-sea trade. The buyers of the debt were incorporated by royal charter as the 'South-sea Company,' and certain taxes were set aside to pay the annual interest, which amounted to 600,000*l.* 27 June, 1711, a capital of four millions was raised for the company under a royal commission. 18 Feb., 1715, the Prince of Wales was made a governor, and 3 Feb., 1718, the king himself, George I., was a governor. 7 April, 1720, the company offered to parliament to take into its hands the whole national debt, amounting to nearly 31 millions. See 'South Sea Scheme.'

South-sea Fund (The). Established in 1711 to pay the interest of that part of the National Floating Debt advanced by the South-sea Company and its annuitants. The debt was 10 millions sterling, and the interest at 6 per cent. amounted to 600,000*l.* a year.

South-sea Year (The), 1720. See 'South-sea Bubble.'

Sow has farrowed (The), 1819. When the English besieged Berwick they sent a testudo against the walls to undermine them. This movable penthouse was called a sow, because its roof resembled a sow's back. John Crab, a Fleming, erected a huge catapult, and one of the stones discharged from it smashed the wooden shed, and the soldiers under it ran as fast as they could to save themselves. 'The English sow has farrowed!' shouted the besieged, and by hurling lighted torches from the walls they set fire to the sundry machines of assault.

This jest was repeated, 7 Oct., 1337, by Black Agnes of Dunbar. Edward III. sent the Earl of Salisbury to besiege the castle of Dunbar, and a 'sow' was driven to the walls, when Agnes called out, 'Beware Montagow, for farrow shall thy sow,' and a huge rock falling on it, dashed it to pieces.

Sowars, native Indian troopers. In the Indian mutiny, 1857, the sowars were conspicuous for their bloodthirstiness.

Spa Fields (The Affair of), 2 Dec., 1816. A great crowd, led by Orator Hunt and Mr. Watson, met in Spa Fields. They called themselves Spencean Philanthropists or Spenceans (q.v.), and rushed to the Tower, demanding its surrender. The sentinel laughed at them, when they followed Watson to Snow Hill and ransacked a gunsmith's shop. The Lord Mayor and Sir James Shaw dispersed the mob, making several prisoners, but only one was executed. Capital was made of this riot in the House of Commons to urge the necessity of parliamentary reform.

Spahees, holders of military fiefs in Turkey. In war they are bound to arm at their own cost.

Spahis (The). The Arab cavalry in Algiers. The infantry are called Turcos.

Spain (Kings and Queens of). Ferdinand [Fernando] of Aragon and Isabel of Castile, 1479.

Then the house of Austria gives five kings, 1516–1700. Then follows the house of Bourbon.

House of Austria: Karl V., called Carlos I. (1516-1556); Felipe II., his son (1556-1598); Felipe III., his son (1598-1621); Felipe IV., his son (1621-1665); Carlos II., his son (1665-1700), no issue.

House of Bourbon: Felipe V., son of Louis the Dauphin, grandson of Louis XIV. (1700-1724); Louis I.; Fernando VI.; Carlos IV.; [Joseph Bonaparte 1808-1813]; Fernando VII.; Isabel (deposed 1868); Amadeus 1870; Alfonso XII.; Alfonso XIII. (born 1886).

Spalding MS. (The). A MS. romance written by the Rev. Solomon Spalding, who died in 1816. The 'Book of Mormon' (q.v.) is said to be a verbatim copy of this romance, first published in 1830.

Span-counter. Strutt (p. 384) informs us that this was a game similar to our chuck-penny. One of the players throws a counter and another tries to hit it, or to place his counter so near as to be able to span both (as in marbles), and in either case he wins both counters. In French: 'Jouer au tapper,' and in Italian, 'Meglio al muro. See 'BLOW-POINT.'

> Shortly boys shall not play
> At span-counter or blow-point, but shall pay > Toll to some courtier.
> Dr. DONNE, Satire, iv.

Spanish Donkey (The), or 'Equileus,' an instrument of torture employed by the Inquisitors. It consisted of a saddle mounted on a post, but the saddle was sharpened to a point. The victim was seated on this point, and heavy weights being attached to his feet, the point was slowly and gradually driven into the victim's body.

Spanish Era (The). This era begins with 1 Jan. B.C. 38. See 'Era.'

Spanish Fury (The), 1576. The Spanish soldiers under the Duke of Parma garrisoned in Antwerp mutinied in 1576 on account of their pay, joined the rebels, surprised the city, and made dreadful havoc of the inhabitants. The town-house and many other magnificent buildings, with 600 houses, were burnt to the ground, and upwards of 6,000 persons were killed or severely wounded. The 'fury,' which lasted three days, began 4 Nov. See p. 348, 'French Fury.'

Spanish Inquisition (The). Instituted by Ferdinand and Isabella in 1480 and suppressed in 1820. There had existed an Inquisition ever since 1208, when Innocent III. appointed a commission to 'convert' the Albigenses. Even in 882 Theodosius appointed inquisitors to search out and punish heretics; but what is generally understood by the Holy Office of the Inquisition is the modern Spanish Inquisition.

Spanish Liturgy (The). A Greek liturgy altered by Isidore of Seville (570-636). It remained in use till the 11th cent.

Spanish Liturgy (The Old), or 'Mozarabic Liturgy,' consists of the liturgy of Rome, mingled with the oriental liturgies of the Arian Goths. Its use was suspended by the council of Braga; and it was only saved from oblivion by Cardinal Ximenes, who reprinted it in 1500, and endowed a chapel and canons to use it daily in Toledo.

Spanish Main (The). The coast along the north part of South America.

> There was a loud demand upon Walpole (1733) to insist on plain terms for throwing open the trade to the Spanish main, and for satisfaction for past damages, but Walpole knew that such a course rendered a war hazardous.—HOWITT, Hist. of England (Geo. II. p. 418).

Spanish Marriages (The). I. That of Isabella II., who came of age in 1843 and who married against her will her imbecile cousin Don Francisco d'Assis 10 Oct., 1846.

II. The marriage of Louis Philippe's youngest son (the Duke de Montpensier) with the Infanta Luisa Maria, sister of Queen Isabella, also 10 Oct., 1846. These marriages were brought about by the intrigues of Louis Philippe under the hope of securing to his son the Spanish throne.

Spanish Phœnix (The). Lope de Vega (1562-1635) is so called by G. H. Lewis.

Spanish Shakespeare (The). Calderon is so called by the brothers Schlegel. Sismondi calls him the 'Poet of the Inquisition.'

Spanish Succession (1700). A question which led to a war of thirteen years' duration. Carlos II. had no child, and four crowned heads of Europe had pretty nearly equal claims to the succession, viz. the King of France, the Kaiser King of Germany, the Elector of Bavaria, and the King of Savoy. The last two retired, and left the field to France and Germany. Louis XIV. was the cousin of Carlos and son-in-law of Felipe IV. (whose eldest daughter he had married), and Carlos left the crown to Philippe d'Anjou, second son of the dauphin. The kaiser argued that France could not accept the Spanish crown, as she had renounced all claim to it by the treaty of the Pyrenees, and Karl, a grandson of Felipe IV., was the rightful heir. Louis XIV. proclaimed his grandson 'Felipe V.' of Spain, and Leopold proclaimed his second son 'Carlos III.' of Spain. War ensued, and England joined Germany. After a long contest, the French claimant was acknowledged by all parties. See 'War of the Spanish Succession.'

Spanish Tyrtæus (The). Manuel José Quintana (1772–1857).

Spear (The), or 'Lance' which pierced the side of Jesus on the cross, is thus accounted for. St. Andrew of Crete affirms that it was found by the Empress Helĕna in the cave of the temple of Venus at Jerusalem, with the cross and other relics. The shaft is in the basilica of St. Peter's at Rome; but Baldwin II. king of Jerusalem sent the head of it to Venice, and St. Louis (IX.) took it thence to Paris, where it was carefully preserved in the Holy Chapel till the French Revolution. See 'Crucifixion, Relics of the.'

St. Andrew of Crete died in 722, and he speaks of the spear in his 'De Exaltatione Crucis'; but certainly it is not included in any of the early lists of the relics discovered by the Empress Helĕna.

Special Purposes and Sanitary Committee (The Metropolitan). Responsible for the inspection and control of the 15,403 premises in which animals are slaughtered, or offensive trades are carried on; where petroleum and other explosives are stored; where cows are kept and milk sold; and where babies are farmed out. The committee has an inspecting staff of ten persons. It also presides over the testing of gas and gasmeters, for which it employs fifty chemists, examiners, and inspectors. Every alternate Tuesday it acts as the Contagious Diseases Act Committee.

Speculum (Dr. Dee's). A mirror which Dr. John Dee asserted was brought to him by the angels Raphael and Gabriel. At the Doctor's death it passed into the possession of the Earl of Peterborough at Drayton; then to Lady Betty Germaine, who gave it to John duke of Argyll. The duke's grandson (Lord Frederick Campbell) gave it to Horace Walpole; and in 1842 it was sold, at the dispersion of the curiosities of Strawberry Hill, to Mr. Smythe Pigott. At the sale of Pigott's library in 1853 it passed into the possession of Lord Londesborough, and is now in the British Museum.

It is a flat polished mineral, like cannel coal, of a circular form, and fitted with a handle.

Spec'ulum Hu'manæ Salvatio'nis. A sacred picture book in rhyme. This book and the 'Biblĭa Paupĕrum' (q.v.) were immensely popular before the Reformation.

Speculum Majus (The). A kind of encyclopædia in four parts by Vincent de Beauvais, who died 1264. Part i. containing a description of nature; part ii. containing philosophy, rhetoric, grammar, law, medicine, and theology; part iii. containing history, and part iv. moral philosophy.

Spencean Philanthropists (The), or 'Spenceans,' 1816. A society established in London by a Mr. Spence, a Yorkshire schoolmaster, assisted by Preston (a workman), Watson (father and son, surgeons), and Castles, who turned out to be an informer against them. Their platform was a common property in all land, the destruction of all machinery, and parliamentary reform. On 2 Dec. they met in Spa Fields, and went in a crowd to the Tower, when Preston summoned the sentinel to surrender, at which he laughed. The mob was dispersed, and one man was tried and condemned to death. Hunt made capital of this silly affair towards reform in parliament. The Spenceans were connected with the Green Bag Plot (q.v.).

Spenerism, 1690. A prototype of Methodism, or the establishment of 'collegia pietatis,' that is leavening confraternities. The whole community was divided into sections, each section had a centre of life, an earnest leader whom the section was to obey. There were exhorters to stir up the flagging, converts were placed under the eye of trusty overseers, and sections were vitalised by class meetings. So named from Philippe Jacques Spener, of Alsace, the founder of the sect (1635–1705).

Sphinx (The Egyptian) at Gizeh is attributed to the third Egyptian dynasty, but there are several of later date.

Spino'zaism. The philosophical system of Baruch de Spinoza, of Amsterdam (1622–1677), who taught that the universe is all one with a mundane soul.

That there is only one substance which is infinite, with two essential attributes—thought and extension. This substance is, in fact, Spinoza's deity, and all finite beings are merely parts or modifications of this one eternal whole. Spinoza died 1677, aged 45.

According to this system, the universe was not created by God, but the universe is God. God is everything, and everything is God; that is to say, God is 'the all in all.'

Spires, or 'Speyer' (Diet of). See under 'Diet.'

Spiritualists, or 'Spiritists' (The). Those who believe that men and women have intercourse with the spirits of the other world. Roman Catholics believe that holy men and women have communion with the spirits of the just, made perfect; but spiritualists believe that any spirit may be invoked, and questioned by the living. Originated in America in 1848.

Splendour of Reason or Wisdom (The). Mian-ning emperor of China, son of Kia-king. In 1840 he declared war with England for importing opium into his empire. In 1842 the war terminated, and five ports were thrown open to English traders.

Spoilt Child of Fortune (The). André Massēna, who, next to Napoleon, was the greatest of the French generals in the first empire. It was Napoleon who called him 'the Spoilt Child of Fortune' and made him prince of Eslingen, for his distinguished valour at Eslingen in 1809 (1758–1817).

Spolia Opi'ma. Spoils taken by a Roman general from an enemy slain in single combat. Only thrice obtained: (1) by Romulus from Acron king of the Cæninenses; (2) by Cossus from Tolumnius king of the Veientes, B.C. 318; and (3) by Marcellus from Virodomārus king of the Gauls, B.C. 222.

Sponge (The), filled with vinegar and presented to Jesus on the cross, when He cried 'I thirst,' is said to be in the basilica of St. John de Lateran of Rome. The Venerable Bede assures us that he saw it in the silver tankard used by our Lord in the Last Supper. See 'Crucifixion, Relics of the.'

A part of the sponge is said to be preserved at St. James of Compiègne, another piece at St. Sylvester, another piece at St. Maria Maggiore, another at St. Mary in Trastevere, another at St. Mark's, another at St. Mary's in Campitelli. St. Louis (IX.) we are told bought a part of the sponge of Baldwin with other 'sacred relics.'

Spot Ward. Joshua Ward, one of the physicians who attended the court of George II. So called from a claret spot (nævus maternus) on his cheek. He was famous for his blue, red, and purple pills containing antimony or arsenic.

Of late, without the least pretence to skill, Ward's grown a famed physician by a pill.

Spread-eagleism in America corresponds to chauvinism in France, and jingoism in England.

Spring Captains are officers of the militia summoned for duty in their respective regiments for about six weeks in the spring of the year. Also young officers who come to London in the spring to attend the Epsom and Ascot races, where they go 'to cut a dash,' and risk their money in bets. All well-dressed fast men were, at one time, called 'captain' by bookmakers, and are so still to a great extent. See p. 858, 'Summer Lieutenants.'

Spring-heeled Jack (1837–1838). Some one or party of confederates who assumed sundry diabolical shapes, and for six months kept London and its suburbs in perpetual fright. Robbery was not their game, but simply to scare. Spring-heeled Jack first appeared at Barnes as a white bull; then at East Sheen as a white bear; then at Richmond, Ham, Kingston, and Hampton as a man in brass armour; then at Teddington, Twickenham, Hounslow, and Sion Park. Afterwards at Uxbridge, Hanwell, and Brentford; then at Ealing, in steel armour; then at Hammersmith, as a gigantic baboon, &c. He attacked travellers and caused them bodily injuries, then with a somersault disappeared over a wall or hedge. Rumour said that the ringleader of this gang was the Marquis of Waterford, but no proof was ever adduced in support of this surmise. In the spring of 1838 these silly pranks ceased.

Even so late as 1877-78 an officer of her Majesty's service caused no little excitement at Colchester, Aldershot, and other garrison towns, by springing suddenly on passers-by.

Spurious Scriptures (The). See p. 801, 'Scriptures, Spurious.'

Spy Wednesday. The Wednesday of Holy Week, or the day before Maundy Thursday. The sanhedrim first sent a deputation to pry into the credentials of Jesus; then wily hypocrites to put questions to entrap him; at last they agreed with Judas to betray his private haunts during the hours of the night, and sent with the faithless disciple officers to apprehend his master.

Square Caps, in French 'Bonnets Carrés' (15th cent.). First made in France by Patrouillet, but used in England by ecclesiastics long before. The familiar name of a university cap is a mortar-board, which some affirm to be a playful corruption of the French mortier. This is doubtful, as the mortier is a round velvet cap, still worn in France by the présidents des cours de justice. It has not a flat square board, like a mortar-board, but resembles an inverted mortar used by chemists and druggists. As a rule mortier means a velvet cap, bonnet a woollen one.

Still the French mortar-cap may have suggested the playful name. St. Louis (1215-1270), in a window of Sainte Chapelle, is represented with a mortier on his head, and numerous MSS. and miniatures represent Louis XI. with the same sort of cap. All members of the French parlement wore scarlet robes and mortars.

Square the Circle (To). To find a square exactly equal to the area of a given circle, or (which is probably the same thing) to find the exact proportion between the diameter and the circumference of a circle. Roughly speaking, three times the diameter = the circumference, but the exact measure has never been discovered.

Anaxagoras died in prison while attempting to square the circle, B.C. 428.

Squares of a Right-angled Triangle (Euclid, i. 47). 'The square of the greatest side = the sum of the squares of the other two sides. This famous proposition is attributed to Pythagŏras; but the Chinese have had from time immemorial a somewhat similar one. If the three sides are respectively equal to 3, 4, 5 (or their multiples), then the square of the greatest side will equal the sum of the squares of the other two sides.

This is obvious from the diagram. The square of 5 contains 25 equal parts, the square of 3 contains 9, and the square of 4 contains 16. As $9+16=25$, the sum of the squares of the two smaller sides = the square of the greatest side of the right-angled triangle.

Squire Letters (The). Thirty-five letters sent to Carlyle in 1847 respecting Oliver Cromwell, purporting to have been written by Samuel Squire, a subaltern in the Ironsides. This Squire had served with Oliver from the 'first mount' of that indomitable corps, and had kept a journal (1642–1643). Carlyle requested to see the originals of these letters or this journal, and received for answer that the correspondent had 'gathered all the old Puritan papers, the Ironside Journal, and all Cromwell's autographs together, and burnt them,' adding 'Much evil hereby lies buried.' See p. 524, 'Literary Forgeries.'

Squitti'no (The) of Florence. A corruption of Scrutinio, a special council for the appointment of magistrates. The act of election was termed squittinare, i.e. scrutinium, because minute investigation was made into the qualities of the eligible burghers.

Sse-ki (The), or 'Book of Annals,' in five parts, begins the history of China from B.C. 2697, but no dates are given to the annals till B.C. 827, the reign of Siuen-wâng. It was the work of Sse-ma-Thsian, the Herodotus of China, who lived in the reign of Hân Ho-lee (89–106).

The Shu-king, a book of morals and history, is said to have been written in the mythical reign of Ya-u, who reigned 102 years (B.C. 2357–2255).

Stabat Mater Doloro'sa. This Latin hymn is sometimes attributed to Innocent III., but with greater probability was composed by Jacopone of Todi.

It has been set to music by Pergolèse (4 syl.), Haydn, Handel, Rossini, and others.

Stable-stand (in forest law) is when a person is found at his stand in a forest with a bow in his hand, or close to a tree with a greyhound ready to slip. It is one of the four presumptive evidences of deer-stealing. The other three are—

Back-berond, or back-berind; that is having a deer on his back.

Bloody-hand, when his hands or clothes are stained with blood.

Dog-draw, drawing after a deer by the scent of a hound led in hand.

Stadtholder. A high functionary in the republic of the Seven United Provinces of the Netherlands. Originally the word was given to the commander of the forces, then to the governor of a province, and to the general governor of the united provinces called his stadtholderate. The office was abolished at the death of William II., in 1650, but was restored in 1672 in favour of William III. (who received the crown of Great Britain). It was again abolished at the death of William III. in 1702, but was reconstituted in 1747 in favour of William IV. of Nassau, who was created 'General and Hereditary Stadtholder.' This continued till 1795, when France conquered Holland.

Staff of Jesus (The). Said to have belonged to St. Patrick. It was covered with gold and set with precious stones. It was kept in the Cathedral of Armagh till Fitz-Aldelm, the English governor of Ireland, removed it to the church in Dublin, in 1178.

Stagi'rite (The). Greek σταγειρίτης. Aristotle, born in Stagira, in Macedonia (B.C. 384–322).

Staircase (The) of Pilate's judgment hall, up which Jesus ascended, was sent by the Empress Helena to Rome in 356, and it was deposited in St. John de Lateran. It consists of twenty-eight stairs of white marble, now cased in wood for preservation. See p. 231, 'Crucifixion (Relics of the).'

Pope Leo IV., in 850, established the practice of mounting these stairs on one's knees. If they had not been cased with wood they would assuredly have been worn through.

Stalwarts (The), 1889. The new Radical party in the House of Commons. In the U.S. the more out-and-out members of the Republican party have been called 'Stalwarts' for fourteen or fifteen years (1890).

Stambool, i.e. Constantinople, is a corruption of εἰς τὴν πόλιν (Greek, 'to the city'), pronounced by the Turks Stan-bolin, shortened into Stambool.

Is it not rather a corrupt abbreviation of Constantinople into Stanti-pol, Stan pol, Stambool?

Stamp Act (The), 1764, by Lord Grenville. The imposition of stamp duties on our American colonies. Repealed, after several riots in Boston and other parts of North America, in 1766.

All that Grenville expected to obtain by this act was barely 1s. a head from the North Americans, which would have produced at the utmost only 100,000*l.* a year.—Howitt, Hist. of Eng. (Geo. III. chap. iii. p. 80).

 The principal Stamp Acts since are 55 Geo. III. c. 184; 13, 14 Vict. c. 97; 16, 17 Vict. cc. 59, 63; and the 17, 18 Vict. c. 83. The acts provide that a tax be imposed on all papers on which legal proceedings or private instruments are written, and also upon licences for retailing wines, letting horses on hire, cards, dice, cheques, receipts, and numerous other purposes.

Standard (Battle of the), 22 Aug., 1138, won by Stephen over the Scotch.

Standard (The) of the 'Battle of the Standard' consisted of the banners of St. Cuthbert of Durham, St. John of Beverley, and St. Wilfrid of Ripon, brought from their churches. This combination banner, raised on a tall mast, was set on a four-wheeled car. The mast was surmounted with a cross, attached to which was a pyx containing the sacramental wafer. This standard was erected by the English army which fought for Stephen against the Scotch, who took the part of Matilda daughter of Henry I., and niece of David king of Scotland at the time. The battle was fought at Northallerton 22 Aug., 1138. See above.

Standard (The Black). That of the Abbaside califs.

The dress, the turbans, and the standards of the Abbaside califs were all black.—Dr. Herbelot.

Standard (The Celestial). The great green silk flag of the Turks, said to have been given to Mohammed by the angel Gabriel. It is now preserved in four coverings of green taffeta, enclosed in a case of green cloth. It is twelve feet in height, and the golden hand which surmounts the pole holds a copy of the Koran. In times of peace this palladium is guarded in the 'hall of the noble vestments,' in which hall are preserved relics of the 'prophet,' as his teeth, beard, stirrup, sabre, and bow.

Standard Doctrines (The) of the Wesleyans, imposed by the Conference on every minister in the connexion, are contained in Wesley's four volumes of sermons, and his 'Notes on the New Testament.'

Standard of Augustus (The). A globe, to indicate his empire of the world.

Standard of Cheap (opposite Honey Lane). A substantial building for the supply of water, in existence in the reign of Edward I. Stow, in his 'Survey,' tells us it was made in the mayoralty of John Wells, grocer.

In the reign of Edward III. two fishmongers were beheaded at the Cheapside Standard for riot. And Henry IV. caused 'the blank charter' of Richard II. to be burnt at the same standard.

Standard of Constantine (The) was called the 'Labărum,' and the bearers were denominated Labarif ĕri. It was purple, with a gold fringe, and only unfurled when the emperor himself was in the field. This standard was decorated with the sacred monogram ☧ (Chr-istos). See Gibbon, 'Decline and Fall,' xx., note (1788).

Standard of Cornhill (The), 1582. A water conduit with four spouts made by Peter Morris, a German, and supplied with Thames water conveyed by leaden pipes over the steeple of St. Magnus's Church. It stood at the east end of Cornhill, at its junction with Gracechurch Street, Bishopsgate Street, and Leadenhall Street. The water ceased to run between 1598–1603, but the standard itself remained long after. Distances from London were measured from this spot.

Standard of Great Britain (The Royal). A red banner with the national arms covering the entire field.

The standard of Edward I. was a flag with the arms of England, St. George, St. Edmond, and St. Edward.

Standard of the ancient Danes: A flag fringed, and bearing a raven. Sometimes mounted on a stand with wheels. Since the 13th cent. the Dannebrog has been the Danish standard.

Egyptians: An eagle stripped of its feathers.

Franks: A tiger or wolf on a pole. After they became Romanized they adopted the Roman eagle, and later still a large flag with fleurs-de-lis.

Gauls: A lion, bull, or bear on a pole.

Greeks: See lower down.

Jews: See lower down.

Persians: In the time of Cyrus, a golden eagle with outspread wings. The blacksmith's apron; said to be the apron of Kawah, or Gao, who headed a rebellion against Biver, and used his apron for a standard (B.C. 800).

Romans: See lower down.

Standard of the Anglo-Saxons (The) was an ensign. It was a white horse on a pole. Later on it was a flag bearing a white horse.

Standard of the Greeks (The). The ancient Greeks had no national banners, but they had ensigns, called semeia [se-mī-ah].

The Athenian ensign was an owl on the top of a pole, in honour of Athēnê [Minerva], their protector.

The Corinthian ensign was a pegăsus or winged horse.

The Messenian ensign was the letter M.

The Lacedemonian ensign was a Greek L [Λ].

The Theban ensign was a sphinx, in commemoration of the monster overcome by Œdĭpus.

The signal for battle was hoisting on a spear a purple coat or white cloth. Polybius tells us that the Illyrians received orders to begin the fight by the hoisting of a white flag; the Megalopolitans by hoisting a purple coat. And Homer says that Agamemnon hoisted a purple cloth as a telegraph to begin fighting. When the ensign was taken down the fighting was to cease.

Standard of the Jews (The).

1. Of Judah: A lion.
2. „ Reuben: A man.
3. „ Ephraim: A bull.
4. „ Dan: The cherubim (Gen. xlix. 8–22). See p. 806, 'Evangelical Symbols.' (Jahn, 'Archeologia Biblica,' No. 287.)

There are three words—degel, oth, and nes—meaning a standard. The nes was not borne from place to place, but the pole of the flag was fixed in the earth (Jer. lv. 6, 21; li. 12, 27; Ezek. xxvii. 7). It seems to have been used as a call to arms. The oth appears to have been a long pole with a bunch of leaves fastened on the top.

Standard of the Prophet (The), A.D. 632. When Mahomet was dying, at Medĭna, on the eve preceding the conquest of Syria, the chief officers entered to hear his last orders. Ayesha, to save the prophet from further exhaustion, tore down the green curtain which screened one end, threw it to the officers, and told them to preserve it as a rallying-point for Islam. This standard floated over the walls of Vienna in 1683, but is never unfurled except at times of grave emergency. In battle it is borne to the front, where all may see it.

Standard of the Romans (The) was not a flag, but a pole surmounted with an eagle, horse, or some other device. A flag was always the proper and only ensign of the Roman cavalry. Under the empire a distinct body of soldiers, called 'Vexillārii' (flag-bearers), were embodied, to render assistance to the army if required and guard the frontiers. They were mounted, and carried a special flag or 'vexillum.'

Neither the Romans nor the Greeks had standards—i.e. large flags—but only ensigns.

Standard of the Turks.
The Sanjak Cherif of green silk. See above, 'Standard of the Prophet.'
The Sanjak Cherif of red silk.
The Tug, consisting of one, two, or three horse-tails fastened to the end of a gilt lance. Beys have one horse-tail carried before them. Pachas have three horse-tails.
The Alem, a broad standard with a silver crescent in the middle.
See 'Flags.'

Standards of Royalty, &c., in the Middle Ages.

The great standarde to be sett before the kinge's pavilion [not to be borne in battle] is to be of the length of eleven yardes, [but] the standarde to be borne [to battle] is to be slitte at the end, and vii. yardes long.
The erle's standarde is to be vi. yardes long.
The baron's standarde v. yardes long.
The bannerett's standarde iiij. yardes and the haulfe long.
The knighte's standarde iv. yardes longe.
Every standarde to have in the chiefe the crosse of St. George, to be slitte at the end, and to contayne the creast wyth the posy and device of the owner.

Standing Council of the Church (The), 1596. A permanent Scotch committee of Presbyterians, with supreme authority in the Presbyterian Church, whenever it was thought there was any danger to the ecclesiastical establishment. They were very dogmatical and most rancorous against Catholics.

Standing-fishes Bible (The), 1806. 'And it shall come to pass that the fishes [fishers] shall stand upon it from Engedi.' See 'Bible' and 'Scriptures.'

Stanhope Historical Essay (The), Oxford University. Value 20*l.* in books. The range is limited to the dates, 1800–1815. Founded by Lord Stanhope in 1855.

Stapleton College, 1815. The original name of Exeter College, Oxford. Founded by Walter Stapleton, bishop of Exeter

Star (The Order of the), 1350. A French military order, established by Jean le Bon. It consisted of warriors who had received wounds in battle. The knights of the Star vowed never to retreat before an enemy more than one mile, after which they had to make a stand and either conquer, be taken prisoners, or be cut down. Extinct about 1460.

Star and Luminary of Law and Lantern of Equity (The). Bartoli the Italian civilian (1812–1856).

Star Chamber (The). Chambre des Estoylles. In Latin, 'Camera Stellata,' 8 Henry VII. c. 1 (1486). Abolished 16 Car. I, c. 10 (1641). Green says, in his 'History of the English People,' 'the bonds of the Jews were deposited for greater security in a chamber of the royal palace at Westminster, which, from their Hebrew name of 'starrs,' gained the title of the Star Chamber.' The Latin equivalent, 'Camera Stellata,' does not support this hypothesis, but seems to refer to some 'starry decoration' of the chamber. We have the Painted Chamber, the White Chamber, &c., and, if Mr. Green's suggestion were correct, the Latin phrase would be 'Camera Stellarum,' not 'Camera Stellata.' We are told that part of the decorations of the Star Chamber may still be seen in Leasowe Castle, West Cheshire, the seat of Sir Edward Cust, baronet.

The jurisdiction of this court was without appeal in the hands of the treasurer and the keeper of the privy seal, assisted by a bishop, a temporal lord of the privy council, the chief justice, and two other justices.
The reason why the Court of the Star Chamber was so hated in Charles I.'s time is because Charles used it as a general law court to exact fines for his own exchequer. Amongst other cases were the following: A gentleman who had married his niece was fined 12,000*l.* Brawlers were fined 4,000*l.* or 5,000*l.* John Hampden was prosecuted in this court for refusing to pay ship-money. Chambers, an alderman of London, was fined 2,000*l.* for saying that men in England were worse off than those in Turkey. The judges in the court of the Star Chamber were the king's privy council. It was held in the palace of Westminster without jury.
The Star Chamber took cognizance of forgery, perjury, riots, frauds, libels, conspiracies, misconduct of judges and of other officers connected with the law-courts, contempt of the king's authority, and even treason, felony, and murder; but capital punishment could not be awarded by this court. Its power was restricted to fines, pillory, torture, mutilation, and incarceration for a term of years or for life. It dated back to very ancient times, but its powers were abridged by Edward III., and it was wholly abolished by 16 Car. I. c. 10.

Star of India (The), 1869. For distinguished merit or service in our colonial possessions. Originally it consisted of 25 knights of the grand cross, 60 knights commanders, and 100 companions; but in 1880 the numbers were increased to 35, 120, and 200.

Star of South Africa (The). A South African diamond, weighing in the rough 83½ carats, and after being cut 46½ carats.

Star of the North (The). Gustavus Adolphus, king of Sweden, was so called after his great victory at Leipzig, 7 Sept., 1631, over Tilly and the Catholic League. This was the first great battle of the Thirty Years' War.

The other two great battles of this war were Lützen (1632), also won by Gustavus; and Nordlingen, in 1634, won by the kaiser's son over the Protestants. This son was afterwards Friedrich III. of Germany.

Star of the South (The) weighs 254 carats, and is the largest diamond hitherto found in Brazil. It is a brilliant of purest water, and was found in July 1853 by a poor negress working in the mines of Bogagen.

Star-spangled Banner (The). The national banner of the United States of America. First applied to the American flag by Francis S. Key on the morning after the British attack on Fort McHenry, at Baltimore, in 1814.

Oh! say, does that star-spangled banner yet wave
O'er the land of the free and the home of the brave?

Star Tables (The), 1437. Compiled by Ulugh Begh, sultan of Samarcand and astronomer. They are still highly esteemed and referred to. See p. 284, 'Eelkhanee Tables.'

Starch. It is said that Mrs. Anne Turner invented the yellow starch which stiffened the ruffs so fashionable at one time in the haut monde. This Mrs. Turner also compounded love-philters, and was condemned to death 15 Nov., 1615, for poisoning Sir Thomas Overbury. On the day of execution Mrs. Turner wore a ruff stiffened with yellow starch, and the fashion went out of vogue.

The legend that Mrs. Turner was hanged by her collar is, of course, nonsense. She might appear on the scaffold in such a collar, that is, wearing one, but that is a very different thing from being suspended by it to the gallows.

In 18 Nov., 1849, Maria Manning wore a black satin dress when she was executed on the roof of Horsemonger Lane Gaol, and black satin gowns instantly disappeared from society.

Starkeyites (3 syl.). Faith-healers so called from Mr. Starkey, a clergyman, who joined James Prince, the founder of the Agapemônê at Charlynch, near Bridgewater.

Starosts (2 syl.). Dignitaries of Poland who held in the name of the king either a fort or royal domain. They taxed their own people, but paid one-fourth to the king.

Stars and Bars. The flag of the Confederate States of North America (1861–65).

Stars and Stripes. The national banner of the North American United States. The stars are white on a blue canton; the stripes are alternately red and white running horizontally. Said to represent the mullets and bars of the Washington coat of arms.

Start (The), 1650. The escape of Charles II. from Perth, during a hawking expedition, after the battle of Dunbar. He rode forty-two miles and passed the night in a miserable hovel at Clova, a village in Forfarshire, in the braes of Angus. Next day Colonel Montgomery induced him to return, and he was crowned by the Scotch parliament 1 Jan., 1651.

First the officers refused to serve under Leslie. . . . Next, they hinted doubts of the lawfulness of the war. . . . Then came the accident of 'The Start' which embittered and emboldened the zeal of the fanatics.—Dr. LINGARD, Hist. of Eng., viii. 4.

State Services (The), 1661. Four services annexed to the Book of Common Prayer after the Restoration: viz. one for Gunpowder Treason, 5 Nov.; one for King Charles's Martyrdom, 30 Jan.; one for the Restoration, 29 May; and one for the King's Accession. The first three were expunged from the book by order of council given by Queen Victoria.

Stately Sunday. Trinity Sunday is so called, because the mystery of the Trinity is the most stately of all. See 'Sunday.'

States-General (The). I. In French history was a deliberative assembly, consisting of deputies from the nobility, clergy, and commonalty. The first was convoked by Philippe IV. on 10 April, 1302, and the last by Louis XVI. in May, 1789, when the number of deputies was 1,145.

There was a states-general under Louis XIII., 27 Sept. 1614.

II. Of the united provinces. The legislative body consisting at first of only five members, but subsequently increased to seven. The states-general of Holland ceased to exist in 1795 when the republic was broken up.

The legislative body of the present kingdom of the Netherlands is so called.

Statesmen (The), in the Commonwealth of England were the civilians of the House of Parliament in contradistinction to the 'Grandees of the Army' (q.v.).

The grandees of the army felt that they no longer [in 1658] possessed the chief sway of the government. War had called them away to their commands in Scotland and Ireland; and during their absence the conduct of affairs had devolved on those who, in contradistinction, were denominated the statesmen.—Dr. Lingard, Hist. of Eng., viii. 5.

Statics (Father of). Archimēdēs of Syracuse, slain B.C. 212, aged 75.

Statics is the science of forces in æquilibrio, which produce rest. Dynamics is the science of forces which produce motion. To Archimēdēs we owe also the principal laws of hydrostatics.

Statue of William III. This equestrian statue on College Green, Dublin, was inaugurated in 1701, in commemoration of the battle of the Boyne in 1690. Twice a year, viz. 1 July, the anniversary of the battle, and 4 Nov., the birthday of William (the Orangemen's festivals), the statue used to be whitewashed, the king being decorated with a scarlet coat and orange sash, while a bunch of green ribbons and shamrocks was placed under the uplifted left foot of the horse. Garlands of orange lilies, and streamers of orange ribbons decked the horse, and any person passing the statue who neglected to take off his hat was knocked down, and then kicked for presuming to fall in the presence of the hero. In 1822 these biennial decorations were prohibited by law, and in 1836 the statue was blown to pieces by gunpowder. Daniel O'Connell, during his year of mayoralty, had the statue repaired and bronzed. The original statue was of iron, faced with lead.

Statuesque School of French artists. The school of painting founded by David (1748–1825).

David, pronounced Dah-veed.

Statu'ta Gui'gonis, 1134. The written rules of the Carthusians made by the fifth prior Guigo. Also called Consuetudines Cartusiæ.

Statu'ta Sabau'diæ. The code of laws by Amadeus III. of Savoy (1391–1451).

Statute Caps. Cloth caps enjoined by statute (13 Eliz. c. 19) to be worn by all apprentices. Similar to the caps of the Bluecoat boys. James I. had the size, shape, colour, and price of such caps fixed by Act of Parliament.

Better wits have worn plain statute caps.
Love's Labour's Lost, Act v. 2.

Statute-merchant, 12 Oct., 1283. A bond of record under the hand and seal of the debtor, authenticated by the king's seal. If the debtor failed to pay on the date assigned, execution was summarily awarded. See p. 8, 'Acton Burnel, &c.'

Statute of Labourers (The), 1349, fixing the wages to be given; and another 1360 which enacted that labourers, who absented themselves from their work or quitted their place of abode without permission, should be imprisoned for fifteen days and branded on their forehead with a hot iron. Trades unions were decreed to be unlawful. Every labourer was to work at a rate of wages fixed by statute.

Statute 6 George I. (The). Enacted that 'the crown of Ireland be inseparably annexed to that of Great Britain; that Ireland be bound by British acts of Parliament, if named therein; that the Irish House of Lords have no appellate jurisdiction; and that final appeals, in all cases of law and equity, be to the British House of Peers.' In 1782 Henry Grattan induced the British legislature to repeal this act, and the Irish parliament voted him a donation of 50,000*l*.

Statutes of Io'na (The), 1603 (James I. of England). The object of these laws was to bring the Hebridēans in line with the rest of Scotland.

The principal men of the M'Leods, the Macdonalds, Macleans, and Macneills (also Mackinnons, &c.) were Hebridean chiefs.

Statutum de Milit'ibus, 1307 (1 Edw. II.), defining and regulating the obligation to receive knighthood in England. It is now a coveted honour, but in the middle ages it was shirked, and laws were passed to compel those qualified to assume the honour. The compulsory obligation was abolished in 1642 (16, 17 Car. I. c. 30).

Steel Boys (The), 1760. Irish rebels who went about armed to rescue from the constables those taken up for refusing to pay rent, or who committed acts of violence in opposing the law. See 'Irish Associations.'

The cause of this armed rebellion was this: The estates of Lord Donegal (an absentee Irish landlord) being out of lease, he proposed to accept fines from his tenants in the place of rent. Many tenants were unable to pay the fine imposed, and some did not choose to do so. Evictions followed, the vacant estates were let to merchants of Belfast, whole districts were partly depopulated, and insurrection followed insurrection. When these uprisings were put down by the military, thousands of Irish migrated to America. Ireland continued in a state of turbulence more or less to the close of the century, the great grievance being the restrictions imposed by the British parliament on Irish commerce.

 During the 'Home Rule' trouble there was a gang of Irish robbers called Steelboys in the county of Mayo, but they had no connection with the agrarian agitators. See p. 428, 'Home Rule.'

Steel Hand. The founder of the race of Clephane of Carslogie was so called because, when he lost one of his hands, his feudal lord supplied him with a hand made of steel (SCOTT, 'Border Antiquities,' vol. ii. p. 206). See 'Duke with the silver hand,' 'Golden Hand,' and 'Iron Hand.'

Steelyard (The). The English branch and depôt of the Hanseatic League, on the banks of the Thames, and near London Bridge. It was a solid imposing structure, surrounded by a strong wall, and with three massive gates. There was a large garden, orchard, and vineyard attached for the delectation of the merchants and their apprentices.

Stee'nie (2 syl.). George Villiers (subsequently duke of Buckingham). When first introduced to James I. as cupbearer, at a supper entertainment at Baynard's Castle, the king (weary of Carr, who had grown spiritless) was much struck with the looks of the youth, and pointed out his imagined likeness to a beautiful head of St. Stephen at Whitehall, whence he gave him the pet name of 'Steenie,' which he ever after retained. He was furthermore called by the king 'his dog Steenie,' because the queen said he must be her watchdog, and whenever the king was about to make a fool of himself he was to pull the old sow by the ear. I fear his office was no sinecure.

Steenkirk (A). I. A wig. We have also a Ramillies wig. The battle of Steenkirk was in 1694. See 'Wigs.'

I hope your lordship is pleased with your Steenkirk?—VANBRUGH, The Relapse (1697).

II. A cravat or neckcloth carelessly tied and worn, 1692, by French ladies, in imitation of the lace cravats worn by the young French nobles surprised by William III. in the Netherlands. These young nobles, not having time to change their dress, rushed to battle just as they were, 'with lace cravats loosely tied.' As William was repulsed by Marshal de Luxembourg in the battle of Steenkirk in the Netherlands, 3 August, 1692, the furore in France was boundless, and every sort of article was called a Steenkirk something. There were Steenkirk collars, bracelets, and chains, Steenkirk perfumes, confections, and sauces. In short, 'Steenkirk' was the slang of the day. William III. is usually represented with a Steenkirk cravat round his neck.

Good chance saved me from this extremity of wretchedness. For just as I had yielded up my cravat (a smart Steinkirk, by the way, richly laced) enter Dougal, and the scene was changed. —Sir W. SCOTT, Rob Roy.

Stella, the pen-name of Mrs. Bowen-Graves, authoress of 'My Queen.'

Stella (Sir Philip Sidney's), Lady Penelope Devereux. Edmund Spenser called Sir Philip 'Astrophel,' 'lover of Stella'—formed from Phil (Greek φίλος, lover), and ἄστρον (=Latin stella), a star. Hence Astro-philos, Astrophel.

'Stella' (Swift's) was Esther daughter of W. Johnson, steward to Sir William Temple. Some say she was Sir William's natural daughter. Swift was her tutor, and in 1716 privately married her, but she went by the name of Mrs. Johnson, and never lived under the same roof as Swift. In 1728 she died 'of a broken heart' at the age of 44.

While the husband of Stella he became an admirer of Miss Vanhomrigh ('Vanessa'), leading her to suppose that he was unmarried. In 1717 she discovered the fact, and soon after died. Swift died 1745, aged 78.

Stella is Latin for a star=the Greek ἀστηρ, phonetically near enough to Esther for a lover's pun. It is rather strange that Miss Vanhomrigh's name was also Esther, which Swift fondled into 'Essa,' and adding Van[homrigh] before it, made the poetical name Van-essa. A third name of his was 'Varina,' a Miss Waring. Esther, in old Persian, means a star.

Stenkill (The Dynasty of). A dynasty of Sweden. It succeeded the Ivarian, gave five kings, and was followed by the race of Sverker. Stenkill race 1056–1129.

The Swedes chose Stenkill, but the Goths chose Hako the Red. The rival monarchs came to an amicable arrangement, stipulating that Hako should reign during his life, but that Gothland should revert to Sweden when he died.

Stephen, King of England, usurped the crown which by regular descent should have gone to Maud, daughter of the last king (Henry I.), wife of Geoffrey, Count of Anjou (Plantagĕnet). Maud was actually crowned in 1141, but Stephen was the recognised sovereign till his death, when the crown descended to the son of Maud (Henry II.). Stephen was the grandson of William the Conqueror by Adela, who married the Count of Blois (1104, 1135–1154).

Father: Stephen count of Blois; Mother: Adela, daughter of William I.; Wife: Matilda or Maud, daughter of Eustace count of Boulogne. (His son William inherited his estates and his title 'count of Blois.') Style and Title.—Stephanus rex Anglorum.

Stephen (Order of St.), 1764. A military order of Hungary revived by Queen Maria Theresa, the decoration being an Hungarian cross hung on a cerise-coloured ribbon edged with green. The legend is 'Sancto Stephano regi Apostolico.'

Stephen I. (St.), king of Hungary (979, 997–1038). His name was Vayik, and he was the son of Duke Geyza. St. Adalbert, in 993, on the baptism of Vayik changed his name to Stephen. He was called 'the Apostle of Hungary' and 'S. Stephanus rex Apostolicus.' His day is 20 Aug., still held sacred, and his embalmed right hand is carried in procession through the streets of Buda. The crown given him by Gregory V. is still called St. Stephen's crown, and with it the emperor of Austria is still crowned as king of Hungary.

He died and was crowned on Ascension Day, and five centuries after his death was canonised.

Stephen's Crown (St.). The crown of Hungary presented by Pope Gregory V. to King Stephen of Hungary. The present crown consists of two parts, but it is the upper part which was presented by the pope.

Sterco'rians. Those Christians who believe that the Eucharistic elements are digested and turn to corruption like other food. Of course, with those who believe in the dogma of transubstantiation, the difficulty is the promise: 'Thou wilt not suffer thy Holy One to see corruption.'

Stercorianism. The dogma that the Eucharistic elements are digested like other food. (Latin stercus, dung.)

Sterling Gold consists of 22 parts (called carats) of pure gold and two parts of alloy, either silver or copper. But fancy gold articles may be manufactured with only 15, 12, or even 9 carats of gold and the rest alloy. 1 lb. Troy of standard gold is coined into 46 sovereigns. There remains a small fraction over; but 46 sovereigns will do for a pound Troy weight.

A sovereign weighs 5 dwts. 3·27447 grains; but 5 dwts. 2½ grains is a legal tender.

The Bank of England gives 46*l.* 14*s.* 6*d.* a pound for gold, and 3*l.* 17*s.* 10½*d.* per ounce.

Sterling Silver consists of 37 parts of silver and three of copper. 1 lb. Troy of silver is coined into 66 shillings.

A shilling from the mint weighs 8 dwts. 15·27272 grains.

The standard value of silver is very variable. In 1870 it was 5*s.* an ounce. In 1875 about 4*s.* In 1878 it was 4*s.* 2*d.* In 1890 it varied from 4*s.* to 4*s.* 4*d.*

Stettin, in Prussia (Treaty of), 13 Dec., 1570. A treaty of peace after the Seven Years' War.

Steward of the Household (Lord). An officer in the royal household of England, head of the 'Board of Green Cloth.' He has no formal grant of office, but receives his charge from the sovereign, who presents him with a white wand, saying: 'Seneschal, tenez le bâton de notre maison.' The salary is 2,000*l.* a year.

These tags of French put into the mouth of our English monarchs are quite out of date, and ought to be abolished. Surely an English sovereign ought to speak the English language. English is fifty times a better language than French, and quite able to express the mystic phrase 'tenez le bâton de notre maison.'

Steward of the Marshalsea (Court of the). For the trial of treason murder, manslaughter, and blows by which blood was shed in any of the palaces or houses of the king during his residence there (Henry VIII.).

Stewart Diamond (The). A South African diamond discovered in 1872, and weighing 288¾ carats (nearly 2 ounces Troy). It is of a light yellow colour. See 'Diamonds.'

'Stir-up' Sunday. The last or 25th Sunday after Trinity. So called from the first two words of the collect. See p. 858, 'Sunday.'

Still Christmas, 1525. The festivities of this Christmastide were forbidden on account of the illness of the king (Henry VIII.).

Stockholm (Treaties of). I. 11 Sept., 1640, of alliance between Sweden and the States-General.

II. 20 Nov., 1719, an accommodation between Sweden and George I., in right of his Hanoverian dominions. George agreed to pay a million crowns on condition that Bremen and Verden were ceded to him in perpetuity.

Bremen and Verden had been ceded to Sweden by the Peace of Westphalia (1648).

III. 21 Jan., 1720. By this treaty, enforced by Great Britain, the King of Prussia got the town of Stettin, with the Isles of Usedom and Wollin, and a part of Pomerania.

Stettin was occupied by the Swedes 1630-1648, and after much contention was restored to Sweden in 1679.

Stoic Sect (The) of ancient Greece. Founded by Zeno of Cyprus (B.C. 358–260). He lectured in the 'Stoa Pœcîlê' of Athens, whence his disciples were called stoics, or frequenters of the porch. The main doctrines of this sect were fatalism, perfect subjection of the passions, and the freedom of the will. Zeno considered the earth to be a sentient animal, of which God is the living soul. His contemporaries were Persæos, Aristo, Herillos, and Sphæros. Their successors were Cleanthês, Chrysippos, Zeno and Athenodôros of Tarsus, Panætîos, Diogênês the Babylonian, and Posidonîos.

The New School consisted of Epictêtos of Phrygia (A.D. 50–120), Arrian the historian (A.D. 90–182), and Marcus Aurêlius the Roman emperor (A.D. 130–180), author of 'Meditations' written in Greek, and for style, humility, and piety unrivalled among heathen writers. The poet Senêca was a Stoic.

Stolbowa (Peace of), Feb. 27, 1617, between Sweden and Russia, by which Russia gave up Carelia, Ingria, Novgorod, and Narva to Sweden; renounced all pretensions on Livonia; and paid Sweden 200,000 roubles (8,000*l.*).

Stone Age (The). The period of stone implements, preceding the bronze age. See p. 14, 'Ages.'

Stone Staircase (The), Venice. A flight of forty-five stone steps leading up to the doge's palace. See p. 866, 'Giant's Stairs.'

Stone of Destiny (The). The Lia Fail of Ireland, better known as the Scone Stone, removed by Edward I. from Scotland and enclosed in our coronation chair, in Westminster Abbey, where it still remains. It was called the 'Fatale Marmor,' or 'Stone of Destiny,' from the notion, inscribed on it, that wherever this stone is, the Scots shall be the dominant power; and the succession of the Stuarts is thought to be sufficient to justify the prophecy. See 'Lia Fail.'

Ni fallat fatum, Scoti, quocunque locatum
Invenient lapidem, regnare tenentur ibidem.
Where'er this stone may be, such is the Fates decree,
There the Scottish race will fill the highest place.

It is a great pity it was not sent back again, for a worse dynasty than that of the Stuarts could not be easily found.

Stone of Infamy (The). A large flagstone on which bankrupts were bumped on Shrove Tuesday. There is still one to be seen in Venice near St. Mark's church, another in Verona, a third in Florence in the old market place. One by one the bankrupts were brought to the stone, partially stripped, and then, being lifted into the air by two or three stout men, bumped twelve times 'in honour of the twelve apostles.' At each bump the creditors crowed like cocks.

Stone of the Swede (The). Gustavus Adolphus was slain at Lützen 16 Nov., 1632. His body was found the next day not far from the great stone between Lützen and the canal. This stone has ever since been called 'The Stone of the Swede.'

In 1832 the German nation erected a noble monument to the memory of the Swedish king.

Stonewall Jackson. Thomas Jefferson Jackson, general of the southern or confederate army in the great American Civil War. He contributed to the defeat of the federals at Bull Run 21 July, 1861; distinguished himself in the battles of Chickahominy June, 1862; defeated General Banks at Cedar Mountain 9 Aug., 1862; captured Harper's Ferry 15 Sept., 1862; fought in the battle of Antietam 17 Sept., 1862; contributed to the defeat of Hooker at Chancellorsville 2 May, 1863, and here he received his death wound. It was General Bee who said, in the battle of Bull Run, 'There is Jackson, standing like a stone-wall.' See p. 119, 'Brazen Wall.'

Stony Waste (The). Between Marseilles and the mouths of the Rhône, 'about 100 furlongs from the sea.' Here Hercules, passing through Gallia, encountered Albion and Bergion, who had united their powers near the mouth of the river Rhosne (Rhône), and a great battle was fought. Hercules, seeing that his men were worsted, commanded them to pick up stones and cast them against the foe. This did they, and gained the victory, leaving Albion and his brother dead on the field.

Stool of Repentance (The). An ecclesiastical punishment in which the offender was placed 'directly over against the pulpit, there to stand bareheaded with a sheet, or other accustomed note of difference, on a board raised a foot and a half at least above the church floor, that they may be in loco editiore, et eminentiores omni populo. This was repeated sometimes for 'six preaching days,' or even more, and the preacher spoke at the 'penitent' or to the penitent as he thought proper. The satisfaction being finished, the offender put on his usual clothes and entered the church purified and absolved.

Storm (The Great), 26 Nov., 1703. The most terrible that ever raged in England. It was this storm which supplied Addison with the celebrated lines—

> So when an angel by divine command
> With rising tempests shakes a guilty land,
> Such as of late o'er pale Britannia past,
> Calm and serene he drives the furious blast;
> And pleased the Almighty's orders to perform,
> Rides on the whirlwind and directs the storm.

Storm of Nov. 14 (The Memorable), 1854, in the Black Sea, where an English fleet was moored during the Crimean War. It blew down six of the minarets of the Grand Mosque, tore off many roofs, blew down almost all the tents, dispersed the men's clothes in all directions—blankets, hats, great-coats, tables, chairs, tubs, bed-clothes, flew through the air like autumn leaves. Several ships were wrecked, and all the fleet more or less injured.

In the 'Prince' were lost 2,500 watch-coats, 16,000 blankets, 3,700 rugs, 58 000 woollen frocks, 19,000 lambswool drawers, 36,700 socks, 12,880 pairs of boots, 1,800 pairs of shoes, besides drugs of all sorts.

In 14 wrecked transports were lost 359,714 lbs. of biscuit, 74,890 lbs. of salt meat, 157 head of cattle, 645 sheep, 8,000 gallons of rum, 73,986 lbs. of rice, 11,200 lbs. of coffee, 1,116,172 lbs of forage corn, 800,000 lbs. of pressed hay.

With the 'Resolute' were lost several million rounds of ball cartridge, and all the reserve ammunition for the artillery.

Stormy Petrel (The). John Scott, Earl of Eldon (1751–1838). So called because he was in the habit of hastening up to London, when any rumour of a dissolution of the cabinet reached him. He did so at the death of Lord Liverpool, under the expectation that the king would call on him to form a ministry, but the task was assigned to Canning. Again, when Canning died, he was in full expectation of being sent for, but the king applied to Lord Goderich. Again, when Goderich resigned, Eldon felt sure of being sent for, but the king asked Wellington to form a ministry.

Stormy Petrel of Politics (The). Lord Brougham. In a H.B. sketch, No. 694, 22 June, 1841, Lord Brougham is represented as a stormy pet'rel flying over the Channel. The words 'France' and 'England' appear on opposite sides of the picture, and his lordship's flight is towards England.

Stormy Petrel of European Politics (The). Giuseppe Mazzini (1808–1872).

Storthing, or Storting (The). The two legislative houses of Norway combined. It is elected once in three years, and for business purposes divides itself into two chambers—the Lagthing and the Odelsthing (the legislative house and 'house of commons'). All bills originate in the Odelsthing, and are sent up to the Lagthing for approval or disapproval. If assented to they are submitted to the king. If the king dissents, they are returned to the Storthing (or combined house), and whatever passes the Storthing thrice becomes law, whether the king approves it or not.

Thing, or ting, a diet; Stor-thing, the great diet; Lag-thing, the law diet; Odels-thing, the landed diet. Storthing, pronounce Stoor-ting.

Strabo of Germany (The). Sebastian Munster (1489–1552).

Stradiots. A kind of light cavalry raised by the Venetians in their Dalmatian possessions. They dressed in a semi-European and semi-Eastern fashion. They wore short hauberks, but over the hauberks a parti-coloured tunic of rich stuff; their legs were clad in wide pantaloons and half-boots. On their head they wore a straight upright cap, like a Greek cap, and their weapons were a target, a bow and arrows, a scimitar, and a poniard. Their horses were the best obtainable, being employed for skirmishing. Greek, στρατιώτης, a soldier.

Scarcely had Charles (VIII.) dismounted at Fornovo when his quarters were beaten up by the Stradiots, who retired as soon as the French took to arms.—History of Venice, vol. ii. p. 144 (Murray, 1900).

Straffor'dians, 1641. The fifty-nine members of the House of Commons who voted against the bill of Strafford's attainder. In fact Strafford was not guilty of treason against the king, that is quite certain, and treason against the sovereignty of the people was a crime hitherto unheard of.

Strangers from Rome. So Augustine and his party announced themselves when they landed in England, at Ebbsfleet, about 596.

The 'Strangers of Rome,' spoken of in Acts ii. 10, means Jews who had taken up a temporary residence in Rome. It was to these 'Strangers of Rome' that the 'Epistle to the Romans' was written.

Strate'gi. The Board of generals in the Athenian republic, consisting of ten officers, who in war took the command of the army alternately, each for one day. Later on a chairman, called the Polemarch, was added, who had the casting vote in the board.

Towards the decline of Roman greatness the chief magistrate of Athens was called Stratēgos (duke). Constantine the Great honoured him with the title of 'Megas Stratēgos' (Grand Duke).

 Before the battle of Marathon 'The Ten Strategi' met in council, and the opinion was divided. The casting vote was given by the polemarch, Kallimăchos, in favour of battle.

Strawberry Leaves (The). Emblem of a duke's crown. To 'desire the strawberry leaves' means to wish to be created a duke. The duke's coronet is adorned with eight strawberry leaves. The coronet of a marquis has only four leaves (either strawberry or oak) and four pearls, alternating.

The queen offered Lord Salisbury a dukedom, but he does not desire the strawberry leaves.—Truth, 11 Feb., 1886.

Strawberry Preachers. So Latimer called those clergymen who strayed from their parishes. Some stray as stars, some for pleasure, some from idleness and indifference. The strawberry is the plant which strays (Anglo-Saxon streowan, to stray, whence streow-berie).

Street Bullies, in London. At the Restoration they were called Muns and Tityre Tus [pronounce tuze].

They were next called Hectors and Scourers.

Later still they were called Nickers and Hawcabites.

Then Mohocks.

The last of this ill-famed notoriety was Spring-heeled Jack.

See each of these words in loco.

Street of Trip'ods (The), in ancient Athens. These tripods had been won by musical competitions between different tribes. The chorāgos, or leader, received a tripod for prize, but was expected to build a shrine over it. The best known is that of Lysicrătēs, popularly known as the 'Lantern of Demosthĕnēs.'

Strelitzes (The), that is, Russian musketeers. A militia raised by Ivan IV., and armed with muskets instead of bows and arrows. The word strelits means 'one who fires a musket.' The militia ceased to exist in the reign of Peter the Great. Ivan = our English name John.

Strict Communionists. See p. 180, 'Close Communionists.'

Strongbow. Richard de Clare earl of Pembroke, to whom Dermot [M'Murrough] king of Leinster gave in marriage his daughter Eva and the succession to the crown, for having recovered the kingdom from which he had been driven by Tiernan O'Ruarc lord of Breffny, whose wife Dermot had abducted. Strongbow was brave, munificent, and of ruined fortune. His father Gilbert (who died 1149) was also called Strongbow. Died 1176.

Struck Bruce. Midnight. Lord Aberdare (whose family name was Bruce), as Home Minister, was the father of the bill for the closing of public houses at midnight. So when the clock has struck twelve, publicans say it has 'struck Bruce.'

Stuart Dynasty (The), in England, gave James I., Charles I., Charles II., James II., Mary wife of William III., and Anne. (With the two Pretenders, James and Charles Edward.)

HENRY VII. was the father of Margaret, who married James IV. of Scotland, and their son was James V. of Scotland. James V. was the father of Mary queen of Scots, and Mary queen of Scots was the mother of JAMES I. of England.

 The Scotch as a nation are radicals, but no kings could possibly be less democratic than the Stuarts. The Scots are Presbyterians and puritans, but the Stuart kings were Catholics, in heart, at least, and anything but puritans either in morals or religion. Perhaps Charles I. was the best of the bad lot, the worst of all our dynasties.

Stuart Papers (The), 1712. Negotiations carried on between the British ministry and the Old Pretender respecting his succession to the throne, on the death of Queen Anne. The chief correspondent was St. John lord Bolingbroke. These papers were obtained by George IV. from Rome, and are now preserved in Cumberland Lodge, Windsor.

Stuarts (The). The old Scottish way of spelling stewards. The royal Stuarts of Scotland were descended from Walter, the 6th steward or seneschal of Scotland. The first of the dynasty was David II., son of Margery and Walter, and grandson of 'The Bruce.'

ROBERT I. (The Bruce) was the father of Margery, who married Walter the Steward or Seneschal, and their son was David II.

Stuarts (The). Ill-starred for 400 years. The house of Stuart was as unlucky as the house of the Theban Laius.

ROBERT III. died of grief because his eldest son Robert had been starved to death, and his younger son James was taken captive by Henry IV.

JAMES I. (his son), after spending his youth in imprisonment, was assassinated by his uncle.

JAMES II. was struck dead by the plug of a bursting cannon.

JAMES III., flying from the field of battle, was thrown from his horse, and murdered in a cottage into which he had been conveyed.

JAMES IV. fell at Flodden Field.

JAMES V. died of grief for the ruin of his army at Solway Moss.

MARY his daughter was beheaded by Queen Elizabeth.

HENRY STUART lord Darnley, her cousin and husband (the titular king), was blown up in his own lodging-house.

JAMES I. of England died, not without suspicion of being poisoned by Lord Buckingham.

(His daughter Elizabeth Stuart was the ill-starred 'Winter Queen' of Bohemia.)

(His cousin Arabella died insane in the Tower of London)

CHARLES I. was beheaded.

CHARLES II. passed many years in exile after the fatal battle of Worcester. (The slave of Louis XIV.)

JAMES II., being driven from his throne, died in a foreign land, a pensioner of Louis XIV.

The two Pretenders, James and Charles Edward Stuart, vainly tried to recover the throne, and both died in exile.

MARY, daughter of James II., died childless.

ANNE, sister of Mary, lost all her seventeen children in infancy.

HENRY the cardinal called himself Henry IX. 'by the grace of God, but not by the grace of man.'

It has been facetiously said that 'a cousin of Queen Anne' may be found in every family of maiden ladies in every cathedral city of England.

Sturm und Drang Period, 1750 to 1800. The volcanic era of German literature, when French and Latin patches were banished from the language, and German was left unadulterated.

The Sturm und Drang period of life is between 20 and 25, all enthusiasm and cram full of radical reform. All abuses are to be swept away, and a Utopian millennium is to be introduced. So in this literary period the language was to be purified, and German literature was to be made the model literature of the world. Old things were to be done away, and all things to become new.

Styli'tes (3 syl.). 'Sancti Columnārês' (Latin), 'Pillar-saints' (English). Religious enthusiasts who followed the example of Simeon the Syrian, who lived 47 years on the top of a pillar, and died 460, aged 69, of an ulcer. He first lived on a pillar only 12 feet high, then on one 22 feet high, then on a pillar 56 feet high, and lastly on one 40 feet in height. This foolery continued in the East for 600 years.

When Vulfilacius erected a pillar near Trèves, the bishop had it pulled down.

Suabian League (The). 'Schwabischer Bund,' 1376, opposed to the 'League of Marbach' (q.v.). In 1384 it was extended and converted into the Grand Union at Heidelberg. In 1499 Würtemberg joined, and thus formed the Great Suabian Confederation. It was dissolved in 1538.

At first it contained 32 towns, afterwards as many as 41.

Suabian Mirror (The), or Schwabenspiegel (13th cent.). The local laws of Suabia compiled into a digest. See 'Saxon Mirror.'

Suabian Poets (The). The Minnesingers (1150–1250). The modern school is headed by Uhland (1787–1862), universally known by his song called 'The Lad of the Mountain.'

Su'adæ Medulla. The Marrow of Persuasion; irresistible persuasion. So

Ennius calls Marcus Cethēgus, the curule, edile, and pontifex maximus, B.C. 213. Persuasion is here personified.

Subdeacon. He does not receive from the bishop imposition of hands, but receives from him the patera and cup empty, and from the archdeacon the cruises of wine, of water, and the towel. He must be 22 years of age. His duties are (1) the custody of the sacred vessels used in the mass; (2) to pour out the wine and the water; (3) to intone the epistle; (4) to hold the book of the Gospels while the priest reads; (5) to carry the cross in solemn processions; (6) to pour water for the priest's washing of his hands; and (7) to assist the deacon in receiving the offerings of the congregation.

Subjectivity of Knowledge (The). The question whether our knowledge of phenomena is merely subjective or mental. Does the outward world (in relation to any individual) really exist, except in the brain of that individual? Protagŏras (B.C. 480–411) said, 'Man is the measure of all things to himself'; Heraclītos believed the same; so did Aristippos of Cyrēnê. This was the prevailing belief in old Rome at the close of the 2nd Christian cent., and has cropped up again in Germany, France, and England within the last few years. The argument is this: If man cannot get out of himself, all he knows must be in himself. Even his thoughts can never be divorced from his ego, but must be always a part of himself.

Sublapsa'rians, Supralapsarians. The Supralapsarians maintain that God decreed the fall of Adam and its consequences before the creation of Adam (supra lapsum, before the fall). The Sublapsarians maintain that God did not decree, but only permitted the fall, and after man had fallen, God's judgments against disobedient Adam were carried out (sub lapsum, after the fall).

Illustrate thus. I lay a log over a rail, and the train is smashed; that is one thing. The passengers themselves lay a log over a rail, and I do not interfere to prevent it; that is another thing. In both cases the train is smashed, but in one case I am the active agent of the mischief, in the other I am the passive permitter of it.

Sublime Porte (The). French for the 'Lofty Gate.' Name given to the Turkish government. Bagdad, the capital of the caliph, was called 'the Porte' (q.v.). Constantinople has 12 gates, and near one of these gates is a building with a lofty gateway (called 'Bab-i-humajun). In this building resides the vizier, and in the same are the offices of all the chief ministers of state. The French phrase has been adopted because French was, at the time, the language of European diplomacy.

Sublime Society of Beefsteaks (The). Established in London 1735.

Submission of the Clergy (The), 1531. Henry VIII. insisted on being acknowledged supreme head of the Church and clergy of England, next immediately after Christ. Convocation objected, but at length submitted, with the limitation 'quantum per Christi leges licet.' The Convocation of York gave in, and offered a subsidy also. It was then agreed that no new canons or constitutions should be enacted without the king's authority. The king agreed to the limitation, and the clergy were restored to royal favour. The Submission of the Clergy was confirmed by Act of Parliament in 1534 (25 Hen. VIII. c. 19).

Subtle Doctor (The Most). Docteur Subtil. So Duns Scotus was called by the French. He was regent of the theological schools of Paris from 1304 to 1310, when he died of apoplexy in the 34th year of his age.

Succession (The Acts of). Acts of Parliament to authorise a change in the hereditary succession of the British or English sovereigns.

(1) Henry IV. who possessed himself of the crown to the prejudice of Lionel duke of Clarence (second son of Edward III.), declared the succession should run in his own son Henry [V.] and his descendants.

(2) Henry VII. had no hereditary right to the crown, but Parliament passed an Act whereby his son Henry [VIII.] was made heir, and the succession was placed in his regular heirs.

(3) Henry VIII. changed the succession first from Mary to Elizabeth and then from Elizabeth to Edward VI.

(4) Charles II. was by parliament held to succeed Charles I., by which Act the Commonwealth was wholly ignored.

(5) On the 'abdication' of James II

the succession was settled on William and Mary; and if they died without issue, on the Protestant line, or issue of the Electress Sophia of Hanover.

Suf'fave'an or Sofi dynasty (The), lasted 237 (1499–1736). A Persian dynasty founded by Ismail, third son of Hyder, fifth in descent from Sheik Sofi or Suffee, a very holy man. It was overthrown by Nadir Shah.

Suffolk Resolutions (The), 9 Nov. 1774. That is the county of Suffolk in Massachusetts, of which Boston is the capital. They were made against the attempts of Great Britain 'to enslave America.' They enjoined officers who had public money in their hands to retain it till the wrongs of the people were redressed; and called on all public officers appointed by the British Government to resign before the 20th of Sept., or to be held as enemies of the American colonies. They called upon all Americans to attend military drill and prepare themselves for war. They advised the people to imprison all government servants if Government attempted to lay hands on the insurgents.

Suffragan Bishops. Assistant bishops. Twenty-six were appointed by 26 Hen. VIII. c. 14, A.D. 1534. So called because they were allowed the jus suffragii or right of suffrage in the synods. Discontinued and the Act repealed by 1, 2 Phil. & Mary c. 8, A.D. 1554. Revived by 1 Eliz. c. 1, A.D. 1559.

Su'liots. A number of families who fled from their Turkish oppressors to the mountains of Suli in the 17th cent. They were partly Hellēnic and partly Albanian in origin. Their descendants mostly live in Greece.

Sulpic'ians. The company of priests founded at Vaugirard by J. J. Olier, curé of St. Sulpice. The object of this college is the instruction of young ecclesiastics.

The great seminary at Montreal, Canada, is conducted by the Sulpicians, but their main establishment is in Paris.

Summer King. When Robert Bruce was boasting of his sovereign rank and great success, his wife said to him, 'You are, indeed, a summer king; but you will scarcely be a winter one.'

Summer Lieutenants. In the Prussian army are officers of the Landwehr and reserves summoned for duty in their respective regiments for six weeks in summer.

Summoned (The). Ferdinand IV. of Castile and Leon (1285, 1295–1312), so called because the brothers Peter and John Carvajal, being condemned to death without trial, 'summoned' him to appear before the tribunal of God within thirty days. Ferdinand was quite well on the thirtieth day, but was found dead in his bed next morning.

Sun of Austerlitz (The). A promise of success, a good omen. Napoleon I. remembered that the sun broke out just before the battle of Austerlitz (2 Dec. 1805), which he won over the Emperors of Austria and Russia; and in subsequent campaigns looked on sunshine as a good omen.

Quelques instants avant la bataille de la Moskowa, le soleil se montra dans son éclat: 'Soldats (s'écrie Napoleon) c'est le soleil d'Austerlitz!' et ces seuls mots électrisèrent la grande armée.—LA ROUSSE, Dictionnaire Universel.

 For explanation, see each word under its proper letter.

Sunday Fine (The). A fine of 1s. levied upon all the Irish who neglected to attend the Protestant church. This levy was made first in the reign of Elizabeth, and, with fees, amounted (says Hume) to 20*l.* a month. The shilling was supposed to go to the poor, but this was evaded, at least in the case of the Catholic poor, who (it was said) ought to pay and not receive the shilling.

Sunday Sabbath, 321. It was Constantine who, by an imperial decree, consecrated the Sun-day [dies solis], as the Christian sabbath, to be observed throughout Christendom as a day of rest and religious observances. And from this decree it was called 'The Lord's Day.' See 'Day of Rest.'

τὴν σωτήριον ἡμέραν, ἣν καὶ φωτὸς εἶναι καὶ ἡλίου ἐπώνυμον συμβαίνει.—EUSEBIUS, Life of Constantine, iv. 18.

Sung or Song Dynasty. See 'Tsong.'

Sunnites (2 syl.), or 'Sonnees' or 'Sunis.' A Musulman sect so called from the Arabic word sunnah (tradition), because they professed to preserve the true tradition. They recognised as the real descendants of Mahomet, the califs Aboubekr, Omar, and Othman, and were opposed to the Shiites or Shiahs who insisted that Ali was the legitimate descendant of Mahomet. The Sunnites now prevail in the Ottoman Empire, Arabia, Egypt, &c., while the Shiites prevail in Persia, exist to some extent in India, and to a much less extent in Syria.

The Sunnites are divided into four sects, called the Hanbalites, the Shafeites, the Malekites, and the Hanefites, so called from their leaders, Hanbal, Hanefa, Shafei, and Malek. See 'Shiites.'

Superior Person (The). Edward Horsman, M.P. (1807–1876), was so called by Mr. Disraeli in his speech upon Denmark and Germany, 8 July, 1864.

We know in private life there is always in every circle some person who is regarded as a 'superior person.' They [sic] decide on everything, they lecture everybody, all acknowledge their transcendent qualities, but everyone gets out of their way. The right hon. member for Stroud is the 'superior person' of the House of Commons.

Su'perlapsa'rians, or 'Su'pralapsa'rians.' Those who believe that God from all eternity decreed the fall of man. The Sublapsarians, on the other hand, maintain that God did not foreordain and predetermine the fall, but only permitted it—that Adam was free to stand and free to fall.

Supplementary Act (The), 1 June, 1815, added in the French Constitutional Charter to the Imperial Constitution as a codicil. This was done by Napoleon in the famous 'Hundred Days.'

Supplicat (A). In the University of Cambridge is a grace of the senate duly signed to confer a degree on the person signified in the writ.

Supporters to an heraldic shield are, in England, confined to corporations and to peers and knights either of the Garter or of the Bath. In Scotland Lord Lyon (q.v.) has the privilege of granting this honour to others; not so the Garter king of Arms (q.v.) in England.

Supremacy (The Act of), 26 Hen. VIII. c. 1, A.D. 1534, constitutes the reigning monarch of England supreme head of the English church, and reduces the 'courts spiritual' into king's courts. By this Act the bishops were virtually made responsible for the loyalty of their clergy; the clergy were mere exponents of the Royal will; and the king had the power of prescribing the form of faith, doctrine, and discipline, which should be taught throughout the land.

Fisher bishop of Rochester, Sir Thomas More the ex-lord chancellor, and several others were beheaded in 1535, for denying the king's supremacy. Before this Act was passed, the pope of Rome exercised supremacy in the churches of England and Scotland.

Supreme Being (The), 7 May, 1794. Robespierre proposed to the Convention that the republic should acknowledge Wisdom as the Supreme Being of all created things, not as a personal fact, but as a most useful political bogie. Accordingly, the painter David was employed to make in the garden of the Tuileries a suitable symbol of the Supreme Being. He made a mound surmounted with a tree of liberty. On the top of this mound Robespierre, as the high priest of the Supreme Being, was to set fire to the statues of Atheism and Deism, and to unveil the statue of Wisdom. Dressed in a sky-blue coat and most showy waistcoat, and carrying in his hand a monster bouquet, the 'Incorruptible' headed the procession on 8 June. All Paris was mad with joy at this new change and every church adopted the new motto TO THE SUPREME BEING.

The babyism of such foolery seems quite inconsistent with the 'philosophy' of the Encyclopedists, and the many really wise and practical laws passed at the time.

Supreme Father (The). The grand master or chief potentate of the St. Simonians. Barthélemy Prosper Enfantin, usually called Père Enfantin, was elected Supreme Father in 1830. In 1831 a split in the 'family' was made by Bazard, chief of the dogma department, who wished to keep his wife to himself, and also that his daughter should marry; but Enfantin insisted there was no such thing as marriage in the St. Simonian Family. The contest grew so high that Enfantin established 'a model community' at Ménilmontant, near Paris. Here he was arrested for social indecency, imprisoned for a year, fined 4*l.*, and the family at Ménilmontant, which had lasted only two years, was dispersed. Enfantin, as Supreme Father of the world both in spiritual and temporal matters, summoned Louis Philippe, king of the French, to appear before him, and answer for his usurpation of the authority due to the 'Supreme Father' only. The family wore a blue robe with a leather girdle, white trousers, and a red cap; their neck was left bare, and they had long flowing beards.

Supreme Governor of the Church. When the 'Royal Supremacy' was restored (1 Eliz. c. 1), 1559, the queen insisted that the words 'Supreme Governor of the Church, &c.' should be substituted for 'Supreme Head of the Church.'

Surgery (Father of English). Richard Wiseman (17th cent.). He introduced ligatures in amputation instead of hot pitch, or strong acids, or branding the wound with burning iron. The ligature was invented by Ambroise Paré, a French surgeon in the 16th cent.

Surgery (Father of French). Ambroise Paré (1517–1590).

Surintendant. A title of honour in the old French monarchy.

I. Le surintendant des finances was created in 1300 by Philippe IV. le Bel for Enguerrant de Marigny; but the office was suppressed in 1661 on the disgrace of Fouquet.

II. Le surintendant général de la navigation created by Louis XIII. for Cardinal de Richelieu, but suppressed in 1669 on the death of the Duke of Beaufort, the third holder of the office.

III. Le surintendant des bâtiments de la couronne created by Louis XV. for the Marquis de Marigny, brother of Mme. de Pompadour.

IV. In the empire there was a surintendante de la maison impériale.

Surrender by a straw. Surrenders are made in various forms. In some manors by a rod, in others by a straw, in others by glove, delivered by the surrenderor to the steward or some other person taking the surrender in the name of seisin. In practice a pen or penholder, a walking-stick or umbrella, or, more commonly still, an office ruler is employed for surrenders and admissions to copyhold property.

Surtees Forgeries (The), 1806. Mr. Surtees palmed off on Sir Walter Scott certain ballads of his own composition as ancient ballads discovered by him, and Sir Walter Scott inserted them in his 'Border Minstrelsy.' One was 'On a feud between the Ridleys and the Featherstones,' which Mr. Surtees says he took down from the recitation of an old woman on Alston Moor. Another was a ballad of 'Lord Ewrie,' which he says he took down from an old woman named Rose Smith of Bishop Middleham (aged 91). A third was 'Barthram's Dirge,' obtained from Ann Douglas, 'a withered crone who weeded in his garden.' A whole series of legends were professedly obtained from a Mrs. Brown of Falkland, and another series from Mrs. Arnut of Arbroath. See 'Literary Forgeries.'

Suspension of the Habeas Corpus. In old Rome the phrase was, Videant Consules, ne quid detrimenti capiat Respublica (Let the Consuls see that the Commonwealth suffers no injury), by which the appeal to the Centuries (in the empire to Cæsar) was held in abeyance, and dictatorial power was vested in the consuls without appeal. This suspension of appeal was enforced against the Gracchi and against the Catiline conspirators.

When habeas corpus is suspended suspected persons may be arrested without assigning any reason, and persons arrested are not allowed bail.

Sussex (Kingdom of). Founded A.D. 491 by Ella, who came from Holstein, the land of the Saxoni, landed at West Wittering near Chichester (477), and in 491 took Anderīda, the capital of the Regni. Chichester is a phonetic spelling of Cissa-ceaster, the camp-ground of Cissa, son of Ella.

Sutin'ians. Same as Photin'ians (q.v.).

Sutras. Aphoristic rules in Sanskrit. The word means strung together, because the leaves on which they were written were strung together on a thread.

Suttee. The voluntary immolation of a Hindû widow on the funeral pile of her husband. Declared illegal by the governor-general of British India in 1829.

Swan. 'By heaven and the swans,' an oath of Edward I.'s. On the day when King Edward I. conferred the dignity of knighthood on his son, the Prince of Wales, 300 others were also knighted. In the course of the high festival two swans richly adorned with gold network were placed on the table, and the king made a vow to God and the swans that he would start forthwith to Scotland and never sheathe sword till he had avenged the death of John [Red] Comyn.

Edward, in fulfilment of his romantic vow to heaven and the swans, advanced as far as Carlisle . . . . but was detained there by . . . . dysentery. —Sir W. Scott, History of Scotland, viii.

Sweating-sickness (The), in 1485 (Henry VII.'s reign), first appeared in England. It lasted a month and carried off 20,000 persons in London. Persons died from extreme exhaustion caused by profuse perspiration. It appeared a second time in England during the year 1506 (Henry VII.); again between July and Dec., 1517; for a fourth time in 1528 (Henry VIII.), and lastly in April and Sept., 1551 (Edward VI.). It raged in Holland, Germany, Denmark, Sweden, Poland, and Russia, 1525–1530.

Swechat, near Vienna, is the place where in 1848 the Hungarian patriots were defeated by the Austrians, led on by Jellachich.

Sweden. Nine dynasties.

1. The race of Ivar and Sigurd, * - 1056, gives twelve sovereigns.
2. The race of Stenkill, 1056–1129, gives seven sovereigns.
3. The races of Sverker and Eric, 1129–1250, gives eight sovereigns.
4. The Folkungians, 1250–1389, gives seven sovereigns.
5. The period of the Union of Calmar.
6. The dynasty of Vasa, 1523–1654, gives seven sovereigns.
7. The dynasty of Deux-Ponts, 1654–1751, gives five sovereigns.
8. The dynasty of Holstein-Gottorp, 1751–1818, gives four sovereigns.
9. The French dynasty, 1818– *.

Swedenbor'gians, or 'The New Jerusalem Church' (Rev. xxi.10), followers of Dr. Emanuel Swedenborg (1688–1772). They hold peculiar views respecting salvation, inspiration, and the Trinity. In regard to the Trinity, they believe it to be centred in the person of Jesus Christ.

Swedes' Stone (The). A large stone placed by Jacob Erichsson on the night after the battle of Lützen (17 Nov., 1632) to mark the spot where Gustavus Adolphus fell. In 1830 the German nation replaced the stone by a noble monument in memory of this 'Star of the North.'

Sweet Singer of the Temple (The). George Herbert, the poet, who wrote 'The Temple' (1633) and 'The Priest to the Temple' (1652). Born 1593, died 1633.

Swi or Sooy Dynasty (The). The twelfth imperial dynasty of China, in which China was again united, after being divided for 167 years (420–587). It gave three emperors, and lasted thirty-seven years (587–618). The city of the court was Ho-nân. It was succeeded by the Tang dynasty.

Yang-kien, who assumed the name of Wente, the founder of this dynasty, was prince of Swi.

Swing (Captain). 1830–1833. A name assumed by certain persons who sent threatening letters to those who used threshing machines. The letters ran thus: 'Sir, if you do not lay by your threshing machine, you will hear from Swing.'

Swing and his myrmidons were abroad in the counties, and could scarcely be kept down by the yeomanry and poor-law guardians.—T. Hughes, Tom Brown at Oxford, chap. xxxix.

Swing-fires. Incendiary fires for the burning of machinery. So called from 'Captain Swing' (see above).

He [Mr. Gladstone] quoted the Swing-fires as an example of an evil which may have averted greater evil.—The World, 2 May, 1888.

Swiss Blood, or 'Sang des Suisses.' Wine of St. Jacques, near Basel, where 1,600 Switzers resisted 22,000 French commanded by the Dauphin (afterwards Louis XI. of France). All the Swiss but ten were slain. This is called the 'Swiss Thermopylæ,' A.D. 1444.

Swiss Thermop'ylæ (The), 1444. See above.

Sword, in the arms of the city of London.

The usual hypothesis is that this emblem was adopted on the first quarter of the arms of this corporation to commemorate the act of Sir William Walworth, who cut down with his sword the rebel Wat Tyler in the reign of Richard II. We are told in 'Notes and Queries' (28 July, 1887) it had been adopted some 'few months previously.'

Another solution is that it is the sword of St. Paul, the patron saint of London.

A third is that Stow mistook the letter L in the first quarter for a sword.

Sword (Order of the). I. Created 1522 in Sweden by Gustavus I. as the 'Star of the North,' and reconstructed in 1748 by Frederick I. for 'fidelity to the king and the Lutheran faith.' The decoration is a St. Andrew's cross formed by two swords, &c.

II. An order of chivalry instituted 1449 by Alfonso V. of Portugal.

Sword-bearers (Knights), or Ensiferi, 1204. An order of knighthood in Livonia. Their habit was white, with two swords crossed, in red. They acquired sovereign power in Livonia. The order ceased in 1562.

Also called 'Brothers of the Sword.'

Sword of God (The). Khaled, Mahomet's lieutenant (582–642); also called 'The Scourge of Infidels.' It was by the valour of Khaled that the empire of the califs was founded in Arabia and Syria. He used to say, 'As long as I wear this cap, which has been blessed by the prophet himself, I am invulnerable to all the darts and swords of the infidel.'

Sword of Mars (The). Attila (died 453).

Sword of Rome (The). Marcus Claudius Marcellus, B.C. 270–280, famous in the second Punic war.

Sydrack. A philosopher and astronomer, who lived 847 years after Noah, of 'whose book of astronomy he held possession.' He converted King Boccus to the Christian faith (!!) and was invited by him to build a mighty tower against the invasions of a rival king ('The History of Boccus and Sydrack').

Symbol (The Twelve Articles of the), i.e. the twelve articles of the Apostles' Creed, said, in legend, to have been suggested by the apostles themselves in a grotto of Mount Olivet, before their final separation. It was received into the Latin church, in its present form, in the 11th cent., but there was a formula extant in the 2nd cent.; items were added in the 4th and 5th cent., and verbal alterations much later. It has as much right to be attributed to the apostles as the twelve sibylline 'prophecies' to the ancient sibyls. Tradition assigns the items thus: To

1. Peter: 'I believe in God the Father Almighty, maker of heaven and earth,'
2. John: [And] 'in Jesus Christ, his only Son, our Lord.'
3. James, the Greater: [who was] 'conceived of the Holy Ghost; born of the Virgin Mary;'
4. Andrew: 'Suffered under Pontius Pilate;'
5. Philip: 'Was crucified and buried.'

'Dead' is a modern innovation, and is very shaky English. 'Mortuus est' means 'died,' and not 'was dead.' 'Was crucified, was dead, and was buried.' Was dead! when? We should hardly say 'Charles I. was beheaded, dead, and buried.'

* 'Descended into Hell' is not in the older formulas.

6. Thomas: 'The third day he rose again from the dead.'
7. James the Less: 'He ascended into heaven, and sitteth on the right hand of God the Father Almighty.'
8. Matthew: [From thence] 'He shall come to judge the quick and the dead.'
9. Nathaniel: 'I believe in the Holy Ghost;'
10. Simon: 'The Holy Catholic Church;'

'The Communion of Saints' is not in the old formulas.

11. Matthias: 'The forgiveness of sins;'
12. Jude: 'The resurrection of the dead.'

'The life everlasting' was added in the 4th cent.

Symbols (The Four).

I. The symbol of the apostles, called by us the 'Apostles' Creed,' because each of the twelve clauses is attributed by legend to one of the apostles.

II. The Symbol of Nicæa, called by us the 'Nicene Creed,' because it was formulated in the Council of Nice A.D. 325.

III. The Symbol of Constantinople, so called because it was formulated at the Council of Constantinople in 331. It is nearly the same as the original Nicene Creed. This is the creed recited by the priest in the mass.

The phrase 'and the Son' (filioque) was added by a Council of Toledo in 589.
N.B. The original creed has been condensed in some parts and expanded in others.

IV. The Symbol of Athanāsius, called by us the 'Athanasian Creed,' directed mainly against Arianism. It did not exist till 670, nearly three centuries after the death of Athanasius, who died in 373, but it is supposed to express his teaching.

Symmes' Hole. The hole about the poles. Captain John Cleves Symmes propounded the theory that the earth about the poles is hollow, and his theory in ridicule is spoken of as Symmes' or Symmes's Hole.

Sym'pathi'sers, 1837–1838. Filibustering citizens of the United States of North America who 'sympathised' with and joined the democrats of Canada in the rebellion. They issued proclamations in the name of the Provisional Government, offering 100 dollars and 300 acres of the best land in Canada to everyone who joined the republicans. Their headquarters were on Navy Island, in the Niagara river, about two miles above the 'falls.'

Syncretists. I. In philosophy. So the Eclectics are called in contempt.

II. In theology. The Calixtines (q.v.) are so called.

Syndics, of the Cambridge University, are the members of special committees. They must be members of the Senate and are appointed, when required, by grace of the Senate.

Synergists, in theology. Those 'heretics' who maintain that man cooperates with grace, as a 'fellow-worker together with God' in salvation, and that good works must be joined to grace. Melanchthon was a Synergist, so was Pfeffinger, and so was Strigel. This dogma caused a schism in the Lutheran party.

Synod (The), 1689, of the Scotch kirk, is a superior court to the Presbytery, and consists of ministers and elders of contiguous presbyteries. It is a court of review.

The four ecclesiastical bodies are: 1. The Kirk Session; 2. The Presbytery; 3. The Synod; and 4. The General Assembly. The first is limited to one parish, the next extends to contiguous parishes, the third to contiguous presbyteries, and the fourth to the entire body in all Scotland.

Synod convened by Pole (The), 1555. A legatine synod convened in London by Cardinal Pole for the 'correction of abuses and making of canons.'

I. The Feast of Reconciliation (q.v.) was to be strictly observed.

II. Instructions were to be issued to the clergy for the proper administration of the eucharist.

III. Ecclesiastics were to resign all pluralities, and not engage in secular cares.

IV. Bishops were to restrain their ostentation and luxurious living.

V. Bishops were to examine candidates for holy orders personally.

Simony was forbidden, schools were to be established, and visitations enforced.

Synod of Dort (The), 1618–1619. A synod convened at Dort, to which James I. sent deputies to decide upon the five points of difference between Calvinists and Arminians. As the synod excluded the Arminians their judgment was one-sided. See 'Five Articles of Dort.'

Synod of Gap (The), 1603, is remarkable for giving out 'we believe and maintain that the pope of Rome is properly the Antichrist, and the "son of perdition" prophesied of in the Word of God, under the emblem of the scarlet woman.'

Synod of Lambeth (The), 1281. Convened for the correction of ecclesiastical abuses. Canons were passed in this synod against pluralities and non-residence, for the better teaching of the people, for enforcing the doctrine of Transubstantiation, and for communion in one kind only.

Synod of Merton (The), 1236. An assembly which attempted to introduce into England Roman Canon Law, in order to legitimise natural children by a subsequent marriage, and to prevent the interference of the secular power in ecclesiastical matters. The legitimation of children was warmly supported by the clergy, but was overruled by the barons.

Synod of Presbyters. A general council composed of two or more presbyteries, convened for religious purposes.

1. Of Antrim, 1727. This 'presbytery' was an offshoot of the 'Synod of Munster.'

2. Of Munster, 1660. The same as the 'United Presbytery' (q.v.).

3. Of Ulster, 1642. Formed originally at Carrickfergus. This was the first presbytery of Ireland.

A 'Presbytery' is a religious court formed of the respective pastors of a given district, and a ruling elder, or the district itself so represented.

Synod of Ulster (The). See above.

Synod of the Oak (The). A villa near Chalcēdon, to which Theophilus summoned Chrysostom to appear. The president was the bishop of Heraclēa, and a long list of charges was brought against the archbishop, relating to faulty administration of the church and its funds, his habits in private life, his ritual irregularities, and his heretical sermons. (Robertson, 'Hist. of the Christian Church,' vol. ii. p. 110.)

Synods of the Church. There have been twenty-three altogether, or twenty-four if the apostolic one is reckoned in. Six are called Ecumenical Councils (q.v.), between 325 and 680. Seven other synods were held before the Eastern and Western Churches separated, and ten have been held since that division.

The seven synods, not Ecumenical, before the severance of the Eastern and Western Churches, are:—

1. Held at Sardĭca, in 347, to restore the bishops deposed by Arius.

2. Held at Ariminium, in 360, to alter the wording of the Nicene Creed at the instance of the Arians.

3. Held at Ephesus, in 449, to depose Flavianus for condemning Eutȳchēs, who taught that the body of Christ was not strictly speaking human.

4. Held at Constantinople, in 754, commanding the disuse in churches of pictures and images.

5. Held at Nicæa, in 787, to reverse the decision of the previous council (No. 4).

6. Held at Constantinople, in 869, to depose Photius, the originator of the severance of the Eastern and Western churches.

7. Held at Constantinople, in 879, to restore Photius.

Synods of the Western Church (The). Since the separation.

1. The first Lateran, summoned by Calixtus II. in 1123. To settle the question of investitures (q.v.).

2. The second Lateran, summoned by Innocent II. in 1139. To condemn the Manichēans, who believed there are two principles, one of good and one of evil.

3. The third Lateran, summoned by Alexander III. in 1179. To regulate the election of popes.

4. The fourth Lateran, summoned by Innocent III. in 1215. To publish a profession of faith, specially condemnatory of Manichæism.

5. Held at Lyons, summoned by Innocent IV. in 1245. To depose Kaiser Friederich II.

6. Held at Lyons, summoned by Gregory X. in 1274. To declare that the Holy Ghost proceeds Patre Filio-que (not from the Father only).

7. Held at Constance, summoned by John XXIII. in 1414. To condemn the doctrines of Wyclif, and enforce the one element to the laity in the eucharist.

8. Held at Basle, summoned by Martin V. in 1431. To declare the authority of a council paramount over that of a pope.

9. Held at Florence, summoned by Eugenius IV. in 1437. To confirm the doctrine of purgatory, and the supremacy of the pope.

10. Held at Trent, summoned by Paul III. in 1545. To fix the doctrines of the church, and condemn Protestantism. This synod sat for eighteen years. The first session was held 13 Dec., 1545, and the last 3 Dec., 1563.

11. The Vatican Council, 1870, summoned by Pius IX. to render the 'Immaculate Conception' an article of faith.

Syrian War (The). I. B.C. 192–190, between the Romans and Antiochus, king of Syria. It was brought to an end by the battle of Magnesia, won by Scipio, who was now called Asiaticus.

II. 1840. Mehemet Ali, pasha of Egypt, laid claim to Syria in 1839, but Great Britain, Russia, and Austria joined forces with Turkey to wrest it from him. After taking Beyrout, Acre, and Sidon, the pacha came to terms, and by the Treaty of London, in 1841, Syria was restored to Turkey.

Syro-Macedonian Era (The). This era began with 1 Sept., B.C. 312.

Szatmas (The Compact of), 1711, whereby an amnesty was granted to the Rakoczy insurgents, who rose in arms against the Austrians in 1703, and constitutional and religious liberty was secured to Hungary.

Szegedin (Treaty of), 12 July, 1444, between Hunya'dês, the Hungarian general, and the Sultan Amurath II. By this treaty of peace the sultan recognised the independence of Servia, and ceded Wallachia to Hungary.

Tabardillo, 1627. A contagious pest which ravaged Mexico, the year after it had been visited by the plague of locusts. The fever lasted seven days, but most persons died between the third and fifth day. The mouth and tongue became black as a coal. It began in Mexico and spread to Guatemala and thence to all the regions round about. See p. 694, 'Plagues,' &c.

Taberdarship. The rights and privileges of a Taberdar, a kind of scholarship in Queen's College, Oxford. So called from the taberds or tabards, or long gowns.

Tabernacle Connexion (The), 1770. A split from the Calvinistic Methodists after the death of George Whitfield. These Methodists hold that election has been from all eternity according to the sovereign will of God, and is not a choice on God's foreknowledge of the fitness of the elect to be numbered with the saints in light.

Tabernacles (Feast of), or 'Festum Canabārum' (Lev. xxiii. 33–36). A Hebrew feast lasting seven days. It began on the fifteenth day of the seventh month (Tishri), and commemorated the sojourn in the wilderness.

Table. See also

Alfonsine Tables.
Rudolphine Tables.
Theodosian Table.
Twelve Tables.

Table (The) used at the last supper is said to be preserved in St. John de Lateran of Rome. Nothing is known about it. See 'Crucifixion, Relics of the.'

Table of Abydos (The). See 'Tablet,' &c.

Table of Emerald (The). The table on which Hermês engraved, before the flood, the secret of alchemy. It is said to be hid under the great pyramid.

Table of Peutinger. 'Tabula Peutingeriana,' also called the 'Theodosian Table,' one of the most valuable literary relics of the world. It traces all the military roads of the empire called 'Theodosian,' because they were made in the reign of Theodosius the Great. The table was discovered at Speyer [Spires] in 1500 by Conrad Peutinger, who lived 1465–1547.

Tables. The Scotch committees established in 1637 to resist an imposition of the Anglican system of religion on Scotland. In the burghs were four tables, each of four members, and each table sent one representative to a fifth table in the capital. All complaints were to be made to the tables. These tables soon spread through the length and breadth of the land, whereby a united decision was speedily come to, and the whole weight of the country was brought to bear on the unpopular measures of the king [Charles I.]. For the provincial Fifth Tables, meeting in Edinburgh on a summons, made a committee of the whole soul, strength, and life of the religious party of the entire country.

They next elected as clerk-register Archibald Johnstone, clerk of the Edinburgh Tables.—HOWITT, Hist. of Eng. (Charles I., ch. iii. p. 178).

Tables (Lunar). Tabular lists of the values of the elements of the moon's orbit. Also the tabulated angular distances of the moon from certain stars at fixed epochs, as given in the 'Nautical Almanac.'

Tables (Planetary). Tabular lists of the elements of the planets' paths.

Table-money. An allowance granted to general officers in the army, and to flag officers in the navy, to enable them to fulfil the duties of hospitality within their respective commands. It varies, but the maximum is three guineas a day.

Table-turning, 1848, with table-rapping, the card process of spelling, spirit drawings, and other manifestations of the spirit world, originated in America. It is said Andrew Jackson Davis, the 'Seer of Poughkeepsie,' a cobbler, who professed to hear spirit verses in the air, was the precursor of 'spiritism' or spiritualism.

Tablet of Aby'dos (The), B.C. 1855. A series of royal rings, each containing the name of an Egyptian king. It was found on a wall in a temple of Abydos. Three rows of these rings remain still, and the names correspond with those given by Manĕtho. This valuable tablet, now in the British Museum, was discovered by W. Bankes, in 1818, on an inner wall of the Temple of Osĭris at Abȳdos in Upper Egypt.

Similar lists (though not so extensive) have been found in Thebes (Egypt), and these names correspond with those on the tablet of Abydos, with some important additions.

Another valuable source of ancient Egyptian history is the list of names hewn in the solid rock in the Grottoes of Ben Hassan, on the east bank of the Nile.

Tabor (Light of Mount). In the 14th cent. a dispute of considerable acrimony arose respecting the Light of Mount Tabor, the scene of the Transfiguration. The question was this: What was the nature of the Light there seen by the three apostles: was it the uncreated and eternal light in which the divine essence dwells, or was it created and temporal? The monks of Mount Athos violently protested it was the light of God. Barlaam maintained the contrary, and so great was the angry feeling he excited by this 'heresy,' that he was obliged to quit Constantinople; and a synod, presided over by Cantacuzene, established the dogma as an article of faith, that the Light of Mount Tabor was uncreated and divine.

Also called the 'Taboritic Light.'

Ta'borites (3 syl.), 1419–1436. The insurgents of Bohemia after the treacherous martyrdom of John Huss and Jerome of Prague. So called from Mount Tabor where they pitched their tents. Under the leadership of Zisca they often defeated the armies of the church, insomuch that in 1433 the council of Basel called the leaders to a conference. Certain concessions were made, which split up the party, and in 1436 the church and the kaiser succeeded in gaining the ascendency.

Tac (Le), 1411. A pestilence which appeared in Paris of a very strange character. It was marked by loss of appetite and insomnia, a trembling of the limbs, and a violent cough night and day. It lasted three weeks, but no one died. At the end of three weeks the sufferer bled profusely, and then recovered. See p. 694, 'Plague,' &c.

Ta'herides (3 syl.), or 'Ta'herites' (3 syl.). A dynasty in Persia which reigned over Khorassan (818–872). So called from Taher, an Arabian general (in the service of Haroun al Raschid), who assassinated Amyn, and received this government in reward. This was the first of the contemporary kings, and was succeeded by the Soffarides. Persia was at the time a province of the califs.

Taï-Ping Rebellion (The), 1850–1864. A schoolmaster named Hung, having renounced Buddhism, founded the society of the Taï-Pings (Universal Peace), which came into collision with the imperial army in 1850. Hung then gave out that he was an instrument sent by God to root out Buddhism and establish the dynasty of Universal Peace. He also assumed the title of Taï-ping Wang (Prince of Universal Peace). Nankin was made his capital in 1860. Colonel Gordon, since called Chinese Gordon, quelled the insurrection, and overthrew the armies of Hung. Hung himself committed suicide, and Gordon returned to England, having received the titles and privileges of the Ti-Tu, the Yellow Jacket, and the Peacock's Feather.

Taking of the Covenant (The), 1643. In the civil war Charles I. sought assistance from the Irish, who in 1641 had massacred 50,000 Englishmen in a diabolical manner in the north of Ireland. This was so hateful to the English, that officer after officer in his army laid down his commission, and Scotland, to secure its own safety, hastened to take or sign the covenant. The covenant pledged them to 'bring the churches of God in the three kingdoms to a uniformity of faith, church government, and form of worship; to extirpate popery, prelacy, schism, and profaneness; to preserve the rights and privileges of the parliament, and the liberties of the kingdom; to punish malignants; to unite England and Scotland in peace and lasting union; and to vow both in public and private to live as God-fearing Christians.'

Talbotype (The), 1839. So called from W. H. Fox Talbot, who took permanent pictures on papers, which he called calotypes, but his 'instantaneous process' is more wonderful still. An image is formed in a camera, and a revolving-wheel which turns 200 times in a second, being illuminated by an electric spark, records a legible impression of what is printed on a bill affixed to the wheel.

Daguerre in 1839 took impressions on copper; Talbot the same year took impressions on paper; in 1848 Joseph Nicéphore Niepce de St. Victor took impressions on glass coated with a film of albumen; Mons. le Gray in 1850 introduced the use of collodion.

Talkmotes, places used by the old Saxons for conference. In these places they would also defend themselves when attacked unawares. In Ireland they are called Bannes; some are square and some round.

Tallage. Arbitrary impositions imposed by the Anglo-Norman kings on the demesne lands of the crown and all royal towns. Abolished by Edward III. by his famous statute De tallagio cum concidendo. The tax called la taille prevailed in France also, but Turgot, the French minister, substituted for it a fixed tax towards the close of the 18th cent.

Talmud (The). The code of the Jewish civil and canonical law. It is composed of the Mishna or decisions of the doctors, and the Gemāra or the reasons thereof. The Mishna was compiled in A.D. 180 by Jehūda the Saint. There are two Gemāras, that of Jerusalem completed A.D. 400; and that of Babylon a century later and four times the size of the former commentary. The language is Aramaic. See 'Targum.'

The former is called 'The Jerusalem Talmud,' and the latter 'The Babylonian Talmud.'

Talmudists. Those Israelites who accept the Talmud as authority. Those who reject its authority are called Caraïtes or Karaites.

'Talpra Magyar,' 'Up, Hungarians,' 1848. The Marseillaise of Hungary, written impromptu by Petöfi. The first verse runs thus:

Magyars, obey your country's call,
Be slaves, or break the Austrian thrall.
We swear on our forefathers' graves,
Magyars no longer shall be slaves.

(Magyars pronounced Mah-yars, with a slight d sound in the first syllable.)

Tamerlan à Lunettes. A nickname of Mons. Thiers, the historian (1797–1877). See p. 57, 'Attila le Petit.'

Tamerlane. A corruption of Timur leng (i.e. lame), 1336–1408.

Tang Dynasty (The). The 18th imperial dynasty of China. It gave 22 emperors and lasted 289 years (618–907). The court was held at Sia-gan-fu, in Shen-si. In no dynasty was China more prosperous than in this. It succeeded the Swi dynasty, and at its close the empire was again divided.

This was the Augustan or Golden Age of China.

Tanist. Heir presumptive of an Irish provincial or sub-king. He was chosen by the people from the blood royal (either son, brother, or cousin) for the most part in the lifetime of the king, and was ex officio head of the army and chief judge of the province. The heir presumptive of the monarch or over-king bore the title of Roydamna.

Tanist Stone (The), or 'Heir-apparent's Stone.' A Celtic monolith used as a coronation seat. Thus we read in Judges ix. 6 of Abimelech, that 'a pillar was erected in Shechem' when he was made king. Again, in 2 Kings xi. 14 it is said that a pillar was raised when Joash was made king, 'as the manner was.'

Tanistry (in Ireland). A tenure of lands for life only, the successor being appointed from the family by election. The tenant of such a holding is called a tanist. By tanistry the 'inheritance of land was given to the most worthy,' and not to the next heir. The 'most worthy' was virtually the strongest, and this led to endless family feuds. Abolished in 1605.

They were bound not to alienate their lands to the mere Irish. Tanistry and Gavelkind were abolished in the 5th year of James I.—O'Conor Hist. of the Irish People, p. 155.

Tan'simas. The organic laws of the Turkish empire, published in 1844 by the Sultan Abdul Medjid. Part 1 is the political organisation of the empire; part 2, finance; part 3, legal matters; and part 4, military affairs.

Tantivies (The), 1680. The Anti-Birmingham party, opposed to the Exclusion Bill (q.v.). A royalist or cavalier, so called from tantivy, the note of a hunting-horn, and therefore a fox-hunter. The country gentlemen were almost all tories and royalists.

Those who took the king's side were Anti-Birminghams, Abhorrers, and Tantivies.—MACAULAY, Hist. of England, ch. ii.

Tantra. The Bible of the worshippers of Siva. Its subjects are the creation and destruction of the world; the worship of the gods; magical rites; and the modes of hypostatic union. There are several Tantras.

Tantum Ergo. The most popular of all the Eucharistic hymns in the Catholic Church. It is sung at benediction with the Holy Sacrament.

It consists of the last two stanzas of the 'Pange Lingua.' The first runs thus:

Tantum ergo sacramentum
Veneremur cernui:
Et antiquum documentum
Novo cedat ritui;
Præstat fides supplementum
Sensuum defectui.

(The second stanza is a mere Gloria Patri, &c.)

Tao-tsee. A religious sect in China who adore Tao, founded by Lao-Tseu in the 6th cent. B.C. Their sacred book is called 'Tao-te-King.'

Taouism [Tao-tse, primitive reason]. A religious system in China founded by Lao-Tseu, who was born B.C. 604. It has degenerated into a sort of polytheism. Its priests, who are looked on as magicians and astrologers, are consulted about the sites of houses, burial grounds, fortunate days, and other responses of the fortune-teller's character.

There are three religious systems in China. That of Yu, restored by Koun fou-tse (Confucius); the state religion, in which the emperor acts as the priest and intermediator; and the third is Buddhism. There are, however, Moslems, Christians, and even a few Jews in China. The Christians are, for the most part, disciples of the Jesuits.

Tappent-durs (Strike-hards). A species of guard that Robespierre had always about his door, or guarding him through the streets. They were armed with clubs or heavy sticks.

Robespierre went, surrounded by his Tappent-durs, first to the Jacobin club, and then to the convention.—HOWITT, Hist. of England (Geo. III., 1794, p. 122).

Tara Meetings (The). Tara is a hill in the county of Wexford (Ireland) where the ancient Irish held assemblies These musters were not popular meetings, but conventions of the kings and chiefs of the Milesian line.

Taran'tism or Tarentism (16th cent.). The Dancing Mania. In 1374 a similar hysteria appeared in Germany. Probably the Bacchanalian orgies of the Greeks and Romans are to be attributed to similar hysteria.

The epidemic called Tarantismus, from Tarentum or Taranto, in Naples, was said to be caused by a small spider, the Tarentula (in Italian tarantula). It provoked an irresistible desire to dance. Hence the dance called Tarantella.

Tard-Venus (Les), 1361. Companies of adventurers who formed themselves into gangs, in France, after the Peace of Brétigny (1360). They were composed of the offscouring of all nations and disbanded soldiers. The utter destruction of property was prevented only by the payment of black mail. They defied the army of Jean which was under the command of Jacques de la Marche, made themselves masters of the Pont St. Esprit, and made Urban V. tremble in Avignon. The Marquis of Monferrat enrolled them in the pope's army, and drilled them into discipline.

Of course the word venus in this compound has nothing to do with the goddess so called, but is the participle of venir. Tard-venu, pl. Tard-venûs.

Targums (The). Translations of the Hebrew Scriptures into Aramaic, made for the Jews because they had forgotten the Hebrew language by their long residence in Chaldea. The oldest dates between the 3rd and 4th cent.; the latest in the early part of the 11th cent. The most noted Targums are those of Onkelos, of Jonathan ben Uziel, and of Joseph the Blind. See 'Talmud.'

A portion of Daniel and Ezra with verse 11 chap. x. of Jeremiah have no Hebrew original. Aramaic, the language of the Jews in the time of Christ, was a mixture of Chaldee, Syriac, and Hebrew.

There are three Targums of the Pentateuch, one on the prophets, two on Esther, one on Chronicles, one on Daniel, besides those on the Psalms, Job, the Proverbs, Solomon's Song, Ruth Lamentations, Ecclesiastes, &c.

Tarleton's Dash at Charlottesville, 4 June, 1781. During the American War of Independence, Colonel Tarleton at the head of his cavalry rode at a dash into this town of Virginia, took seven of the assembly prisoners, and destroyed a large quantity of stores.

Tascodrugi'tæ, or 'Tascod'rygites' (4 syl.). Du Cange (vol. vi. p. 487, col. 1) says: 'Hæretici ita appellati a τασχδς, quod illis paxillum sonabat, et δροῦγγος, nasus, quod inter orandum indicem digitum naso apponerent, ut animi tristitiam et affectatam quandam sanctitatem præ se ferrent.' Also called 'Passalorinchitæ a Græco πάσσαλος, paxillus, et ῥίν, nasus, vel ῥύγχος, rostrum, rictus.'

Tatian. A name common to several persons, but especially noted in church history for two authors often confounded together. One was a Platonic philosopher, born in Syria, converted to Christianity by Justin the Martyr. He lived in the 2nd cent., and was the author of a 'Discourse to the Greeks.' In 172 he became a Gnostic, and was the founder of the Encratistês.

The 'Discourse' of this Tatian was published in 1546 by C. Gessner, and by Otto of Jena in 1851.

The other Tatian was a native of Mesopotamia, and lived a century or more after the Platonic philosopher. He wrote in very inferior Greek a book called 'Diatessaron.' The original is lost, but there is extant a Latin translation by Victor of Capua, inserted in the 'Bibliothèque des Pères.'

M. Bouillet says this latter Tatian 'vivait au Ve siècle,' but this is an error, as the 'Diatessaron' is mentioned by Eusebius. The 'Diatessaron' is an heretical book supposed to be based on the Gospels. During the lifetime of the second Tatian Syria belonged to Persia; and the Emperor Julian went thither to prepare for his war against the Persians.

Tavernier's Diamond. The first blue diamond known in Europe was bought by Tavernier in India, in 1642, and sold to Louis XIV. in 1668. It is described as d'un beau violet. It was flat and ill formed. The cut given is from an old French engraving. It was apparently cut after it came into the possession of 'Le Grand Monarque,' for we read of a blue diamond in the regalia of 67⅛ carats. In August 1792 this 'blue diamond' was seized and deposited in the Garde Meuble. Of course it was abstracted and never heard of again. However, in 1830, a Daniel Eliason was in possession of a blue diamond weighing 44¼ carats, without a history, which afterwards became the property of Henry Hope, and was called the 'Hope Diamond.' Probably the Great Table Diamond was made into two brilliants. A model of the blue diamond was shown in the first French Exhibition, 1862. See p. 254, 'Diamonds.'

THE GREAT 'TABLE DIAMOND, 242½ carats. (N.B. 151½ carats = 1 ounce.)

The other part of the great diamond was sold at the sale of the Duke of Brunswick's jewels in 1874, and is called the 'Brunswick Diamond.' Its weight is from 6 to 7 carats, and it was purchased in Geneva.

Taylor Institution (The). In the University of Oxford, 1848, erected from the bequest of Sir R. Taylor. It consists of a library and reading-room supplied with the chief periodicals of France, Germany, and Italy, accessible to all members of the university. It is well supplied with atlases, dictionaries, encyclopædias, biographical dictionaries, and reviews. There is also a Taylorian scholarship, and Taylorian scholars have certain privileges similar to graduates.

Taylor Scholarship and Exhibition, for modern languages. The Scholarship is worth 50*l.* a year and the Exhibition 25*l.* Called 'Taylor' because the candidates will be examined according to what is taught in the Taylor Institution, Oxford.

Tchew or Chow Dynasty (The), B.C. 1122–256. The third imperial dynasty, and last of the semi-historic period. It was preceded by the Chang dynasty, and followed by the Tshin or first historical dynasty. It gave thirty-four emperors, and the seat of government was Yn. This was the dynasty of the 'kings combatant.'

Tcin Dynasty (The). The seventh imperial dynasty of China. It gave fifteen emperors, and lasted 155 years (from 265 to 420). The seat of government was Ho-nân. It followed the San Kuo (or three States) period, and was succeeded by the Woo-tae, or five races.

Most of these rulers were bad emperors and met with violent deaths.

Te Deum of Handel was composed to commemorate the wonderful escape of George II. at Dettingen 15 June, 1743. The Earl of Stair had led the English into a trap, in which there seemed no escape; but George cut his way through the French, and ultimately drove them across the Main. The whole affair seems more like romance than sober history.

The 'Te Deum' is called the Ambrosian Hymn from a tradition that St. Ambrose composed it by sudden inspiration at the baptism of St. Augustine.

Te igitur. One of the service-books of the Catholic Church, used by prelates and other church dignitaries. So called from the first words of the canon Te igitur, clementissime Pater.

Tearless Victory (The), B.C. 367. The victory of Archidamos III. king of Sparta, over the Arcadians and Argives. So called because not one of the Spartans fell in the battle.

Not one of the British army fell in the Abyssinian expedition under Sir Charles Napier, 1867-1868.

Tellers. In the division lists of the House of Commons are a remnant of the old talliers, officers who kept one part of the tallies in the public archives, the corresponding part being given to the claimant. The tally system existed in England till 1826 in our public accounts. The tally was a wand cut with notches to represent certain sums. In 1834 the old tallies, of which there were two cart-loads, were burnt in the stores of the House of Lords, and it was this conflagration which set fire to and destroyed both Houses of Parliament, with their offices and a large part of the old palace of Westminster.

Temperance Movement (The). The movement in Scotland began 1828. John Dunlop J.P. formed the first temperance society in 1829. The first English total abstinence society was formed 1830. A temperance society was formed in Ireland by the Rev. G. W. Carr in 1829. In England the first society was formed in 1830 by Henry Forbes, a merchant of Bradford, and the first total abstinence society, at Preston, in 1832. In 1838 Father Mathew began his crusade at Cork.

In 1808 a total abstinence society (which still exists (1890) was formed in Greenfield (New York). The American Temperance Society was founded in 1826.

Templars, or 'Knights Templars,' 1118. A secret society founded by Hugues de Payens and eight other knights then in Syria, and uniting the monastic with the military character. Its nominal object was to defend the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem, and the pilgrims who came to visit it. The red cross was assigned to them in 1146 by Pope Eugenius III. They were organised to defend the Holy Land and protect pilgrims; but on the loss of Palestine, in 1192, they took refuge in Cyprus. Their dissolution in England, France, and other countries occurred in 1312, when their lands were transferred to the Hospitallers, but in Spain to 'Our Lady of Montesa.' 'Le crime des Templiers est encore un problème.' Lejeune in 1789 wrote a history in their defence, but Raynouard, in 1813, wrote a history in their condemnation.

Their dress was a white mantle with a red cross. In 1314 the master of the Order, James de Molay, was condemned to the stake.

Temple of Glory (The). Paris. See p. 548, 'Madeleine.'

Temporalisti, 1870. Those who advocate the temporal power of the pope, like M. Thiers; and after Rome had been added to the kingdom of Italy believed in the possibility of its being restored to the pope.

M. Thiers to his last hour was unable to understand why the abolition of the pope's civil authority should be an irrevocable fact: and he died belonging to the sect of the Temporalisti.—Nineteenth Century, Sept. 1889, p. 895.

Temporary Relief Work, 1847. Ireland, during the potato famine. This relief was given in the spring to a large number of labourers employed on 'public works,' such as road-making, that they might go and cultivate their own plots of land for ensuing crops.

Ten (The), or 'I Dieci,' 1310. A criminal court of Venice invested with plenary inquisitorial powers, and entire sovereignty over every individual in the State from the doge downwards. At first the tribunal was appointed for 10 days, but was prolonged first for 3 months, then a year, then for 5 years, then for 10 years, and in 1325 for perpetuity. They were called I Neri (the black), from the colour of their official robes. The ten controlled every branch of government, were despotic in peace and war, had sole control over all fiscal enactments, annulled at pleasure even the decrees of the Grand Council, and were in power for five centuries. Long before the invasion of Napoleon, in 1796, the government of The Ten had become a veritable Reign of Terror.

The actual number of this council was seventeen, because the signoria (consisting of the doge and his six councillors) was associated with it.

Ten Articles (The), 1536. Agreed to by the Convocation to settle the religious differences of the Protestant party at the reformation: (1) The Christian faith as comprised in the Bible, the three creeds, and first four general councils to be accepted; (2) baptism is essential for salvation; (3) penance is a sacrament; (4) the real corporal presence in the eucharist is to be believed; (5) justification and remission of sins is a gift of God, through the merits of Christ; (6) saints are to be honoured as examples of holy life; (7) prayers may be addressed to saints as intercessors; (8) vestments, holy water, candles, palms, ashes, &c., are excellent helps to devotion; (9) images aid devotion; (10) prayers for the dead are useful, though purgatory is uncertain. See p. 48, 'Articles.'

Ten Kings of Darkness (The), or the She-ming-wâng, the ten judges of hell in Buddhism.

Ten Men's Tale, or 'Tenmentale.' So the freeborg was called in Yorkshire. Tenmentale consisted in the responsibility of ten men for the good conduct of each other. If one of the ten committed a fault, the other nine were bound to produce him, and stand bail for him. If he fled from justice, and his estate proved insufficient, the nine had to make good the penalty.

Everyone above the age of twelve was required to be enrolled in some tything according to the laws of Canute.

Ten Numerations (The). A cabalistic doctrine. Three are called the superior, and seven the inferior numerations. The three superior are the supreme diadem, wisdom, and understanding. These existed from all eternity. The seven inferior numerations are mercy, severity or might, beauty, victory, glory, stability, and sovereignty.

Ten per cent. and No Surrender, 1854. The watchword of the trades-unions who commenced the great wages movement (q.v.).

Ten Persecutions (The). Under the Roman emperors. 'The ten horns are ten kings which shall make war with the lamb' (Rev. xvii. 12–14).

First century.

1. Under Nero 64–68, in which Peter and Paul are said to have been slain.
2. Domitian, 81–96.

Second century.

3. Trajan, Hadrian, and Antoninus Pius, 107–161.
4. Marcus Aurelius, 161–181, in which Justin Martyr, Polycarp, and Pothinus were put to death.
5. Septimus Sevērus, 202–211, in which Irenæus was put to death.
6. Decius, 250–251.
8. Valerian, 257–260, in which Cyprian was put to death.
9. Aurelian, 272–275.
10. Diocletian, 298–305.

Before the Roman persecutions were those—
1. By the Zealots, A.D. 34, in which Stephen was stoned.
2. By Herod Agrippa, A.D. 44, in which James son of Zebedee was beheaded.
3. By Annas the High Priest, A.D. 62, in which James the Less was put to death. See 'Persecutions,' and 'Milan, Edict of.'

Ten Thousand (The), B.C. 370. A confederation of Arcadians, a synod of which met periodically at Megalopŏlis. See p. 756, 'Retreat of the 10,000.'

Ten Virtues of the Virgin (The). In Catholic theology.

(1) Chastity. Because she is the queen of virgins.

(2) Prudence. Shown in the Annunciation.

(3) Humility. Even when chosen for the mother of the Messiah, she called herself 'the handmaid of the Lord.'

(4) Faith. She believed and doubted not what the angel announced.

(5) Piety. Shown by her retirement, silence, and submission.

(6) Obedience. She submitted to the will of God.

(7) Poverty. She despised the grandeur and wealth of the world.

(8) Patience. In bearing the pain of her travail.

(9) Charity. In offering her son a sacrifice for the salvation of man.

(10) Compassion. In that a sword pierced her own heart out of compassion to her son.

Ten Years' War (The), or 'Sacred War,' B.C. 356–346. This was the second of the sacred wars. The first, called the Cirrhæan War, was B.C. 595–586; and the third, or Amphissian War, was from Feb. to Aug. of 338 B.C.

Tenaille (The). In fortification, a low work in the main ditch before the curtain (q.v.) and between the flanks of the half bastions of a front of fortification (q.v.). Usually about 16 yards in thickness, and riveted with masonry all round.

Tenant at Will. One who occupies without a lease, whose occupancy may be terminated at any time the proprietor thinks fit.

Proper time must be allowed for removal, and if crops have been sown the outgoing tenant has a right to them or can claim compensation.

Tenant in Fee Simple. An absolute owner, who by a fiction of law is a tenant of the crown.

Tenant-right, in the north of Ireland, was either the custom ensuring a permanence of tenure in the same occupier, without liability of any increase of rent, except such as might be sanctioned by the general community,—or else the right of the farm-tenant, on the transfer of his farm to another, to receive purchase-money, amounting to 10*l.* or 12*l.* an acre. In this latter case a schedule of the tenants' debts is made out. His back rent is first paid, and then the different creditors as far as the money goes. The reason of this custom is this. Large tracts of land, the property of absentees, were let, but the owner did nothing whatever either for the land or for the tenant; so the tenant claimed the right of selling his tenancy.

The legality of tenant-right in Ulster was established by 33, 34 Vict. c. 46 (1870).

Tenants' Defence Association (The), 1885. A society in connection with the anti-landlord platform and the 'Plan of Campaign' (q.v.). As the banks refused to renew the bills which the Irish tenants had taken out to pay their rents, the tenants formed themselves into a society, each contributing to a fund for defence of the whole tenantry. See 'Irish Associations.'

Tenants' Defence League (The), July 1889. An Irish League the object of which is 'by litigation and other constitutional methods to make the lives of Irish landlords as miserable as possible.' It is a tenants' protection league and an agrarian trade-union with an executive and sustentation fund. See p. 455, 'Irish Associations.'

Tenants'-right, in Ireland. The right of a tenant to his improvements, and giving him a property in his holding and a saleable interest. A provision of the Land Act.

This was a deadly blow to professional agitators, who did all they could to thwart the sale and purchase by denouncing the transaction as 'land-grabbing.'

Tenants in Socage. Tenants by hereditary right.

Tennessee (U.S. America) means a 'Curved Spoon,' an Indian name for its river. The state received its name in 1796. The inhabitants were at one time nicknamed Whelps (a nickname now seldom heard).

Tennis-ball of Fortune (The). Pertinax, the Roman emperor. He was first a charcoal-seller, then a schoolmaster, then a soldier, then emperor of Rome. Within three months he was dethroned and murdered (126–193).

Tenson (meaning a contention). A poetical dialogue, not unlike those eclogues of Virgil in which two or more shepherds contend in song. Spenser, in his eclogues, has several tensons. The word is applied to a class of Troubadour poetry.

Tenth Mazarine (The). One of the twelve diamonds set in the French crown. It was a brilliant, and was so called because Cardinal Mazarin in 1660 was the first person who had the diamond polished.

Tenth Muse (The).

I. Sappho of Lesbos, who flourished B.C. 600.

II. Margaret queen of Navarre, sister of François I. of France.

Tenth of April (The), 1848. The day when the Chartists determined to present their monster petition to parliament, and carry it to the house by a procession. The Chartists met on Kennington Common under the leadership of Feargus O'Connor, but the idea of a procession was abandoned, and the petition was sent in three cabs. The term 'Tenth of April' became proverbial of an apprehended danger averted by judicious forethought.

The 10th of April, 1848, has been a beneficial crisis, not merely in the temper of the working men, so called, but in the minds of those who are denominated by them 'the Aristocracy.' —C. KINGSLEY, Alton Locke (Preface addressed in 1854 to the Working-men of Great Britain).

Tephilim (The) or Frontlet. Four pieces of parchment containing four texts of scripture, worn by the ancient Jews on the left wrist or middle of the forehead. The texts are Exod. xiii. 10; Exod. xiii. 11–16; Deut. vi. 4–9; and Deut. xi. 13–21.

The Tephilim which these old pedants wore on their left wrists, and the Mezuzah which they fixed on the right side of their doors to keep off devils.—KINGSLEY, Hypatia, ch. xxi.

Ter Sex, aut Tres Tesseræ. Three sixes or three aces. The Romans played dice with three tesseræ, marked like our dice, and the highest throw was three sixes, the lowest throw was three aces. Technically the highest throw was called 'Venus' or 'king' (basilĭcus), and the lowest canes, caniculæ, vulturii, or 'tres tesseræ.'

There was another game played with four tali, in which the highest throw was when all four of the dice came different, and the lowest throw was when they all came alike.

Terminable Annuities. Sums of money borrowed and so paid back that both interest and principal are cancelled in a certain number of years, and the obligation terminates. Suppose I buy 1,000*l.* 3 per cent. of the Treasury Stock. If the government pays me only 30*l.* a year, it merely pays the interest, and the capital sum (1,000*l.*) remains unreduced; but suppose the government pays 60*l.* a year instead of 30*l.*, then it pays back every year both interest and part of the principal, and in about twenty years it would have paid back the entire interest and principal, so that the obligation would terminate.

Between 1889 and 1904 more than 70 millions of our National Debt will be thus cancelled.

Termors. Persons having only a chattel interest in their estates.

Terra Firma, applied to the former territories of Venice, means those possessions in Italy not in the Lagune, as the provinces of Bergămo, Brescia, Crema, Verōna, Vicenza, and so on.

Terreur Blanche (La), 1815. The bloody reaction of the Royalists. Marshal Brune was massacred by a Royalist mob at Avignon; Marshal Berthier committed suicide; Labedoyère was executed; Fouché and Talleyrand were dismissed; Marshal Ney was shot; Murat was shot; and 4,556,000 Frenchmen were slain in battle.

Terrible Tenth of May (The), 1857, when the British in India were fearfully massacred in Delhi during the Indian Mutiny.

Terror (The). A period in French history between the extirpation of the Girondists and the death of Robespierre, 1793–1794.

Terror of the Greeks (The). Dominico Michieli, or Micheli, the 36th doge of Venice (died 1130). His tomb bears this inscription: 'Terror Græcorum jacet hic.'

Terrorists.

I. 1793. The party headed by Robespierre after the death of Marie Antoinette. Those who tried to check the sanguinary fury were nicknamed the 'Moderates.'

II. 1879. Revolutionists of Russia who in 1881 assassinated Czar Alexander II. See 'Decembrists,' 'Propagandists,' and 'Nihilists.'

Terry Alts, in Ireland. Insurgents of Clare, who appeared after the Union, and committed great outrages. They were similar to the 'Thrashers' of Connaught, the 'Carders,' the 'Rockites,' the 'Fenians,' &c. They made themselves very conspicuous in the sanguinary tithe war 1830–1835 (q.v.). See p. 455, 'Irish Associations.'

Tertiaries, or Tiers Ordre. Seculars who followed their ordinary callings, and lived the ordinary life, but promised to conform to certain religious and moral rules drawn out by the order under which they lived.

The Tertiaries of St. Francis were founded in 1221.

Those of St. Augustine were founded in 1401.

Those of St. Dominic were founded in 1422.

Others have been founded since, such as the Carmelites, Servites, &c.

At present many tertiaries live in convents

Tertiary Canons. Such as received only a third part of the revenue of the canonate.

Tertium Quid, which Abelard called 'Conceptualism.' The realists, like Plato, insisted that there is a real something in abstract ideas; thus beauty is not a mere notion, but a reality. Nominalists, like Aristotle, insist that abstract words are merely names of abstract ideas, that beauty is nothing per se, but simply expresses our general idea of the beautiful in objects. Abelard held a third or intervening theory, that after our conception has been formed, then there is reality in abstract ideas, but not before. Thus when we have made up our mind on what makes beauty, that conception of beauty is a reality, a reality post rem (after the conception), and not ante rem. It is a 'conceptual' reality, or tertium quid.

Teschen, in Silesia (Peace of), 13 May, 1779, between Prussia, Austria, and Saxony, terminating the war of Bavarian succession.

Test Act (The). I. 1562. The first of a series of penal statutes which weighed on the Roman Catholics of England for about 200 years. By these acts the oath of allegiance and the abjuration of the temporal authority of the pope was exacted of all persons holding office, whether lay or spiritual, with the exception of peers.

What is popularly known as the Test Act is not this statute of Elizabeth, but the one below.

II. 25 Car. II. cc. 1, 2 (1673), an enlargement of the Corporation Act (q.v.), obliging all persons whatsoever, before being allowed to accept any place of trust under the crown, to take the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, to subscribe a declaration against transubstantiation, and to receive the sacrament of the Lord's Supper in a parish church. Repealed 1828.

After 'The Popish Plot' (Oct., 1678) another Test Act was passed to exclude all Roman Catholics from the House of Lords as well as from the House of Commons, and to declare the Church of Rome to be idolatrous.

Testament (King Robert's), in Latin leonines. Thus given by Mr. Tyler:—

On foot should be all Scottish weire [war]
By hill and moss themselves to bear:
Let wood for walls be;—Bow and spear
And battle-axe their fighting-gear.—
That enemies do them no drear [harm].
In strait place cause to keep all store,
And burn the plain land them before;
Then shall they pass away in haste
When that they nothing find but waste:
With wiles and wakening of the night,
And mickle noises made on height,
Them shall they turn with great affray,
As they were chased with sword away.—
This is the council and intent
Of good King Robert's testament.

The Scots kept King Robert's [Bruce] testament in recollection, and lurking among the woods and valleys they fell upon such English as separated themselves from the main body.—Sir W. Scott, Hist. of Scotland, xiii.

Tête Morte of Würtemberg (Order of the), 1806. Established by Frederick William duke of Brunswick, on the death of his father, in 1806. When the duke's father had received his death-wound Napoleon refused to allow the dying man to be conveyed to Brunswick, to die there. He wrote these words in reply to the request: 'Qu'il s'en aille en Angleterre, y chercher son salut. Je veux l'écraser lui et toute sa famille.' The young duke then arrayed all his soldiers in mourning, as members of the order of the Tête Morte. He placed on their military caps, in front, the device of a skull and cross-bones, and instead of a feather adopted flowing black horse-hair. This gloomy costume was to be continued till the death of Napoleon. It was called 'The Black Legion.'

Tetrad, according to Pythagoras, is the fourth mathematical quantity, viz. depth. The monad is the indivisible and impartible point; length is the duad, and breadth the triad. Physically, intellectual capacity is the monad, scientific knowledge the duad, opinion the triad, and perception through the senses the tetrad.

Tetrapolitan Confession (The), 1531. The confession of faith of the four cities, Strasburg, Constance, Lindau, and Memmingen. This was the Sacramentarian confession presented in the diet of Augsburg, 1530. See p. 785, 'Sacramentarian.'

Tetrarchy (A). An independent fourth part of a kingdom. Thus at the death of Herod the Great the kingdom of Judæa was divided into four parts, of which Judæa, Galilee, and Iturea were given to his three sons, Archelaus, Antipas, and Philip. Samaria was the remaining part. In 56 the division was abolished again, and Herod II. (Agrippa) was made sole king of Judæa.

Herod II. was great-grandson of Herod the Great. His father, Herod Agrippa, ruled over three of the tetrarchies, Judæa, Galilee, and Samaria, but resided at Rome.

Aristobulus tetrarch of Judæa
|
Agrippa, who put James to death
Herod II. (Agrippa), who heard Paul make his defence.

Tetrarchy (The Roman), 304–311. Constantius Chlorus (the pale) was maximus imperator, and died at York A.D. 306. The four then were Constantius, Galerius, Sevērus, and Maximinus. Severus put an end to his life in 307, and Maxentius became a tetrarch. Constantine put an end to the tetrarchy, and became sole emperor A.D. 311.

Maximinus killed himself 313. He dispossessed Galerius in 308.

Teutonic Knights (The), or 'Order of Teutonic Knights,' 1190, confirmed by Celestine III. in 1192. They wore white robes with a black cross of eight points. Suppressed by Napoleon I. in 1809.

Called the 'Knights of the Virgin Mary,' or 'Brothers of the Teutonic House of Our Lady of Jerusalem,' or the 'Teutonic Knights of St. Mary of Jerusalem,' or 'German Knights of the Cross.'

Teutonic Knights (The), 1190. Organised by Frederick duke of Suabia, in Palestine, and invested in 1192 with the privileges of the Hospitallers and Templars. In 1237 incorporated with the Short-swords of Livonia. Prussia was given to them in 1243 by Innocent IV., and in 1255 they founded Königsberg. They lost Prussia in 1525, which was given to Albert of Brandenburg by the peace of Cracow. The order was abolished by Napoleon in 1809; but still subsists in Austria as an honour.

Teutonic Nations (The). The Germans, Danes, Swedes, Norwegians, Frisians, Dutch, Jutes, and Normans. England was Celtic, but after the Saxon and Danish invasions it became largely Teutonic, and the Normans (after the conquest) added to this predominance. See p. 154, 'Celts.'

Wales and Ireland are Celtic, and the north of Scotland, and Cornwall largely so.

Teutons. So the German races are called, from the Teutŏnēs or Teutŏni, an ancient horde of Germany which, with the Cimbri, invaded the Roman dominions B.C. 113.

Tewkesbury Mustard Pills. Seven hundred fire-balls, which Titus Oates asserted the Roman Catholics had employed to set fire to London. Oates furthermore asserted that these Roman Catholics had made a good thing out of the conflagration by carrying off diamonds to the value of 14,000*l*. Ten years afterwards, in 1676, said Oates, the same persons had set fire to Southwark, by which they gained 2,000*l*. above their expenses.

Texas (U.S. America). It was so called (it is believed) from an Indian confederation called Texas, Tejas, or Friends. The inhabitants were once nicknamed Beef-heads.

Texerans or Tesserands (weavers). So the Waldenses (q.v.) in the south of France were called, because they were for the most part weavers.

Thaborit'ic Light (The). A heavenly light supposed to emanate from the 'navel soul.' Certain quietists seat themselves on the ground and fix their eyes on their navel (the seat of the soul). After a time a light beams forth upon them which fills them with rapture and ecstasy. This is the Thaborit'ic Light.

See 'Tabor, Light of,' because it was believed to be identical with the light seen on Mount Tabor at the Transfiguration.

Thalami'tæ. The lowest bank of rowers in a Greek galley; the uppermost bank were the Thranītæ, and the middle bank the Zeugītæ.

Thames Tunnel (The), 1824–1841. Constructed by Marc Isambard Brunel to connect Rotherhithe with Wapping. A bridge was not practicable, not so much on account of the width of the river as the obstruction it would offer to our shipping. The Tunnel is 1,200 feet long, and 63 feet below the bed of the Thames. It has two arched ways and two footways, one for those going from Wapping and Rotherhithe, and one for those going in the opposite direction.

Thanes (1 syl.) were of two sorts, Messe Thegnes and World Thegnes. Bishops were 'Messe Thanes,' and by the laws of King Athelstan ranked with earls or secular Thanes. Other priests were 'World Thanes,' and hence were subsequently entitled 'Sir.' The bishop still retains the title of Lord, but the wife of a bishop has no title, not even that of a common knight's wife.

Thannaim (The). Jewish doctors, authors of the 'Mishnah.' They lived from the time of Malachi to B.C. 21. See p. 291, 'Emoraïm.'

The 'Mishnah' was closed by Rabbi Judah the Nachi four years before. The annotations, &c., form the 'Gemāra,' and both together the 'Talmud.'

Thaumaturga of the Nineteenth Century (The). Filumēna, of whom nothing is known except that three tiles were disinterred in 1802 in the cemetery of Priscilla, inscribed thus:

LVMENA | PAXTE | CVMFI.

By changing the position of the tiles we get PAXTE CUMFI LUMENA, and by dividing the words Pax tecum Filumena. The miracles, of course, were those attributed to the disinterred body.

We are gravely told as an historic fact that the 'Virgin Martyr' took the trouble to reveal to a priest and a nun in a dream that her name was really Filumēna, because she was Fi[lia] Lumena, the daughter of the 'Light of the World.' In confirmation of this revelation, when her bones were taken to Magnano, she repaired her own skeleton, made her hair grow, and performed many other wonderful works! This silly stuff is told as an historic fact in the 19th cent., and is actually believed by many. Filumena is duly registered in the hagiography of the Petits Bollandistes.

Thaumaturgists. Workers of miracles. (Greek θαυματουργέω, to work wonders, or perform tricks of jugglery.)

From the Old Testament the greatest wonder-workers were Moses, Jannes and Jambres (Pharaoh's magicians), and Elisha.

Dositheus, who taught Simon Magus, was a great thaumaturgist.

Simon Magus was called 'The Great Power of God' (Acts viii. 10).

A most graphic account of the ascent of Simon Magus, in imitation of that of Elijah, is given in 'Notes and Queries,' 8 Dec., 1883, pp. 441-2. It was in the presence of Nero and an immense crowd. Simon Magus applied to himself many of the words uttered by Christ, such as 'Behold I go to the Father. . . I will prepare a seat for you at the foot of my throne. . . . I will pour out upon my elect people my celestial treasures.' And again, 'Verily, verily, I say unto you, whoso believeth in me shall not see death; for in me is eternal life.' And again, 'Remember that your eyes have seen the Word of God. I am the Beautiful One, the Paraclete, the Omnipotent, the great Pan, the divine All.'

III. The following were miracle workers, but not entitled 'Thaumaturgi' by the Catholic Church:—

Prince Alexander of Hohenlohe, titular bishop of Sardica. His miracles made a great noise in 1820–1821. He healed by prayer only.

J. Joseph Gassner of Bratz, in the Tyrol, who exorcised the sick. His cures were considered to be miraculous (1727–1779).

Jambĭcus. When he prayed, we are told, his body 'rose in the air at least 10 cubits, and his face became luminous'; so says Eunāpius (4th cent.).

Jannes and Jambres, Pharaoh's magicians, who imitated the miracles of Moses.

Mohammed is said to have performed no miracles, yet rode he to heaven on the back of Alborāk, made the moon pass up one sleeve and down the other, and took a scroll of the Koran out of the horns of a bull (570–632).

Blaise Pascal, philosopher and mathematician (quite sufficient to account for his 'deeds of wonder'), 1623 1662.

Simon Magus of Samaria, called 'The Great Power of God' (Acts viii. 10).

Sospĭtra, who, says Eunapius, 'had the power of seeing what was done in any part of the world.'

Vespasian, the Roman emperor, we are told, 'cured a blind man and a cripple by his touch while staying at Alexandria.'

 Gaspar Schott published a treatise on natural magic, entitled 'Thaumaturgus Physĭcus' (1657–9).

Apparently thaumaturgy did not hold a very high place in the Christian Church. It was extremely common, and nothing whatever is known of many thaumaturgists beyond the name and fête day.

Thaumaturgus. The following are given as thaumaturgi by Mgr. Guérin, 'Petits Bollandistes,' xvii. p. 757.

Antony of Padua . . .	1195–1231
Bridget or Brigit of Ireland	436–523
Francis de Paula . . .	1416–1507
Gregory of Neocæsarēa .	212–270
Hyacinth (of the 13th cent.) .	1182–1257
Martin of Tours . . .	316–397
Vincent Ferrier . . .	1357–1419
Francis Xavier . . .	1506–1552

Hundreds of others are said to have worked miracles, but the eight given above are recognised thaumaturgi.

Thaumaturgus of the West (The). St. Bernard of Clairvaux (1091–1153).

The before a proper name in Scotland and Ireland means the head of a clan, as: The MacLeod, The Chisholm, in Scotland; The O'Donoghue, The O'Connor Don, in Ireland. The assumption of 'the' was forbidden and declared treasonable because the head of a clan, like The O'Neill, also claimed a right to sovereignty. Thus when O'Neill threw off his allegiance to Queen Elizabeth, he called himself 'The O'Neill of Ulster,' meaning that he was king of Ulster.

The'atines (3 syl.), 1524. Confirmed by Clement VII. in 1524. Settled in France by Cardinal Mazarin in 1644, and suppressed in France in 1790. The order was founded by the Archbishop of Chieti (in Latin, Theāte), who afterwards was pope (Paul IV.). The object of the order was to reform the lives of the clergy, and restore the priesthood to apostolic purity. They wore a black soutane, and black robe with white sleeves.

Theatines of the Congregation, 1583. An order of nuns founded at Naples by Ursula Benincasa. Made subject to the Theatines by Clement IX. in 1668.

Theatines of the Hermitage, 1610. Founded in Naples by Ursula Benincasa, and confirmed by Urban VIII. in 1624.

Thebaidic. See p. 787, 'Sahidic.'

Thellusson Act (The), 39 & 40 Geo. III c. 98. For checking the disposition of testators to restricting the use of their fortunes till they had accumulated to very large amounts. So called from Mr. Thellusson, who had directed in his will that his personal property should be left to accumulate during the lives of his three sons, and the lives of their sons, and then to be inherited by the eldest male descendant of his three sons. No testator can now tie up his property for more than twenty-one years, dating from the death of the testator.

Mr. Thellusson died 21 July, 1797. It was decided in the House of Lords that his 'stock' might accumulate for 120 years, when it would amount to 140 millions sterling. Should no heir then exist, the whole should be applied to the discharge of the national debt.

Themistians, 535. Monophysites, originated by Themistius, deacon at Alexandria. Also called Agnoites (q.v.).

Themis'toclês of Modern Greece. Constantine Kanaris (1795–1855).

Theodor'ici Infernum. The crater at Lipări.

Theodosian Code (The). Said to have been compiled by command of Theodosius the Younger, Emperor of the East (401, 402–450). The reputed date of the code is 438; but nine years later the 'Novellæ Constitutiones' were promulgated in the Western empire. The codex consists of 16 books, subdivided into titles and sections. The 262 laws are imperial Rescripts (q.v.) consecrating the wisdom of Christian princes from the reign of Constantine to the year 447. One of the edicts ascribed to Constantine, extending the jurisdiction of bishops to all causes, has been proved to be a forgery; it is, however, inserted in the capitularies of Charlemagne. See p. 524, 'Literary Forgeries.'

Another edict, ascribed to the same emperor [Constantine], and annexed to the Theodosian code, extended the jurisdiction of the bishops to all causes which either party chose to refer to it, even where they had already commenced in a secular court, and declared the bishop's sentence not subject to appeal. This edict has clearly been proved to be a forgery.—HALLAM, Middle Ages, vol. ii. p. 211.

Theodosian Table (The). Same as the Peutingerian Table (q.v.).

Theoph'ilan'thropists (Lovers of God and man), 1796–1800. Philanthropic deists who rose in France during the revolution. They believed in God and the immortality of the soul, but not in the Christian scheme of salvation through faith or by the atonement. They considered that the duty of man is doing good, and their rule was, 'Worship God, cherish your kind, and render yourself useful to your country.' Thomas Paine was one of the founders of this society, and one of its most active members.

These Theophilanthropists superseded the social circle of Paris. Its chief authors were Auber-mesnil, Chemin, Mandar, and Valentin Haüy. The cult was professed in many of the French churches, but was forbidden in 1800.

Theoph'oron, Christot'okos, and Theot'okos. Nestorius (5th cent.) declared that Mary was not θεοτόκος (mother of God), but only χριστοτόκος (mother of Christ), for God cannot be born of a woman. Jesus of Nazareth he called θεοφόρον (possessed of God). These distinctions were condemned by the Council of Ephesus in 431.

Theos'ophy, 1889, means 'the wisdom of the gods,' or the divine wisdom which underlies all religions. It professes to pick out the grains of wisdom from all the divers religious systems of the world, and to amalgamate them into one consistent whole.

Theot (Catherine), 1725–1793. A French visionary, who called herself sometimes the Mother of God and sometimes the new Eve.

Theotokos. See 'Theophoron.'

Therapeutæ (The), Greek θεραπευταί. Greek Jews of Egypt, more rigid than the Essenes, as they avoided towns and dwelt only in deserts or 'commons,' where they gave themselves up to contemplation. Like the Essenes they had all things in common, but unlike the Essenes they abjured all possessions beyond the barest necessities. When anyone entered the society he 'sold all that he had and gave to the poor.' The Therapeutæ were all celibates, like the Essenes, although women were allowed to join their society. On Sabbath days all dined together, the women on one side, the men opposite, and the fare was bread and salt, with a little hyssop (Philo, 'De Vita Contemplativa').

The Therapeutæ believed that God is the author of all good, but not of evil.
That the soul is immortal. That the good are rewarded after death, and the wicked punished.
They objected to animal sacrifice, as no man could be justified in taking life.
Seven was their sacred number.

Ther'midor (The 9th), Year II. 27 July, 1794. The day when Robespierre was accused by Tallien in the Convention, and arrested in the Hôtel-de-Ville, Paris. He and 22 of his partisans were guillotined next day (10 Thermidor, Year II.).

Amongst these partisans were St. Just, Lebas, Henriot, Robespierre jeune, &c. The month called Thermidor was from 19 July to 18 Aug.

Thermido'rian Government (The), 1795–1799. The French Directory was so called because it was established in the month Thermidor (July).

Thermido'rian Reign of Terror (The), 1795. The period which immediately succeeded the fall of Robespierre, when the Anti-Jacobins were in power, and guillotined the Jacobins with the same relentless vengeance as Robespierre had shown against the Anti-Jacobins.

Thermido'rians. Partisans of the 9th Thermidor. See 'Thermidor.' Originally applied to Tallien, Legendre, Lecointre, Fréron, Thuriot, Bourdon de l'Oise, and Barras, but afterwards (1794) applied to all the Anti-Jacobin party, which rose into power on the downfall of Robespierre (9 Thermidor, Year II.), i.e. 27 July, 1794. There were a host of young Thermidorians called 'Fréron's Gilded Youth.' See 'Jeunesse Dorée.'

Generally speaking, the term Thermidorians was applied to those who wanted to restore the monarchy.

Thermopylæ of France (The), 1792. The Forest of Argonne, which Thouvenot was assigned by General Dumouriez to hold against the army of Brunswick, who was marching on towards Paris. Whilst planning how he was to prevent the allied Prussian and Austrian armies, which had just taken Verdun (2 Sept., 1792), from advancing on Paris, he wrote to the French ministers, 'Grand-Prey and Islettes are our Thermopylæ.' He meant that the enemy would be penned up in the desolate, muddy, and sterile fields of Campagne, if his army held Grand-Prey and Islettes. If not the enemy would winter in the fertile country of the Trois Evêches.

[Dumouriez] beckons a certain young Thouvenot, the fire of whose looks had pleased him, to wait a moment. Thouvenot waits: 'Voila (says Polymetis, pointing to the map) that is the Forest of Argonne, that long strip of rocky mountain and wild wood—40 miles long . . . this might one . . . seize . . . [and] once seized . . . [it] might be the Thermopylæ of France.'—CARLYLE, French Revolution, vol. iii., book i., 8.

Thes'mophor'ia. A festival of the ancient Greeks in honour of Demēter, the thesmoph'oros or law-giver. It lasted three days of October, and only married women could take part in the ceremonies. The last day, called Kalligenei'a, was spent in jollity and raillery.

Thiers (Mons.). His nicknames were 'Attila le Petit,' 'Tamerlan à lunettes,' 'Caméléon,' 'Général Bonne,' 'Le Roi des Versailleux.' Louis Adolphe Thiers, born at Marseilles 1797; first president of the French Republic 1871–1873; died 1877.

Thiggers and Sorners of Scotland. Similar to the 'sturdy rogues' of England. Vagabonds who preferred begging to work, and collected alms by menacing the timid. James I. of Scotland tried to put them down, and ordered licensed beggars to wear a badge. These licensed beggars were called 'Gaberlunzies.'

To thig is to beg. Ancient German thigen. Thiggers also written Thigsters. A Sorner, in Scotch law, is one who takes meat and drink from others by force or threats. Sorn or Sorehon was an arbitrary exaction or servile tenure in Scotland and Ireland. Purveyance was a similar exaction in England, that is food and free quarters for king or chief and all his retinue on passage.

Thimble League (The), 1886. To provide work at fair wages for women whose only means of livelihood is needlework.

Thinæ. An hypothetical city of ancient geographers, situated, as Ptolemy says (book vii., 3), 'on or near the vast ocean which bounds Asia. It is enclosed by brazen walls.' The following is the description given in the Periplus of this city: 'It is situated under the Lesser Bear, and is reported to border on the opposite part of Pontus and the Caspian Sea, by which the Mæōtis Palus flows into the ocean' ('Periplus Maris Erythræi,' ap. Hudson, 'Geogr. Vet. Scrip. Græci Minores,' vol. i., p. 36).

Some identify Thinæ with China.

Third Founder of Rome (The). Caius Marius, the victor of the Teutons and Cimbrians (B.C. 101); the second founder was Camillus, who overthrew the Gauls that invaded Rome under Brennus (B.C. 367). Romulus is called the original founder (B.C. 753).

Third Order of Religionists (The). See p. 873, 'Tertiaries.'

Third Romulus (The). See above, 'Third Founder of Rome.'

Thirlwall Prize (The), for original historical research. A prize given every alternate year. Part of the prize is a bronze medal. Open to all graduates of the University of Cambridge of not more than four years' standing. Founded out of the Thirlwall memorial fund 1884; first award 1889.

Thirteen United Colonies (The), 1775. The style assumed by the American Congress after Georgia sent in her adhesion. For the other twelve colonies, see 'Patres Patriæ.' See also 'Congress of the United Colonies.'

Thirty (Battle of the), 1351. The defiance of Jean sire de Beaumanoir to the English châtelain Bemborough to decide a contest by thirty Bretons pitted against thirty Englishmen. It is said by French historians that after eight of the Englishmen had been slain, the rest surrendered; and that Jean sire de Beaumanoir quenched his thirst with a draught of blood. The fight took place between the castles of Josselin and Ploermel in France.

Thirty Tyrants (The). I. Of Athens, B.C. 404. After the battle of Ægospotămos, the government of Athens was changed into an oligarchy. The political clubs named a committee of five who called themselves the Athenian ephors; and this committee nominated thirty persons to draw up the new constitution and to undertake the temporary administration of the city. The chief names were Theramēnēs and Critĭas. The committee thus appointed soon obtained the unenviable name of the Thirty Tyrants.

II. Of Rome, B.C. 200. A term loosely applied to a number of usurpers who assumed the rank and title of Augustus in different Roman provinces after the death of Valerian. The phrase applied to a list of independent rivals, only nineteen in number, is ridiculous, and these rivals in no wise resembled the council of thirty set by Sparta over Athens.

The nineteen pretenders to the Roman throne were Cyrĭădes, Macrĭānus, Ballista Odenăthus, and Zenŏbia (in the East); Posthumus, Lol'lian

Victorinus and his mother Victoria, Marius, and Tetricus (in Gaul and the western provinces); Ingennus, Regillianus, and Aureolus (in Illyricum and the confines of the Danube); Saturninus, in Pontus; Trebellian, in Isauria; Piso, in Thessaly; Valens, in Achaia; Æmilian, in Egypt; and Celsus, in Africa. They all died a violent death. Perhaps the thirty was made up of the wives and children involved in the deaths of the pretenders.

Thirty Years' Peace of Venice (The). From 1538 to 1570, when Selim II. sultan of Turkey declared war against Venice wholly without provocation.

Thirty Years' Truce (The), B.C. 445–415. This truce preceded the great Peloponnesian war.

Thirty Years' War (A). The War of the Roses lasted thirty years; and in this civil war more than 100,000 Englishmen lost their lives. The first battle was that of St. Albans 22 May, 1455, and the war ended with the death of Richard III. in Bosworth Field 22 Aug., 1485. The other historic battles were: Northampton, in which Henry VI. was made prisoner a second time 19 July, 1460; Wakefield, in which Richard duke of York was slain 31 Dec., 1460; Towton, in which Henry VI. was a third time made prisoner—this was one of the bloodiest domestic battles ever fought, 29 March, 1461. Hexham, won by the Yorkists 15 May, 1463; Barnet, in which the Earl of Warwick was slain, fought Easter Day, 14 April, 1471; Tewkesbury, in which Margaret and her son were taken prisoners 4 May, 1471. Altogether eight noted battles.

Thirty Years' War (The), 1618–1648. A war to extirpate the Protestants of Germany set on foot by Kaiser Ferdinand II. It may be divided into four parts, thus—

I. From the commencement to the Danish intervention. A period of seven years (1618–1625).

II. From the beginning of the Danish intervention to the peace of Lübeck, when Christian IV. of Denmark retired from the contest. A period of five years (1625–1630).

III. From the intervention of the Swedes under Gustavus Adolphus to the battle of Nordlingen. Another period of five years (1630–1634).

IV. From the French intervention to the peace of Westphalia, a period of thirteen years, in which the character of the war was wholly changed. It was no longer a religious war, but a fight by France and Sweden for German ascendency (1635–1648).

Thistle (Knights of the), 809, said to have been founded in Scotland by Archaïcus. Revived by James II. of Great Britain in 1687; again by Anne 31 Dec., 1703. The badge is a collar composed of sixteen gold thistles interlaced with golden sprigs of rue; and a small golden image of St. Andrew in a gold badge attached to the collar. The motto is 'Nemo me impune lacessit.'

The 'rue' is a pun. Thistles And-rew (rue).

Thistlewood's Conspiracy, 1820, to assassinate all the ministry. Arthur Thistlewood had been arrested for taking part in the Spa Fields riots (q.v.), Dec. 1816. He challenged Lord Sidmouth (secretary of state for the Home Department) 1817. Sixteen of the ministers were to die at Lord Harrowby's house in Grosvenor Square on 19 Feb. One of the conspirators was to call with a note, and when the door was opened the rest were to rush in and murder all the ministers, bringing off in bags the heads of Sidmouth and Castlereagh. They were then to throw fireballs into the straw-sheds of the cavalry barracks and set them on fire; and then to take the Bank and the Tower. Edwards informed against the conspirators, so the whole affair ended in smoke. Thistlewood and four others were executed 1 May, 1820.

The four others were Ings, Brunt, Tidd, and Davidson. Castlereagh, pronounce Castle-ray.

Thomas (Christians of St.). A very early sect settled on the coast of Malabar, and said to have been planted by Thomas the apostle. They lapsed into the Nestorian heresy; that is, they believed in the co-existence of the two natures of Christ, but not in their union. At present they are chiefly Monophysites, but many are Romanists of the Eastern rite.

It is certainly remarkable that the churches said to have been founded by apostles were, as a rule, not what is now called 'orthodox.' These were the Seven Churches of Asia, the St. Thomas Christians, the Church of Pella presided over by James and his brother, and so on.

Thomasites. See p. 169, 'Christadelphians.'

Thomists. Disciples of Thomas Aquinas (1224–1274), who applied the Aristotelian philosophy to Christianity. Aquinas was a Dominican, and therefore was hated by the Franciscans, their natural enemies. In the 14th cent. Duns Scotus, a Franciscan, came forward as the avowed opponent of Thomas Aquinas, and hence arose the two sects, the Thomists and the Scotists. The Thomists leaned to 'Nominalism' (q.v.); the Scotists to 'Realism' (q.v.). The Thomists, like Augustine, denied the 'Immaculate Conception'; the Scotists maintained it. The Thomists believed in the doctrine of Condignitism (q.v.); the Scotists were Semi-pelagians (q.v.). The points of grace and predestination were always bones of contention.

See 'Christians of St. Thomas,' a large body of Christians in Malabar. See p. 170.

Thomites (The) of Kent, 1838. Followers of John Nicholl Thom, a native of Cornwall, who went to Kent, assumed the name of Sir William Courtenay, gave out that he was the Messiah, and wholly invulnerable by fire or steel. This lunatic had a large following of respectable middle-class men and women, who were guilty of rioting. The military being called out, Thom was shot, and buried at Herne Hill 5 June, 1838.

Mr. Wyse referred to the ignorance revealed in the county of Kent by the delusion of the Thomites. —HOWITT, Hist. of Eng. year 1838, p. 441.

Thorn (Treaty of), 1466, which closed the wars between the Poles and the Teutonic Knights of Preussen. By this treaty all the western part of Preussen was ceded to Poland, and the rest of Preussen (or ancient Prussia) was held as a fief by the knights.

Thorough (The). A system adopted by Wentworth and Archbishop Laud, which would (by the aid of the church) have rendered Charles I. the most absolute of all monarchs. It was the 'thorough' subjection of all law to the royal will.

The hearers had not forgotten the 'Thorough,' nor the utter suppression of all forms of religion but his own, the sweeping away utterly of the faith of Scotland, and the substitution of Arminianism and the liturgy.—HOWITT, Hist. of Engl. (Charles I., chap. iv. p. 249).

Thoulounides (3 syl.). A Turcoman dynasty of Egypt (869–905), so called from Thouloun of the tribe of the Oïgours. He was a slave, but made Egypt independent.

Thrani'tæ, the uppermost bank of rowers in a Greek galley. The lowest bank was called the Thalamitæ and the middle bank the Zeugitæ. As the oars of the Thranītæ were the longest, their labour was greatest, and they had higher wages.

Three Articles (The), 1584. The three things which Archbishop Whitgift required the clergy to subscribe to, viz. (1) the royal supremacy in matters ecclesiastical as well as temporal; (2) the legality of the Book of Common Prayer and the Ordinal; and (3) the Thirty-nine Articles. See p. 48, 'Articles.'

Three Branch Men (The). A term applied to those politicians who in the reign of Charles I. used to speak of the king, lords, and commons as the three estates, or the three branches of the legislature. The phrase originated with John Reeves at the close of the 16th cent.

Lord Clarendon says: 'The three branches is not only unsound in point of law, but is wholly false as a metaphor. Nobody talks of branches, but relatively to something else. If you speak of branches of a canal, you always have in your mind the grand trunk; but if king, lords, and commons are three branches, where is the trunk?' (Of course the three estates of the kingdom are the nobility, the clergy, and the commons.)

Three Chapters (The). In Greek Κεφάλαια. Schedules setting forth the heresies of Theodore of Mopsuestia, Theodoret of Cyrrhus, and Ibas of Edessa, accused of the Nestorian and Pelagian taint. They had been cut off and restored to church communion, and were dead and buried, when Justinian revived the controversy and submitted the 'Three Chapters' to the fifth general council held at Constantinople in 553. The three 'heretics' and all their defenders were then delivered over to the prince of darkness.

Dean Milman (vol. ii. p. 543) says: 'The controversy of "the Three Chapters" was idle and frivolous; yet how many pages of church history does it not fill!' Gibbon says: 'The dispute has filled more volumes than it deserves lines.'—See ROBERTSON, Hist. of the Christian Church, vol. ii. p. 301.

Three-cornered Constituencies. A political device for representing minorities. In 1867 it was enacted that if any place returned more than two members, the constituents should be allowed to vote for one less than the entire number: thus if, as in the city of London, there are four members, the constituents could vote for only three. By this arrangement the three most popular candidates would represent the majority, and the fourth choice would lie between the least popular of the majority and the most popular of the minority, and in almost every case the latter would be elected.

Three Days of July (The), or 'The Three Days,' July 27, 28, 29 (Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday) of 1830, in which the revolution of France culminated in the abdication of Charles X.

The famous Three Days of July had as thrilling an effect in Transylvania as elsewhere.—GODKIN, Hist. of Hungury.

Three Emperors (The), B.C. 2953–2598. The 10th ki of Chinese 'history.' This mythic period followed the allegorical. The three mythic emperors were Fo-hi, Chin-nông, and Hoâng-li, i.e. son of heaven, divine husbandman, and emperor of earth.

Three Fatal to France. The fatal number to Rome has been six; and three has proved singularly fatal to France.

I. Take the kings. The third of any name has been uniformly either worthless or unlucky: Childebert III., Clotaire III., Clovis III., Dagobert III., and Thierry III. were rois fainéants.

CHILDERIC III., the last king of France of the first race, was confined in a cloister that Pepin le Bref might reign in his stead.

PEPIN le Bref was the third Pepin: (1) Pepin de Landen; (2) Pepin d'Héristal, his grandson, and (3) Pepin le Bref, grandson of Pepin d'Héristal, who was succeeded by the Carlovingian dynasty.

CHARLES III. le Simple was wholly under the thumb of favourites, and after a most inglorious reign was poisoned by the Comte de Vermandois.

HENRI III. le Mignon, 'weaker than woman and worse than harlot,' was assassinated by Jacques Clément.

LOUIS III., joint king with Carloman, reigned about a year and was killed by an accident at the age of 22.

PHILIPPE III. le Hardi was singularly unfortunate, and singularly misnamed 'The Bold.' This tool of Labrosse went on a crusade, and brought home the dead bodies of five near relatives: his father, his wife, his son, his brother, and his brother-in-law. The 'Sicilian Vespers' (q.v.) occurred in his reign. He died of an epidemic at Perpignan.

NAPOLEON III. lost his imperial crown at Sedan, and died in exile at Chiselhurst, in Kent.

II. The succession of three brothers has always proved fatal:

The CAPETIAN dynasty terminated with the succession of three brothers: Louis X., Philippe V., and Charles IV. (sons of Philippe le Bel).

The VALOIS line came to an end by the succession of three brothers: François II., Charles IX., and Henri III. (sons of Henri II.).

The BOURBON dynasty terminated with the succession of three brothers: Louis XVI.; Louis XVIII., and Charles X. (sons of Louis the Dauphin).

III. The monarchy of France was brought to an end by the third of these triplets.

The empire of France consisted of Napoleon I., Napoleon II., and Napoleon III.

Ut dicitur, semper sub sextis perdita Roma,
Sic quoque sub numero tres perdita Francia semper.

If six to Rome hath always brought mischance,
Three hath a fatal number proved to France.
See p. 796, 'Semper sub Sextis.'

Three Glorious Days, or 'La grande semaine.' The insurrection of 27, 28, 29 July (1830), in Paris, which drove Charles X. from the throne. The days were Tuesday, Wednesday, and Thursday.

The political world was shaken by the three glorious days in Paris.—J. A. FROUDE, Thomas Carlyle, vol. ii. p. 124.

Three Great Military Orders (The). The Knights Templars, the Knights Hospitallers, and the Teutonic Knights of St. Mary of Jerusalem.

Three Hundred (The), of Milan. The band in charge of the banner of St. Ambrose, the sacred oriflamme of Milan, sworn to die in its defence. The three hundred were supported by a guard of three times three hundred, the elect soldiers of Lombardy. Three was a sacred number, and three times three was thrice sacred.

Three in English history. Our line of kings never exceeds three reigns without interruption or catastrophe.

William I., II., Henry I.
A usurper, Stephen.
Henry II., Richard I.
A usurper, John.

Henry III., Edward I.
Edward II. murdered.
Edward III.
Richard II. deposed.
Henry IV., V., VI.
Line of Lancaster changed.
Edward IV., V., Richard III.
Dynasty changed.
Henry VII., VIII., Edward VI.
Lady Jane Grey.
Mary, Elizabeth.
Dynasty changed.
James I.
Charles I. beheaded.
Charles II.
James II. dethroned.
William III., Anne.
Dynasty changed.
George I., II., III.
Regency.
George IV., William IV., Victoria.
Indirect successions.

 Except in one case, that of John, we have never had a great-grandchild as sovereign in direct descent. See 'Three Fatal to France.'

Three Kings (The). The three Kings of Cologne are the supposed Magians who offered gifts to the infant Jesus in Bethlehem. The 'Feast of the Three Kings' is the Feast of Epiphany or Twelfth Night. There was a famous dramatic spectacle so called, once extremely popular. The representation in 1336 by the monks of Milan is historic.

The names usually given in Cologne Cathedral are Gaspar, Melchior, and Balthasar; but other traditions give other names, as Apellios, Ameros, and Damascos; Magalath, Galgalath, and Sarasin,—Ator, Sator, and Peratoras.

Three Kings' Day. Twelfth Day, so called because the visit of the 'Three Kings' or wise men of the East who came to honour the infant Jesus is commemorated on that day (the Epiphany).

Three per cent. Reduced Annuities (The), 1747. Several funds borrowed at a higher rate of interest reduced to a three per cent. interest. In 1749 by Act of Parliament it was declared that all such holders of the fund as did not choose to accept the reduced interest should be paid off in full. Very few embraced the alternative.

Three Popes.

I. In the 11th cent. there were three simultaneous popes: Benedict IX. (1033–1048), Silvester III. (1044), and Gregory VI., who bought the pontificate (1044–1046). Kaiser Henry III. in 1046, having set aside Benedict and Gregory, appointed Clement II., a German, who died the following year. Benedict still held on, and in the two next years two other Germans were appointed by the kaiser.

II. In the 15th cent. there were three simultaneous popes: Gregory XII. (1406–1415, died 1417), held his court at Friuli; Benedict XIII., the Avignon pope, held his court at Peniscola, in Spain (1394–1424); and Alexander V., the Roman pope (1409–1410), succeeded by John XXIII. (1410–1415). While Gregory and Benedict were still alive the Council of Pisa appointed Martin V. (1417), and at the death of Benedict Clement VIII. took his chair.

Three Questions (The), 1687. The lords-lieutenants of counties and mayors of boroughs were requested by James II. to make a return of persons who answered the following questions in the affirmative: (1) If chosen to sit in the next parliament will you vote for the repeal of the Test Act and of the Penal Laws? (2) Will you give your vote to candidates favourable to those repeals? (3) Will you support the declaration for liberty of conscience by living peaceably with Christians of a different creed to your own? The answers received were not favourable to the king's views.

Three Rejected Articles (The). The original number of the articles of the Church of England was 42, drawn up in 1551, but the present number is 39, three having been omitted by Convocation, 29 Jan., 1563. The three articles rejected are these: (1) The resurrection of the dead is not passed already; (2) the soul does not perish with the body; and (3) not all men will be saved.

Three Sacraments (The).

I. 1520. Luther acknowledged only three sacraments, viz. baptism, the eucharist, and penance. Roman Catholics have seven sacraments, but English Protestants since 1553 have admitted but two, baptism and the Lord's supper, as may be gathered from the church catechism published that year.

II. In 'Cranmer's Catechism' (q.v.) three sacraments are authorised:

1. Baptism, the bath of regeneration, or instrument of the second birth (pp. 182, 206).

2. Absolution, or the authority of the keys, by virtue of which pardon is obtained for sins after baptism.

3. The holy communion, which supplies fresh grace to the worthy recipient, and enables him to go on from strength to strength.

Three States or Stages (The). Comte says the mind passes through three stages, the theological, the metaphysical, and the positive. In the infancy of thought the mind attributes phenomena to the arbitrary will of some spirit, fairy, or pervading providence, which says and it is done. In the second stage it attributes the causes of phenomena to some abstract or hypothetical principle, as law and force. In the third stage it relies on science and data. Thus plague or famine by the first is attributed to God; by the second to eclipses or some other hypothesis; by the third to bad sanitary arrangements. Most educated men are in all the three stages: on some subjects they are in the theological stage; on others in the metaphysical; and on others in the positive. Thus Faraday was remarkable for his theological and positive stages.

Three States (Period of the), called by the Chinese San-kuo (221–226). The states were (1) Heou-Hân, or Sho-Hân, the continuation of the Hân or 6th imperial dynasty. It gave two kings, and lasted forty-four years. The seat of government was Shen-see; (2) the kingdom of Oey or Wei, which gave five kings, lasted forty-five years, and had Honân for the seat of government; (3) the kingdom of Ou or Woo, which gave four kings, lasted forty-four years, and had its seat of government first at Ou-chang, and afterwards at Nankin.

Three Tailors of Tooley Street (The). Only two of these busybodies were tailors. They were John Grose (tailor, Tooley Street), Thomas Satterley (tailor, Weston Street), and George Sandham (grocer, Bermondsey Street), who met after business at a public-house, to smoke their pipes and talk politics. During the movement of Catholic Emancipation they resolved to petition parliament, and commenced their document with these words: 'We, the people of England.' Canning was prime minister.

A correspondent of 'Notes and Queries' (21 Jan., 1888, p. 55) avouches this to be a fact.

Three Test Articles (The), 1554, introduced in the reign of Mary in proof of orthodoxy, were:—

1. Is the natural body of Christ really present in the elements after consecration, or not?

2. Does any substance, except the body and blood, remain in the eucharist?

3. Is the Mass a propitiatory sacrifice for the sins of the living and dead, or is it not? See p. 48, 'Articles.'

Three Theological Virtues (The). Faith, Hope, and Charity.

Three-way Leet. A three-way road, a cross-road where suicides used to be buried with a stake thrust through their body. These cross-ways were the terror of 'old women and old maides.'

Lædan, zeléedan · lád, gelád. Junius says, 'Trivium, quadrivium, ita dicunt, in quibusdam Angliæ tractibus.

'Three Ws' (The), 1837. Three great American houses in London. The amount paid from June to December by Wilson & Co. was 935,300*l.*; by Wigan & Co. 674,700*l.*; and by Wildes & Co. 505,000*l.*; total acceptances in six months, 2,116,000*l.*

Three Writers (The). See p. 801, 'Scriptores Tres.'

'Five Writers,' see 'Scriptores Quinque'; 'Ten Writers,' see 'Scriptores Decem'; the 'Six Chronicles,' see 'Six.'

Threshers (The), 1806. An Irish secret treaty formed by Roman Catholics of Ireland in opposition to the Orangemen or Protestant association. They appeared in Sligo, Mayo, Leitrim, Longford, Roscommon, and Cavan. One of their articles was the resistance to the payment of tithes, even when voluntarily paid to Roman Catholic priests. Their chief called himself 'Capt. Thresher,' and his gangs used to thrash or beat unmercifully all collectors of tithes and their clerks, as well as those who paid tithes. See p. 455, 'Irish Associations.'

Throne and Altar (The). 'Le Trône et l'Autel,' the motto of the Legitimists and Carlists. It really means the divine right of kings and priests, both 'the Lord's Anointed.' The absolute king and infallible Church.

Throne of Jamshēd (The). Persepŏlis is so called because founded by Jamshēd (shēd means illustrious). This mythical king of Persia began to reign B.C. 2240 and reigned twenty years. The Blue-ribbonites will be glad to know that the art of making wine is ascribed to this king.

Throne of the Barricades (The). That of Louis Philippe of France (1830–1848), founded on the Revolution of July, when Paris was barricaded for three days.

Thronus Regalis (Königstuhl). A round vault on the Rhine, five miles south of Coblentz. The vault is built of freestone, and rests on nine stone pillars, one of which stands in the middle. It is eighty feet in circumference, furnished above with seven seats, one for each elector. The ascent to it is by stairs consisting of twenty-eight stone steps, and it has two stout doors. On this thronus regālis the original electors consulted respecting their choice of a king. Heinrich VII. in 1308 was elected in this manner, and in 1338 the electoral league was established here. Maximilian I. was the last of the kaisers brought to the thronus regalis.

Thugs (The). A religious fraternity in India in honour of Khali, wife of Siva, but addicted to murder. In some provinces they are called Phansīgars or stranglers.

Phansigars means those who 'employ the noose' or phansi. Thug means deceiver or cheat.

Thunderbolt of Italy (The). Gaston de Foix, nephew of Louis XII., who fell at Ravenna in the moment of victory (1489–1512).

Thunderer (The). The 'Times' newspaper, so called from an expression used by Captain Edward Stirling while Thomas Barnes was editor: 'We thundered forth the other day an article on the subject of social and political reform.'

Thundering Legion (The), A.D. 174. In Latin 'Legio Fulminatrix.' While Marcus Aurelius was engaged in a war with the Quadi and Marcomanni his army suffered severely from want of water. Eusebius says the 12th legion (Legio Melitīna) fell on their knees and prayed for rain, when forthwith a storm broke overhead, supplying the Roman army with water, and dealing destruction to the foe. From this storm the Legio Melitīna was ever after called the Thundering Legion.

The assertion of Eusebius (v. 5), be it remembered, is only one-sided, for others ascribe the storm to the prayers of Marcus Aurelius to Jupiter, and under this impression the emperor raised a pillar in gratitude to 'Jupiter the Thunderer.' Others ascribe it to the incantations of Arnuphis, an Egyptian magician. Then, again, Dio Cassius informs us that the twelfth legion had been called 'Legio Fulminatrix' ever since the time of Augustus (Book vii., v. 22).

Thurificati (The). Those lapsed Christians who, to avoid persecution, consented to burn incense to heathen gods.

Tiara (The). The triple crown of the pope, symbolising his civil rank, as the keys symbolise his ecclesiastical power. The most ancient head-dress of the bishop of Rome was a high round cap. In 1053 Pope Damasus II. adopted a cap more like that of the Jewish high-priest or a mitre. In 1276 Pope John XIX. encompassed his mitre with a crown; in 1295 Boniface added a second crown; and in 1411 John XXII. added a third crown, completing the tiara or triple crown to signify the power of the pope over the church 'souffrante, militante, et triomphante,' or else his power over three parts of the world (Europe, Asia, and Africa).

Surely the pope cannot claim power over the church triumphant.

Tiberius (The French). Louis XI. (1423, 1461–1483). Both were cruel, crafty, and deceitful. Their rule of government was, 'He who knows not how to deceive knows not how to rule.'

Tibullus of France (The). Evariste Désiré Desforges Parny (1753–1814). The 'dame de sa plume' was a Creole, who, however, preferred in marriage a rich planter to a poor poet.

Tiedge Verein (The), 1842. An institution founded in Berlin in honour of Christoph August Tiedge, 'the Nestor of German poesy' (1752–1841). It gives every fifth year a literary prize to some youthful candidate, and makes provision for needy meritorious authors.

Tien-teh. The pretender to imperial power in China, and leader of an insurrection which lasted sixteen years. There were five chiefs, all of whom acknowledged his supremacy (1850–1866).

His proper name was Hung-siu-tsuen. He was a native of Quang-si of low origin, and assumed the titular names of Tien-teh (celestial virtue) and Tae-ping-wang (prince of peace).

Tien-tsin (Treaty of), 26 June, 1858, between Great Britain and China. Ratified 24 Oct., 1860. Provided for ambassadors on the part of the two contracting parties to reside at each other's court; for the establishment of a British minister at Pekin, and the liberty of trading without restriction.

Tierce. One of the eight daily services of the Catholic Church, and third of the four lesser ones. At nine in the morning—the third hour of the day. See p. 140, 'Canonical Hours.'

Tiers Consolidé, 1797. A name given in France during the Directory to the public debt, 'dont le tiers seul était garanti,' the nation being bankrupt at the time.

Tiers État (Le), or 'Le Tiers.' The third order of the state, the other two being the noblesse and the clergy. The three orders combined form the Etats Généraux. In the reign of Louis le Gros (1108–1137), the commons were admitted into the legislative assembly, which then took the name of the 'Assemblée des trois états.' 27 Dec., 1788, it was determined that the deputies of Le Tiers should equal those of the other two orders combined. This is called 'Le doublement du Tiers.' The name of Tiers Etat was abolished in 1789, and the Etats Généraux became the Assemblée Nationale.

Pronounce Tears-a-tah'.

Tiers Ordre, or 'Tiercelins,' or 'Tertiaries.' Seculars of a religious order who observe the rules of the order to which they attach themselves without renouncing their civil life. The 'Third Order of St. Francis' was founded in 1221; the 'Tertiaries of St. Augustine' in 1401; the 'Third Order of St. Dominic' in 1422; &c.

Some tertiaries who live in common.

Tigernach. The oldest of the Irish annalists (died 549). His annals were published in O'Connor's Rerum Hibernicarum Scriptores Veteres at the expense of the Duke of Buckingham, 1814–1826.

Tiglath-pileser. See p. 485, 'Kileh-Shergat.'

Tigretier. The dancing mania of Abyssinia, which occurs most frequently in the Tigré country, whence its name.

Tilsit (Peace or Treaty of), 7 July, 1807, between France and Russia. This was a most disgraceful affair, as Russia was at the time an ally of Great Britain, and they were acting together against Turkey and the French. Napoleon by this treaty won over Alexander, and secretly provided that he should make common cause with France against Great Britain, and sign the Berlin Decree (q.v.). It was secretly agreed between the two signatories that France should be allowed to make itself master of the Danish fleet and Russia to seize Finland. Turkey was to be divided between them: France to have Macedonia, Dalmatia, and Greece; and Russia all the rest of Turkey. 9 July Prussia signed the treaty, but was not informed of the secret provisions above referred to.

'Times' (The), newspaper. Commenced 1 January, 1788.

'Times' (The) and the Irish Land League, 1889. The 'Times' newspaper had used its gigantic influence to put down the crimes committed in Ireland for several past years connected with the Land League. The Irish were compelled by the leaguers to join the league on pain of death or personal injury, and those who joined the league were forbidden to pay their rents or to occupy a holding from which a defaulting tenant had been evicted. In 1889 three judges, called Commissioners, were appointed to examine into the merits of these charges made by the 'Times.'

Whatever may be said respecting the position taken up by the 'Times' in 1888-1889 against Charles S. Parnell and the Irish party, one thing is indisputable, the motive was noble and patriotic. Mr. Gladstone as prime minister had said that 'crime dogged the Parnellite party in every movement,' and if so, the movement ought to be put down. In fact, the phrase 'Parnellism and crime' is only Gladstone's dictum in another form. The conduct of the 'Times' in seconding Mr. Gladstone was a most disinterested act, with only one fault—the editors trusted too implicitly to an adventurer named Pigott, who betrayed them.

'Times' Fund (The), 1854. A sum of 10,000*l.* raised by private subscription and sent to Printing-house Square for the relief of the sick and wounded in the hospitals of Scutări, tended by Miss Florence Nightingale and a staff of lady volunteers in the Crimean war. The 'Times' newspaper undertook to superintend this fund.

'Times' Memorial (The), 1841. Mr. O'Reilly, the 'Times' correspondent at Paris, having received secret information of a gigantic fraud projected on the continent, exposed it in the 'Times' newspaper, and saved the bankers the loss of a million sterling. A testimonial was set on foot, and the 'Times' declining any money recompense, a 'Times' scholarship was founded at Oxford for boys educated at Christ's Hospital, and another at Cambridge for boys educated in the City of London School. The rest of the money was spent on four tablets, to be set up in the Royal Exchange, in Christ's Hospital, in the City of London School, and in the 'Times' printing office.

The swindle was to have been a simultaneous issue of forged letters of credit on the chief bankers of Europe. The attempt to expose the Irish Land League was equally noble, but miscarried through the villainy of one Pigott.

'Times' Testimonial (The), 1842. The Bishop of London headed a subscription to the 'Times' newspaper for the interest taken by that journal in the School of Christ's Hospital. The money collected was funded to create exhibitions in that school to either of the Universities, and to found 'Times' Scholarships.' See above 'The "Times" and the Irish Land League.'

Timothy Sparks. The nom de guerre of Charles Dickens in his pamphlet of 'Sunday under Three Heads': (1) As it is; (2) As Sabbath bills have made it; and (3) As it might be made (1836).

Timothy Titcomb. The pen-name of Josiah Gilbert Holland, an American author.

Tineman, i.e. lose-man, the man who loses his men. So Archibald Douglas was called, because after the death or murder of the Duke of Rothesay, fortune deserted him, and he lost most of his followers in each action he undertook (died 1424).

Tintamarresque. Burlesque history: as 'Le Trocadéroscope, Revue Tintamarresque de l'Exposition Universelle.' Paris, 1878. Par Touchatout.

'Histoire de France Tintamarresque.' Par Touchatout. Paris (to the flight of Louis-Philippe in 1848).

'Histoire Tintamarresque de Napoléon III.' Par Touchatout. Paris, 1877 (from 1848).

'La Dégringolade Impériale' (a second part to the above). Paris, 1878.

'Grande Mythologie Tintamarresque.' Par Touchatout.

'Histoire Populaire et Tintamarresque de la Belgique.' Par F. Delisle. Brussels.

Tintoret of Switzerland (The). John Rudolph Huber (1722–1790). He painted 3,065 portraits, besides other subjects.

Tippling Act (The). 24 Geo. II. ch. 40. So called because it allowed no action to be maintained for the sale of spirituous liquors, retailed on credit, unless the debt amounted to 20*s.* or upwards at one time. Now in part repealed.

Tire'sias. Milton is called 'the blind Tiresias of modern times' (1608–1674).

Tirshatha. A governor appointed over the Assyrian kings.

Tirzah (The House of). In the language of the Roundheads, the Episcopalians were of the house of Tirzah. Any persons who differ from our own religious faith. Tirzah was the royal city of the revolted tribes of Israel.

He liked not this going to feast in high places with the uncircumcised in heart, and looked on the whole . . . as a making merry in the house of Tirzah.—Sir W. Scott, Peveril of the Peak, chap. 4.

Tisserands (weavers). The French name of the Cathări, or Puritans of the 12th cent. See p. 150, 'Cathari.'

Tithe Agitation (The). In Ireland, 1831. The Catholic Irish combined to resist the payment of tithes to Protestant clergymen. The rebellion was stirred up by Daniel O'Connell, who hated Mr. Stanley, the chief secretary. Many of the clergy in Ireland were reduced to pauperism. At Newtownbarry, in Wexford, cattle were impounded by a tithe-proctor, and the peasantry who went to release them came into collision with the yeomanry, who fired and killed twelve. At Carrickshock, however, there was a more frightful tragedy. The peasantry armed with scythes and pitchforks killed eighteen of the police, including the commanding officer. At Castlepollard, in Westmeath, the police fired on the peasants and shot ten. At Gortroche, near Rathcormack (Cork), Archdeacon Ryder, supported by a number of the military, ordered the soldiers to fire, when eight were killed and thirteen wounded. Among the slain was the son of widow Ryan. Government now took the matter up. Mr. Stanley, chief secretary, insisted that the law must be respected; Daniel O'Connell sided with the tithe recusants. It was found that the amount of arrears was 104,285*l.*, but all that could be collected was 12,000*l.*, and the cost of collecting it was 15,000*l.*, so the contest was given up, as the game was not worth the candle. See 'Irish Church Temporalities Bill.'

Tithe Bill, or Commutation Act, 1836. As a tenth of the produce of land would in many cases swallow up the profits of improvement, the bill enacted that a rent-charge should be levied equal to the average amount received for wheat, barley, and oats, during the seven preceding years. The rent-charge removed the vexatious custom of taking tithes in kind. The measure was devised by Mr. Jones.

Many landlords let their lands tithe free, and pay the rent-charge themselves. This should always be done under all circumstances. When tithe was collected in kind, a green bough was stuck into every tenth shock of corn on the field to mark the property of the tithe-owner.

Tithe Commissioners of England and Wales (The). 6, 7 Will. IV. c. 71 appointed to convert the tithes into a rent-charge payable in money, but varying in amount, according to the average price of corn (i.e. wheat, barley, and oats), for the seven preceding years.

Tithe Commutation Act (The), 1832. Ireland. This act enabled the tenant to pay a yearly sum of money in lieu of tithes, if the rector was willing to accept the commutation. Above 1,000 parishes accepted the change, but some rectors stood out, and this led to the Anti-tithe War (q.v.).

Tithe Composition Bill (The), 1832. Introduced by Lord Stanley. In 1838 composition for tithes in Ireland was changed for a fixed charge, which was only three-fourths of the former composition, to be paid by the landlords and not by the tenants (1, 2 Vict. c. 109).

Tithe War (The). In Ireland (1830–1835). A most sanguinary rebellion ostensibly for the abolition of tithes The Whitefeet, the Blackfeet, the Terryalts, the Lady Clares, the Molly Maguires, and the Rockites overran Ireland during these years. And in 1842, 1846, the Repeal movement roused the country to a state of enthusiasm bordering on frenzy, if not actual revolt. See p. 455, 'Irish Associations.'

Tithes (Commutation of). In England and Wales, 1836 (6, 7 Will. IV. c. 71), whereby the tithes hitherto collected in kind were commuted for a fixed sum of money. Amended by 1 & 2 Vict. c. 64 (1837), and several times since.

Titi (Prince). Frederick prince of Wales, eldest son of George II. Seward, a contemporary, tells us that Prince Frederick was a great reader of French memoirs, and that he wrote memoirs of his own times under the pseudonym of 'Prince Titi.' These memoirs were subsequently found amongst the papers of Ralph the historian.

Correspondents of 'Notes and Queries' in 1884 inform us that there is a political fairy tale by St. Hyacinthe (1684-1746) called the 'History of Prince Titi,' the four chief characters of which are KING GINGUET, mean, stingy, and hating his son (like George II.); the QUEEN TRIPASSE, his wife, haughty, very fond of money, and also hating her son (like Queen Caroline); PRINCE TITI, a good, kind-hearted, affable prince, handsome and brave, but ill-used by his royal parents (like Frederick prince of Wales); and PRINCE TRIPTILLON, a younger brother, made much of by both his parents (like the Duke of Cumberland). Ralph also wrote a 'History of Prince Titi,' in which the page L'Eveille by fairy help gets to know all that passes in royal councils, and keeps the prince advised of everything. The page made a journal in cipher of these matters, which was printed in 1736.

Titian (The French). Jacques Blanchard (1600–1638).

Titian (The Portuguese). Alonzo Sanchez Coello (1515–1590).

Titian (The Spanish). Juan Fernandez Ximenes, generally called 'El Mudo' (the Dumb), 1598–1666.

Title, or 'Titŭlus,' means 'pastor,' as the 'Title of St. Mary,' i.e. the pastor of the church so called.

Title of Accusation, (The), nailed to the cross, we are told, is deposited with one of the nails in the Santa Croce of Rome. Bozio asserts that it was found in the cave where the three crosses were buried. The letters are red, and the slab of wood. Lipsius informs us that the slab shown to him was 9 inches long; but, as it contained only a small part of the inscription, the entire slab, he thinks, must have been about 4 feet. See p. 231, 'Crucifixion, Relics of the.'

Father Durand (1232-1296) tells us that he saw in Paris the title of the accusation in full. The monk Antonine (1389-1459) asserts that he held in his own hands the slab bearing the full accusation when he visited the Holy Sepulchre at Jerusalem.

The title on the Roman slab contains two Latin words, NAZARINVS RE[X], and one Greek word written backwards and spelt with two blunders, IYONEPAZAN, where E should be H, and -OYI should be -OI. Surely this must be a most clumsy forgery, for the writer ignorantly supposed that Greek was written like Hebrew from right to left.

Tit'ulars of Tithes. Scotchmen to whom the king made grants of abbey lands and tithes, on condition of their providing suitable stipends to the reformed clergy. Also called the 'Lords of Erection.'

Titus of Germany (The). Joseph II. (1741–1765–1790), son of Maria Theresa. So called because hardly a day passed which was not distinguished by some act of munificence, some private deed of charity, or something done for the good of others; yet was he almost always unfortunate.

Titus, or the Delight of Mankind of Germany (The). Maximilian II. Coxe, in his 'House of Austria,' says: 'If ever a Christian and philosopher filled the throne, that Christian and philosoper was Maximilian II.' (vol. i. part ii. p. 649). Born 1527, reigned 1564–1576.

Tityre Tus (pronounce Tit'-e-re tuze). The name assumed in the 17th cent. by a clique of young blades in London, of the upper class, whose delight was to break windows, upset sedan-chairs, rudely caress young women, molest the watch, and annoy quiet citizens. See 'Street Bullies.'

The reference is to the first line of Virgil's first 'Eclogue,' Tityre, tu patulæ recubans sub tegmine fagi, implying that they were men of leisure who delighted to 'recline at ease under their paternal beeches.'

To Remain Bible. In Gal. xxiv. 29 an editorial note in the margin, 'to remain' [stet], is inserted in the text: 'But as then he that was born after the flesh persecuted him that was born after the spirit to remain, even so it is now.' See p. 90, 'Bible,' and 'Scriptures.'

Tobacco Revolt (The), 1848. See p. 32, 'Anti-tobacconists.'

Toeplitz, in Bohemia (Treaty of), Sept. 1813, between Austria and Great Britain. This treaty of alliance was effected between the battle of Dresden and that at Leipsic. A few days previously (9 Sept.) Austria, Russia, and Prussia had entered into an alliance against Napoleon.

Toga'ted Nation (The). The ancient Romans, whose distinguishing dress was a toga or white robe bordered with purple for magistrates. Women as well as men wore the toga.

The children who were free-born wore a toga prætexta (white bordered with purple) till they were seventeen, when they changed it for the toga virilis, made of white wool without ornament or border.

Toga'ti et Pallia'ti. The Romans and Greeks. The dress of a Roman was the toga, of a Greek the pallium, whence the Romans were called the gens togāta, and the Greeks the gens palliāta.

Toghlak (The House of). Founded in Delhi by Tóghlak in 1321. This line of kings succeeded the second Gaurian dynasty, which reigned from 1288 to 1321. The house of Toghlak was succeeded in 1414 by the government of the Seiads.

Toleration Act (The), 1 William & Mary, c. 18 (24 May, 1689). For the relief of Protestant Dissenters. All persons dissenting from the Church of England (except Papists, Unitarians, and Arians) were allowed to assemble for religious worship according to their own forms, provided they took the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, and also subscribed a declaration against transubstantiation. The exception of Unitarians and Arians was repealed by 53 Geo. III. c. 160. The Roman Catholics were relieved by the Emancipation Act, 10 Geo. IV. c. 7, 1829, and 1844.

Tolosa (Gold of). Tolōsa—i.e. Toulouse—was a large and wealthy city with a famous temple, where great riches were deposited. In this temple was preserved the booty taken by 'Brennus' from Delphi. In 106 this temple was plundered by Quintus Servilius Cæpio on his way to meet the Cimbrian army. Cæpio was utterly defeated by the Cimbri, and it was said that his defeat was a judgment of the gods for his sacrilege. Hence the Latin proverb Aurum Tolo- danum habet ('Ill-gotten wealth never prospers').

Toltecan Nations (The). The Mexicans and Peruvians are so called by Morton. The Toltecans, he says, were the builders of that series of mounds found throughout North America.

Tom Moore of France (The). Chaulieu (1639–1720). Called 'The Anacreon of the Temple.'

Tom of Ten Thousand. Thomas Thynne, of Longleat Hall. So called not only from his great wealth, but for his unbounded hospitality. He married Elizabeth Percy (countess of Ogle), heiress of Joscelyne earl of Northumberland, and was murdered on his wedding day (12 Feb., 1682) by three assassins hired by Charles count Konigsmark, a disappointed suitor of Lady Ogle.

In Dryden's 'Absalom and Achitophel' Thomas Thynne is introduced as 'Issachar.'

Tome of St. Leo (The). That is his 'Dogmatic Letter' 449. Leo set aside the Council of Ephesus, which had pronounced in favour of Eutychês, and summoned a new council of Chalcêdon, in which his 'Tome' was accepted 'as the voice of St. Peter,' and adopted as the orthodox exposition of the doctrine of the person of Christ. It declared that his body was not a celestial body, as Eutychês maintained, nor yet a mere human body into which the Godhead descended at baptism, as the Nestorians taught, but a human and divine nature like the union of body and soul. This of course led to the dogma that Mary was the mother of God, and to the more modern dogma of the Immaculate Conception.

Tomlins Prælector of Anatomy in Oxford University. Founded by Richard Tomlins in 1626. Now annexed to the Linacre professorship of Physiology, the stipend being 200*l.* a year.

Tong-Hân. The last fourteen kings of the Hân dynasty (B.C. 25 to A.D. 220).

The first 16 kings of this dynasty were the western or Si-Hân. The second half the eastern or Tong-Hân.

Tong-Oeï Dynasty (The), A.D. 534. The northern empire of China was split into the eastern or Tong-Oeï, and the western or Si-Ooï. The first dynasty of the eastern kingdom had but one sovereign, who reigned 16 years (534–550).

Tonnage and Poundage. A duty per ton or per pound on goods imported into England. First imposed by Edward III. by vote of parliament for a fixed number of years, and renewed at the expiry of the time. It was to furnish the sovereign with ready money for the defence of his realm. In the reign of Henry V. the grant was made for life, but on the accession of Charles I. the parliament limited the grant to a year, and when the grant was not renewed, as was usual, Charles levied it without the authority of a grant. The amount was about 3*s.* per tun on imported wines, 10 per cent. on goods sold by the pound of less value than 100*l.*, and 5 per cent. on goods above that value. In the reign of Queen Anne these imposts were made perpetual, and mortgaged for the public debt, and in 1787 (27 Geo. III. c. 13) tonnage and poundage was abolished, a duty being substituted according to tariff on each article subjected to duty.

Of course, since 1846, when free trade in corn was established, the principle has spread to the free importation of well-nigh every article of commerce; but no nation in the world follows the example (1890). The United States of N. America, in Oct. 1890, ran to the extreme of protection. And now the nations will learn whether Free Trade or Protection is the true principle of national prosperity.

Tonnage Bank (The), 1694. So the Bank of England was called when it was first established in the reign of William III., because the Bank company was to lend government 1,200,000*l.* at 8 per cent., and to receive in repayment the proceeds of a new duty on tonnage.

Tonsure. The shaven part of the head indicative in the Catholic Church of holy orders. Probably it represents the halo of sanctity, or else the crown of the royal priesthood.

1. St. Peter's tonsure. The shaven part is the whole crown of the head, with a fringe of hair left to represent the crown of thorns. This is the tonsure of the Latin Church.

2. St. Paul's tonsure, when the whole head is shaven. This is the tonsure of the Greek or Oriental Church.

Simon Magus's tonsure. A semicircle shaven from ear to ear above the forehead, but not reaching to the hinder part of the head, where the hair was suffered to remain. This is sometimes called St. James's tonsure. It was adopted by the Irish missionaries.

Tonsures are mentioned by St. Dionysius the Areopagite, who died A.D. 95, 'De Hierarchia,' p. 2; and they were general in the 4th and 5th cents. See Bede, 'Church Hist.,' book v. ch. 22.

Toom Tabard (Empty Jacket). So John Baliol was called by the Scotch for his silly opposition to Edward I. (Baliol born 1259, king 1292–1296, died 1314.) 'Vox et prætera nihil.'

Torch of Pengwern (The). Gwenwyn, prince of Powysland, was so called from his constantly laying Pengwern in Flintshire, part of the 'province of Shrewsbury,' in conflagration.

Torches, Links, and Lanterns. In the reigns of James I. and Charles I. courtiers (proceeding home after dark) were conducted with torches, merchants with links, and mechanics with lanterns.

Torgau (The Book of), 1574. A celebrated confession of faith, the object of which was to establish unanimity between the reformers. Torgau is in Prussia (Saxony). Also called the 'Formula of Concord.'

Torgau, pronounce Tor-gow (ow as in 'now').

Tories (in Irish history), 1653, rapparees, or freebooters. They were the Irish Catholics driven by Cromwell from their homes into Connaught, who, instead of settling down, lived by blackmail, or by plundering those planted on their estates. Tory-hunting was a regular business after the Restoration, and was continued to the latter part of the 18th cent. In 1695 a law was made that any Tory killing two other Tories, 'proclaimed and on their keeping,' should be entitled to pardon for all former offences, except murder. In 1718 it was declared a sufficient claim for pardon if a Tory could plead that he had killed one Tory. These acts expired in 1776. The word is from toruighim, to pursue for the sake of plunder.

The word Tory has completely changed its meaning: it no longer means the anti-government party, but the Church and State party. So in Italy the Guelfs and Ghibellines (q.v.) in 1818 completely changed their meanings. From the accession of William III. to the reign of George II. the Jacobites or anti-government party were the Tories: since then they have been the strong Church and State party.

Tories and Whigs, 1781, in the American War of Independence. Those colonists who adhered to the British interest called themselves Tories, Royalists, or Loyalists; those in the American interest called themselves Whigs or Patriots. They were nearly equal in numbers, and showed a savage hostility to each other.

Torné (Bishop), 1792, in the National Hall of Paris, demanded that all religious costumes and such like caricatures should be abolished. Then he flung on the floor of the house his pontifical cross, skull-cap, and frill-collar. Fauchet and other prelates followed his example, till all insignia were stripped off ('Moniteur,' 7 April, 1792).

Torquema'da. A bigoted inquisitor. The reference is to Thomas de Torquemada, the first Inquisitor-General of Spain, born at Valladolid' (1420–1498). He was a Dominican, and made Inquisitor-General of Castile in 1483. He greatly augmented the number of persecutions against 'heretics,' consisting of confiscations, condemnations, punishments of all kinds, and autos-da-fé, insomuch that even the popes [Sixtus IV. and Alexander VI.] were obliged to moderate his excessive zeal. Torquemada had the chief hand in the banishment of the Jews and Moors of Spain in the time of Ferdinand and Isabella.

Tor'tura Torti (Tortus confuted), 1609. A book by Lancelot Andrews, written at the request of James I. to confute the attack of Bellarmine, who, under the assumed name of Matthew Tortus, had attacked that monarch. Andrews was rewarded for his book with the see of Chichester, 1605.

Tory. A political party in England opposed to the Whigs. They are the most remote from the democratic or republican party, and are for the most part attached to the monarchy, the established church, and the landed interest. They are called Conservatives from their desire to preserve these, which the Radicals wish to root out. For etymology see 'Tories and Whigs,' 'Whig and Tory.'

Toryism, in the latter part of Queen Anne's reign, and the earlier days of George I., meant the peace party, and the party of free-trade. This party was opposed to the pretensions of the crown, and endeavoured to override the authority of the House of Lords by the creation of new peerages. Their sympathies were with the Catholics of Ireland, and some of them were for the repeal of the Scotch Union. The reason is plain enough; they were Jacobites, and opposed to the innovations of Anne and the house of Hanover.

To'temism. An American Indian superstition; the belief in totems or guardian angels, whether animal, vegetable, or mineral. A totem is the image of this guardian spirit. For not only human beings have souls, but all animals, plants, inanimate beings, stars, sun, moon, earth, sky, and even thunder, which the totem is supposed to represent.

Tottenham in his Boots, 1748. The Irish patriot toast. The Irish House of Commons incurred great public debts, and was charged with extravagance. An attempt was made to change the annual vote for the discharge of the national debt into a grant either for perpetuity or for a term of years. The ayes and noes were equal, when a member named Tottenham entered the house in his riding dress, and gave the preponderance of votes to the anti-ministerialists. Hence the toast.

Touch-piece (A). A medal which the king hung on the neck of a person touched for the 'king's evil.' It was called an Angel, and contained the legend, 'He touched them, and they were healed.' In the Stuart Exhibition, 1889, nine of these tokens were exhibited. Those of Charles II. were gold pieces; those of James I. and the two Pretenders were silver.

Of course the legend shows the prevalence of the notion of the 'divinity' of kings.

Toulunites (3 syl.), 868–905. A dynasty of califs in Syria and Egypt, founded by Ahmed Ibn Toulun, a Turkish slave.

Tower of Famine (The). The tower on the Piazza del Anziana, in which Ugolino of Pisa, with Gaddo, Ugoccione (his sons), and Nino and Anselmuccio (his grandsons), was confined. The archbishop threw the key of the dungeon into the Arno. Ugolino survived five days after the death of the other four. Dante refers to this in his 'Inferno.'

Town Clerk (The). Since the Municipal Corporations Act of 1835 the town clerk acts in obedience to the directions of the town council. His duties are to preserve minutes of the transactions, and to make out the freemen's roll, the burgess list, and the ward list; he is responsible for the safe keeping of all charter deeds and municipal records; and is subject to various fines in cases of neglect. He is a lawyer by profession.

Townley Marbles (The). Sculptures which Charles Townley collected at Rome between 1765 and 1772. He died in 1805, when his collection was purchased by the nation for the British Museum.

Toyshop of Europe (The). Birmingham.

I look upon Birmingham as being the great toyshop of Europe.—BURKE, speaking on a Bill for licensing the New Street Theatre, Birmingham.

Tract No. 90 (1841), by the Rev. J. H. Newman, was intended to show that much of the Roman Catholic doctrine might be held consistently with subscription to the Thirty-nine Articles of the Anglican Church. This led to the termination of the series, and the resignation by Mr. Newman of the vicarage of St. Mary's, Oxford, and subsequently, in 1845, to his secession to the Church of Rome. Many of his friends and associates followed him.

Dr. Newman was made a Cardinal in 1879, and died in 1890.

Tracts for the Times, or 'The Oxford Tracts,' 1833–1841. A series of tracts published in Oxford having for their object the revival of church principles, greater attention to all the rites, ceremonies, and externals of religion, and checking the latitudinarian tendency of the day. The chief promoters of the movement were the Rev. John Keble (author of the 'Christian Year'), the Rev J. H. Newman (author of Tract No. 90, (q.v.), the Rev. E. B. Pusey, the Rev. Isaac Williams, the Rev. Hugh J. Rose, &c., all men of great scholarship and literary honours.

The Apostolic succession, priestly absolution, baptismal regeneration, the real presence, the authority of the Church, the value of tradition, and a discountenancing of Protestant principles are the chief tenets of the Tractarian party.

Tractarianism. The system contained in a series of papers called 'Tracts for the Times' (q.v.). The effect of which have been:

1. A revival of the High Church party.

2. A great development of church ritual. The preacher no longer wore his college gown and Geneva bands, pews were abolished, intoning became general, and bowing at the name of Jesus.

3. A great impulse was given to church restoration and building, and the style of church architecture has been carefully studied.

4. Many hundreds of churchmen have seceded to the Roman Catholic Church.

5. The Pope has taken advantage of the movement to establish in England and Scotland a regular hierarchy. 1852.

Tractarians. Those who uphold the doctrines and practices advocated by the 'Tracts for the Times.'

Trades-Unions. Declared unlawful in 1860. The law abolished 1824. Regulated by Act of Parliament 1825, and again 1859. These unions are combinations of artisans to compel masters to pay such wages as the union thinks they ought to give. Commission on outrages at Sheffield, 1867; at Manchester, 1867; law amended, 1871. If masters refuse to obey the demand, the men 'strike,' i.e. refuse to work, and the masters are unable to fulfil their contracts.

So long as the members of a union do not interfere with the liberty of non-unionists, these combinations are lawful, but the moment they overstep that limit they are most despotic. Any man may fix the price at which he will work, but it is tyranny to prevent another man from working at a lower or higher wage.

In 1834 as many as 50,000 Dorchester labourers marched through London to Whitehall to present a petition of grievances to the throne. This, of course, was a moral threat, and meant to be so.

Tradu'cianism. A theory to account for the procreation of the soul in human beings, ascribed to Tertullian. Tertullian taught that souls are procreated by souls as bodies are by bodies.

Somewhat allied to Tertullian's theory are the theories called Generationism and Creationism. The former explains the production of soul as analogous to corporeal generation; the latter supposes that the Creator sends a soul into every human body at birth.

Tragedy (Father of French). Robert Garnier (1534–1590). Also P. Corneille (1606–1684), generally called 'Le grand Corneille.'

Tragedy (Father of Greek). I. Thespis, the Richardson of Athens.

II. Æschylos is also called the 'Father of Greek Tragedy' (B.C. 525–426).

Trailbaston. A law term applied to certain lawless men, probably armed with clubs. See below, 'Court of Trailbaston.'

Circa hæc tempora processit in publicum nova inquisitionis breve, quod Anglice dicitur Trailbaston, contra intrusores, conductitios, hominum vapulatores, conductitios seisinæ captores, pacis infractores, raptores, incendiarios, murdiratores, pugnatores. Multi hoc perempti, multi redempti, multi noxii, pauci innoxii sunt inventi. Adeo quidem rigide processit hujus coercitionis justitia, quod pater proprio filio non parceret, &c., dira multa.—Hist. Roffens. folio 200, de anno 1305. See 'Notes and Queries,' 10 Dec., 1887, p. 470*a*.

Trailbaston (Court of), 1305. 'Justices of Traylbaston' were appointed by Edward I. upon occasions of great disorders in the realm during his absence in the Scotch and French wars. We should now call them 'justices in eyre.' Riley tells us that the offenders themselves were styled Trailbastons from the bastons or clubs with which they were armed. The courts were for the trials of these rebels, who 'lurked in woods and parks to rob, murder, and molest the unwary.'

Justices in eyre are itinerant magistrates. Eyre a French word from the Latin iter, a journey.

Train-band. A militia force substituted by James I. for the old English fyrd. In the civil wars the train-bands sided with the parliament. Charles II. restored the militia to their ancient footing. Everyone will call to mind that John Gilpin was a 'train-band captain.'

Trajan's Column, at Rome. Made of marble, A.D. 114, by Apollodōrus. It is 132 feet in height, and has inside it a spiral staircase of 185 steps, with 40 windows to let in light. It was surmounted by a statue of the Emperor Trajan, but the original statue was (by Sixtus V.) most incongruously supplanted by that of St. Peter. As in the column of the Place Vendôme, Paris, the battles of Napoleon form the spiral reliefs, so the battles of Trajan are represented spirally in bas-relief in the older Roman column. It still stands amid the ruins of Trajan's Forum.

Trajan's Column is made of 24 huge pieces of marble so closely united that they seem like one block. It is about 12 feet in diameter.

Trajan's Rescript. This was a letter to Pliny the Younger, proprætor of Bithynia, telling him how to act towards Christians. 'They are not to be hunted up; but if brought before you and convicted of crime, they must be punished as the law directs.' See p. 397, 'Hadrian's Rescript.'

Trajan's Wall. A line of fortifications across the Dobrudscha.

Trampling on the Crucifix. See p. 468, 'Jefume.'

Transcendental and Transcendent. Kant means by transcendental the various ideas, forms, and categories assumed to be native elements of human thought. These are not products of experience, though manifested only in experience. Such, for example, as space, time, causality, &c.

Transcendent he reserves for those transcendental elements that transcend experience, as God, the immaterial soul, spirits, and so on. See below.

Kant says: 'I call all knowledge transcendental which occupies itself not so much with objects as with the way of knowing those objects so far as it is possible à priori.'

Transcen'dentalism. The system of certain schoolmen, like Duns Scotus, who taught the existence of conceptions which, by their universality, transcend or rise above the ten Aristotelian categories. Thus God exists and the world exists, so that existence bears the same relation to particular existences as summum genus does to genera. Kant uses the word transcendental differently, though analogously. See above.

Kant means (I think) that there are certain mental data which are innate, and thus transcend mere experience.

Transfiguration (Day of). Matt. xvii. 1–13. Instituted 6 Aug., 1498.

Transfiguration (Mount of). Supposed to be Tabor, in the plain of Esdraelon, in Galilee. On its summit is a plain of about a mile in circumference. The Mount is about 1,000 feet in height.

Transubstantiation. The change which takes place in the Eucharist by consecration, when the whole substance of the bread is changed into the body of Christ, and the whole substance of the wine into the blood of Christ. The fact that the bread and wine phenomenally appear to be unchanged is a sensual deception. By consecration the bread ceases to be bread and the wine ceases to be wine, the phenomenal appearance is mere 'accident,' the noumenon, or real substance, is the body and blood of Christ.

The Lutheran doctrine is that the bread remains bread and the wine remains wine, but that the body and blood of Christ by consecration are transfused into them, 'as heat into hot iron'; so that the bread is bread plus the body of Christ, and the wine is wine plus the blood of Christ. This is called 'Consubstantiation,' or 'Impanation.'

It has been denied that Luther taught the doctrine of Consubstantiation; but what else did he mean by impanation and the 'heat of hot iron'?

Trappists, 1140. Founded in Normandy by Rotrou, comte de Perche. Refounded by Abbé de Rancé in 1636. A reformed Benedictine order. The female order call themselves Trappistines, instituted 1822. When driven out of France in 1791 they went to Switzerland and built the monastery called Val-Sainte, which was suppressed in 1811. Fifty-nine monks of La Trappe migrated from England to France in 1817, and settled in La Loire Inférieure. In 1822 the Trappists had sixteen houses in France. Their chief monastery was burnt to the ground in August, 1871. They have several houses in the United States.

Travaux Forcés, Code Napoléon, called travaux publics in republican euphemism. Hard labour of criminals in public works, instead of the punishment of the galleys, which was abolished in 1748.

Travelling Bachelors, in the University of Cambridge, 1861. Two bachelors to travel for three years to investigate the religion, learning, laws, politics, customs, manners, and rarities of foreign countries. Stipend, 100*l.* each per annum.

Travendhal (Treaty of), 5 Aug., 1700, between Charles XII. of Sweden and Frederick IV. of Denmark. Frederick IV. of Denmark, regardless of the treaty of Altŏna (1689), revived the disputes with the Duke of Holstein, who had married the eldest sister of Charles XII. Charles immediately attacked Denmark by sea and land, and so furious was the attack that Frederick of Denmark was obliged to sue for peace. By the mediation of England and France a treaty of peace was signed at Travendhal, and Denmark had to pay the expenses of the war.

Treacle Bible (The) is Beck's Bible of 1549, in which the word balm is rendered treacle. The Bishops' Bible has tryacle (Jer. iii. 22; xlvi. 11; and Ezek. xxvii. 17). See 'Bible.'

Treasurer (The), since the Municipal Corporations Act of 1835, is appointed by the council, of which he must be a member, and he must give security for the proper discharge of his duties. The treasurer of the corporation is bound to keep accounts of all receipts and disbursements, and these accounts must be open to the inspection of the members of the council. He is to pay no money except by written order, and is to submit his accounts with vouchers every half-year.

Treasury Devil. A law phrase meaning clerk to the Solicitor-General of government business.

Treasury Remembrancer, or 'Treasurer's Remembrancer.' He whose charge it is to put the lord treasurer and the rest of the judges of the exchequer in remembrance of such things as are called on and dealt with in the sovereign's behoof. In England the office was in 1833 allied to the queen's remembrancer, but in Scotland and Ireland the office remains.

Mr. Goschen met Mr. R. W. Arbuthnot-Solmes, Treasury Remembrancer, and other officials.—Newspaper paragraph (on Mr. Goschen's visit to Dublin), 3 Dec., 1887.

Treaty of 1841 (The), signed 29 Aug., 1842. Made with the Chinese after the war with that country. Its provisions were:—The payment by the Chinese of 21,000,000 dollars (about 4½ million £ sterling). The opening of the new ports, Canton, Amoy, Foo-Chow, Ningpo, and Shanghai to British merchants; the cession of the island of Hong Kong to England; correspondence to be opened and continued between the Chinese and British Governments, and the islands Chusan and Kolangsoo to be held until the money was paid.

Treaty of 2 Dec., 1854 (The). Between Austria, Great Britain, and France, against Russia. Austria engaged to defend the frontier of the Principalities against Russia; if Russia made war on Austria the three powers would act in concert; if the Crimean War lasted beyond 1 Jan., 1855, the three powers would unite to bring it to an end.

Treaty of Partition (The), B.C. 205. At the peace of Dyrrhachium Philip V., king of Macedon, made a bargain with Antiochus, king of Syria, to divide the dominions of Ptolemy Epiphanes, the boy-king of Egypt. This scandalous treaty induced Ptolemy to place himself under the guardianship of Rome.

Treaty of 1696 (The). In this treaty it was secretly stipulated at Loretto: (1) That the Vaudois valleys should have no communication or connection with the subjects of the great king [Louis XIV.] in matters of religion; and (2) that the subjects of his most Christian Majesty [Louis XIV], who had taken refuge in the valley, should be banished.

This was a mere evasion of the famous Edict of 18 May (q.v.), to which Victor Amadeus (whose daughter was betrothed to the heir of France) was forced by Louis XIV.

Treaty Stone (The), 8 Oct., 1691, Limerick, Ireland. A large stone on which the capitulation of Limerick was signed by General Ginkell and the leaders of the Irish insurgents. It still stands near Thomond Bridge, in the county of Clare, beside the river-bank.

Trecentisti. The Italian worthies of the 14th cent. See 'Cinquecentisti' and 'Seicentisti.'

This was the golden period, of which Dante was the representative.

Tree of Feudalism (The), 14 July, 1792. An immense tree erected in the Champ de Mars, Paris, on which were hung crowns, blue ribbons, tiaras, cardinals' hats, St. Peter's keys, ermine mantles, doctors' caps, law-bags, titles of nobility, escutcheons, coats of arms, and so on, to which the king (Louis XVI.) was to set fire. Louis refused to do so, saying there was no such thing as feudalism in France.

Champ de Mars, pronounce Sharnd Mar (r of 'Sharnd' silent).

Trees of Liberty. Trees or green boughs set up as symbols of liberty. The idea came from America. In 1790 the Jacobins planted a tree of liberty in Paris, and soon every village in France had its tree, crowned with the cap of liberty, round which the people danced singing revolutionary songs, as English villagers used to sing and dance round the May-pole. In the Reign of Terror thousands were guillotined for injuring these trees. During the empire the trees were suppressed, but in July, 1830, they were again set up, and again in 1848. These trees were adorned with rings as symbols of unity, with triangles as symbols of equality, with tricoloured ribbons as the revolutionary badge, and a cap of liberty. The last was rooted up in 1872.

In Italy, during the revolution of 1848 and 1849, numerous trees of liberty were planted in the peninsula.

Trent (Council of), begun 1545 and closed 1563. Its object was to correct, confirm, and fix for ever the doctrines and discipline of the Catholic Church, and to reform the lives of the Catholic clergy. Hence Catholics are called Tridentines (3 syl.), from Tridentum, the ancient name of Trent, in Lombardy.

Trêve de Dieu (La), 1040. Suspension of arms during sacred days, divine service, and the intervals between Advent and Epiphany, Quinquagesima and Pentecost.

Triad, according to Pythagoras, is the third mathematical quantity; the monad or point is the first, length is the duad, breadth the triad or third mathematical quantity, and the fourth or tetrad is the solid. Physically, intellectual capacity is the monad, scientific or certain knowledge is a duad, opinion a triad, and perception by the senses a tetrad.

Triad Society (The). A secret society in China during the reign of Kiaking (1796–1820). Organised for plunder. Ostensibly, however, for the expulsion of the Manchoos from the throne and country.

Triads (Welsh). Mythological traditions, moral rules, historic fragments of the British, &c., in the Welsh language, disposed in groups of three.

Trial by Battel, or 'Wager of Battle.' Recognised in the laws of Liutprand, about 720. In use in England before the reign of Henry I., and not abolished till 1819. The combatants fought on horseback, fully armed. Being duly marshalled, they entered the lists saying, 'May God defend the right' The king presided: if he threw down his warder, the combat ceased; if not, it went on till one of the combatants was vanquished or slain. The notion was that God would defend the innocent party.

Abraham Thornton in 1818, charged with the murder of Mary Ashford, refused to be tried by a jury, and insisted on a wager of battle. Lord Chief Justice Ellenborough allowed the appeal, and as Thornton was a very strong and athletic man, and his accuser a mere stripling, the trial was declined, and Thornton released.

Trial of the Pyx (The). A very ancient ceremony, spoken of in the reign of Edward I. as 'a well-known custom.' It is the final trial, by weight and assay, of the gold and silver coins of the United Kingdom prior to their issue. The proceedings, which now occur every year, are conducted by the Lords Commissioners of the Treasury with much solemnity, and constitute a public attestation of the standard purity of the coin. The wardens of the Goldsmiths' Company act as the jury, and after making a careful examination, deliver to the king's or the queen's remembrancer a verdict that they can discover no variation from the standard specified in the Coinage Act, 1870.

Triarchy (The Roman), 337–361. Constantine the Great, at his death, divided his empire into three parts between his three sons:

To his eldest son, Constantine [II.], he left Gaul, Spain, and Britain.

To his second son, Constans, he left Italy, Illyricum, and Africa.

To his third son, Constantius, he left the East.

Constantine attacked his brother Constans, and was slain A.D. 340, aged 25.

Constans was slain by Magnentius A.D. 350.

Constantius died at Tarsus A.D. 361, aged 41. And the empire came to Julian.

Tribes (Roman). The original followers of Romulus were called Ramnés, or Ramnians. After the Sabine war the Sabines had a share in the new state, and were called Titĭes, or Titians. And after the conquest of Rome by Porsĕna, the Etruscans had a share in the state, and were called Lucĕres.

Ramnes, the original Romans. See Ramnes.
Titiĕs, so called from Tatius, the Sabine king.
Lucĕres, so called from Lucĕrum, a town of Etruria.
It has been suggested by modern scholars that these are primitive clan-names long before Rome was founded.

Tribunal Extraordinaire, or 'Tribunal Révolutionnaire,' 1792. Decreed by the Mountain for the trial and dispatch of suspects. It had five judges and a standing jury, was subject to no appeal, and was virtually free from any law forms.

Tribunal Révolutionnaire (Le), 10 March, 1793. An 'exceptional tribunal' created by the Convention of France, and consisting of three judges at least, a jury, and a public accuser. Its decisions were without appeal.

Tribunal de Première Instance (Le), 1810. A jurisdiction established in each arrondissement of France for 'toutes les affaires civiles et correctionnelles' which are not specially assigned to other tribunals.

Tribunal of Blood (The), 1567. The organisation under Margaret, governor of the Netherlands, under which 18,000 persons were put to death in three years. Also called 'The Council of Trouble.'

Tribunal of the Faith (The), 1823. A revival in Spain of the 'Holy Inquisition.' Extinct in 1868.

Tribunal of the 17th of August (The), 1792. A French revolutionary tribunal demanded of the Convention by Robespierre, for the trial of 'traitors against the people.' It consisted of one deputy from each section. This tribunal was succeeded by the more awful 'Tribunal Révolutionnaire' (q.v.).

Tribunat (Le), 1799. In France, established for discussing the merits of the laws presented by the government. Orators were appointed to speak pro and con, and the corps législatif decided. The tribunat entered on its functions in 1801. It was originally composed of 100 members, not above 25 years of age. In 1802 the number was reduced to 50, and in 1807 it was wholly suppressed.

Tribunaux Correctionnels (Les), 1810. Under this title the tribunals of 'première instance' take cognizance of appeals from the decisions of the police court, and all minor offences limited to five days' imprisonment or a fine not exceeding 15 francs (12*s.* 6*d.*).

Pronounce Tre-bu-no cor'rek'-se-o-nel.

Tribune of the People. So François Noel Babeuf called himself (1764–1797). He assumed the name of Gracchus, and tried to make himself a second Robespierre, but his rebellion was soon crushed by the Directory, and Babeuf was guillotined.

Tribunes (French), 1799. In the Consulate 100 tribunes formed part of the government. Their sole province was discussion. The first consul submitted a motion to the corps législatif; whereupon the state councillors advocated its adoption, and the tribunes pleaded against it. In 1807 the tribunate was abolished, and the 'Corps Législatif' was addressed by the Conseil d'État.

Tributum was the Roman property tax, an extraordinary levy in times of war. The censors made the assessment, and it was called tribute because it was exacted from all the tribes. The collectors were called Tribuni Ærarii.

Tricolour (The), 1789. Clovis, after his baptism, adopted the blue standard of St. Martin de Tours for the national banner. The successors of Hugues Capet, who made Paris their capital, changed the blue standard of St. Martin for the red standard of St. Denis. As red was the English colour, Charles VII. discarded it, and chose white (in honour of the Virgin Mary), for the national colour. Hence blue, red, and white have all in turns been the national colours of France. In the revolution, 1789, blue and red were adopted, being the colours of the commune of Paris, and Lafayette added white (the lilies of France), to represent the French nation.

Long before this, Mary Stuart, wife of François II. (afterwards queen of Scotland), had adopted the tricolour as the livery of her Swiss guards: white for France, blue for Scotland, and red for Switzerland, in compliment to the nationality of the guards themselves.

There is no reason to suppose that Lafayette introduced white (the monarchical colour) to conciliate the Bourbon king.

Tricolour Scarfs. Still worn in France by the municipal magistrates and commissaires of police.

Tricolours (European). Indicative of national liberty:

In France: Blue, red, white, divided vertically.

In Italy: Green, white, red, divided vertically.

In Belgium: Black, yellow, red, divided vertically.

In Holland: Red, white, blue, divided horizontally.

Tricoteuses (Les). Women who frequented the public clubs and revolutionary tribunal in Paris, where they sat knitting, while they listened to what was going on, and expressed audibly their approval or disapprobation. With the fall of the Jacobins in 1794 they ceased to appear. They were called 'The Furies of the Guillotine.'

Pronounce Trick'-ko-teuze. No combination of letters in the English language can convey the sound of the French euse. It almost rhymes with hers.

Tricoteuses de la Guillotine (Les). Knitters of the guillotine. Women of Paris who daily went to the Place de la Révolution, Paris, to witness the executions, and passed their time there knitting.

Tridentine Catechism (The), 1566. Prepared in accordance with the decrees of the Council of Trent by Archbishop Leon, the Bishop Ægidius Foscorari, and the Portuguese Dominican Francis Fureiro. It was revised by the Cardinals Borromēo, Sirlet and Antonian, and sanctioned by Pius V.

Tridentine Council (The), i.e. the Council of Trent, called in Latin 'Tridentum,' 1545–1563.

Tridentines (3 syl.). Bigoted Roman Catholics whose religious views are rigidly circumscribed by the decrees of the Council of Trent [Tridentum], 1537–1563.

Triennial Bill (The), 1694. It provided two things: (1) That no parliament shall continue longer than three years, and (2) that a new parliament shall always be called within three years of the dissolution of the preceding one.

Triennial Parliaments, 1694 to 1715. Appointed to be held by Act 16 Car. I. c. 1 (1641), by 16 Car. II. c. 1 (1664), and by 6, 7 Will. & Mar. c. 2 (1694). Septennial Act was passed 1716 (1 Geo. I. c. 38). See 'Parliaments.'

Triers of Petitions. Edward I. granted leave for everyone who thought himself unduly assessed, rated, charged to aids, subsidies, or taxes, to deliver a petition to receivers who sat in the Great Hall of the Palace of Westminster. The petitions were forwarded to the king's council. This gave rise to the 'Triers of Petitions' at the opening of every new parliament by the House of Lords, a usage which is still continued. See 'Tryers.'

Trimmers, in the reigns of Charles II. and William III., were those whose political opinions were neither hot nor cold. Charles Montagu (earl of Halifax) called himself a 'trimmer' or medium man, half Whig and half Tory. They were friendly to the monarchy, but opposed to James duke of York; and pleased neither party.

Trimurti is the inseparable unity in the three gods Brahma, Vishnu, and Siva in one person. The Christian dogma is the inseparable unity of three Persons (Father, Son, and Holy Ghost) in one God.

Son, husband, and father may be one and the same person, or trimurti; and Antony, Octavianus, and Lepidus may be three separate persons, but one triumvirate. This is not meant to be an explanation of the Trinity, but merely to show the difference between three gods equal to one person, and three persons equal to one god.

Tringlo (A). A soldier of the Arab commissariat and baggage trains in Algiers.

Trinita'rian Controversy (The), 17th and 18th cents. This controversy had many phases: (1) The Arian, answered by Dr. Bull in his 'Defensio Fidei Nicenæ,' 1685–1688. This is termed the 'Patristic' phase. (2) The Metaphysical phase, controverted by Dr. Thurlock and Dr. South. (3) The Scriptural phase, set forth by Dr. Samuel Clarke, Sykes, Whitby, and Jackson, and answered by Dr. Waterland in his 'Vindication of Christ's Divinity,' 1719, 1723. (4) The Free-thinkers led by Lord Shaftesbury, Collins's 'Free-thinking,' Woolston's 'Discourse on Miracles,' Tindal's 'Christianity'; replied to by Waterland, Zachary Pearce, and Warburton.

Trinitarians. Those who believe that there are three distinct Persons (Father, Son, and Holy Ghost) in the one undivided Godhead.

The word 'persons' is very misleading applied to deity, as we use the word to signify an objective individual, and cannot divest our thoughts of some such idea. In no sense is God an individual or objective person, but simply an entity, or, to use the Hebrew phrase, an 'I am.' No one on earth would call the human soul a person.

Trinity (Confraternity of the), or 'Fathers of the Oratory,' 1550. A religious order founded in Rome by Philip Neri to aid and succour pilgrims. When it undertook to instruct the young the brotherhood changed their original name to Oratorians. In 1611 P. de Bérille instituted a branch of the society in France, and called it 'L'Oratoire de Jésus,' a normal school for young priests. Suppressed in 1790, but re-established in 1858 under the title of L'Oratoire de l'Immaculée Conception.

Some of the greatest Christian orators of France were Oratorians: as Malebranche, Massillon, Mascaron, Richard Simon, Lelong, La Bletterie, Foncemagne, Dotteville, Daunou, &c. Cardinal Newman was an Oratorian.

Trinity College.

I. Cambridge University. Is the consolidation of several foundations: (1) Of St Michael house, founded by Hervey of Stanton in 1324; (2) of King's Hall, founded by Edward III. in 1337; (3) of Phiswick's Hostel and Oving's Inn; (4) augmented and largely endowed by Henry VIII. in 1546, when its present name was given to the College. It is the largest and richest foundation in the University. The head of the college is called the Master, and is appointed by the crown.

II. Dublin University, 1591. Founded by Queen Elizabeth. Statutes revised 31 June, 1855.

III. Oxford University, 1554. Founded by Sir Thomas Pope. It was originally called 'Durham College,' being endowed by the priors and bishops of Durham. The headmaster is called the 'president.'

Trinity Hall. A college in the University of Cambridge, founded by William Bateman, bishop of Norwich in 1350.

William Bateman was the second founder of Gonville and Caius College also. See 'Caius College.'

Trinity Sunday. Instituted in 1287. It is next to Whitsunday, and is called 'Stately Sunday.' See 'Sunday.'

Statuimus quod Festum Trinitatis Dominicæ post octavam Pentecostes, quæ vocatur octava Trinitatis, cum ix lectionibus et debita solemnitate fiat.—The Bull for its institution.

Christmas Day is the day of the birth of Jesus Whitsunday is the day of the outpouring of the Holy Ghost, and Trinity Sunday is the day dedicated to Father, Son, and Holy Ghost, 'One in Three and Three in One.'

Trinity Week. Hebdomada Trinitatis, the week which begins with Trinity Sunday.

Trino'da Neces'sitas. Three imposts or taxes to which all lands (not excepting church lands) were subject in Anglo-Saxon times: (1) Bryge-bót, for keeping bridges and highways in repair; (2) Burg-bót, for keeping the burgs or fortresses in repair; and (3) Fyrd, for the payment of the military and naval forces of the kingdom.

Fyrd means an army, or the military force of a country; fyrdung means military service; and fyrd-wite the fine for neglecting to join the fyrd.

Tripartite (The). The Jus Æliānum (q.v.).

Tripartite Decree (The), or 'Decretum tripartitum juris consuetudinarii,' by Verbŏczy of Hungary, 1514.

I. It established equal rights to all the Hungarian nobility, who were exempt from all taxation.

II. It limited the authority of the clergy, and deprived the pope of the disposal of church benefices in Hungary.

III. It took from the peasantry all liberty and every species of property, reducing them to the state of serfs.

Tripit'aka, or 'Three Baskets.' The sacred books of the Buddhists; the books altogether being between two and three thousand. A complete series was presented to the India Office by the Japanese ambassador, Iwakura-Tomomi, from the Mika'do, some years ago. The collection was originally published by the Emperor Wan-lich of China, at the close of the 16th cent., and it was reproduced in Japan in the sixth year of Nengo Impo (i.e. 1679).

Triple Alliance (The). I. 28 Jan., 1668, between Great Britain, the Netherlands, and Sweden, against France. It was a ruse of Arlington's to force Louis XIV. to accept the peace of Aix-la-Chapelle. William III. was king of England, and his heart was bent on checking the conquests of Louis that his beloved Holland might be aggrandized, and to this end he wanted to protect from France the Spanish Netherlands.

II. 4 Jan., 1717. Between Great Britain, Holland, and France, against Spain, or rather against the designs of Cardinal Alberōni of Spain, whose object was to re-establish the monarchy of Charles V. In order to annoy the English the Spanish cardinal favoured the pretender, and in order to annoy France he favoured the Huguenots. He tried to induce Charles XII. of Sweden and Peter I. of Russia to join him; to plunge Austria into a war with Turkey, to stir up insurrection in Hungary, and actually effected the arrest of the regent Duc d'Orléans. The platform of the alliance was (a) that the Pretender should be made to quit France; (b) that the fortifications of Dunkirk should be abolished according to the treaty of Utrecht; and (c) that the Protestant succession of Great Britain should not be disturbed.

III. 1789, between Great Britain, Holland, and Russia, against Catharine of Russia, in defence of Turkey.

Triple Tree (The). The gallows, which was a permanent erection resting on three posts; first at Smithfield, then at Tyburn. See 'Elms.'

Tripod of Life (The). The brain, the lungs, and the heart. All natural death in the human animal proceeds from one of these three organs.

Tripos, in the University of Cambridge. In the 15th cent. an 'ould bachelour,' as representative of the university, had to sit on a three-legged stool 'before Mr. Proctours' to test the abilities of the candidates for degrees by arguing some question with the 'eldest son' of them as their representative. There were three occasions on which questionists were admitted to degrees: (1) the Comitia priora on Ash-Wednesday, for the best men; (2) the Comitia posteriora, a few weeks later, for the second-best men; and (3) the Comitia minora for the 'poll-men.' Hence the word tripos meant the stool and the 'ould Bachelour,' then the three classes of questionists, and lastly the examination system.

The Classical Tripos was established in 1824, and the Historical Tripos, the Science Tripos, &c., in 1858.

 The word now means the classification into three classes of graduated merit adopted in the University of Cambridge, Class I. being the highest.

The Triposes are: The Classical Tripos, the Historical Tripos, the Indian Languages Tripos, the Law Tripos, the Mathematical Tripos, the Mediæval and Modern Languages Tripos, the Natural Science Tripos, the Semitic Languages Tripos, and the Theological Tripos.

Trisag'ion (The), or 'First Religious War,' A.D. 508–518. The Trisagion is the repetition of the word 'Holy' three times, as 'Holy, holy, holy, Lord God of Hosts,' supposed to indicate a Trinity. The Greeks maintained that it is the song sung by the angels before the throne of God, and that it was miraculously revealed to the church at Constantinople in the middle of the 5th cent. The Manichæans objected, and a sedition was caused which filled the streets day and night with men, women, and children, shouting and fighting. Churches were destroyed, the statues of the Emperor Anastasius were thrown down, and at length Vitalian, with an army of Huns and Bulgarians, interfered for the Catholic party. Such, says Gibbon (xlvii.), was the event of the first religious war waged in the name of the God of peace.

Triumphal Arches. The most celebrated are the following:—

Constantine's Arch, in Rome, to commemorate the triumph of Constantine over Maxentius.

The Arch of Septimus Sevērus, at the foot of the capitol.

Gallienus's Arch, erected A.D. 260.

Titus's Arch, to commemorate his taking of Jerusalem.

Arc de Bénévent, in honour of Traj'an. A copy of Titus's Arch. Another, dedicated to the same emperor, called the 'Arch of Ancōna.'

The Arch of Rimini, dedicated to Augustus. This is the most ancient of the Roman arches. Another, dedicated to the same emperor, at the foot of Mont Cenis, and called the 'Arch of Suza.'

In PARIS there is an arc de triomphe at the Porte St. Denis, erected in 1673 to commemorate the passage of the Rhine by Louis XIV. There is another dedicated to the same king at the Porte St. Martin, to commemorate his conquest of the Franche-Comté.

The arch in the Carrousel was raised to the honour of Napoleon in 1806. The splendid Arc de Triomphe in the Champs Élysées was begun in 1806 and finished in 1835. It is the work of Chalgrin and Huyot.

Triumvirate (The). I. The British Triumvirate (1763), consisting of George Grenville and the Lords Egremont and Halifax, who succeeded the Earl of Bute and Sir Francis Dashwood. Grenville took both Bute's and Dashwood's office (lord of the treasurer and chancellor of the exchequer), while Egremont and Halifax were the two secretaries of state.

In the reign of Queen Anne the triumvirate was the Duke of Marlborough, Lord Godolphin, and Sarah duchess of Marlborough. The first controlled foreign affairs, the second controlled the council and parliament, and the third controlled the Court and queen.

II. The First French (1561). The Guise family leagued against the Huguenots. The triumvirate was the Duc de Guise, the Constable de Montmorency, and Marshal de St. André. This league was supported by the Pope, the Cardinal de Lorraine, and the clergy generally, the people of the north and west, and by Philip II. of Spain.

III. The Second French Triumvirate (1685) for the extirpation of Huguenots in the reign of Louis XIV. The triumvirate was Father la Chaise (the king's confessor), Madame de Maintenon (the king's wife), and the Marquis de Louvois. See below, No. IV., 'Triumvirate' (The Thermidorian),' and 'Reign of Terror.'

IV. The Thermidorian Triumvirate (1795), consisting of Barras, Rewbell, and La Réveillère. As in all other triumvirates one of the three is dominant, so in the Thermidorian Triumvirate Barras was infinitely more powerful than the other two.

V. First Roman (B.C. 60). A cabal formed by Crassus, Pompey, and Cæsar. Crassus was the wealthy partner, Pompey the most powerful, Cæsar the most popular.

VI. The Second Roman Triumvirate (B.C. 43–31). Lepidus, Antony, and Octavianus. After the assassination of Cæsar.

VII. Of the Commonwealth (1659). General Lambert having put down the Rump Parliament, after the death of Cromwell, introduced a military form of government. Its three heads were Lambert, Fleetwood, and Monk. In April, 1660, the king (Charles II.) was recalled.

Fleetwood was Cromwell's son-in-law, and Monk was governor of Scotland.

VIII. Of the Reign of Terror (1794). Robespierre, Couthon, and St. Just.

IX. Of the Roman Government (30 March, 1848) Mazzini, Armellini, and Saffi. These representatives of the people formed a constitutional assembly, with a design of converting Italy into a republic like France; but it was republican France which prevented it by an army of occupation.

Triumvirate of England (The). Gower, Chaucer, and Lydgate (poets).

Triumvirate of Italian Poets. Dantê, Boccaccio, and Petrarch.

Boccaccio is now known chiefly as the 'Father of Italian Prose.' His 'Decameron' has outlived his poetry.

Triv'ium. The three sciences: Grammar, rhetoric, and logic. The QUADRIVIUM were the four sciences: Music, arithmetic, geometry, and astronomy. Up to the 14th cent. called the seven sciences or seven liberal arts, and all taught in Latin.

Trois Chapitres (Les). Three theological works on the Incarnation of Christ and his dual nature, by Theodore of Mopsuestia, Theodoret of Cyrrhus, and Ibas of Edessa, condemned as heretical in 553.

Trojans and Greeks in the University of Cambridge. Partisans of Sir John Cheke, regius professor of Greek in the University, and of Gardiner the chancellor. Sir John introduced a new pronunciation of Greek, against which the chancellor protested. As Sir John was a Protestant and Gardiner a Catholic, the feud was more than half of a religious character. Those who took the side of the Regius professor were called 'Trojans'; those who sided with the chancellor called themselves 'Greeks.' Many a street row ensued, till at last the king in council commanded the innovation of Sir John to be discontinued. See p. 735, 'Ramists.'

Troppau, in Silesia (Congress of), from 20 Oct. to 20 Dec., 1820. Its object was to resist the revolutionary movement in Russia, Austria, and Prussia.

Trottiera (La). The bell which summoned the 'riders' or nobles to the Grand Council in Venice.

Trou'badours (The). Minstrels of Southern France in the 11th, 12th, and 13th cents. They were the first to discard Latin and use the native tongue in their compositions. Their poetry was either about love and gallantry or war and chivalry. See 'Trouvères.'

The poetry of the provençals or troubadours was of two sorts: cansos, or poems of love and gallantry, and sirventese, or lays of war and chivalry, politics and morals. The word is from troubar, to invent, as 'poetry' is from the Greek verb meaning 'to make' or 'create.'

Trousse-galant (Le), 1445. An epidemic which ravaged France, and was so called 'de la rapidité avec laquelle elle enlevait les malades. Elle affectait surtout le bas-ventre et la tête.' See 'Plague,' &c.

Trouvères (The). Minstrels of the north of France in the 12th, 13th, and 14th cents. The language they employed was the 'Walloon' or 'Langue d'oil' (q.v.). The subjects of these minstrels were satires and romances, tales of knavery and adventure, legends and historical traditions. It had three periods. In the first period the subjects were Gothic, Frankish, and Burgundian heroes. In the second period the subjects were Charlemagne and his paladins. In the third period they were traditions of British story, such as the fabulous Brute, King Arthur and his knights, King Horn, and so on.

Sir Walter Scott's 'Marmion,' 'Lady of the Lake,' 'Rokeby, &c., are excellent imitations of the old Trouvère minstrelsy. The word is the Walloon verb trouver, to find out or invent. The same as troubar. See 'Troubadours.'

Troy (The Destruction of). This was 12 June, B.C. 1184.

Troyes, in France (Treaties of).

I. 21 May, 1420. Between Charles VI. of France, Henry V. of England, and Philippe le Bon of Burgundy, for the marriage of Henry V. with the Princess Katharine of France. By this treaty Henry was declared regent and heir of France.

II. 1 April, 1564. A treaty of peace between England and France.

Truce of God (The), 1040. A modification of the 'Peace of God' (q.v.). The latter was an ecclesiastical prohibition of war altogether, under the general expectation of the Second Advent of Christ, the Prince of Peace (1085). The truce limited the prohibition to Thursday, Friday, Saturday, Sunday, and Church festivals, such as Easter, Lent, and Christmas, and absolutely forbade anyone to molest a man working in the fields. The penalty of breaking the truce was death or outlawry.

Truck Act (The), 1, 2 Will. IV. c. 37 (1831), forbids employers to pay wages in whole or in part by goods instead of money. Orders on a truck-shop or store are likewise forbidden as a set-off against wages.

'Truck' is the French troquer, to barter.

Truck System (The). The mode of paying wages in part or wholly either by goods or by an order on some store. Very common before it was prohibited by law in 1831.

True as Bicknell. Bicknell was a hosier who supplied George III. with gloves. In the Gordon riots, 1780, a notion got abroad that the Roman Catholics designed to kill the king by poisoned gloves, as Catherine de Medicis killed Jeanne d'Albret, mother of Henri IV. of France, and many others. The 'London Courant' and other newspapers, to lull this suspicion, inserted the following paragraph: 'We are authorised to assure the public that Mr. Bicknell, his majesty's hosier, is as true and faithful a Protestant as any in his majesty's dominions.'

True Blue, in a theological sense, means a Presbyterian in contradistinction to an Episcopalian. Butler says that his knight Hudibras was 'Right Presbyterian true blue.' In the time of George I., and probably before that reign, 'True Blue,' in a political sense, meant a Whig in contradistinction to a Tory. Lord George Gordon, in 1780, and his adherents appeared in the House of Commons with blue cockades in their hats.

'True Blues'; so the Palatines of Limerick called themselves when they mustered into the yeomanry service. 'True Blues' have always been associated with Orangeism.

Trumpet (Murder of the), 1403. This refers to an incident in Venetian history. A Venetian trumpet (herald) appeared before Vicenza and announced to Francesco Terzo that the city had placed itself under the protection of Venice. Francesco ordered the trumpet to retire, and not return without a safe conduct. In the evening he returned, bearing the pennon of Vicenza, and commanded the Paduans to raise the siege. Francesco denied the authority of the trumpet, and said if he had been sent by the Venetians he would have borne the Venetian pennon. Next morning the trumpet again appeared, this time with a Venetian pennon. The guards seized him, cut off his nose and ears, and sent him back with a declaration of war. 'Let us make this trumpet,' said the guards, 'the Lion of St. Mark.' The point was this: the Lion of St. Mark has both nose and ears, but shall henceforth be mutilated like this trumpet by the indignant Paduans.

Trumpet of Sedition (The). So George III. spoke of William Pitt, the statesman, afterwards the earl of Chatham, because he protested so strongly against the American war, which George as strongly desired. While Britain was glorying in the victories of Lord Howe, he said:—

You cannot conquer America. If I were an American, as I am an Englishman, while a foreign troop was landed in my country, I never would lay down my arms—never, never, never.'

Trumpets (Feast of). A Jewish festival held the first day of the civil year, which was in September, and instituted in commemoration of the thunder heard on Mount Sinai at the giving of the Law.

Tryers, or Triers, 20 March, 1654. Commissioners appointed by Cromwell and his council to examine into the 'sufferings of the clergy.' Francis Rous, with thirty-seven others, part laymen and part ministers, were appointed. A list of the names is given by Neal in his 'History of the Puritans,' iv. p. 93 See p. 899, 'Triers of Petitions.'

Tse Dynasty (The). The ninth imperial dynasty of China. Like the eighth, tenth, and eleventh dynasties, it had dominion only over Southern China, the court being held at Nankin. It lasted twenty-three years (479–502), and gave five sovereigns.

Tshin Dynasty (The). The first historic dynasty of China (B.C. 256–201). Also called the fourth imperial dynasty. It gave five emperors who held their court at Yn; and lasted fifty-four years. It was succeeded by the dynasty of Hân. It was Tchao, the first of this dynasty, who built the great wall of China.

This dynasty must not be confounded with that of Tsin (the seventh), nor with that of Tchin (the eleventh), nor with that of Tsing (the twenty second). It is spelt and pronounced differently.

Tsin Dynasty (The), 265–420. The seventh imperial dynasty of China. It was preceded by the San-kuo or Three States, and succeeded by the duplex empire called Southern and Northern. It gave fifteen kings, all of whom were either dethroned or put to death. This dynasty is known by its exodus or grand migrations.

It is thought that the word China is derived from Tsin, but Fo-hi was said to hold his court at Shensi or the country of Tsin or Chin, whence Tsin-a, Sina, China, and this was B.C. 2953, the mythic period of the empire. No dates are introduced in the Chinese annals till B.C. 827.

Tsing Dynasty (The) of China (1644–*) succeeded the Mings, founded by Choun-tchi. This is sometimes called the Manchou dynasty. The present reigning family of China is of this dynasty.

Tsong Dynasty (The) or Pih Sung. The eighth imperial dynasty of China, and first of the Woo-tae or 'five races.' These five races ruled only over the southern empire, and held their court at Nankin. The eighth dynasty gave seven emperors and lasted fifty-nine years (420–479). The founder, Noo-tee, was a cobbler.

Tuatha-na-Danans (The), a semi-historical very early Irish dynasty. It is said that the five sons of Dela established in Ireland the five principalities of Leinster, Munster, Ulster, Connaught, and Meath, and this pentarchy continued for eighty years, when the three sons of Danan invaded the island and established themselves there, till they were driven out by the eight sons of Milesius, who came from Spain. Five of the sons perished, and the whole island was divided between two of the surviving sons, Heremon and Heber. Heremon took Connaught and Leinster, and fixed his residence at Tarah, in Meath. Heber ruled over the southern provinces, but being slain in battle, Heremon became sole monarch of the island.

Tuatha=commander.

Tübingen School (The), of theology in Germany, also called 'The Historical School,' founded by Baur, to investigate the historical correctness of the New Testament. Baur wrote a book to prove that the Gospel of St. John was not written till some considerable time after the other three gospels; and another to show that St. Mark's Gospel was not written till many years after the supposed date. The bases of his criticisms are the undoubted historic facts of the New Testament.

Tuchins, or Touchins, 1385. Peasant rebels of France who committed most frightful massacres. The verb tuchinare (rebellare) and the noun tuchinatus (rebellio) are used in ancient French charters.

La ville de Nismes est bonne ville . . . les habitans sont . . . obéissans au roy, et ils ne furent onques Tuchins, mais ont toujours eu les fleurs de lys sur les portes de la ville.—Placitum, 21 Jan., 1387.

Tudor, a corruption of Theodore. Owen Tudor, a yeoman in the guards in Bedford's army, married Catherine, widow of Henry V., and had three sons. The eldest son Edmund, who was made by Henry VI. earl of Richmond, married Margaret Beaufort, heiress of the house of Somerset. He died at the age of 20, leaving one son, afterwards Henry VII.

Catherine fell in love with the Welsh guardsman while he was keeping guard at Windsor. It is said that he stumbled and fell upon her lap at a dancing party, whence their acquaintance began. He had but 40*l.* a year. No proof of the marriage was ever traced. The Duke of Gloucester, lord protector, seized Tudor and committed him to Newgate, whence he escaped, and after a while Henry VI. made him keeper of his park in Denbigh, Wales.

Tudor Rose (The), or 'Union Rose,' a combination of the Lancastrian red rose and the Yorkist white rose. The red rose has two rows of five alternate petals; the white rose is represented with three rows of five alternate petals; the Tudor or Union rose has four rows of alternate petals, one containing 10, one 8, one 7, and one 6 (counting from the exterior), with centre. The Tudor rose, between sprigs of shamrock and thistle on one stalk, forms the badge of England.

Tudors (Line of the). Henry VII., Henry VIII., Edward VI., Mary, and Elizabeth.

Henry VII. descended from John of Gaunt, duke of Lancaster, 4th son of Edward III. (q.v.). He married Elizabeth of York, daughter of Edward IV., son of Richard duke of York slain at the battle of Wakefield, 1466. See 'York.'

Henry VII. had no hereditary right to the crown. He was the illicit and adulterous son of Edmund Tudor by Margaret Beaufort, daughter of the Duke of Somerset. Elizabeth of York was heir to the crown, but even in the Lancastrian line there were many who had a much cleaner title than Henry. It is not even certain that he was born in wedlock at all. He was a despicable money-grubber, and very 'indifferent honest.'

Tudors' Crest (The). A crown in a bush of fruited hawthorn to commemorate the incident of a soldier finding the crown of Richard III. hid in a hawthorn bush on the day of battle. It was given to Lord Stanley, who placed it on the head of Richmond, saying 'Long live King Henry!'

Tugendbund (Der), or 'League of Virtue,' 1813. A secret society set on foot by the Prussian minister Von Stein, and supported especially by the students. It had for its object the total expulsion of the French from German soil, and embodied the seething hatred of Germany for France. It gave umbrage to the allies and was dissolved in 1815.

Tulchan Bishops, 1574. Bishops who took a small part of their stipends and gave the rest to their patrons. When a cow had lost her calf, it was customary in Scotland to flay the calf and stuff the skin with straw, that, being placed before the mother, she might be induced to part with her milk freely. This stuffed calf was called a Tulchan, and the stipendiary bishop parted with his revenues to the patron freely, his see being only nominal. The first skimmed-milk bishop was John Douglas, appointed archbishop of St. Andrews by the Earl of Morton, who claimed the cream.

The regent Morton, affecting zeal for the Protestant doctrines, disobliged the Church of Scotland by a device which he had invented to secure to the secular nobility the lands and revenues of the Catholic clergy. To this end he nominated to the archbishopric of St. Andrews a poor clergyman named Douglas, taking his obligation to rest satisfied with a very small annuity out of the revenues of the see, and to hand over the rest to his patron, the regent himself. This class of bishops . . . was facetiously called Tulchan prelates.—Sir W. SCOTT, Hist. of Scotland, xxxi.

Tuileries (The), a garden and palace in Paris, built on the site of an ancient fabrique de tuiles. It was composed of three great pavilions, called Le pavillon de Marsan (north), the pavillon de Flore (south), and the pavillon de l'Horloge (centre). It was joined to the Louvre by Napoleon III. (1851–6). The land was bought by François I. in 1564, and the original palace was made for Catherine de Medicis, after the design of Philibert Delorme. Louis XIV., Napoleon I., Louis-Philippe, and Napoleon III. made great improvements, especially the last. In the republic the convention held their meetings there, afterwards it was used by the Conseil des Anciens. The First Consul made it his residence in 1800. In 1848 it was converted into an asylum for invalid workmen; it was the imperial residence of Napoleon III. from 1852; and was burnt by the Communists 24 May, 1871.

Tulip Mania (The), 1634–1637. An extraordinary rage for tulip-bulbs, which prevailed in Holland and spread through Europe. The tulip called the Viceroy fetched 250*l*., and the Semper Augustus as much as 1,700*l*. Thousands were sold on Exchange merely as articles of speculation, and when the rage subsided thousands of persons were ruined.

Tullia'num (The). A loathsome dungeon in Rome. This dismal subterranean dungeon was built by Servius Tullius, and was a part of the Carcer Mamertinus built by Ancus Martius on the slope of the Capitoline hill. The Tullianum is especially noted, as it was in this dungeon, twelve feet underground, that several of the Catiline conspirators were put to death.

Mamers is the Sabine form of Mars, and Ancus Marcius was a Sabine. Jugurtha was starved to death in the Carcer Mamertinus.

Tully, i.e. Cicero. The Tullii were of Alban descent, transplanted to Rome in the reign of Tullus Hostilius. Cicero made the word a generic name for a legal orator.

Tumble-down Dick. Richard Cromwell, son of the Protector. He was proclaimed Protector after his father's death, but resigned office within seven months. 'Tumble-down Dick' was a common public-house sign affected by royalists.

Tumults and Disorders (Act against), 1661. This Act made it an offence punishable with a fine of 100*l*. and three months' imprisonment to solicit a signature to a petition to king or parliament which had more than twenty names signed, unless the petition was sanctioned by three justices of the peace, or by the majority of the grand jury of the county. Whoever presented such petition was liable to the same punishment also; and whoever was present at the presentation of a sanctioned petition, if there were more than ten persons attending it.

Turanian Languages (The). The agglutinate orders of languages, divided into North and South. The Northern division falls into five sections, viz. the Tungusic, Mongolic, Turkic, Finnic, and Samoyedic. The Southern division comprises the Tamulic, the Gangetic, the Taic, the Malaic, and some other Polynesian tongues or dialects. See 'Semitic' and 'Aryan.'

Turcomanchi (Peace of), Feb., 1828, between Persia and Russia, making the river Araxes the boundary of the two kingdoms. Persia had also to pay the expenses of the war.

Turcos (The). The native Algerian foot-soldiers. The horse-soldiers are called Spahis. Cf. SEPOY.

Turin (Treaty of). I. 8 Aug., 1381, terminating the war of Chiozza between the Venetians and the Genoese. The turning-point of Genoa's greatness, from which she began to decline.

II. 29 Aug., 1696, for separate peace between France and Savoy.

Turin Papy'rus (The), or 'Book of Kings.' A fragmentary list of Egyptian kings brought from Thebes by an Italian named Drovetti. At one time it was supposed that this was a complete list in chronological order, but it does not point out contemporary or double kings. A facsimile is preserved in the Royal Society of Literature, 21 Delahay Street, London.

Turkish Trilateral (The). Silistria, Shumla, and Varna in Bulgaria and on the flank of every possible line of operation upon the Balkan.

Turkish War of 1683–1697. Principally noted for the siege of Vienna by Mustapha, the Turkish vizier, in 1683. When, on the eve of success, Sobieski, king of Poland, arrived with reinforcements, Mustapha decamped, leaving behind him the sultan's standard, many splendid dresses, and the harnesses of several Turkish horses adorned with silver, gold, and precious stones; besides the money for the siege, the pay of the soldiers, the baggage, tents, cannons, and chariots.

The war dragged on after this till 1697, and was brought to an end by the 'Peace of Carlovits.'

Turlupins, 1372. Heretics analogous to the Begards (q.v.). They taught the perfectionability of man; and, it is said, went about nude. They were excommunicated by Gregory XI. in 1372, and were extirpated by the order of Charles V. of France. They called themselves the Fraternité des pauvres. Called Turlupins 'quod ea tantum habitarent loca, quæ lupis exposita erant.' (An etymology most unsatisfactory.)

A turlupin means a sorry jester, a fool. Whence turlupinade and the verb turlupiner, to play the fool.

Turneys, 1339. A base coin made in Ireland and circulated 'to the injury of the king's sterling money.' See p. 99, 'Black Money.'

Turpin's Chronicle, 'Chronique de l'archevêque Turpin.' Turpin was a monk of St. Denis, and afterwards archbishop of Reims, contemporary of Charlemagne. The chronicle referred to is an historic romance having Charlemagne for its hero, and is full of marvels, such as enchanted castles, winged horses, magical horns, incantations, and so on. Historically it is worthless, and probably Turpin had no hand at all in it. Some say it was the work of Gui de Bourgogne (Calixtus II.) in the 12th cent.; others ascribe it to a monk of St. André de Vienne, in Dauphiné, who lived in the 11th cent.

Tweeddale's Act (The Earl of), 1668. It restored to their livings those ministers who had been ejected, provided they would accept collation from the bishop, and would attend the presbyteries and synods.

'Collation' means induction and institution, or investing a clergyman with the temporalities and spiritualities of his living.

Twelfth (The), i.e. the 12th August. The commencement of grouse-shooting.

Twelve Articles of the Symbol (The). Said to have been suggested by the Apostles in a grotto of Mount Olivet just before their final separation.

1. PETER: I believe in God the Father Almighty, maker of heaven and earth.

2. JOHN: [And] in Jesus Christ, his only son, our Lord.

3. JAMES the Greater: Who was conceived of the Holy Ghost, born of the Virgin Mary.

4. ANDREW: Suffered under Pontius Pilate; was crucified and buried.

'Dead' was subsequently added, and is bad English. We should not say (A B) was hanged, dead, and buried.

5. PHILIP: He descended into hell.

6. THOMAS: The third day he rose again from the dead.

7. JAMES the Less: He ascended into heaven, and sitteth on the right hand of God the Father Almighty.

8. MATTHEW: [From thence] He shall come to judge the quick and the dead.

9. NATHANIEL: I believe in the Holy Ghost.

10. SIMON: The Holy Catholic Church.

'The Communion of Saints' was added in the 6th cent.

11. MATTHIAS: The forgiveness of sins.

12. JUDE: The resurrection of the dead, and the life everlasting.

The twelve Apostles were anciently delineated, each holding a banderole inscribed with the words attributed to him. Of course the tradition is historically worthless. The Apostles had no hand whatever in the creed.

See 'Articles.'

Twelve Brethren (The). The Twelve 'Marrowmen' (q.v.).

Twelve Fruits of the Holy Ghost (The) in Catholic theology.

(1) Chastity; (2) faith; (3) gentleness; (4) goodness; (5) joy; (6) longsuffering; (7) love or charity; (8) meekness; (9) modesty; (10) patience; (11) peace; and (12) temperance.

Compare these with Gal. v. 22, 23.

Twelve Peers of France (The). Philippe Auguste fixed the number of peers to six seculars and six ecclesiastics. The secular peers were: (1) the Duke of Normandy; (2) the Duke of Burgundy; (3) the Duke of Guyenne; (4) the Count of Flanders; (5) the Count of Toulouse; and (6) the Count of Champagne.

The ecclesiastical peers were: (1) the Archbishop of Reims; (2) the Bishop of Laon; (3) the Bishop of Langres; (4) the Bishop of Beauvais; (5) the Bishop of Châlons; and (6) the Bishop of Noyon.

Twelve Remembrancers (The). (1) Unity of the Godhead; (2) the hypostatic union of God and man; (3) the Trinity; (4) the Evangelists; (5) the wounds of Christ, two in the hands, two in the feet, and one in the side; (6) the six days of creation; (7) the seven words uttered on the cross; (8) the Beatitudes; (9) the heavenly host; (10) the commandments; (11) the Apostles after Judas the traitor had 'gone to his place'; (12) the Apostolic college when completed. Called 'The Twelve.'

Twelve Tables (The), or Leges Duŏdĕcim Tabularum. The Magna Charta of Old Rome drawn up by the Decemvirs. Ten of them B.C. 451, and the other two B.C. 450.

Twenty (The). See p. 867, 'Giunta.'

Twenty Years' War (The), 1794–1815. The wars against Napoleon. 1 June, 1894, the French fleet was defeated and crippled by Lord Howe off Brest, and 18 June, 1815, the battle of Waterloo gave the coup de grâce to the great disturber of nations and enduring enemy of England.

Twenty-two (The), 30 Oct., The twenty-two Girondin deputies were sentenced to death, with confiscation of goods.

Two Hundred (The). On the day of subscription to the Bill of Uniformity, in the reign of Charles II., 200 of the Scotch Presbyterian clergy relinquished their livings. Calamy, Baxter, and Reynolds, chief of the Nonconformist leaders, were offered bishoprics, but only Reynolds accepted the bribe. See 'Seven Bishops.'

Charles II. said to Lauderdale that a Scotchman's religion 'is not fit for a gentleman.' It is much to be feared the king's religion was not fit for any man, gentle or simple.

Two Thousand (The). See 'Memorable,' &c.

Tyburn Dick. Richard Savage, lord Rivers; made by Queen Anne lieutenant of the Tower in 1710.

Tyndale's Bible. English translation of the New Testament, published at Wittenberg in 1526. English translation of the Pentateuch, published at Hamburg in 1530. This translation was the basis of the Great Bible (1539–1541) in the reign of Henry VIII.; of the Bishops' Bible (1568–1572) in the reign of Elizabeth; of the King's Bible (1611) in the reign of James I.; and of the Revised Version (1870–1884) in the reign of Victoria. See 'Bible.'

Tynwald (The Court of). The court of the three estates of the Isle of Man, consisting of the governor, the council of ten, and the House of Keys. It is the supreme court of the island. All new Manx laws must be proclaimed in English and Manx, in the presence of the people, at the Tynwald Hill.

The laws of Man still retain much of their ancient peculiarity of character, though modified by occasional acts of the Tynwald.—PRINCE, Parallel History, vol. iii. p. 285.

Type (The), A.D. 648. An edict published by Constans II. of the Eastern empire under the hope of burying in silence the dissentient views of the orthodox Christians and the Monothelites (q.v.). It imposed silence on both parties on all points of religious differences.

Tyran de Blanc. Frederick baron Grimm (1723–1807). So called from his free use of cosmetics to repair the ravages of increasing age in his face. He was so called when he took up his abode in Paris.

Tyranny of the Thirty (The), B.C. 404, lasted eight months. After the overthrow of the Athenians at Ægospotămos the Lacedæmonians insulted them by setting over them thirty magistrates, called 'Tyrants.' These magistrates behaved with such arrogance and cruelty that Thrasybūlus easily got possession of the city and expelled the tyrants.

To the honour of the Spartans be it said, when they were informed of the rebellion, instead of punishing the conspirators, they passed a bill of amnesty, and re-established in Athens the democratic form of government upon its ancient foundation.

Tyrant Basili'des (The). Ivan IV. of Russia, surnamed the 'Terrible' by the Russians. 'Basili' is only another spelling of 'Vassili,' and Ivan IV. was the fourth of the Vassili who had reigned in Russia. 'Basili-ides' or 'Vassili-ides' means 'a descendant of Vassili.'

Among the writers of the history of the north, Ivan IV. is famous as 'The tyrant Basilides.'—DUNCAN, Hist. of Russia, vol. i. p. 89.

Tyrants of Sparta (The), B.C. 219–192. They were, first, Lycurgus, nine years; then Machanīdas, four years; and lastly Nabis, fourteen years. Called tyrants because they did not belong to either of the royal dynasties, but were usurpers.

Tyrconnel—now Donegal, Tyrone, Derry, Fermānagh, Armagh, and Ca'van (500,000 acres)—was the land planted by James I. The lands were portioned out into estates varying from 1,000 to 2,000 acres, and the proprietors were bound to build substantial houses in the English fashion, and to people them with English and Scotch tenantry. A company of London merchants, called 'The Irish Society,' contracted (1619) for large tracts of land, which are still held under this tenure.

Tyrian Era (The). This era began 19 Oct., B.C. 125.

Tyrolese Insurrection (The), 1809. Tyrol had been 442 years under Austria, and was happy and prosperous; but Napoleon placed it under Bavaria, with a promise that nothing should be changed. Immediately, however, Maximilian changed its name to South Bavaria, and conformed its laws to those of his own kingdom. André Hofer, proprietor of the inn of Sand, now induced Austria to join them in freeing the Tyrol; battle after battle was won by the insurgents, and then Austria made peace with France. Hofer was taken prisoner by the French and shot 20 Feb., 1810.

Tyrtæos (The English). Laurence Minot, who celebrated the exploits of Edward III. in English verse (died 1352).

In 1878 the music hall jingo-song, 'We don't want to fight,' almost roused England into a war with Russia.

Tyrtæos of Attica in the second Messēnian War was by command of an oracle appointed leader of the Spartan army, and by his war-songs led them to victory. The following is a free translation of the first of his three extant elegies:—

Oh! 'tis joyful to fall in the face of the foe,
For country and altar to die;
But a lot more ignoble no mortal can know
Than with parents and children, heart-broken with woe,
From home as an exile to fly.

Unrecompensed travail, starvation, and scorn,
The fugitive's footsteps attend;
Dishonoured his race, and his children forlorn,
Himself by temptation and shame overborne,
Never hear the sweet voice of a friend.

To the field, then! Be strong, and acquit ye like men!
Who shall fear for his country to fall?
Ye younger, in ranks firmly serried remain;
Ye elders, though weak, look on flight with disdain,
And honour your fatherland's call.

Tyrtæos of France. Rouget de Lisle (1760–1836), whose 'Marseillaise' stirred the French revolutionary party almost to madness. The refrain of this spirit-stirring hymn runs thus:—

Aux armes, citoyens! Formez vos bataillons! Marchons! marchons! qu'un sang impur abreuve nos sillons.

Tyrtæos of Germany (The Youthful). Karl Theodore Körner (1791–1813), killed in a skirmish with Walmoden's outposts at Godebusch. His 'Lyre and Sword Songs' stirred his countrymen like a trumpet. Perhaps the 'Wacht am Rhein,' by Max Schneckenburger, who died 1851, may be called the German 'Marseillaise.' The fifth verse runs thus:

While there's a drop of blood to run,
While there's an arm to bear a gun,
While there's a hand to wield a sword,
No foe shall dare thy stream to ford.
Dear fatherland, no fear be thine,
Thy sons stand firm to guard the Rhine.

Tyrtæos of Spain. Manuel José Quintāna, whose odes stimulated the Spaniards to vindicate their liberty at the war of independence (1772–1857).

Tyrwhitt Scholarships, for Hebrew. Two for bachelors of arts of the respective values of 80*l.* and 20*l.*, tenable for three years. Founded in the University of Cambridge by the Rev. Robert Tyrwhitt, 1818. See 'Hebrew Prize,' 'Mason Prize.'

U and V. The ancient use of these two letters was this: U before vowels, especially the vowels a, e, and i; V before consonants, especially the consonants n, r, p, s.

As meruailed, aduantage, conuaye; leaue, haue, gaue, moued, reueal, gouern, deserues, diuers, forgiue; deuise, hauing, deuil, sauiour, seruice.

vnto, vnite, vnmannerly, covntry; discovrse, Oedipvs.

It must not be supposed that u was never set before consonants, nor v before vowels. In the book now before me, dated 1604, hundreds of examples might be gathered, as very, rule, mouse, foure, houre, &c.

Ubiqua'rians (The). A social club which existed in Barbadoes, and probably elsewhere, in the latter half of the eighteenth cent. Their tenets were called Ubiquarianism.

Ubiquita'rians or Ubiquists (The), 1560. A small German religious sect, originating with John Brentius, who maintained that the body of Christ was present everywhere (ubique), in the eucharist, by virtue of his divine ubiquity. They were opposed to the Sacramentarians (q.v.).

Udaller (A), an allodial possessor of Zetland. A Udaller holds his possession under an old Norwegian law, instead of the feudal tenures introduced from Scotland. Hence a Udaller had no feudal lord or superior. Icelandic odal, an hereditary estate.

Uhlan King (The). King Alfonso XII. of Spain was so called in contempt by the French, in 1883, because he accepted a colonelcy in Germany of a Uhlan regiment.

Uhlans, Prussian hussars, 1813. They are mounted on fleet horses, are lightly clad, and armed with sword, pistol and lance. Every battalion of the Landwehr (q.v.) has its squadron of Uhlans. In the Franco-German War, 1870, these Uhlans did admirable service, especially as scouts.

Ukase (Emanoi), that is, a 'personal order,' meaning an edict signed by the czar. These edicts, as various as the opinions, whims, or prejudices of the czar, are the laws of Russia. Alexei Michailowitz (1645–1676) had a selection of such edicts for the preceding century made into a digest called the Sobornoe Ulajenie, which is the common law of Russia. In 1670 he collected all the royal ukāses held by private individuals as personal licences, and burnt them, so that one and the same law prevailed through his whole dominion. Ukase = Ou'-kase.

Ulaj'enie (The). A Russian code of jurisprudence, amended and codified by Alexei Michailowitz, czar of Russia (1646). See above, 'Ukase.'

Ule'ma, a powerful corporation in Turkey, consisting of the Mufti, who presides, the Imaums, the Mollahs, and the Kadis. Their functions extend to the religion of the country, the administration of justice, and the general government. It serves as an equipoise to the despotism of the sultan.

Ulid'ia, in Ireland, comprised the present county of Down and part of Antrim.

Ulster Custom (The), 1870. It was a custom up to 1870, but was then made a law. It is a sort of 'free sale' which prevails in Ulster. Suppose A is the tenant of B, and does not wish to continue so, instead of throwing up his tenancy, he can sell it to C, and then C is the tenant of B. Certain restrictions are made. For example, the landlord can prevent A's asking an exorbitant price, because this would be to the prejudice of the landlord. The new tenant C must be accepted by the landlord before the transfer is made. And, lastly, A (the old tenant) must pay up all rents and taxes before C can take his place.

Mr. Lowther, chief secretary of Ireland, in 1879, protested against the extension of Ulster custom to the rest of Ireland; but in 1881 this demand, together with 'fixity of tenure' and 'fair rent,' was duly recognised.

Ulster King-of-arms, chief of the Irish staff of heralds. The first was appointed by Edward VI. (1 June, 1552). That of Scotland is styled Lord-Lyon. See p. 415, 'Heralds.'

Ul'timus Anglo'rum. William Bedell (Protestant bishop of Kilmore and Ardagh), who died 1642, aged 70. The Irish insurgents fired a volley over his grave in Kilmore churchyard, and parted saying 'Requiescat in pace ultimus Anglorum.'

Ul'timus Romano'rum. Dr. Johnson was so called by Thomas Carlyle. I think he might be more aptly called the last of the Catos (1709-1784).

Sometimes Horace Walpole is so called (1717-1797).

Ulto'nian Kings (The). The kings of Ulster, in Ireland.

Emania, the seat of the old Ultonian kings.—T. MOORE, Hist. of Ireland, vii. p. 143.

Ultramontane Doctrines, or 'Ultramontanism.' Extreme views of papal supremacy and the rights of the popes. These partisans of the pope are so called in France because the pope resides on the other side of the Alps, ultra montes. They are opposed to the Gallicans (q.v.).

Ultramontane Party (in Ireland), 1825. The anti-English and anti-Protestant party. The Duke of Wellington made a great distinction between 'Orangemen and Papists' [Ultramontanists] and 'Protestants and Catholics.'

Ultramontanes. So the Vaudois who settled beyond the Apennines, after they were driven from their valley homes in the 13th cent., were called by the natives, because they originally dwelt on the other side of the mountain range. They first founded, in the vicinity of Montalto, the town of Borgo d'Ultramontani, subsequently the walled town of Guadia.

O Florence, what does the word Florence mean? The flower of Italy. And so thou wast till these Ultramontanes persuaded thee that man is justified by faith and not by works; and herein they lie.—GILLES, p. 20.

Ulysses of Brandenburg (The). Albrecht III., elector of Brandenburg. Also called the 'German Achilles' (1414–1486).

Ulysses of the Highlands. Sir Evan Cameron lord of Lochiel. Also called 'The Black' (died 1719).

It was the son of Sir Evan who was called the 'Gentle Lochiel.'

Umbrella (Mr. Gladstone's). Mr. Gladstone's policy. When in September 1885 he issued his manifesto to the electors of Midlothian it was said that he 'opened his umbrella.' His ministry were said to take shelter or stand under his umbrella. In caricature he is often drawn with a 'Sarah Gamp' under his arm.

Unam Sanctam, 1302. The famous constitution of Boniface VIII., setting forth that 'the church is one body and has one head. Under its sway are two swords, one spiritual and the other temporal. The former to be used by the supreme pontiff himself, and the latter by temporal powers at his bidding, but at all times the lesser sword must be in subjection to the greater, the temporal power to the spiritual . . . Every human being on the earth is the subject of the see of Rome ('Extravagantes,' book i., title viii. c. 1).

This constitution ends thus: 'Dicimus, definimus, et pronunciamus, omnino esse de necessitate fidei.'

Uncorruptible Commoner (The). Andrew Marvell, also called 'The British Aristidês' (1620–1678). See p. 48, 'Aristides,' n.

Uncrowned Monarch (The), of Ireland. Daniel O'Connell, also called 'The Agitator.' With Sheil he founded the new Catholic Association in 1825; he began the agitation for the repeal of the Union in 1842, held monster meetings in 1843, was arrested for sedition in 1844 and found guilty, but the sentence passed on him was reversed by the House of Lords. He lost his supremacy, and died at Genoa, on his way to Rome (1775–1847).

Under the Yoke (Sent). In Roman history to be sent under the yoke was a sign of subjection. The yoke consisted of an arch made with three spears, two upright ones, and one forming a transom. The conquered army was made to lay down their arms, and march sub jugum in token of subjugation.

Undertakers. I. In English history, 1614. Men of influence who undertook for a consideration to get such persons returned to parliament as would prove submissive to the royal will [James I.].

Bacon, Somerset, and Neville were the three chief, and are sometimes called 'undertakers' because they undertook by bribes to win over the chief speakers and men of influence in the parliament of 1614.

A generation about the court that, to please and humour greatness, undertook a parliament, as men presuming to have friends in every county and borough, who by their power among the people would combine to return such members as should comply solely to (sic) the king's desires. —WILSON.

In his [James I.] opening speech he admitted what he had so sturdily denied before, the existence of Undertakers in the last parliament, 'a strange kind of beast which had done mischief.— HOWITT, Hist. of Eng. (James I., vol. iii., p. 83).

II. In Irish history, 1608. Those English or Scotch colonists sent by James I. in the northern counties of Ca'van, Fermānagh, Armagh, Derry, Tyrone, and Tyrconnell, who were allotted 2,000 acres each. They were men of capital, and undertook to pay a mark a year for every 60 acres, and to admit no recusant for tenant.

James confiscated 2,000,000 acres in these counties, and divided them in lots of 2,000, 1,500, 1,000 acres. Elizabeth tried to plant Ulster with an English colony.

 In the early part of George III.'s reign a party which played off the British Government against the Irish Parliament were called Undertakers. They had two objects in view: (1) To make the crown, so far as Ireland was concerned, dependent on themselves: (2) To check the spirit of liberty in the people, but throw the odium on the government. This party was broken up by making the lord-lieutenant reside in Ireland and distribute the patronage himself.

Undertakers (Fife), 1600. An association of gentlemen, chiefly proprietors of Fife, who undertook to settle in the Lewis, Uist, and other isles convenient for the fisheries, in order to bring these islands into a more civilised state. They expelled the natives, built towns, and introduced manufactories. The attempt did not succeed, and three years later was tried again, but with no better success.

Unfair Preacher (The). Isaac Barrow, D.D. (1630–1677). So Charles II. called him 'because his sermons were so exhaustive that he left nothing for others to say who came after him.'

Unfunded Debt (The). Loans to the British government which are paid off in a given number of years. Sometimes these loans are for a few months only, and sometimes for a few years. Thus a war, such as that in Egypt, may increase the government expenditure, say 10 millions, more than the Chancellor of the Exchequer has provided for, and instead of adding this sum to the National Debt, the Treasury may think proper to borrow the money at 3 per cent., and pay off 2 millions every year for 5 years, and so cancel the debt. Such a debt is not 'funded,' but is only temporary.

Unicorn. One of the pursuivants of Scotland. See p. 415, 'Heralds.'

Uniformity (Statutes of), 3 Edw. VI. c. 1 (1549); 5, 6 Edw. VI. c. 1; 1 Eliz. c. 2; 13, 14 Car. II. c. 4. Dissenters relieved of all penalties of nonconformity by the Act of Toleration (1689).

Uniformity (Act of), 1661. Enacted that the revised Book of Common Prayer shall be used in all places of public worship; that the ordination of ministers therein prescribed shall be alone lawful; that all beneficed clergymen shall read the service therein contained within a given time, shall subscribe to the 39 articles, and shall profess in a set form of words their unfeigned assent and consent to these Articles and to everything else contained in the said Book of Common Prayer. Above 2,000 ministers refused to be bound by this act. All schoolmasters, all who entered our universities, and all persons who took any office, civil or military, were required to give on oath their assent and consent to this act.

By the Act of Uniformity all ministers who refused to comply were to be imprisoned for six months for the first offence, to lose their livings for the second offence, and to be imprisoned for life for the third offence.

Unigen'itus (The Bull), 1713, passed by Clement XI. in condemnation of the Jansenists. This bull condemns 101 passages extracted from the famous book of Quesnel, called 'Moral Reflections on the New Testament,' and set the whole kingdom of France in an uproar.

The Jansenists were Calvinistic Roman Catholics who maintained the doctrines of free grace, predestination, and the non-freedom of the will.

Union (The), 22 July, 1706. The union of Scotland and England under the name of Great Britain. The terms were: (1) The succession to the throne of Great Britain shall be vested in the Princess Sophia and her heirs; (2) All the subjects shall enjoy the same rights and privileges; (3) the court of session and all other courts of judicature in Scotland shall remain as at present constituted; (4) Scotland shall be represented in parliament by 16 peers and 45 commoners, &c.

Union (Act of), 1799. An Act of Parliament by which Ireland was united to Great Britain. It came into operation 1 Jan. 1801, when the Dublin parliament was suppressed.

Union (L'Arrêt d'), 18 May, 1648. The abolition of the Act of Union. Mazarin proposed to keep back for four years the salaries of all the crown courts of France except those of the Paris parlement. The Paris parlement refused to be made an exception, and immediately passed the Act of Union, declaring that all crown courts should be treated alike. Mazarin stopped the Act from passing, declaring it to be illegal, and this was 'l'arrêt d'Union.' The parlement would not give way, and civil war broke out. This civil war was called la guerre de la Fronde, which was between Mazarin and the Paris parlement.

Union (The Edict of), 1588. An Act proclaimed at Blois, by which Henri III. was declared chief of the league or confederation of the Catholics in France against the Huguenots. See 'Holy Union.'

Union (The Evangelical), 1608. An alliance formed at Auhausen in Bavaria, and confirmed at Halle in 1610, between the Protestant states of the Palatinate, Würtemberg, Hesse-Cassel, and Baden-Dourlach, against the Holy League formed in 1609 at Wurtzburg.

Union Brigade (The), at Waterloo, 1815, was composed of the 1st Royal Dragoons [England]; the 2nd Dragoons [the Royal Scots Greys] for Scotland; and the 6th [Inniskillings] for Ireland.

Union of Calmar (The). The union of the three crowns of Denmark, Norway, and Sweden, agreed to in the Conference of Calmar in Sweden. From the overthrow of Albert king of Sweden in the battle of Falkoping, Margaret queen-regent of Denmark and Norway had acted as regent of Sweden; but the Diet held at Calmar on 17 June, 1397, conferred the crown of the three kingdoms on Eric, her grand-nephew, because no woman could reign. The union was only nominal at any time, and was formally abolished in 1523.

Margaret had the provinces of Wermland, East and West Gothland, with several contiguous dependencies, assigned to her as a life settlement.

 From 1471 to 1523 Sweden had separate administration, but Wasa or Vasa united the two kingdoms.

Union of Public Good (The). The reorganised 'Association of Russian Knights.' A Russian secret society in the reign of Czar Alexander I. Their ostensible object was the welfare of Russia, but all their schemes were to be worked secretly to prevent envy, hatred, and opposition. There were several sections; the duty of the first was philanthropy; it had to watch over all charitable institutions, and report abuses. The business of the second section was educational; it had to keep watch on all schools and colleges, and see that the scholars were taught to love Russia and hate foreigners. The third section was devoted to the law-courts, and reported all grievances. The fourth section was to study political economy, the sources of national wealth, and the development of industry.

Union of Safety, or the True and Faithful Sons of the Country (The). A secret society organised in Russia in 1816 by young officers who had served in the campaigns of 1813, 1814, 1815. The members were divided into (1) Brothers, (2) Men, and (3) Boyars. The Boyars were superior in grade to the Men and Brothers, and from them three directors were chosen monthly, viz. a president, a superintendent, and a secretary. Solemn ceremonies were observed at their meetings, and all members were sworn to absolute secrecy. Dissolved 1821.

Union of Scotland and Ireland (The), 1651, effected by the Rump Parliament. Eight commissioners were sent to Scotland, and in spite of much opposition, procured a vote in favour of the union, and 30 members were admitted in the parliament of 1654 for Scotland, and 30 for Ireland. But the legislation of the Protectorate was ignored by Charles II., and the permanent Union was effected in the reign of Queen Anne, 1707, when the Scotch parliament was abrogated, and the nation was permitted to send 16 lords and 45 commoners to the British parliament.

Union of Utrecht (The), 1579. A league under the influence of William (prince of Orange-Nassau), aided by Count Hoorn and Count Egmont, to throw off the Spanish yoke. It was joined by seven of the South Belgian provinces, which succeeded in 1594 in erecting themselves into an independent state, called the 'Republic of the Seven United Provinces.'

The seven provinces were Holland, Zealand, Utrecht, Gelderland with Zutphen, Over-Yssel, Friesland, and Groningen with Drenthe.

Union with Ireland (The). The act passed for this Union 2 July, 1800 (39, 40 George III. c. 67).

Unionists, 1885, &c. The Radicals and Whigs who united with the Conservatives, in Lord Salisbury's administration, to preserve the integrity of the United Kingdom, which Mr. Gladstone (the preceding premier) would have sacrificed to please the Irish Home Rule party led by Mr. Parnell. Mr. Gladstone's bill utterly demoralised the Whig party, and split from it its richest, most talented, and most influential members. George Joachim Goschen, a Whig, joined the ministry as chancellor of the exchequer; Lord Hartington and Joseph Chamberlain, important members of Gladstone's ministry, abandoned the Whig party and became Unionist leaders; about seventy-five M.P.'s did the same, leaving the Gladstone party an utter wreck. See 'Broad-bottom Administration.'

Mr. Gladstone, by giving independent parliaments to Ireland, Scotland, and Wales, would have reduced the United Kingdom into a mere federation. In 1890 the Gladstone or Whig party was nicknamed the 'demoralised.'

Lord Salisbury's parliament, formed in 1886 on the downfall of the Gladstonian house, consisted of 670 members, of which 393 were Conservatives and 75 Liberal-Unionists who voted with the Conservatives=378. The opposition consisted of 206 Gladstonians and 86 Nationalists, chiefly Irish members=291. Conservative majority 87, often increased to 100 and more.

Unitarians, 16th cent. Protestant Dissenters who believe in the monarchy of God, and disbelieve that the one God has three persons. Arians, Socinians, Mussulmans, and Jews are in one sense Unitarians, but, of course, the sect so called disavow the identity of the five creeds. Unitarians disbelieve the doctrine of the Trinity, the vicarious atonement of Christ, the doctrine of original and transmitted sin, and everlasting punishment. They baptize, however, and celebrate the eucharistic sacrament as a memorial of the crucifixion.

Milton, Newton, Priestley, Locke, and Dr. Lardner were Unitarians.

Unitas Fratrum. The Moravian brotherhood (1500).

United Armenians (The). A sect in Italy, Poland, Galicia, Persia, Russia, and Marseilles, which recognise the spiritual sovereignty of the pope and hold the doctrines of the Catholics, but have their own church government.

United Brethren (The), or, as they call themselves, 'Unitas Fratrum.' More generally called 'Moravians' (q.v.) or 'Moravian Brethren,' 1500.

The 'United Brethren in Christ' (1800) are German Methodists of North America.

United Brotherhood (The). The American Irish League. They were called 'V.C.' (q.v.). The object was to bring about an Independent Irish Republic in Ireland by force of arms. Called in Ireland 'I.R.B.' (Irish Revolutionary Brotherhood).

The Irish, in their jargon, were called 'Jajid,' and Ireland was called 'Jaimboe.'

The executive body was known as 'F.C.' which was merely removing the initial letters (like V.C.) one letter in advance. F.C. for E.B., and V.C. for U.B.

The secretary was known as 'Y,' the treasurer as 'Z,' and the chairman as 'X.'

Letters were addressed 'To the F.C. of the V.C.,' i.e. the 'Executive Body of the United Brotherhood.' See 'Irish Associations.'

United Diet of Prussia (The), 1847. A union of the provincial diets created in the previous reign. It was no organ of the national will, like the British Parliament. It levied taxes, except in time of war, but the kingdom of Prussia was ruled like a military camp by the king as commander-in-chief, and his diet took the place of field officers.

United East India Company (The), 1708. The original company chartered in 1600 by Queen Elizabeth, and granted a monopoly for fifteen years of trading to India, united with a rival company chartered in 1698. In 1759 the united company obtained from parliament the political management of the acquired countries, subject to certain restrictions, and was denominated the 'East India Company,' and twenty-four members were appointed directors, their acts being subject to the revisal of the Board of Control. In 1858 the government of India was transferred to the crown.

The original company was formed in 1599, and consisted of four ships. The charter had to be renewed every fifteen years.

United Empire Loyalists (The), 1783. Those lovers of Old England who gave up everything they had rather than abide in the revolted American colonies under a new and alien flag. They settled in Nova Scotia, the wilderness of Ontario, the West Indies, New Brunswick, and elsewhere. The centenary of their departure from the United States was held in the Dominion in 1883, when the quaint costumes and old coaches of the previous century were paraded.

United Free Church Methodists (The), about 1850. The Wesleyan Association and Wesleyan Reform Association united.

United Free Gospel Churches, or 'Band Room Methodists,' 1806, who first met in the Band Room, Manchester. They do not pay their ministers, they ignore class meetings, and they admit non-members into their society.

United Irishmen (The).

I. In 1793. Projected in 1791 by Samuel Neilson, a draper of Belfast, to unite Protestants and Catholics in a constitutional agitation for reform and Catholic emancipation. The principal leaders of the people were Wolfe Tone, Hamilton Rowan, and James Napper Tandy, whose violence was so great that they were obliged to expatriate themselves. When the Earl of Camden, who succeeded the Earl Fitzwilliam, returned to the old system of coercion, the United Irishmen advocated a separation from England and the establishment of a republic in Ireland in alliance with the French Republic, and a well-organized system of secret confederacy was spread over the country, the heads of which issued orders for enlisting, combining, and arming their adherents. In the northern and midland counties were two associations at the same time, one of Catholics called 'Defenders,' and the other of Protestants called 'Orangemen.' The Defenders joined the United Irishmen, and the Orangemen were the opponents. See 'Irish Associations.'

II. In 1846. An Irish newspaper edited by Mr. Mitchel; the organ of a party which split from the Young Irelanders, whose organ was called the 'Nation.' The 'Nation' advocated the 'combination of all classes, and the exercise of all political and social influences' to carry Repeal; the United Irishmen advocated revolution, bloodshed, and civil war. Mitchel every week addressed the lord lieutenant as 'Her Majesty's Executioner-general and Butcher-general of Ireland'; and women were exhorted to throw vitriol on the police and the Queen's soldiers.

United Kingdom. That of Ireland added to Great Britain. The Act of Union took effect 1 Jan., 1801.

The union of the four kingdoms, Wales, Ireland, and Scotland, added to England, make the anagram W.I.S.E.

United Kingdoms (The Four).

England, the Heptarchy united under Egbert	802
Ireland, united under Anlaf . .	853
Scotland, one kingdom under Kenneth MacAlpin	850
Wales, the several princes of Wales and Powisland united under Howel Dha	907
England and Ireland, Henry II. .	1172
England and Wales (with Ireland), Edward I.	1288
Great Britain (England, Wales, Scotland, and Ireland), under James VI. of Scotland, called 'James I. of England' . .	1603

United Methodist Free Churches (The), 1857. An amalgamation of the Protestant Methodists (formed 1828), the Wesleyan Methodist Association (1834), and the Wesleyan Reform Association (founded in 1849).

The Wesleyans have 7,810 chapels, the Primitives 4,426, and the United Methodist Free Churches 1,242. Their chief differences are the disapproval of a theological seminary, the exclusion of instrumental music, the place they give to laymen in church administration, which is much larger than in the original body, and the greater freedom from control in the circuits.

United Presbyterian Church (The), 1847, is composed of the 'Secession' and the 'Relief,' the former instituted in 1733 and the latter in 1752.

United Presbytery (The), or 'Synod of Munster,' formed in 1809 by the junction of the Southern Presbytery of Dublin with the Presbytery of Munster. It is one of the three non-subscribing Presbyterian bodies of Ireland.

The other two are the 'Remonstrant Synod of Ulster' (q.v.), and the 'Presbytery of Antrim' (q.v.). These three bodies subsequently united and formed the 'General Non-subscribing Presbyterian Association of Ireland' (q.v.).

United States (The). There are somewhat more than 2,700 counties. Of these 10 per cent. are named after presidents, and 85 per cent. after Americans who have not been presidents (1890).

1. Counties, &c., named from presidents:—

27 counties named Washington, besides cities and towns innumerable.
43 Jefferson.
21 Jackson.
17 Lincoln, Madison, and Monroe.
12 Polk.
10 Grant.
9 Adams and Harrison.
4 Garfield, Pierce, and Van Buren.

2. Counties, &c., named from Americans who have not been presidents:—

Boone.
Calhoun.
Clay.
Hancock.
Putnam.
Randolph.
Scott.
Webster, and many more.

3. The following names are enough to Nicodemus any place from ever rising into a bishopric. Only fancy a dignified clergyman signing himself 'Yours faithfully, John . . . . ,' followed by one of the following names:—

Alkaliburg.
Bleeder's Gulch.
Bloody Bend.
Bonnerges Ferry.
Breeches Fork.
Bludgeonsville.
Bugsville.
Butter's Sell.
Buried Pipe.
Cairoville.
Clean Deck.
Daughter's Loss.
Euchreville.
Eurekapolis.
Eurekaville (!)
Fighting Cocks.
Good Thunder.
Hell and Nails Crossing.
Hezekiahville.
Hide and Seek.
Jack Pot.
Joker.
Murderville.
Nettle Carrier.
Numaville.
Peddlecake.
Poker Flat.
Pottawattomieville.
Plumpville.
Roaring Fox.
Sharper's Creek.
Skeletonville Agency.
Soaker's Ranche.
Spottedville.
Starvation.
Stuck-up-Canon.
Thief's End.
Tombstone.
Ubet.
Villa Realville.
Yellow Medicine.
Yuba Dam.
&c.

United States (The), 4 July, 1776. At the 'Declaration of Independence' the name of the American Colonies was changed into 'The United States.' At that time eleven of the states signed the declaration, and formed the nucleus of the United States.

The War of Independence did not terminate till 1782.

Unitive Life. Quietism.

Molinos in 1681 published his 'Spiritual Guide,' in which he spoke of bringing the soul to a degree of perfection which he called 'Unitive Life'; and 'Quietism' became the appellation of his mystic doctrine.—PRINCE, Parallel History (vol. ii. p. 290).

Universal Agent (The). That subtle and all-pervading something of which light, heat, electricity, and life are the phenomena and sensible manifestations.

She struggled to take her eyes from his, but I was of no use. The subtle power of the Universal Agent had got hold upon her, and she was riveted to the spot so long as he kept his eyes upon her.—CRAWFORD, Zoroaster, chap. xviii.

Universalists, or 'The Universal Christians,' 3rd cent. Those who believe that Christ died for all, and that no one will ultimately be cast away for ever. He shall see of the travail of his soul and be satisfied. The wicked shall be cast into hell only till they are purified, when (cleansed from sin) they will join the saints in light.

The Philadelphian Universalists are the followers of Mr. James Kelly, who was connected with Mr. Geo. Whitfield. His congregation met in the Philadelphian Chapel, Windmill Street, Finsbury Square, London. There are a goodly number of these Christians at Boston, Philadelphia, and other parts of the U. S. of America.

See 'Paulinists.'

University.

Paris, founded about 1109; its degrees were recognized 1200.

Oxford, founded about 1150; its degrees were recognized 1214.

Cambridge, founded about 1209; its degrees were recognized 1231.

Glasgow, founded about 1450.
Aberdeen " " 1506.
Edinburgh " " 1582.
Dublin " " 1591.
London " " 1828.

University College, 872. The oldest in the University of Oxford, founded by Alfred the Great. Probably the real founder was William of Durham, rector of Wearmouth 1249. The head of the college is called the Master.

University Counsel (The), Cambridge. These officers have no connection whatever with the Council of the University (q.v.). They are counsellors-at-law consulted upon occasions of doubt, and appointed by grace of the Senate.

University Fight (The). In the reign of Elizabeth, when that queen in 1564 visited Cambridge, the public orator declared in his harangue that Cambridge was the older University. Oxford at once took up the cudgel, and when in 1566 the queen visited that university, she was told that Oxford, not Cambridge, was the older foundation.

Caius in 1574 published a goodly quarto in defence of Cambridge. He countenances the preposterous assertion that the first stones of Cambridge University were laid 178 years after the flood!! and gravely tells us that Cambridge derives its name from Cantaber, a royal Spanish emigrant, who in the 4th Christian cent. sent for Greek philosophers from Athens as professors in the Cantaber or Cambridge University. Brian Twyne in 1608 published a similar folio on behalf of Oxford, stating its foundation was laid when Brute came to the island. This 'Trojan' colony laid the university at Cricklade—i.e. Bello Situm—where Oxford now stands. And as for Cambridge, it was a mere offshoot of Oxford in the reign of Henry I.

University Museum (The), 1855, erected for the study of natural science. There are lecture-rooms, work-rooms, and laboratories, a dissecting-room, a library, and a reading-room. The keeper has 80*l.* a year (University of Oxford).

The nearest approximative institution of Cambridge is the museum in the old Botanical Gardens; but there are other museums, as the Woodwardian for geology, another for zoology, others for comparative anatomy, botany, mechanics, optics and astronomy, chemistry, &c. See p. 828, 'Fitzwilliam Museum.'

Unkiar Skelessi (Treaty of), 26 June (July 8), 1833. A secret treaty between Russia and Turkey of alliance, offensive and defensive, for eight years. It provided the establishment of a perpetual peace between Russia and Turkey. Each was to defend the other's territory against all invaders. The treaty was for eight years positive, with the hope of its being perpetual. The alliance was made when Egypt threatened Turkey with war, and Russia feared that Constantinople would fall into the hands of Egypt. This alliance was annulled by the Treaty of London 13 July, 1841.

Unlearned Parliament (The). 'Parliamentum Indoctum,' 1404, from which all lawyers were excluded. So called by Sir E. Coke. See p. 664, 'Parliaments.'

It advised the king to seize the revenues of the church. More than one-third of all the land of England was church property. It also advised the king (Henry IV.) to repeal the statute De Hæretico Comburendo, but he feared the clergy.

Unrighteous Bible (The). Cambridge Press, 1653, contains this query: 'Know ye not that the unrighteous shall inherit the kingdom of God?' See 'Bible' and 'Scriptures.'

Up-Angas (The). Written in Sanskrit by the sage Vyasa, on the subjects of cosmogony, chronology, and geography. Two heroic poems are also included, viz. the Ramayâna and the Mahabhârata. See p. 820, 'Shastras.'

The Purânas, or sacred poems of Up-Angas, tell of virtue, good works, and the soul.

Upa-Vedas (The), delivered by Brahma, treat of medicine, archery, architecture, music, and sixty-four mechanical arts. See p. 820, 'Shastras.'

Upsetters. The college companions of St. Augustine. See his 'Confessions,' iii. 8.

They formed themselves into tumultuous bands
Which wandered through the city streets with noise,
Fright'ning the old, the peaceful, and the weak
And hence, from acts upsetting decency,
Were called 'Upsetters,' nor refused the name.
HENRY WARWICK COLE, Q.C., St. Augustine.

Urbanists and Clem'entines (8 syl.), 1378. The followers of Urban VI., pope of Rome, and Clement VI., pope of Avignon. For fifty-one years there were two simultaneous popes.

Urbanists and Damianists. Nuns of the order of St. Claire. In 1264 Urban IV. mitigated the austerity of the Franciscan rule observed by these nuns. Those who followed the rule thus modified were called Urbanists, but those who continued the more austere rule were called Damianists from St. Pietro Damian, noted for his extreme austerity.

The nuns of St. Claire devote themselves chiefly to the education of the young.

Urbarial Dues. The labour and produce due to the landlord for an Urbarial Tenure (q.v.).

Urbarial Tenure. A free tenure in Hungary according to the provisions of the Urbarium. By this charter a Hungarian peasant was no longer attached to the soil, but could leave his landlord and farm whenever he thought fit. Every peasant had as his own an acre of land, with a house and garden; and also could possess a farm, varying from fourteen to sixty acres, the rent of which was paid by labour and produce. One-ninth of the produce belonged to the landlord, and the labour varied from 18 days to 104 days, according to the size of the holdings.

In 1848 the nobles of Hungary abolished, of their own free will, their right to exact either labour or produce in return for lands held by urbarian tenure. Thus were the peasants invested with the absolute ownership of twenty millions of acres among them.—GODKIN, History of Hungary, p. 319.

Urbarium (The). A code of laws made in the reign of Maria Theresa of Austria, regulating the relations between landlord and tenant. This was an admirable measure, passed in 1764, and remaining in force till 1835. It was called 'the People's Charter.'

Ursulins, 1537. A religious society founded by St. Angela of Brescia, and dedicated to St. Ursula. Their speciality is the gratuitous education of the young. They followed the rule of St. Augustine. Abolished in France in 1790, but subsequently re-established. They have some houses in the U.S.

Uscocchi, or Uskoks. Dalmatian fugitives, swelled by the offscouring of all nations, who infested the Adriatic for about a century as pirates. They consisted of Turks, Austrians, Croats, Dalmatians, Venetians, and English, who lived in Segni; and 'God save you from the Uskoks' was a proverbial expression. By the Treaty of Madrid, 16 Sept., 1617, the extermination of the pirates was an article stipulated by Venice and Austria, and the horde disappeared.

Uskoks, Russian uskakat, fugitives.

Use. Meaning the prayer-book used, or the 'services' of the mediæval church. Several large dioceses had their own prayer-book, which contained services for local saints and holidays, and special modes of singing and saying the service. The preface of our Common Prayer Book tells us 'there [had] been [hitherto] great diversity in singing and saying in churches within this realm, some following Salisbury Use, some Hereford Use, and some the Use of Bangor, some of York, some of Lincoln. Now, from henceforth, all the whole realm shall have but one Use.'

The Sarum or Salisbury Use was compiled by Osmund about 1085, and of this missal there have been several reprints and translations.

The dates and authors of the other five Uses are unknown, but it is generally thought that they were older than the Sarum. There is a MS. of the Hereford Missal in University College, Oxford, of the 14th cent., and it was printed at Rouen in 1502; copies of the printed Missal are preserved in the British Museum and in the Bodleian.

The Bangor Missal was never printed, but from a MS. of the 15th cent. of this book Mr. Maskell printed the Ordinary and Canon in the Ancient Liturgy of the Church of England in 1844.

The York Missal was printed at Rouen in 1509, and a copy of it is preserved in the Bodleian Library. Nothing of the Lincoln Missal remains except a MS. fragment of the 15th cent., preserved in the Bodleian.

Sometimes the term Use was applied to the local usage of a particular parish. Thus there were offices and a mass of St. Wilfrid secundum usum Riponiæ.

In the northern parts was generally observed the Use of the archiepiscopal Church of York, in South Wales the Use of Hereford, in North Wales the Use of Bangor, and in other places the Use of the principal sees, as Lincoln, Sarum, &c.—STEPHENS, On the Common Prayer, p. 121.

See 'Notes and Queries,' 28 June, 1890, pp. 509, 510.

Use of Sarum ('In Usum Sarum'), 1078. A liturgy or service-book drawn up by Osmund bishop of Salisbury, which was generally adopted throughout the entire kingdom. It was in Latin, and based on the Roman Missals.

There were other liturgies besides that of Sarum, as the 'Use of Bangor,' the 'Use of Hereford,' the 'Use of Lincoln,' and the 'Use of York.' These 'Uses' contained eleven different services, as the Missal, Graduale or Grayle, Processionale, Ordinale, Portiforium or Breviary, Legenda, Pica or Pie, Finale, Antiphonarium, Manuale, and Pontificale.

Uses. A legal device to elude the statutes of mortmain. As no lands could be left to religious houses, donors granted their property in trust for the use of a stated religious house. Other property was transferred by a similar fiction during the wars of the Roses. As a use was not a tenure, such property could not be forfeited for treason or any other offence.

Uses (The Statute of), 27 Henry VIII. c. 10. To prevent the ecclesiastical evasion of the statute of mortmain. It laid down the rule that there cannot be 'a use upon a use.' In other words, that a third person cannot be nominally held for a church or other society, so as to enable that church or that society to evade the statute of mortmain.

Useful Knowledge (The Society for the Diffusion of), 1827. Designed to give information on useful subjects generally. Lord Brougham, Professor De Morgan, Sir David Brewster, Professor Lindley, &c., contributed to the series of books issued by the Society.

Useless Parliament (The). Convened 18 June, 1625, by Charles I., adjourned to Oxford 1 Aug., and dissolved 12 Aug., having done nothing but offend the king. See p. 664, 'Parliaments.'

Utah Mormons (The). The Polygamist Mormons. Sometimes called Brighamites, from Brigham Young, who practised polygamy. Utah was first occupied by the Mormons in 1847.

Polygamy was declared unlawful in 1870 by the 'Mormon Disabilities Bill,' and in 1890 was abandoned by the Mormons.

Utas of Easter (The). Utas are the octaves of a festival. Old French, oitauves, octaves.

Utilitarian School (The). 'To be as useful as possible,' 'to give the least possible pain to others,' and 'to give the greatest possible happiness to the greatest number.' A system of ethics founded by Jeremy Bentham (1747–8—1832).

On his death-bed he gave his body to his physician, Dr. Southwood Smith, for dissection, that he might do the most useful thing possible with it. He forbade calling his friends to his bedside, that he might give them the least possible pain. The two were in accordance with his principle of maxima felicitas.

 His body was, however, embalmed, and is now kept in University College, London.

U'traquists. A sect of the Hussites, also called Calix'tines (3 syl.). Called Calixtines from calix (a cup), because they insisted on the cup being given to communicants; and called Utraquists from utraque (both kinds), because they insisted that both bread and wine should be administered in the eucharistic sacrament.

Utrecht (The Treaty of), 1713, between France and the following allies, viz. Great Britain, Savoy, Portugal, Prussia, and the states of Holland, signed 11 April. Spain, which, of course, was allied with France, did not sign till 18 Sept. Peace was concluded after a war of eleven years, noted for the brilliant victories of the Duke of Marlborough and the Prince Eugene. The treaty of Utrecht is generally considered most dishonourable to England, as it ignored all Marlborough fought for. Philip still remained king of Spain, and the interests of the allies were almost entirely ignored. Bolingbroke, Oxford, and Ormonde, parties to this treaty, were (1715) charged by the House of Commons with high treason. Bolingbroke and Ormonde fled, but Oxford was brought to trial and acquitted.

However, it confirmed to England the island of Newfoundland and Nova Scotia, with the possession of Gibraltar and Minorca, St. Kitts, and Hudson's Bay.

In 1708 Newfoundland was attacked and partly conquered by the French.

Nova Scotia was given to France by the treaty of St. Germain in 1632, was reconquered by the British in 1654, and again ceded to France by the treaty of Breda in 1667, was again taken by Britain 1711, and confirmed to the British crown in 1713.

These were but small concessions, it is true, but they tended to confirm the peace between France and England.

V. C. The cryptogram used in Ireland to designate the 'United Brethren.' It consists simply of shifting the initials one letter forwards. V comes next to U, and C comes next to B. The 'Clanna-Gael' (q.v.) was a secret organisation known as 'V. C.' See p. 455, 'Irish Associations.'

V and S (branding with). V = vagrant, S = slave.

A runaway, or anyone who lives idly for three days, shall be brought before two justices of the peace, and marked V with a hot iron on his breast, and shall be adjudged the slave of him who brought him for two years. . . . If within that space he absents himself fourteen days, he shall be marked on the forehead or cheek by a hot iron with an S, and be his master's slave for ever. (Edward VI.)

Vacca (Tower of the), in the Palazzo Pubblico or Della Signoria of Florence. The great bell-tower or campanile in the middle of the edifice. Arnolfo designed and began it, but it was completed by altri maestri. Why called the Cow Tower is not known, but the 'lowing' of the bell is a part of the city wit.

Vakeel. A Persian satrap, or prince of a small state. In India an envoy or inferior ambassador is called a Vakeel.

Aga Mohammed was soon set aside by Lutf Ali Khan of the Zend tribe, and a relative of the late Vakeel, 1789.—PRINCE, Parallel History, vol. iii. p. 182.

Valdenses. Separatists from the Catholic Church in the 11th cent. Probably vallenses from the Latin vallis, a valley. Hence commonly called the 'Church of the Valleys,' the chief being the valleys of Piedmont and Embrun. Other valleys where they abounded were the 'Valley of San Martino,' the 'Valley of Perosa,' the 'Vale of Pragela,' the 'Valley of Lucerna,' the High Valley of the Durance and the adjacent glens, and many others. The followers of Peter Valdo were 'The Poor Men of Lyons.'

Ebernard de Bethune says: 'They call themselves Vallenses because they live in a Vale of Tears.'—Maxima Biblioth. P. P. vol. xxiv.

Valentia. One of the five provinces into which Britain was divided in the reign of the Emperor Sevērus. It included the land from the Wall of Severus to the Forth and Clyde. It had its own ruler, but that ruler was subject to the præfect or governor-general of the island.

Valentin'ians (The), 2nd cent. Followers of Valentīnus, an Egyptian, a Platonist, who taught that Depth is the first principle, and the trinity of Depth, Thought, and Silence existed from all eternity. From this triune sprang Wisdom and Truth. Thought and Silence, Wisdom and Truth, Valentinus called the first quaternity of eons, the source of all the rest. The second quaternity was the offspring of Wisdom, viz. the Word (or Logos) and Life, Man and the Church. Logos and Life produced five couples of eons, Man and the Church formed six couples, and the thirty eons compose the Plerōma of deity. Wisdom wanting to pry into depth (or Bythos) gave herself much trouble, and from this sprang matter. Horos restored Wisdom to the Pleroma, and then she brought forth Christ and the Holy Ghost. Irenæus, Justin the Martyr, Tertullian, and others were avowed opponents of the mixture of Christianity and Platonism.

Eon, in Platonic philosophy, means a divine attribute existing without beginning or end. In Gnostic theology it means an emanation from deity anterior to time. The Son is an eon of the Father, the Holy Ghost is an eon from the Father and Son. The word is also used to signify a period of time of immeasurable duration.

Vale'sians, A.D. 198. Heretics, so called from Valesius, an Arabian. They admitted only eunuchs into their society, insisting that this crucifixion of the flesh is essential to salvation.

Valley of Death (The). Balaklava, famous for the charge of Lord Cardigan's Light Brigade, consisting of 607 sabres, which advanced right into the Russian centre with the view of taking thirty Russian guns directed against them. When Lord Raglan perceived the mistake, he ordered a retreat to be sounded. 25 Oct., 1854.

Certainly a worse choice than Lord Raglan as leader of a great war could hardly have been made. He had neither the energy, the dash, nor the lightning speed of a military hero.

Valley of Heroes (The). So the Persians call the Plain of Oujan, the famous royal hunting-ground.

Valley of Waters (The). The Mediterranean Sea.

The Valley of Waters, widest next to that
Which doth the earth engarland, shapes its course
Between discordant shores (Europe and Africa).
DANTE, Paradise, ix.

Valley of the Shadow of Death (The). The Koord Cabul Pass, where in 1839 the Afghans annihilated the British army. See p. 485, 'Khyber Pass,' and p. 18, 'Afghan War.'

Valois Branch (The). The younger branch of the Capētian race of French kings (1328–1498). In 1498 came a branch of the Valois called the Orleans-Orleans, and in 1515 a branch called the Orleans-Angoulême. Called Valois from Philippe VI. de Valois (1328–1350).

Valois-Angoulême Branch of the Capētian dynasty gave to France five kings: François I., Henri II., François II., Charles IX., and Henri III. (1515–1589).

Valois-Orleans Branch of the Capētian dynasty gave to France one king, Louis XII., le père du peuple (1462, 1498–1515).

Valor Ben'eficio'rum, 1512. Drawn up by the clergy in council at Edinburgh, and known by the title of 'Bagimont's' or 'Bajimont's Roll.' See p. 66.

Vandyck (The Caledonian). George Jameson (1586–1644).

Vandyck (The English). William Dobson, painter (1610–1647).

Vandyck of France (The). Hyacinthe Rigaud (1659–1743), the founder of the Pre-Raphaelites.

Vandyck of Sculpture (The). Antoine Coysevox (1640–1720).

Va'nists. Followers of the religious opinions of Sir Harry Vane (1612–1662), which were almost identical with Antinomianism. He detested episcopacy, and though he promoted the Solemn League and Covenant, he abhorred both it and the presbytery. Vane was a fifth-monarchy man, and a great believer in 'unknown tongues,' so that his prayers were utterly unintelligible. He wrote several theological treatises, but all mark him out as a wild visionary.

Varan'gians. All Northmen were so denominated by the Greeks; but, strictly speaking, the Varangians were the Norse bodyguard of their emperors.

Varēla (Peace of), 8 Aug., 1790, between Sweden and Russia.

Vasa (Order of), 1772. A Swedish order instituted by Gustavus III. in honour of Gustavus Vasa, founder of the dynasty.

Vassy (Massacre of), 1 March, 1652. Some 1,200 reformers had assembled in a barn on Sunday morning, when François duc de Guise with sixty horsemen and bowmen rode by, and all began to insult the worshippers by calling them 'rebels! dogs! heretics!' &c. Some of the reformers shut the doors, when the duke shouted 'Mort-dieu! slay the vermin!' A scuffle ensued, in which a stone struck the duke on the cheek. His horsemen now fell foul cutting and slashing. Sixty were slain and above 200 wounded. When called upon to answer for this unprovoked attack, the duke declared that the reformers were the aggressors, and that he only acted in self-defence. He died the following year, and the matter ended for a time, but it led to the long 'Religious Wars of France.'

A Bible was shown to the duke, and he handed it to his brother the cardinal, who said, 'There is no harm in this book. It is the Holy Scriptures.' 'How! (cried the duke) sang-dieu! Call you that the Holy Scriptures? Why, they were written more than 1,500 years ago, and this was written last year, as you may see by the date.'

Vatican (The). 'Vaticānus Mons' is a hill at Rome; but is now chiefly noted for its magnificent palace of the popes, with its superb gardens, its museums, celebrated library, and basilica of St. Peter. The palace was constructed in 498, but has been often enlarged, especially by the popes Nicolas V., Paul II. and III., Sixtus IV., Leo X., Sixtus V., Benedict XIV., Clement XIV., Pius VI., &c.

In the Vatican are the celebrated Sixtine Chapel, the Pauline Chapel, and the Raphael room.

Vatican (Council of the), 1870, to render the dogma of the Immaculate Conception an article of faith.

Of course the New Testament does not give the remotest hint of such a dogma, nor does it remove the difficulty of 'bringing a clean thing out of an unclean,' or, in other words, the entail of sin. It merely removes it one stage further back, and helps to destroy the proper manhood of Christ. The dogma is a grand theological mistake.

Vatican MS. (The) of the Bible. See p. 184, 'Codex Vaticanus.'

Vauban de la Marine (Le). Baron Sané, the shipbuilder, born at Brest (1740–1832).

Vaudois (The) must not be confounded with the followers of Peter Waldo, or 'Poor Men of Lyons,' who were a revival of the Paulicians; but the Vaudois, mentioned by Jerome, were Valentinians, and were confined to the Cottian Alps.

Ved-Angas (The), revealed by Hindû inspired saints, are devoted to astronomy, grammar, prosody, pronunciation, charms, incantations, religious rites, and religious ceremonies. Written in Sanskrit. See 'Shastras.'

Vedas. The sacred books of the Hindûs written in Sanskrit. They are four in number: (1) The Rig, containing hymns, and in verse; (2) The Yadjour, prayers in prose; (3) The Sama, designed to be chanted; and (4) The Atharvan, containing formulas for consecration, expiation, and imprecation. Said to have been written in the 15th cent. B.C.

Of the commentaries the most celebrated are the Purânas and the Sutras. See these words.

Veduto. See p. 286, 'Eighty' (The).

Vehmgerichte (The), 'The Holy Vehm.' A secret tribunal of Germany, death being the penalty of a betrayal thereof.

It had its origin in Westphalia in the 13th cent. The members consisted of the initiated and the ignorants, but every member must be free born and in lawful wedlock. There were secret signs of recognition. The names and charges of persons brought before the tribunal were entered in the 'Blood Book' together with the sentence of the tribunal. There were three modes of proceeding—the summary, the secret, and the open. Death was by hanging on the nearest tree, but a knife stuck in the tree announced to the world that the victim was not hanged by highwaymen. Towards the close of the 16th cent. the Vehmgerichte dwindled and died. See p. 748, 'Red Land.'

See Walter Scott's 'Anne of Geierstein' and Reynolds's 'Bronze Statue.'

Vella (Giuseppe), an abbot and literary impostor (1751–1814). He confessed his frauds and was sentenced to fifteen years' imprisonment. His books are 'Codex Diplomaticus Siciliæ,' 1791, and 'Libro del Consiglio di Egitto,' 1798. See p. 524, 'Literary Forgeries,' &c.

Velvet. The little gentleman in velvet, the mole. The Jacobites used to drink to the 'little gentleman in velvet,' meaning the mole which threw up the mound against which Sorel (King William III.'s horse) stumbled, whereby, being thrown to the ground, he broke his collar-bone, which caused his death.

Velvet Book (The). The Russian peerage and official lists.

Velveteen Plot (The), 1842. A trick played upon Sir Robert Peel by a Lancashire manufacturer in order to forward the anti-corn law interests. It was the present of a piece of cotton velvet so dressed as to look like silk velvet, and ostensibly made in New York. Sir Robert thanked the donor, and said that Lady Peel would have part made into a cloak and he himself would have the rest made up for his own use. After a more careful inspection Sir Robert found that the design consisted of wheat-ears about a scroll on which was inscribed the word FREE. So he returned the present, stating that he was unaware of its political symbolism.

Vendéan Massacres (The), or Vendéan war, May 1793 to 19 Feb., 1795. That is the resistance of the Vendéans to the republican Jacobins. Prudhomme says the slaughter of the Vendéans in this contest was 337,000, distributed thus:—

Women killed in La Vendée 15,000; children killed 22,000; men killed 300,000.

Vendéan Wars (The), 1793–1800. Divers wars between royalists of the west of France and the republicans. The insurgents were the nobles, priests, and peasantry combined. The first encounter was in March 1793 in the Bocage Lazarus Hoche brought the contest to an end in 1796, and was called the Pacificateur de la Vendée. In 1799 the Vendéans again took up arms. Brune brought this insurrection to an end in the early part of 1800. In 1815, during the Hundred Days (q.v.), the Vendéans would have taken up arms if General Lamarque had not interfered to prevent it. In 1832 insurrections were again planned, but came to nothing. Prudhomme estimates the death of the Vendéans in their resistance to the republican Jacobins at 337,000, of which 37,000 were women and children. See 'Chouans.'

Vendémiaire (Days 12, 13), Year IV. That is 3, 4 Oct., 1795; the days when the troops under Barras and General Bonaparte triumphed over the insurgents against the Convention. The combat before the church of St. Roch was most murderous.

Vendetta. The blood-feud, or duty of the nearest akin of a murdered man to slay the murderer. The custom prevails in Corsica, Sicily, Sardinia, Calabria, among the Montenegrins and Albanians, the Druses, Circassians, Arabs, natives of Australia, and in central Asia. In the play of 'Romeo and Juliet' the two houses of Montague and Capulet 'suffered the vendetta.' Moses appointed cities of refuge to break down the vengeance of the vendetta.

The vendetta is called by the Bedouins Tar = re talliation. It existed in ancient times among the Greeks. In the summer of 1889 in Corsica both the slayer and the avenger in a blood-feud were slain in a duel fight with each other.

Vendetta Transversale, a cross blood-feud. That is, each set of two relatives has a murder to avenge, A has a blood-feud with B, but B has a blood-feud with A.

Vendidad Sadê. A sacred book of the Parsees attributed to Zoroaster. It forms part of the Zend-Avesta, and is in the form of a dialogue between Ormuzd and Zoroaster.

Venerable (The) Bede, the author of an 'Ecclesiastical History.' A native of Wearmouth. He died 735, aged 62.

Ven'eta Factio. The Blue Coats. A faction in Byzantium, so called because their livery was Venice blue. The Veneti were simply charioteers in the circus dressed in blue, but the blue coats ultimately formed into a political party of royalists, opposed to the Prasina Factio (q.v.), which were opposed to Justinian, and tried to assassinate him. See 'Blues and Greens.'

Venëti is Latin for Venetians, Venice is 'Venetiæ,' and Venetus, the adjective, means 'of Venice,' or 'Venice Blue,' the livery of the common soldiers and seamen of Rome.

Vengeance de Jeanne de Castille (La), a box on the ears. Jeanne de Castille out of jealousy boxed the ears of a maid of honour she had brought from Portugal, and who developed into a rival.

Vengeance for the Lamb torn by the Wolf. The war-cry and motto of Capobianco, the leader of the Carbonari.

Vengeur (Le), 1 June, 1794. A French man-of-war immortalised by a romantic fiction. It was one of the fleet engaged against the English fleet under Lord Howe. The English gained a signal victory, but Jean Bon St.-André, the Jacobin commissioner on board the 'Vengeur,' announced to the Convention that the French had won a most splendid victory, and the 'Vengeur' went down all the men shouting 'Vive la République! Vive la France!' and continued these cries even at the bottom of the ocean. Barère added to the fiction that the 'Vengeur' was not sunk by the English, but was engulfed by the waves. Chénier the revolutionary poet wrote a panegyric on the 'Vengeur,' containing these lines:—

Les voix des braves expirans
Qui chantent au fond des abimes!

The sinking of 'Le Vengeur' described by Barère, and Napoleon crossing the Alps, a painting by David, are what Carlyle would call 'masterpieces of blague.' Napoleon, who really crossed the mountains on a plodding mule, and buttoned to the chin in a grey greatcoat, is represented in full military costume spurring a prancing charger, and pointing with his right hand towards Italy. But strangely the wind blows the tail and mane of the charger one way, and the military cloak of the rider in an opposite direction.

The 'Vengeur' was one of the ships of the French Convention, which encountered Howe in the Brest waters. Six of the French fleet had been taken, and the battle was lost. The 'Vengeur,' disabled, sank with all its crew, to the number of 200. The men were picked up by British boats, and saved from a watery grave, for which they were very grateful. This is how Barère describes the incident (the translation is by Carlyle, who spells the name Barrère):—

Twelve hours of raging cannonade; sun now sinking westward through the battle-smoke. Six French ships taken; the battle lost; what ship soever can still sail, making off! But how is it with 'Le Vengeur'? she neither strikes [sail] nor makes off? She is lamed; she cannot make off, [and] strike she will not. Fire rakes her fore and aft from victorious enemies: the 'Vengeur' is sinking. Strong are ye, tyrants of the sea; yet we also, are we weak? Lo! all flags, streamers, jacks, every rag of tricolour that will yet run on rope, fly rustling aloft. The whole crew crowd to the upper deck, and with universal, soul-maddening yell, shouts 'Vive la République!' Sinking, sinking. She staggers, she lurches, her last drunk whirl. Ocean yawns abysmal. Down rushes 'Le Vengeur,' carrying 'Vive la Républiques' along with her, unconquerable, into eternity. (He gives as authority Barrère, 'Choix des Rapports,' xiv., 416-421, and refers to Lord Howe's report for the simple truth, 'Annual Register,' 1794, p. 86). See p. 368, 'Glorious First of June,' and 'Fire First.'

Veni, Vidi, Vici, B.C. 47. Cæsar's despatch to the Roman senate when he vanquished Pharnăcês, king of the Cimmerian Bosphorus in the battle of Zela.

Karl V. imitated this despatch when he announced his victory at Mühlberg, in April 1547. 'I came, I saw, God conquered.'

Venice of the East. Bangkok, capital of Siam.

Venice of the North (The). I. Amsterdam, built on 95 small islands, and its canals are crossed by 290 bridges. II. Stockholm, capital of Sweden.

Venice of the West. Glasgow.

Another element in the blazon of the Venice of the West is the fish laid across the stem of the tree.—BURTON.

Venice Sketch-Book (The), or 'Raphael's Sketch Book,' preserved in the Accademia delle Belle Arti, in Venice. Long considered to be a collection of sketches by Raphael, but proved by Morelli to be sketches by Pintoricchio, the Umbrian artist, and executed before Raphael was born.

Ver Sacrum. When the whole produce of a spring-time was devoted to the gods. This was done by the Sabellians in times of famine and public calamities. Even the children born during the ver sacrum were devoted to Mamers, the war god, and had to leave the city of their birth.

Verbena'lia. Annual rites held by the Romans when the altars were decorated with verbena or vervain, called the herba sacra.

Verdun (Treaty of), A.D. 843, by which the empire of Charlemagne was divided into three parts. Lothaire I., as emperor, received Italy and Lorraine; Charles the Bald received France; and Louis or Ludwig received Germany. So that by this treaty Germany was created into a separate kingdom.

Vergobret [Vergob'retus]. A temporary king chosen by the Druids in times of danger. Like the Roman dictator a vergobret laid down his office when the war was ended.

Vergognosi (I). 'The Shamefaced,' or begging nobles of Venice, 16th cent. Many of the nobles of Venice from the 16th cent. were so utterly penniless that 'begging licences' were granted them. These begging nobles assumed a particular dress, viz. an old black linen frock falling to the feet. The head was covered with a hood, and a thick veil fell over the face with two eye-holes. They carried in their hands a little conical box made of paper, for alms. See p. 84, 'Begging Licences.'

Veriss'imus. So the Emperor Hadrian used to call Marcus Aurelius [Antoninus], a pun on the name of his adopted son, Lucius Verus. Lucius the son was Verus; Marcus the father was Verissimus (the philosopher).

Vermilion Pencil. The pencil used by the Chinese in royal edicts and despatches.

On the 25th day of the 1st moon [16 Feb.], and 21st year of Tao-Kwang [1841], the following despatch, written with the vermilion pencil, was received in reply [to Commissioner Keshen's despatch].—First Chinese War.

Vermilion Towers. To the right of the Alhambra in Granada. So called from their very ruddy hue. Built by Mohammed II., who reigned 1273–1302.

Vermont (U.S. America), means 'Green Mountains.' So called in 1777 from a range of mountains which traverses the state (French Verd-mont). The inhabitants are called Green-mountain Boys.

Verner's Law. The law of the interchanges of s and r in the Teutonic languages.

Vernier. A sliding scale by which linear and angular magnitude may be read off with much greater accuracy than by mechanical division and subdivision.

A B is part of a scale; a b is the vernier made to slide along the edge of the scale, Ten divisions of the vernier = eleven of the scale. Invented by Pierre Vernier, a Burgundian, who died 1637, aged 59.

Verona (Congress of), from 25 Aug. to 15 Dec., 1822. It was a congress of European sovereigns.

Versailles (Congress of), opened 8 Dec., 1784. Between France and the States-General of Holland.

Versailles (Treaties of).

1. 9 March, 1701, between the elector of Bavaria and Louis XIV.
2. 5 April, 1715, between Louis XIV. and Charles XII. of Sweden.
3. 5 June, 1744, between Louis XV. and Frederick II. the Great of Prussia.
4. 1 May, 1756, of alliance, between France and Austria.
5. 30 Dec., 1758, of alliance, between France and Austria.
6. 16 July, 1782, between France and America.
7. 3 Sept., 1783, of peace, between Great Britain and the United States of America, admitting the Independence of the United States.
8. 26 Feb., 1871, of peace, between France and Prussia, after the Franco-German War.

Versailles (The German). Cassel is so called from its gardens, conservatories, fountains, and colossal statue of Herculês.

Versailles of Poland (The). The palace and grounds of the counts of Braniski, which now belong to the municipality of Bialystok.

Versailles of Prussia (The). Potsdam.

Vervins (Peace of), 2 May, 1598, between Henri IV. of France and Felipe II. of Spain.

Vespers. One of the eight daily services of the Catholic Church, and one of the four greater ones. At eventide or sunset. See p. 140, 'Canonical Hours.'

Veto (Monsieur). Louis XVI., so called in mockery by the revolutionists, because at one time he had the power of annulling by a simple veto the decrees of the National Assembly. His queen, Marie Antoinette, was nicknamed Madame Veto (q.v. p. 548).

Veto Law (The) or 'Veto Act,' 1834, in Scotland. The General Assembly gave it out as a fundamental principle of the Scotch Church that no minister shall be placed in any parish against the will of the congregation—i.e. against the consent of the majority of the male communicants. This law was based on the practice of the 'minister's call,' or invitation of the people to become their pastor.

Viasma (Peace of), 1634, between Russia and Poland, in which Russia, on one part, renounced all pretensions to Livonia, Esthonia, and Courland; and Vladislas of Poland, on the other part, abandoned his rights to the throne of Poland, and recognised the dynasty of Romanov.

Vicar of Bray. 'Let whoever will be king, I will be Vicar of Bray.' Several vicars have held their livings through shifting creeds. Some say the vicar referred to was Simon Alleyn; others tell us it was Pendleton. Ray says Simon Symonds lived under the Protectorate, Charles II., James II., and William III., and that he was at one time Independent, then Anglican, then Papist, then moderate Churchman. The vicar referred to in the song lived in the reigns of Charles II., James II., William III., Anne, and George I.

Vicars Apostolic (of England). Catholic dignitaries appointed by the Pope over the 'Vicariates' (q.v.).

Vicar'iates (4 syl.). Divisions of England into Catholic governments, presided over by 'Vicars Apostolic.' From the revolution of 1688 up to 1840 there were four vicariates; but Gregory XVI. doubled the number. They were the London, the Western, the Eastern, the Central, the Welsh, the Lancastrian, the York, and the Northern districts. In 1850 Pius IX. re-established in England the regular episcopal system of the Church of Rome; and since then the converts from the Anglican to the Roman rite have been very numerous indeed, especially in the upper classes of society. It looks very much as if Catholicism was about to become dominant in England again.

What else can be expected with the wretched organisation of the Anglican Church? No authority to appeal to, powerless bishops, curates without any certain promotion, vicars taxed far higher than the squirarchy, and their widows virtually turned out of house and home the moment their husbands cease to breathe. It is a most pitiful system, hardly possible to be worse.

Vice-Chancellor (The). In our universities. The deputy of the chancellor, by whom, in Oxford, he is chosen annually from the heads of the colleges; but in Cambridge he is chosen annually by the Senate from two heads of colleges nominated by the council. In 1855 the stipend of the vice-chancellor, at Oxford, was fixed at 600*l.* a year from the university chest. At Oxford it has been usual of late to hold the office for four years, and the first vice-chancellor was William Farrendon (1400–1403). In Cambridge the office is an annual one.

In Cambridge the vice-chancellor is elected Nov. 1 or 8, and enters on his functions Jan. 10 or 11.

Victims of the Unstamped (The). Persons imprisoned or heavily fined for publishing unstamped newspapers. The duty was 4*d.* on each paper, and the Government stamp was in red, at one corner of each sheet. Stamp abolished 1855.

The prisons of London and the provincial towns of Manchester, Liverpool, Leeds, Hull, Birmingham, Bristol, Edinburgh, and Glasgow were seldom untenanted by some of the persons popularly called the 'Victims of the Unstamped.' Large numbers of women and very young persons were put in prison for selling by retail papers without a stamp.—HOWITT, History of England, year 1841, p. 518.

Victor (Canons Regular of St.), 1113. Established in Paris by Guillaume de Champeaux. See 'Victorins.'

Victor of a Hundred Battles (The). Napoleon the Great (born 1768, emperor 1804–1815, died 1821).

Victoria. Queen of Great Britain and Ireland, and Empress of India. The 5th sovereign of the house of Hanover. Born 24 May, 1819, began to reign 20 June, 1837. Proclaimed Empress of India 1 January, 1877.

Father: Edward duke of Kent, 4th son of George III.; Mother: Louisa Victoria of Saxe-Coburg; Consort: Albert of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha; Children: 1. Victoria, the princess royal (who married Frederick William, crown prince of Prussia); 2. Albert Edward, prince of Wales (who married Alexandra of Denmark); 3. Alice Maud (who married Louis of Hesse-Darmstadt), she died 1878; 4. Alfred duke of Edinburgh (who married Marie-Alexandrovna of Russia); 5. Helĕna (who married Christian of Schleswig-Holstein); 6. Louise (who married the Marquis of Lorne); 7. Arthur duke of Connaught (who married Louise Margaret, daughter of Prince Frederick Charles of Prussia); 8. Leopold duke of Albany (who married Helen, daughter of the Prince of Waldeck), died 1884; 9. Beatrice (who married Henry Maurice of Battenberg).

Style: Victoria, by the Grace of God, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, Queen, Defender of the Faith, Empress of India (Kaisar-i-Hind). Or Victoria, Dei Gratia, Britanniarum Regina, Fid. Def. (Empress of India is added only to documents which extend to India.)

 The Queen Victoria is lineally descended from Egbert. Omitting the Normans, we come to Henry II., whose mother was Maud wife of Geoffrey Plantagenet. Maud's mother was Matilda wife of Henry I. of England. Matilda's mother was Margaret wife of Malcolm III. of Scotland. Margaret's father was Prince Edward, son of Edmund. King Edmund was son of Ethelred, Ethelred of Edgar, Edgar of Edmund, Edmund of Edward the Elder, Edward the Elder of Alfred, Alfred of Ethelwolf, and Ethelwolf of EGBERT.

From Henry II. the Plantagenets continued to the Tudors. Henry VII. descended from John of Gaunt, 4th son of Edward III., and he married Elizabeth of York, daughter of Edward IV. Henry VII.'s daughter Margaret married James IV. of Scotland, and their son was James V. of Scotland. The daughter of James V. was Mary Queen of Scots, whose son was James I. of England. Elizabeth, daughter of James I., married Frederick king of Bohemia, whose daughter Sophia was the wife of Ernest Augustus duke of Brunswick. And their son was George I.

Victoria and Albert (Royal Order of). Instituted 1862. In 1878 was instituted 'The Imperial Order of the Crown of India.'

Victoria Cross (The), 19 Jan., 1856. A Maltese cross of bronze, with the inscription FOR VALOUR. It is given to any person who has performed an act of distinguished courage, such as rescuing from fire or water, acts of great bravery in battle, and so on. V.C.

Victorieux (Le). Charles VII. of France (1403, 1422–1461). So called because in his reign the English lost all their possessions in France except Calais. He won the battle of Gravelle in 1423, and of Montarges in 1427, and, by the aid of Joan of Arc raised the siege of Orleans in 1429; he took Metz, conquered the English at Formigni, got possession of Normandy and Guienne, and in 1451 drove the English out of France, leaving only Calais in their power.

Victorins (The), or 'Canons of St. Victor,' 1113, Paris; especially those of them who accepted and extended the mystical views of Hugo of St. Victor. St. Victor contended that the objects of religious contemplation are partly above reason and partly contrary to reason (e.g. the dogma of the Trinity). The Victorins were opposed to dialectical theology.

Victory of Victories (The). So the great battle of Nehavend (A.D. 637) is called by the Arabs. In this battle Yzdegerd III. king of Persia was defeated and afterwards murdered by the Saracens.

Vienna Conference (The). I. 6 Jan.–21 April, 1853. Between

Great Britain, France, Austria, and Prussia, on a device of Count Buol, chief minister of Austria, to prevent war with Russia. Great Britain and France could not agree to Count Buol's plan, and the conference fell through. See 'Vienna Note.'

II. in 1855. Between Austria, Great Britain, France, and Russia, for the purpose of bringing to an end the Crimēan war. It came to nothing.

Vienna (Congress of), from 1 Oct., 1814, to March, 1815, of the allied princes, to distribute the spoils of the French empire, after the banishment of Napoleon I. to Elba. It was found impossible to satisfy the greed of the different powers, and probably war would have broken out between the allies had they not been startled by the alarming news that Napoleon had escaped from Elba and was gathering around him the best strength of France (7 March, 1815).

In this congress England was represented by Lord Castlereagh, Russia by Czar Alexander, Austria by Prince Metternich, Prussia by Baron Hardenberg, and France by Prince Talleyrand.

It was arranged to give to England the Cape of Good Hope, the Mauritius, Malta, and Corfu; to Russia was assigned Finland and Poland; to Austria was assigned Lombardy and the Venetian States; to Prussia was allotted Saxony, Franconia, and Swedish Pomerania; to the Archduke Ferdinand was allotted Tuscany; to the King of Sardinia was allotted Genoa; to Marie Louise, wife of Napoleon, was assigned Parma and Piacentia; to Sweden was assigned Norway; and to Ferdinand IV. of the Bourbon line was allotted the Two Sicilies.

Vienna (Treaties of). The treaties of Vienna are numerous. The three subjoined are the most important:—

I. 18 Nov., 1738, which gave Lorraine to France after the death of Stanislaus, Tuscany to Francis husband of Maria Theresa, and Naples to Don Carlos. It concluded the War of the Polish Succession (q.v.).

II. 14 Oct., 1809, which put an end to the war carried on by the fifth coalition against Napoleon I. By this treaty the emperor of Germany ceded the Tyrol and Dalmatia to France, and agreed to adopt the 'Continental System,' i.e. to hold no commercial intercourse with Great Britain.

III. 9 June, 1815, in which the boundaries of France were defined by the allied powers of Europe.

The other treaties of Vienna were:—

27 May, 1657. An alliance between the kaiser, Poland, and Denmark, against Sweden.

16 March, 1731. An alliance between the kaiser, Great Britain, and Holland, to guarantee the Pragmatic Sanction.

3 Oct., 1735. To agree upon preliminaries of peace between France and Germany.

20 June, 1800. To agree upon subsidies between Austria and Great Britain.

23 March, 1815. Between Great Britain, Austria, Russia, and Prussia, confirming the Treaty of Chaumont and effecting the union of Holland and Belgium.

31 May, 1815. Between the king of the Netherlands, Great Britain, Austria, Russia, and Prussia, agreeing to the enlargement of Dutch territories, and vesting the sovereignty of the Netherlands in the House of Orange.

4 June, 1815. Between Denmark and Prussia, for the cession of Swedish Pomerania and Rügen to Prussia in exchange for Lauenburg.

2 Dec., 1854. A treaty of alliance between Great Britain, France, and Austria.

30 Nov., 1864. Between Denmark, Prussia, and Austria, for the cession of the duchies of Schleswig-Holstein to the allies.

11 Oct., 1866. A treaty of peace between Austria and Prussia.

Vienna Note (The), 1853. A scheme of Count Buol to prevent war with Russia. It proposed a compromise between the czar and the sultan. Russia claimed a protectorate over the Christian subjects of Turkey. This, of course, the sultan could not and would not concede. Count Buol suggested that the Christian subjects should have protection not only as Ottoman subjects, but over and above that as Christians.

The Vienna Note was as huge a diplomatic blunder as could possibly have been devised. 'Such a concession [wrote Lord Stratford 20 Aug.] would leave Russia nothing to desire as to the means of exercising a powerful influence on all the concerns of the Greek clergy, and of interfering on behalf of the Greek laity, subjects of the Porte.'—HOWITT, Hist. of Eng. (year 1853, p. 153).

Vigilance Society (The), 1885. A secret Irish society, similar to the Moonlighters, Fenians, &c., for the murder, mutilation, and destruction of the property of those who refused to obey the league. See p. 455, 'Irish Associations.'

Vigilants (The). Irish rebels similar to the Invincibles. See p. 455, 'Irish Invincibles.'

Vigin'ti-virat of Rome. The office of the Vigin'tivirs or Committee of Twenty. They had charge of the public ways, the minting of money, and the prisons. It was a most honourable office.

Villafranca, in Italy (Treaty of), 11 July, 1859. Between Francis Joseph emperor of Austria and Napoleon III. emperor of the French, for the creation of the Italian Confederation and the cession of Lombardy. Austria ceded Lombardy to France, and France gave it to Sardinia. Lombardy and Sardinia soon afterwards formed parts of the kingdom of Italy (14 March, 1861).

Villeins in Gross. Villeins were farm labourers and domestic servants, not exactly slaves nor yet exactly freemen, but something between the two. 'Villeins in Gross' were, for the most part, domestic servants, who moved from place to place with their master and his family. See 'Villeins Regardant.'

Villeins Regardant. Farm labourers who could not be shifted from place to place, but had a fixed habitation. If a master died or his tenement changed hands from any other cause the villeins remained, like other fixtures, with the new lord.

'Villeins in Gross' were those attached to the person of the lord, and, like personal property, might be sold or otherwise transferred. 'Villeins Regardant' were attached to the land, and were fixtures.

Vinegar Bible (The), 1617, Clarendon Press. In this Bible the 'Parable of the Vineyard' was printed the 'Parable of the Vinegar.' See p. 90, 'Bibles.'

Vinegar Hill. An eminence near the town of Enniscorthy in Ireland, famous for being a station of the rebels called 'White Boys' and 'Peep o' Day Boys,' &c. Here was fought what is called the 'Battle of Vinegar Hill' in 1798.

Vinerian Professorship (The) of English law, in the University of Oxford, 1758. Founded by Charles Viner. The professor is called the 'Vinerian Reader.'

Vinerian Scholarships. Three for law. Of the value of 80*l.* a year for three years. Founded in the University of Oxford by Charles Viner in 1755.

Vinzaglio (Battle of), 30 May, 1859, in which the allied army led by Victor Emmanuel and Napoleon III. defeated 200,000 Austrians. The honour of this day was due to General Cialdini.

Violets, worn by partisans of the French empire in compliment to Napoleon I. He was called 'Father Violet,' because he said, when leaving France for Elba, 'I will return with the violets.' Those partisans who were in the secret of his return wore a violet on their breasts, and always toasted Napoleon as 'Caporal la Violette.' Prints containing profiles of Napoleon and Maria Louisa in two violets were common in 1814, and beneath was written 'En printemps il reviendra.' In 1815 a popular song refers to Napoleon as 'Le père de la Violette.'

Farewell to thee, France; but when liberty rallies
Once more in thy regions, remember me then—
The violet still grows in the depth of thy valleys,
Though withered, thy tear will unfold it again.
BYRON.

Violets (The Day of the), 1 March, 1815. The day when Napoleon I., having escaped from Elba, landed at Cannes, and with 800 soldiers began his march towards Paris.

Virgil of the race of Scota (The). Flann MacLonan, 'chief poet of all Ireland' (ninth cent.).

It must not be forgotten that Scota is Ireland North Britain was called Albany till the 12th cent.

Virgin City (A), or 'Maiden City.' One which has never changed masters or been conquered. Bayonne, in France, boasts of being a 'Virgin City.' Metz was a 'Maiden Fortress' before it fell into the hands of the Germans in the Franco-German War, 1870.

Virgin Mary's Guard (The). The Corps Ecossais, or 'Gardes du Corps du Roi,' organised in 1448 by Charles VII. of France. Louis XI. made the Virgin Mary their colonel. Disbanded in 1830. See 'Gardes du Corps du Roi.'

Virgins (The Eleven Thousand). Ursul [Ursŭla], or Hörsel, in Suabia, means the moon, and her eleven thousand virgins are the stars. But in Cologne Cathedral is shown a pile of bones of all sorts, men, women, and children, taken from an old Roman cemetery, across which the wall of Cologne ran. These bones are exhibited as the veritable bones of St. Ursula and her eleven thousand virgin companions, said to have fallen martyrs to the Huns.

Virgins offered to dragons. When, in 786, Abdalrahman of Cordŏva entered the Asturias in the reign of Mauregato, he utterly defeated his army, and would make peace only on condition of an annual tribute of 100 Spanish virgins. Alfonso II., 'the Chaste,' has the credit of compelling the Moors to relinquish this tribute, about 800.

Virgins of the Shield. In Danish Skioldmeyar, female warriors of ancient Denmark.

Virginia (U.S. America), so called, in 1584, by Sir Walter Raleigh in compliment to the 'Virgin' queen Elizabeth. The inhabitants are nicknamed Beadies.

Viri Galilæi. The north summit of the Mount of Olives, about three furlongs from the middle summit, from which Christ ascended. So called from the words of the angels, 'Ye men of Galilee.'

It is also called Galilee. See Matt. xxviii. 16.

Virtuous Genevese (The). Jacques Necker, the French statesman and financier (1732–1804).

Visigoths (The). The Western Goths, who came from Scandinavia, and settled in Mœsia, A.D. 376. They established themselves in Gaul, A.D. 412, and, passing into Spain, founded a kingdom there in 414, which was overthrown by the Moors in 712. The names of the kings were—

Ataulfus	to 414	Gundemar	610-612
Wallia	415-418	Sisebut	612-620
Theodorês	418- ?	Recarêd II.	620-621
Theudis	531-548	Suintcila	621-631
Theudisele	548-550	Sisenand	631-636
Agila (at Merida)	550-556	Tulca	636-642
Athanagild (Toledo his capital)	556-567	Chindasvindê	642-649
Liuva (at Narbonne)	567-568	Recesvindê	649-672
Leovigild	568 572	Wamba	672-680
Recarêd	572-586	Ervigê	680 687
Liuva II.	586-608	Egiza	687-701
Vitterio	608-610	Witiza	701-710
		Roderic	710-711

Visitandines (4 syl.), or 'Religieuses de la Visitation,' 1610. An order of females instituted by St. Francis of Sales and the Baroness of Chantal, in commemoration of the visitation of the Virgin Mary. They wore a black dress and a silver cross.

Visitation (The), or 'Festum Visitationis,' 2 July, instituted 1263 in commemoration of Mary's visit to her cousin Elizabeth (Luke i. 39–56). The 'Congregation of the Visitation' was founded in 1610 by the Baroness de Chantal at Annecy, and the order was confirmed by Urban VIII. in 1626.

Vitry Disaster (The), 1143. Louis VII. (le Jeune) persuaded the Comte de Vermandois to divorce his wife and marry the princess (Louis's sister). The Comte de Champagne, father of the divorced countess, to resent this interference, stirred up a rebellion against the king, and Louis, to punish the revolt, set fire to the castle of Vitry. The flames spread to the town. The inhabitants fled to the church, which also caught fire, and 1,300 persons were burnt to death. The king, horrified by the shrieks of the sufferers, gave up the war, and made peace with the count.

Vizier of Sultan Selim. The greatest curse which a Turk can utter against a foe is this, 'May you be vizier of Sultan Selim!' Few of his viziers lived more than a month (1512–1519).

Volpone (3 syl.), 1709. So Dr. Sacheverell called Lord Godolphin in his two sermons, one at Derby and another in St. Paul's, London. For this offence he was brought to trial before the Lords, and suspended for three years. The mob took the doctor's side, and shouted 'High Church and Sacheverell!' and Queen Anne gave him the living of St. Andrew's, Holborn. The first sermon he preached there was sold for 100*l.*, and 40,000 copies were sold in a few days.

'Volpone' is the title of a comedy by Ben Jonson. It means 'old fox.'

Voltaire. His name was Marie François Arouet. He was confined in the Bastille for satirising the Duke of Orleans, and on his release from prison assumed the name of Voltaire from a small property left him by his mother. He retired to Ferney, a little village near Geneva. At one time he lived for fifteen years with Madame du Châtelet at Cirey, in Champagne, a lady of fortune, the wife of a marquis, and here he composed his best works. He set up reason as the guide and rule of everything, and whatever could not be squared with human reason he rejected in religion and politics.

Voltaire of Germany (The). I. Christoph Martin Wieland (1733–1813), author of 'Oberon' and the romance of 'Agathon.'

II. Johann Wolfgang von Göthe (1749–1838), also called 'The German Voltaire.'

VOLTAIRE (The Polish). Ignatius Krasicki (1774–1801).

VOLTAIRE (The Russian). Alexander P. Sumorokof (1727–1777).

Voluntary Controversy (The), 1834, in Scotland. One of the most intensely pronounced controversies that Scotland ever witnessed. The question was this: Is a congregation to exercise the right of giving a 'call' or invitation to its pastor, or has the kirk the right of presenting any minister it thinks proper? The question was tried on the celebrated 'Auchterarder Case' (q.v.), and terminated in the great schism of the Free Church.

Volunteers (The), 1852. The Victorian movement sprang into existence, and Dr. J. C. Bucknill of Exeter was the originator. The corps first mustered in uniform 6 Oct., 1852, when the oath of allegiance was taken. Consolidated 21 July, 1863, by Act 26, 27 Vict. c. 65, which Act was amended 9 Aug., 1869.

Rifle corps organised 1859.

Volunteers as volunteers have no regimental colours, but several of the Volunteer corps have had special colours presented to them by persons interested in the movement. Thus the Duchess of Gloucester and her daughter Sophia presented colours to the Kensington Volunteers.

First raised in Great Britain March, 1794; again in the spring 1803. George III. reviewed them in Hyde Park, 26 and 28 Oct., 1803.

Vordingborg (Peace of), 1435, terminating the long war of twenty-six years between the counts of Holstein and the Hanse Towns. By this treaty it was stipulated that the Hanse republics should continue to enjoy all their immunities in the Sound and in the harbours of the three united kingdoms of Scandinavia; and that Adolphus count of Holstein should be secured in the possession of the duchy of Sleswig during his life and his heirs two years after.

Votaries of Celestial Reason (The), or Tien-le, a brotherhood in China during the reign of Kea-king (1796–1820). They broke into the palace and kept possession of it for several days.

Vote of Non-address (The), 1647. After the escape of Charles I. from Holmby House, a vote was passed in both houses that no further application or addresses to the king should be permitted under the penalty of high treason, and that neither the House of Lords nor House of Commons should receive from him any letter or message.

The vote of non-address amounted to a declaration that all attempts at reconciliation were at an end, and that the Independents meant to proceed to put the doctrines of the army in force, and put the king to death.—HOWITT, Hist. of Engl. (Charles I., chap. vi. p. 290).

Votive Mass. 'Missa Votiva,' a mass 'quæ ex proprio voto dicitur.' See p. 565, 'Mass.'

Vow of the Swan (The), or Vow of the peacock, heron, pheasant, or some other bird. A fantastic vow made during some banquet in Mid-Lent to perform some feat during the year. The bird, profusely ornamented, was brought into the banquet-room in great ceremony, a herald trumpeted its approach, and a body of knights, squires, and pages attended it. The person who made the vow stood up, laid his hand on the bird, and vowed before the year was out to perform some feat in honour of the bird and some lady.

10 Feb., 1306, Edward I., then an old man, rising at the royal board, swore on the dish before him (a swan) to avenge on Scotland the murder of John Comyn by Robert Bruce.

Edward III. said, 'Hey! the White Swan! By God's soul I am thy man!'

Henry V. vowed in a similar manner to traverse France from sea to sea with flying banners.

Vulgate (The). A Latin version of the Scriptures by Jerome, the third of the Latin Fathers (q.v.), sanctioned by the Council of Trent. It was translated from the Hebrew, and received the approval of Gregory the Great. See p. 801, 'Scriptures.'

There was a 'New Latin Version' executed by Jerome, 390–405. Wiclif rendered it into English, 1324–1384. See 'Bibles.'

There was an earlier version called 'the Itala,' of which some few fragments remain. Jerome in the 4th cent. revised parts of the Itala, but his MSS. are lost. The Vulgate is quite a new translation.

Waddington Scholarship. Classics. For undergraduates in the University of Cambridge, tenable for five years. It is the interest of 3,000*l.* in the 3 per cent. consolidated Bank annuities. Founded by Miss Waddington and her sister in memory of their two brothers, 1870.

Wadham College, Oxford, 1609. Founded by Nicholas Wadham of Maryfield, Somersetshire. The headmaster is called the 'Warden.'

Wager of Battle. In this ordeal the challenger faced the west; the one challenged faced the east. If the defeated party craved his life he was a craven, but had his life spared.

Wages Movement (The), 1854. A combination of artizans for a sliding scale of wages equal to a tenth of the profit of their production. The men went out on strike only in one or two places at a time, and those employed subscribed to support those on strike. The woollen manufacturers of Preston and Burnley led the way. The movement came to an untimely end in April 1854. The loss to workmen was 500,000*l.*, and to masters many millions.

Wahab'ites (3 syl.), or 'Wahabbees,' or 'Wah'abees,' 1759. Reformed Moslems, founded by the son of Abd-el Wahab, and dominant over the greater part of Arabia. They are firm believers in the Koran, and want to bring back the faithful to the primitive precepts and practices of the first kalifs. They deny the sacred character of Imaums, advocate the perfect equality of man, and call their muftis 'brothers.' These strictest and straitest of the Moslem sects are great brigands and pirates.

Mohammed Abd-el Wahab was born in Arabia 1696, and died about 1764. He preached universal toleration, and taught that Moses, Christ, and Mahomet were three gifted men who taught the will of God, and that the faiths of all three are reconcilable.

Waits. Musical serenaders, who play or sing between midnight and four or five in the morning about Christmas time, and call afterwards on the inhabitants for a Christmas-box. They used to wish greeting to the master, mistress, children, and all, before parting. The thing has now dwindled down to a carol or popular tune or two. Originally they were musical watchmen. Rymer, in the 'Fœdera,' tells us they 'piped the watch nightly in the king's court from Michaelmas to Shrove Thursday, and to make the bon gayte at every chamber-door and office, for fear of pyckeres and pillers.'

Wakes and Lyke-wakes. These are very different things. A lyke or liche wake is a watching of a dead body (Ang.-Sax. lic) all night by the friends and neighbours of the deceased. It used to be a scene of revelry and mourning, the object being to watch the body from being interfered with by evil spirits.

The other 'wake' is about equal to 'vigil,' and every church had its wake on the anniversary of the saint. A religious service was given, but, as the crowd became great, hawkers and minstrels assembled, and the wake became a fair, held in the churchyard. In 1285 Edward I. forbade fairs to be held in churchyards, but the practice continued to the Reformation.

Walburgis. See 'Walpurgis.'

Wal'cheren Expedition (The), 1809. Under the charge of the Earl of Chatham and Sir Richard Strachan. The design was to destroy the French fleet in the Scheldt and take Antwerp; but the expedition was so ill-planned and executed that only the fortress of Flushing was taken and the isle of Walcheren. When the British seamen landed in the pestilential marshes of Walcheren they died by thousands. Napoleon said we might as well 'have thrown our men into the sea as land them at Walcheren.'

It was a magnificent fleet, consisting of 37 men-of-war, 23 frigates, 115 sloops, &c., and carrying 41,000 men. The Earl of Chatham resigned to prevent being brought before a court-martial.

 Strachan, pronounce Strawn.

Waldemar (Knights of St.), 1783. A Russian order conferred on both military men and civilians for merit. The ribbon is red, edged with black.

Waldenses (The), or 'Vaudois,' 9th cent. By Mosheim traced to Peter Waldo of Lyons, who died 1197; but this is an error, as they are mentioned as early as 1100, and had a regular confession of faith in 1120. They seem to have been early reformers dwelling in the valleys of the Cottian Alps, called Vaux, and the inhabitants Vaudois—in Latin Vallenses. These were the ancient 'Subalpini.' The Lyonists or 'Poor Men of Lyons' seem to have followed in the same footsteps, and therefore the two are very often confounded. The Waldenses, the Wiclifites, and the Lutherans were very similar in their reforms. Their original limits were the districts of Angrogna, Villaro, Bobbio, and Rorata. See 'Lyonists.'

They were condemned by the Council of the Lateran in 1179, and Innocent VIII. in 1487 enjoined their extirpation. The crusade included the Waldenses and Lyonists (or Poor Men of Lyons) in one general slaughter. The similarity of Valdo and Valdenses led to the mistake, but the Waldenses were the followers of Claudius of Turin, who died 839—that is, 358 years before the death of Waldo.

The Waldenses or Valdenses were also called: Apostolicians (in the 12th cent.), Arnaldists, Arnoldists, Bagnolens, Cathări (after the 12th cent.), Consolāti, Good Men (in Germany), Insabbates, Lionists, Montani, Passagins, Patarins or Paterins, Perfecti, Petrobrusians, Piphles (in Flanders), Poor Men of Lyons, Poplicans, Purists, Texerans or Tesserands (in some parts of France), Ultramontanes, Vaudois (in France), Xabatatenses. See each of these words.

A Miss Jane Waldo, of Clapham and Hever Castle, daughter of Sir Timothy Waldo, died 1841, aged ninety-six. This was the last of the direct descendants of Peter Waldo of Lyons.

Wales (The Statute of), 12 Edw. I., A.D. 1284, which abolished the most barbarous of the Welsh customs, established guilds, introduced English jurisprudence, and divided the land into shires and hundreds after the English model.

Walker Exhibition (John Lucas), for discoveries in pathology. Value 50*l.* a year; in the University of Cambridge. Founded by John Lucas Walker, 1887.

Walker Studentship (John Lucas). Original research in pathology. It may be held by either sex, and not necessarily a member of the University. Value 200*l.* a year, tenable for three years, and the holder eligible for re-election for two more years. Founded in the University of Cambridge by John Lucas Walker, 1887.

Wall of Seve'rus, the Roman emperor, extending from the German Ocean to the Solway Firth. This was built because the emperor, when he visited Britain A.D. 208, viewed with alarm the enormous encroachment of the Scots southwards. This emperor died at York in 211, aged sixty-six.

The Wall of Severus was for the most part, but not invariably, parallel with Hadrian's rampart. It was further north, and extended somewhat further at each end.

Wallace of Switzerland (The). Andreas Hofer, the Tyrolese patriot (1767–1810). He was a man of gigantic stature and strength; brave as a lion, but gentle as a lamb.

Wallace of Wales (The). Owen Glendower (1350–1415).

Wallach Rebellion (The). In Hungarian history, 1784. The Wallachs are a people of Hungary, but chiefly of Wallachia in Roumania. These insurgents, led by Hora and Kloska, assassinated the government commissioners, destroyed six villages and 182 private houses, killed 4,000 Hungarians, and did other acts of violence before they could be put down.

Wallingford, in Berkshire (Treaty of), 7 Nov., 1153. Between Stephen king of England and Henry (afterwards Henry II.), son of Matilda, 'the Lady of England.' Henry, by the death of his father, having succeeded to Normandy and Anjou, and holding Aquitaine in right of his wife (Eleanor of Poitou), was invited by the archbishop of Canterbury to make his appearance in England. On his arrival the treaty of Wallingford was agreed to by the rival claimants. The castles were to be fazed, the crown lands resumed, the foreign mercenaries dismissed, Stephen to continue on the throne during life, and Henry to succeed as his heir. Stephen died within twelve months of this treaty.

Walloons (The). The French-speaking inhabitants of Artois, Hainault, Namur, Luxemburg, Flanders, and Brabant. These six provinces constituted Catholic Netherlands. The seven united provinces constituted Protestant Netherlands.

There are speakers of the Walloon dialect of French in Belgium, Luxembourg, the Netherlands, and Germany.

Walpurgis Night. The eve of May-day, when the old pagan witch-world was supposed to hold high revelry under its chief on certain high places. The Brocken, in Germany, was an especially favourite spot for these revelries. Walpurgis was a female saint concerned in the introduction of Christianity into Germany.

Walpurgis or Walburgis was the daughter of St. Richard, king of the West Saxons, and was educated in the monastery of Wimborne in Dorsetshire. She was sent to Germany in 752 to assist in the conversion of the Germans, and in 754 was made abbess of Heidenheim. She died 25 Feb., 779, and the day of her death is held in her honour.

Already do I feel the power,
The fun and frolic of the hour;
The advent of Walpurgis Night
Bids every limb thrill with delight.
Another night, another day,
And then the glorious First of May.
GOETHE, Faust (Anster).

Walter the Pennyless. 'Gautier sans avoir' of Burgundy, joint leader of the First Crusade with Peter the Hermit in 1096.

Wapentake. A term in Yorkshire similar to ward or hundred. The word means weapon-touch, and refers to the vassals touching the spear of their feudal lord in token of homage. The word passed from the assembly to denote the district tenanted by the vassals.

Wappenschaws. The feudal array of a county, when each crown-vassal was required to appear with such muster of men and armour as he was bound to make by his fief, under high penalties.

War Cries.

I. Of ENGLAND, in the Middle Ages, 'St. George!'
" FRANCE, 'Montjoye St. Denis!' [pronounce Sahn Dnee]. Montjoye referred to the little mounds surmounted with a cross between Paris and St. Denis, either to guide travellers or to console the pious wayfarer. In the French empire it was Vive l'Empereur!
" GERMANY, during the long contention between the Dukes of Bavaria and the House of Hohenstauffen, it was Guelf and Ghibelline! See p. 394.
" SCOTLAND, it was frequently the name of some clan or chief, as A Douglas! A Home!
" SPAIN, 'St. Jago! [St. James] and close, Spain!' Cervantes says it was 'St. Jago! and charge, Spain!' or 'Santiago mata moros!' (II. ii. 4.)

Mount, chivalrous hidalgo! Not in vain
Revive the cry, 'St. Jago! and close, Spain!'
BYRON, Age of Bronze, vii.

" the IRISH, 'Aboo!'
" the WELSH, 'Alleluia!'

Loud shrieks of 'Alleluia!' blended with those of 'Out! Out! [Oucit! Oucit!] Holy Cross.'—LORD LYTTON, Harold.

II. Of the BOURBONS, the word 'Bourbon!'
" the CRUSADERS, 'Dieu le veut!' Not of the First Crusade.
Of the Counts of HAINAULT, 'Hainault the Noble!'
" JEHOSHAPHAT, in his war against Ammon, Moab, and Seir, 'Praise the Lord, for His mercy endureth for ever!' (2 Chron. xx. 21.)
" the Dukes of MILAN, 'Milan the Valiant!'
" the Lords of MONTMORENCY, 'Dieu aide au premier Chrétien!'

III. In battle of MARKFELD, 1278. Of the Bohemians, 'Praga!' of the Germans, 'Christ!'
" battle of NASEBY, 1645. Of the Royalists, 'God and Queen Mary!' of the Parliamentarians, 'God our strength!'
" battle of PHARSALIA, B.C. 48. Of Pompey, 'Herculês Invictus!' of Cæsar, 'Venus Victrix!'

At Senlac the English had two war cries, 'God Almighty!' and 'Holy Cross!' The latter was the cry of Harold's own men, and referred to Waltham Cross, which he held in special reverence. The Norman shout was 'Dieu aidois à nos!' (God help us!).

Of Capobianco, leader of the Carbonāri, it was 'Vengeance for the Lamb torn by the Wolf!'

Nelson's mot at the battle of the Nile was 'Victory or Westminster Abbey.' At Trafalgar it was 'England expects that every man will do his duty.'

Several others are given in loco.

War Poet (The). G. H. Boker, rendered famous in the American anti-slavery war. See p. 100, 'Black Regiment.'

War Songs (National).

AUSTRIAN, Haydn's Hymn to the Emperor.
BELGIAN, the patriotic Brabançonne.
DANISH, the Song of Danebrog. The danebrog is the flag with a white cross which fell from heaven in the 13th cent. at the prayer of Waldemar II., and which ensured him the victory.
ENGLISH, Rule Britannia. Words by Thomson, music by Handel.
FRENCH (ancient), the Chanson de Roland.
FRENCH (modern), the Marseillaise and the Chant du Départ.
GERMAN (modern), Arndt's Des Deutschen Vaterland and Heil Dir im Sieges- kranz, Watch on the Rhine, Sword-song of Körner, &c.

HUNGARIAN, the Rakoczy March.

ITALIAN, Garibaldi's warlike hymn, composed by Mercantino, and Godfredo Mameli's Italian brethren, Italy has awaked!

RUSSIAN, God protect the Czar!

SCOTCH Jacobite Songs: The king shall enjoy his own again, and When the king comes o'er the water. The Lillibulero of 1688 created a most marvellous furore.

War in Algeria (The), 1827–1847. France owed two Jewish merchants of Algiers 100,000*l*., the balance due for the Egyptian expedition. Hussein dey of Algiers pressed for payment, and asked the French consul why his master did not reply to the letter sent. The consul insolently replied, 'The king of France holds no correspondence with the dey of Algiers.' Whereupon the dey struck him on the face. This insult could not be overlooked, and war ensued, which ended in France taking Algeria, and annexing it to France.

War of Calmar (The), 1611–1613. This war was carried on between Christian IV. king of Denmark and Charles IX. of Sweden, and, after the death of Charles, with Gustavus Adolphus. The real cause of the war was jealousy with Sweden, which had broken away from the 'Union.' The ostensible reason was interruption of Danish commerce in the ports of the Gulf of Riga. The war consisted in destroying each other's towns and ports. It was brought to an end by the mediation of James I. of England.

War of Candia (The), 1667–1668, between the Venetians and the Turks. So relentless was this war, that the expression 'Una Guerra di Candia' became in Venice synonymous with 'war to the knife.' In this terrible siege 30,000 Christians were slain, and although the Turks ultimately became masters of the island, yet they lost in the siege more than 120,000 men.

War of Chiozza (The), 1378–1381, between Venice and Genoa. Chiozza was taken by the Genoese under Pietro Doria 16 Aug., 1379, but recovered by the Venetians June 24, 1380. The recovery of Chiozza is one of the most marvellous of all the romances of history.

War of Devolution (The). 'Guerre de Dévolution,' 1667. The war proclaimed by Louis XIV. against Spain to enforce his pretension to a part of the Spanish Netherlands, founded on an old custom of the Netherlands called 'Le droit de Dévolution.' The law was this: 'Les immeubles apportés en mariage par l'un des époux devinssent la propriété des enfants du premier lit lorsque le père ou la mère contractaient un second mariage.' Now Maria Theresa was the daughter of the first wife of Philippe IV., but Carlos II. of the second wife. The war was brought to a close by the Treaty of Aix-la-Chapelle, 2 May, 1668, by which treaty all Flanders was ceded to France.

Louis XIV. married Maria Theresa of Austria, daughter of the King of Spain.

War of Honain (The), A.D. 629–632, between Mahomet and the Arabian idolaters of Mecca. So called from the Valley of Honain, where the great conflict was decided. The battle was first lost by Mahomet and then recovered by his uncle Abbas. After this victory and the siege of Fayef, Mecca was lastingly converted to the winning side of the Koran.

War of Independence. I. In North America (1774–1782), see p. 24, 'American War of Independence.'

II. In Scotland (1297–1328). The wars carried on by Wallace and Bruce to liberate Scotland from the English crown. Bands of Scotch insurgents rose against Edward I. before 1297, but in that year the insurrection became general. The independence of Scotland was recognised in a parliament at Northampton, 4 March, 1328.

This recognition was due to the great Scotch victory at Bannockburn (24 June, 1314), the defeat of the army of Edward II. at Biland Abbey, in Yorkshire, in 1323, and a victory over Edward III. in 1327.

III. In Hungary (1848–1849). Through the treachery of General Goergey this struggle terminated fatally to the Hungarians. Austria called in the aid of Russia.

War of La Radde (The), 1573. A war against the Vaudois by the French. The Vaudois showed so determined a front that the French were glad to come to terms of peace. La Radde was the officer who commanded the French troops.

This was a continuance of the St. Bartholomew slaughter, begun in Aug. 1572.

War of Liberation (The). The war between Germany and Napoleon I.

to throw off the French yoke. It began in 1813 and ended in 1815. First Prussia and Russia made an offensive and defensive alliance, 27 Feb., 1813. Sweden joined on 14 March, and on 16 March Prussia declared war on Napoleon. Austria joined the alliance 27 June, and declared war with France on 12 Aug. Bavaria joined 8 Oct. (all in the year 1813). It terminated with the Treaty of Kiel, 14 Jan., 1814, in favour of national independence.

The French won the battles of Lützen, 2 May; Bautzen, 19-21 May; and Dresden, 26, 27 Aug. They were defeated at Grossbeeran, 23 Aug.; Katzbach, 21 Aug.; Kulm, 29, 30 Aug.; Dennewitz, 6 Sept.; Wartenberg, 2 Oct.; and at Leipsic, 16-19 Oct.

War of Mityle'ne (The), B.C. 606, between the Athenians and Mitylenians. Phrynon the Athenian attacked Mitylenê, which was defended by Pittăcos. The two leaders agreed to decide the battle by single combat. Pittacos threw a net over his antagonist, and while Phrynon was struggling to extricate himself, despatched him and won the victory. Mitylēnê (4 syl.).

War of Proclamations (The), between General Burgoyne on the side of the English and General Schuyler on the side of the United States.

1. General Burgoyne issued in June a pompous proclamation threatening to punish with the utmost severity those who refused to side with the British government.

2. At Skenesborough, in July, he issued a second proclamation summoning the people to send deputies to deliberate on the measures to be adopted to save from destruction those who had not yet conformed to his former proclamation.

3. General Schuyler issued a counter-proclamation assuring the people they would be accounted traitors if they obeyed the proclamations of General Burgoyne.

War of Schmalkald (The), 1547, by the Kaiser against the 'Schmalkaldic League' (q.v.), under a plea made to the pope of extirpating heresy, and to the Germans of putting down rebellion. The real object of the war was the lust of dominion. The Protestant princes, alive to the danger of this alliance between kaiser and pope, assembled at Ratisbon and determined on resistance, but were overthrown.

War of the Amorous (The), or 'The War of the Lovers,' 1577–1578. The seventh religious war of France; so called because it arose out of some scandalous intrigues of the French court. In fact, Catharine de Medicis, in order to break up the Huguenot party, invited many of them to balls and fêtes, where she surrounded herself with maids of honour more beautiful and fascinating than moral. Gallantries and intrigues naturally took place. One effect of this was to detach the Duc d'Alençon from the court party and ally him to the reformers.

It is said that the real motive of this change was the hope of marrying the English queen, Elisabeth. He died in 1584.

War of the Austrian Succession (The), 1740–1745. On the death of Kaiser Karl VI. the question was who had a right to succeed him. Properly, females could not occupy the throne of Austria; but Karl VI., by a decree called the 'Pragmatic Sanction,' made his only child Maria Theresa his heir. Bavaria, Saxony, Prussia, Sardinia, and Naples all made rival claims, but Karl Albert elector of Bavaria had the best claim, and next Frederick Augustus elector of Saxony. Prussia demanded Silesia, Sardinia demanded Milan, and Spain demanded Bohemia and Hungary. Ultimately the war was left to Bavaria and Prussia; the Elector of Bavaria was crowned kaiser in 1744, lost his electorate, and was kaiser only in name. He died in Jan. 1745. Maria Theresa agreed to restore the electorate of Bavaria to his son Maximilian Joseph, and the elector agreed to give up all claim to the crown of Austria. This being settled, the husband of Maria Theresa was crowned kaiser 4 Oct., 1745 (the same year).

In 1756 broke out the Seven Years' War between Maria Theresa and Frederick II. (the Great) of Prussia.

War of the Bastards (The). 'La Guerre des Bâtards,' 1324. A war between Charles IV. of France and Edward II. of England, supported by the Gascons. 'Dite La Guerre des Bâtards, parce que les Gascons avaient pour chefs des bâtards de la noblesse.'

War of the Cam'isards (The), 1702–1704. The Count de Broglie began it with horrible savagery, but in 1703 he was recalled, and the war was conducted by Marshal de Montrevel.

War of the Giants (The), B.C. 1842. The third revolt of the Titans or sons of the earth. These revolters were ultimately overcome by Heräklês (Herculês).

The battle of Marignano, 1515, is called the 'battle of the Giants,' from the great valour displayed by the combatants. It was won by François I.

War of the Mercenaries, B.C. 241–238. A terrible war which Carthage had to sustain in Africa with the mercenaries because they were not paid. It occurred between the first and second Punic Wars, the leaders being Mathos and Spendius. Hamilcar was sent against the insurgents, and massacred some 40,000 entrapped in a defile.

War of the Peasants (The), 1525. Waged by the Elector of Saxony and the German princes against the Anabaptists, headed by Munzer, Stubner, Storck, and others. Munzer was taken prisoner and beheaded.

War of the Polish Succession (The), 1733–1738. The case was this: On the death of Sobieski king of Poland, in 1674, Frederick elector of Saxony was chosen king. At the death of Frederick, in 1733, two claimants were put forward, Stanislaus, a Pole, and Frederick Augustus elector of Saxony. As Stanislaus was the father-in-law of Louis XV. his claim was backed by France, but Germany took the side of the elector. The war ended in a compromise: Germany gave up Lorraine to Stanislaus, and agreed to exchange Naples and Sicily for Tuscany and Parma. This being done, Frederick Augustus was allowed to keep the throne of Poland.

War of the Rustards (The), also called 'The War of the Peasants,' 1525. A rising of the peasants of Alsatia, excited by the Anabaptists. The leader was Erasmus Gerbert of Molsheim. Chased from Alsatia by the Duc de Lorraine, they took refuge in Germany and amalgamated with the Anabaptists.

War of the Sacramentaries (The), 1524. The paper war or controversy between the followers of Luther and those of Zwingli, the Swiss reformer, on the subject of the Eucharist. Luther maintained that, though the bread remained bread and the wine remained wine after consecration, yet the body of Christ was transfused into the elements and was taken into the mouth by communicants. Zwingli maintained that no such transfusion took place at all, but that the bread and wine were simply symbols of the body and blood of Christ, well calculated to remind communicants of the sacrifice of Christ and nothing more.

Carlostadt, Œcolampadius, Muncer, Storck, and Martin Bucer sided with Zwingli.

War of the Spanish Succession (The), 1700–1714. Carlos II. had no child, and at his death four claimants to the throne of Spain arose—viz. the King of France, the Emperor of Germany, the Elector of Bavaria, and the King of Savoy. The last two retired and left the field to the other two. Louis XIV. was the cousin of Carlos and son-in-law of Philip IV., whose eldest daughter he had married. Carlos had recognised this claim by leaving the crown to Philippe d'Anjou second son of the dauphin, but Louis XIV. by the Treaty of the Pyrenees had renounced all claim to the Spanish crown. Leopold of Germany claimed the crown for his second son Karl, whose mother was also a daughter of Philip IV. War succeeded, and lasted for twelve years. England opposed France, and was joined by Holland, Portugal, Savoy, Brandenburg, and of course Germany.

The French won the battles of Almanza, Villaviciosa, and Denain; but lost those of Blenheim, Ramillies, Turin, Oudenarde, and Malplaquet. The Treaty of Utrecht left France in possession of Spain.

War of the Three Henris (The), 1584–1589—i.e. Henri III. of France, Henri of Navarre, and Henri duc de Guise. On the death of the Duc d'Alençon in 1584, Henri of Navarre was leader of the Protestant party in France; whereupon Henri duc de Guise put himself at the head of the Catholic league; Henri III., jealous of both parties, resolved to bring them to obedience. The king was driven from Paris, the Duc de Guise was assassinated, Henri III. was also assassinated, and Henri of Navarre succeeded to the crown of France, under the name and title of Henri IV, but he also was assassinated.

War of the Uscocchi (The), or 'Uskoks,' 1592–1617. The Uskoks were pirates who for a century infested the Adriatic. They first settled in Clissa, then removed to Zara, and finally to Segna. They were Dalmatian fugitives who gave sanctuary to the proscribed of all nations, and were both numerous and formidable. By the treaty of Madrid, 16 Sept., 1717, the Venetians and Austrians stipulated to extirpate the Uskoks, and the horde disappeared.

Uskoks means fugitives. The Russian uskakat, to run away, is the key to the word.

Wars of Cappel, 1529–1531. See p. 143, 'Cappel.'

Wars of the Roses (The), 1455–1485. Between the Houses of York (white) and Lancaster (the red rose). It began with the battle of St. Albans, 23 May, 1455, and ended with the battle of Bosworth Field, 22 Aug., 1483. The chief battles were Wakefield, 1460, won by the Lancastrians (in this battle fell Richard duke of York, claimant of the crown), and those of St. Albans, Northampton, Towton, Hexham, Barnet, and Tewkesbury, won by the Yorkists.

A white rose formed the badge of the House of York, and a red rose was the cognizance of the House of Lancaster. The political effects of the war were—(1) the ruin of the ancient baronage; and (2) the growth of monarchical power, being relieved of the baronial check.

Wars of the Silesian Succession. Between Frederick II. of Prussia and Maria Theresa of Austria for the possession of Silesia.

The first war (1740–1742). Maria Theresa ceded Silesia to Frederick II. of Prussia by the treaty of Berlin.

The second war (1744–1745). Maria Theresa confirmed Silesia to Prussia by the treaty of Dresden.

Between the first and second Silesian war was fought the battle of Dettingen, 27 June, 1743.

The third war (the 'Seven Years' War,' 1756–1763), when Silesia was finally ceded to Prussia by the treaty of Hubertsburg.

Wars of the Tributary Princes (The). An intestine commotion of China, which lasted with short intervals 450 years (B.C. 770–320); called by the Chinese the Chen-kuo (fighting kings).

The most powerful of these states were OEH, founded by Nang-lee-wâng; TCHAO, by Heaotching-wâng; HAN, by Huon-hoei; TSEE, by Wângkinâ and TSIN, by Tchao-siang-wâng.

Wars with the Albigenses (The). The first was from 1208 to 1229, in the reign of Philippe Auguste. It was entrusted to Simon de Montfort, called 'The French Maccabæus.'

The second was in 1226, in the reign of Louis VIII., the Lion. Louis himself was the leader, instigated by Pope Honorius III. to 'purge the land of heretics.'

The third was from 1545–1547, in the reign of François I.

Warbeck Plot (The), 1490–1499, of which Margaret duchess of Burgundy was the prime mover. The person she selected to personate her nephew, Richard duke of York, second son of Edward IV., who (she said) had made his escape from the Tower, was a Flemish lad named Peter Osbeck, generally called Perkin Warbeck. The lad was invited to the French court, but soon abandoned. He then made his appearance in Ireland, in what is termed the Pale (q.v.), and in 1495 started for Scotland. He was received by the Scotch king James IV., who gave to him in marriage Catherine Gordon, granddaughter of James I. In 1497 he returned to Ireland, fled to Cornwall; and in 1499 was executed at Tyburn.

Warbeck of the North (The), 1598. Otrepieff, who personated Demetrius, the prince murdered by Boris. As Warbeck married Catherine Gordon, so this mock Demetrius married Marina, daughter of the Palatine Sandomir. He was murdered in an insurrection in 1605. Warbeck was hanged for insurrection. See 'Richard IV.'

Warden, in Oxford University. The title held by the head of five of the colleges: All Souls, Keble, Merton, New College, and Wadham.

Warden of the Cinque Ports. The custodian of Dover Castle was created by William the Conqueror warden of the Cinque Ports (q.v.). The jurisdiction of this office was very greatly abridged by 18, 19 Vict. c. 48.

Warden of the Stannaries (Lord). An officer who has the administration of the metal mines of Devon and Cornwall. When Edward III. created his infant son 'prince of Wales,' he conferred on him these stannaries.

Wardship. Custody of the body and estate of minors holding under the king, till the minor, if a male, was 21, and, if a female, was 16 years of age.

The lord gave no account to anyone of his stewardship. Introduced by William the Conqueror, and abolished by 12 Car. II. c. 24.

Warming-pans. Jacobites, so called because Mary d'Este, wife of James II., says rumour, never had a living child of her own, but, wishing for an heir, she had a male child brought to her in a warming-pan, which she substituted for her own still-born babe. This 'warming-pan heir' was James III. the Pretender, called 'The Warming-pan Hero.' See Macaulay, 'Hist. of England,' ii. 308; and Miss Strickland, 'Queens of England,' vi. 213, 243.

What gave some colour to the scandal are the facts that the child was born at least a month before its time, and at its birth none of the persons most interested in the matter were present. Thus the Princess Anne was not present, nor yet the Archbishop of Canterbury, nor yet the Dutch Ambassador, nor any one of the Hyde family. William of Orange, in his manifesto, openly refers to 'the son and heir' of James II. as spurious; but yet the probability is that there was really no collusion.

Warren's Cavalry, 1887. Mounted London police. Sir Charles Warren was Commissioner of the Metropolitan Police Force.

'"Warren's Cavalry" armed to the teeth.'—Newspaper paragraph, 30 Jan., 1888.

Warrior Lady of Latham (The). Charlotte countess of Derby, daughter of Claude de la Tremouille (peer of France) and of Charlotte daughter of William I. prince of Orange. Born 1601, died 1664. The earl joined the king's troops, and left his house at Latham in charge of his wife. The Parliamentary army demanded its surrender, but the countess returned answer, 'It does not suit me.' For eight months she held out, when Sir T. Fairfax retired, leaving Colonel Rigby in command of the besieging troops. At length Prince Rupert came to the rescue, and Rigby raised the siege.

Warrior of Freedom (The). Giuseppe Garibaldi (1807–1882).

Wartburg Contests (The), or 'Battles of the Minnesingers.' An annual prize given by Hermann margraf of Thuringia for the best minne-song. It was given in honour of his wife Sophia, and all the best minstrels attended. About 150 of these prize-songs are still extant. Those by Walter of Vogelwerde are the best. See 'Minnesingers.'

There is a poem so called. It is by Wolfram, and records the contests of the Thuringian and Suabian poets.

Wasa (The Dynasty of), or 'Vasa.' Gustavus Vasa broke off Sweden from Denmark, to which it had been united for 126 years—that is, from the 'Union of Calmar' (1497–1523). Norway still remained in the union till 1813, when it was taken from Denmark by the allies and attached to Sweden.

Wasa (Knights of), Sweden, 1772. Decoration is a gold sword hung on watered blue ribbon. The name of the founder is inscribed in a purple cartouche.

Wat Tyler's Insurrection, 1381. A rising of the peasantry against serfage. It was a servile war produced by oppression and misery. John Ball, a Kentish priest, was the stump orator of the day, and told the people that as all men came from Adam and Eve all men had equal rights, and it was gross oppression that some should be gentlemen and others serfs. The real cause of the insurrection was a poll-tax to defray the expenses of the war in France. The insurgents mustered in great force on Blackheath, where they had an interview with Richard II. The king invited Wat Tyler to a conference in Smithfield, when Sir William Walworth, lord mayor of London, despatched him with a dagger, and the king induced the rioters to disperse. The tax especially objected to was one to enable John of Gaunt to dispute with Henry of Trastamare the crown of Castile in right of his wife Constance, a natural daughter of Pedro the Cruel.

The mayors of London were created 'lord mayors' by Edward III. Walsingham calls Wat Tyler 'Wat the heller' (Ang.-Sax. hel-an, 'to cover').

Watches. It is said that Robert I. (Bruce) had a watch about 1310. Watches were used by Purbach in astronomical observations in 1500. Those made at Nuremberg in 1477 were egg-shaped. Cornelius van Dreble and James Torrianellus introduced great improvements in 1580.

Henry VIII. (1509–1547) certainly had a watch. In 1572 the Earl of Leicester presented one to Queen Elizabeth. It is thus spoken of:—

One armelet or shakell of golde all over fairly garnished with small diamondes and fower score and one smaller peeces fully garnished with like diamondes, and hanginge thereat a rounde clocke fullie garnished with diamondes and an appendant of diamondes hanging thereat.

Pretty common in Shakespeare's time, and often alluded to in plays.

Watchwords. Of course military watchwords are frequently changed; still, it is interesting to know the watchwords of great military men. The following are well known: Brutus, Libertas; Cæsar, Venus genitrix; Marius, Lar deus; Sylla or Sulla, Apollo Delphicus.

Waterlanders (The). Mild Mennonites, who split off from the general body in 1554, and are so called from Waterland, in Holland.

Watling Street. A great Roman road running from Dover to Caernarvonshire in Wales. A branch ran to Scotland.

It passed through Canterbury and Rochester to London, then ran to Uriconium and Chester into Wales. From Uriconium a branch ran to Manchester, Lancaster, and Kendal.

Wattier's Club, at the corner of Bolton Street. In the time of the regency this was the club for all the marriageable young heirs to ancestral honours, and all the penniless younger sons whose dowry was their animal spirits. It is best known to fame for the masquerade attended by the prince regent, into which Caroline forced her way and created a fresh scandal.

Waynflete Professorships (The). One of moral philosophy, and one of chemistry, in Oxford University. Formed from three prælectorships of Magdalen College in 1854. Annual stipend 600*l.* each.

William of Waynflete, bishop of Winchester, founded Magdalen College, Oxford, in 1448.

Waywode (2 syl.). 1. A farmer of the revenue of a district in the Ottoman empire.

2. A former military title of Russia and Poland.

3. A former ruler in the Danubian provinces of Turkey.

Weapons of War and Armour.

Battle-axes:	the best were	Danish.
Casques:	"	"	of Poitiers.
Hauberks:	"	"	of Rouen.
Swords:	"	"	of Damascus, Cologne, and Toledo, in Spain.

Wec'habites (3 syl.). Generally called 'Wahabites' (q.v.).

Wedmore, in Somersetshire (Peace of), 878. Between Alfred king of England and Guthrum the Dane, settled in East Anglia. This treaty followed Alfred's great victory at Edington, and by its terms Guthrum consented to be baptized.

Week of Expectation (The). 'Hebdomada Expectationis.' The sixth week after Easter, when our Lord said to his apostles: 'Manete in hac civitate, et expectate usque dum induamini virtute ex alto' (Luke xxiv. 49).

Week of the Cross (The), or 'Hebdomada Crucis,' is Rogation week.

Weeping Crosses. So called because, in Catholic times, penances were finished before them.

Weeping Philosopher (The). Heraclitos the Ephesian, who died B.C. 495, aged sixty. So called because he was ever mourning over the follies and frailty of man, and the vicissitudes of all human affairs. See p. 630, 'Obscure Philosopher.'

Weliki-Luki (Treaty of), 20 July, 1812. Of alliance between Spain and Russia.

Well-beloved (The). 'Le Bien-aimé.' Louis XV. (1710, 1715–1774).

The contest was carried into the reign of the 'Well-beloved.'—Hist. of France.

 How such a licentious, heartless, and singularly immoral man could be 'well-beloved' is past all human understanding.

Wellington Administration (The), 1829–1830. That of Prince Polignac was so called by the French. It was a retrograde Tory administration, contemporary with the administration of the Duke of Wellington in England.

Wellington Statues.

I. By Boehm at Hyde Park Place, unveiled 21 Dec., 1888. The figures round the pedestal represent the four nationalities engaged in the battle of Waterloo in 1815—viz. (1) The British Guardsmen; (2) the 42nd Highlanders; (3) the Inniskilling Dragoons; and (4) the 23rd Welsh Fusiliers.

II. The bronze statue of Achilles, 18 June, 1822, by the women of England, and made of the cannons taken at Salamanca, Vittoria, Toulouse, and Waterloo. It was originally placed in the south-east angle of Hyde Park, near Apsley House.

III. Equestrian statue of the Duke of Wellington surmounting the Marble Arch, Hyde Park Corner, set up in 1846, taken down 24 Jan., 1888. See p. 131, 'Burton Arch.'

Wellington's Assassin. Cantillon, to whom Napoleon I. left a legacy for his base attempt, and to whom Napoleon III. paid the legacy. Whether Napoleon hired this villain or not to do the damning deed is not of the slightest moment. He certainly set his hand and seal to the full approval thereof, and it is but charity to believe that both Napoleon I. when he made the legacy and Napoleon III. when he paid it were 'politically insane.' Cantillon was alive and in Paris in 1859.

Welsh Calvinistic Methodists, 1743. Organised by Charles of Bala, a clergyman of the Church of England. They believe in the 'Thirty-nine Articles' taken in a Calvinistic sense. In church government they are Presbyterian.

Welsh Mortgage (A). A pledge of land in which there is no day fixed for redemption. Such a mortgage is redeemable at any time on payment of the loan.

A 'vif gage' (vicum vadium) is a conveyance of property to a creditor and his heirs till he has (out of the profits of the estate) satisfied the debt with interest. As neither debt nor interest is lost, such a gage is living—i.e. does not lapse or fail.

Wenceslaus the Worthless. One of the promiscuous kaiser-kings of Germany (1357, 1378–1400, deposed and died 1419).

It was a frightful period. In Germany was Wenceslaus the Worthless, in France Charles VI. the idiot, in England Richard II. the fop. There were two popes anathematising each other, one at Rome and the other at Avignon.

Werela (Peace of), 14 Aug., 1790. Between Sweden and Russia. In this treaty the limits of both states were re-established according to the provisions of former treaties.

Wesleyan Conference (The), 1744. The original conference consisted of six Methodist clergymen of the Church of England and four lay preachers, who met together in London to consult on the continuance of the work. Subsequent conferences have been annually held since.

Wesleyan Methodist Association (The), 1835. Seceders from the old Methodist Connection from an objection to the Conference, which they thought to be tyrannical, especially in excluding laymen from any share in the general management.

Wesleyan Methodist Reformers (The). Seceders from the Methodist Connection, who object to the overbearing authority of the Conference, and especially to the exclusion of those who dared to censure their proceedings. (19th cent.; about 1840.)

Wesleyan Methodists, 1788. The Arminian Methodists organized by John Wesley.

The Calvinistic Methodists led by Whitfield separated in 1752. The 'Wesleyan Methodist Church,' 1843, was formed at Utica, and object to Episcopal titles.

Wesleyan Reform Union (The), 1849. Those Reformed Methodists who did not join the United Methodist Free Church.

Western Church (The), or 'Latin Church'; as they call themselves, 'The Catholic Church'; as others call them, 'The Roman Catholic Church,' separated from the Eastern Church about 324–334. In 606 the word 'pope' was limited to the Bishop of Rome; the Bishop of Constantinople being called 'patriarch' since 588.

Of course the Eastern Church was established before the Western, and the Western Church separated on the moot point whether the bishop of Rome or patriarch of the East were the higher office. As the Western Church severed itself from the Eastern, in the language of the church, it was 'schismatic,' and remains so still.

Western Empire (The).

I. Rome, or the western portion of the ancient Roman empire after its division by Valentinian and Valens, A.D. 364. Valentinian had the western portion, with Rome for his capital, and Valens, his brother, had the eastern portion, with Constantinople for his capital. The Western empire ended in 476, when Odoäcer, king of the Herüli, took Rome, and assumed the title of 'king of Italy.'

The Eastern empire continued nearly 1,000 years longer, till 1453.

II. 960–1268. The united empire of Germany and Italy. Otto I. the Great took Italy from the usurper Berengarius II. and added it to the German empire. In 1268 the Germans were driven out of Italy, and several republics were formed there.

Western Schism (The), or 'Great Schism of the West.' Variously reckoned 39 years, 50 years, and 71 years.

1. 39 years, from the double election of Urban VI. in Rome and Clement VII. in Avignon, 1378 to 1417, when Martin V. was elected by the Council of Pisa.

2. 50 years, from 1378 to 1429, when Clement VIII., elected to succeed Gregory XII. at Avignon, resigned the tiara.

3. 71 years, from 1378 to 1449, when Felix V. was elected by the Council of Basel to succeed Eugenius IV.

See p. 31, 'Anti-popes.'

Westminster (The Conference of), 1559. Summoned by Queen Elizabeth to settle these three questions: (1) Should the public worship be conducted in Latin or English? (2) What power should be allotted to each particular church in the matter of rites and ceremonies? (3) Is the Mass a propitiatory sacrifice or not? The bishops of Lincoln and Winchester threatened to excommunicate the queen and conference if they could not have their own way, were arrested and sent to the Tower for high treason, and the conference was dissolved.

Westminster Assembly of Divines (The), 1643–1649. A convocation appointed by the Long Parliament for settling the doctrine, liturgy, and government of the Church of England. It consisted of 121 clergymen and 30 laymen (10 of whom were lords). This assembly wanted dogmatically to dictate what articles of faith should be compulsory, and even what form of worship should be established, but Cromwell demanded toleration and independence.

Westminster Catechisms (The). The Shorter Catechism, 5 Nov., 1647; the Longer Catechism, 18 Sept., 1648. They were drawn up by the Westminster Assembly of Divines (q.v.), and are still used by the Presbyterians as standard catechisms, but are not accepted by the Church of England as of any authority.

The Shorter Assembly Catechism was probably drafted by Mr. Palmer.

Westminster Confession of Faith (The), 1646. A confession of faith contained in 33 articles drawn up by the Westminster Assembly of Divines (q.v.), and still considered a standard of faith in the Presbyterian churches of the United Kingdom; but, never having received the royal sanction, it is of no authority in the Church of England.

Westminster School, 1560. Founded by Queen Elizabeth.

Westphalia (Peace of), 24 Oct., 1648. One of the most important in European history, as it closed the Thirty Years' War. By the terms of this treaty 'the balance of power' in Europe was first recognised. Alsace was ceded to France; part of Pomerania to Sweden; the Swiss cantons were declared independent; perfect religious freedom was granted, and German Protestants were admitted to equal rights with their Catholic fellow-countrymen. No one could henceforth be put under the ban of the empire but by the diet alone.

Lusatia and Alsace were taken from Austria, and Austria received instead Transylvania and Croatia. Upper Pomerania, Rugen, with Stettin, Gratz, Damme, Golnau, the Isle of Wollin, Peine Schiveine, the Divenau in Lower Pomerania, Wismar, the Duchy of Bremen, and the principality of Verdun were given to Sweden.

Wetter (Mrs.), the Queen Victoria. The family name of her husband was Wetter. A playful pseudonym.

Some say Wettin, which is Prussian; but Wetter or Vetter, is Swedish.

Wharncliffe Meetings. Meetings of public companies held in conformity with the Wharncliffe Order (q.v.).

Wharncliffe Order. A provision introduced into the House of Lords that no meeting of a public company shall have power to change the constitution of the company unless seven days' notice has been given to the subscribers and the meeting represents at least three-fourths of the paid-up capital.

Wharton. Philip Wharton, duke of Wharton (1698–1731). Pope calls him 'the scorn and wonder of our days.' His talents were brilliant, and his power of oratory electric; but his life was most licentious, and he turned traitor. He fought against his countrymen at the siege of Gibraltar, and joined the Pretender, from whom he accepted the worthless title of 'Duke of Northumberland.'

Whewell Scholarships for international law. Two yearly, value respectively 100*l.* and 50*l.*, tenable for four years. Founded in the University of Cambridge by the Rev. William Whewell, D.D., master of Trinity College. See p. 748, 'Regius Professor of Civil Law.'

Whewell, pronounce You-el.

Whig and Tory, modified continuations of the terms Roundhead and Cavalier, which arose, in 1680, on the introduction of the Exclusion Bill. Tory was the name by which ruined adherents of King James were known when he lived in a state of outlawry in Ireland. It was applied in derision to those who held the doctrine of 'the divine right of kings,' subsequently applied to those who stood by 'church and state.' Whig was applied to an opposite class of men in Scotland, but similarly circumstanced as the Irish Tories. They were vagabonds collected by the Marquis of Argyll to oppose certain government measures in the reign of James I. As the Irish Tories were church and state men, the Scotch Whigs were nonconformists, who repudiated the doctrine of 'divine right' and the right of an established church.

Scotch Covenanters were nicknamed Whigs (vagabonds) as far back as 1648; the Abhorrers (q.v.) slanged the Petitioners (q.v.) as Whigs. The term was not used in England as a political designation till 1680. Tory is about equal to Rapparee. As Abhorrers called the Petitioners by way of contempt Whigs, so the Petitioners returned the contumely by calling the Abhorrers Tories.

Tory is from an Irish verb, meaning to pursue for plunder.

Whig of the Revolution (A). So George III. called himself. Not the French but the English revolution. He abhorred the former, but owed his crown to the latter.

Whig Bible. See 'Placemakers' Bible' and 'Bible.'

Whig Club (The), 1793, in Irish history, was instituted to promote reform by pressure from without, through the agency of voluntary associations. It was afterwards superseded by the society of the United Irishmen (q.v.). See p. 455, 'Irish Associations.'

Whigs' Vault (The). A subterranean dungeon in the castle of Dunnottar where the Privy Council of Scotland, in 1685, shut up a number of prisoners supposed to be hostile to the government.

In this prison . . . . still termed the Whigs' Vault, several died of the diseases incidental to such a situation.—Sir W. Scott, Old Mortality (Introduction).

Whigamores (The). The rigid Presbyterian party, under the leadership of the Marquis of Argyll. After the defeat of the Duke of Hamilton, leader of the Engagers (q.v.) or moderate Presbyterians, the Marquis of Argyll, with 6,000 followers, marched to Edinburgh and made himself head of the government (1648). The word contracted into 'Whigs' was applied to the Presbyterians of Scotland opposed to the Royalists or Malignants, and was subsequently applied to all those who denied the divine right of kings, the supremacy of royal prerogatives, and the dogma of passive obedience.

The etymology of the word is doubtful. Some derive it from Upham-more, pack-saddle thieves; others from whig, in horse language, meaning 'get on'; others more wittily than truly from an anagram 'We Hope In God.'

In the 'Encyclopædia Britannica' we read: The Whigs were so denominated from a cant name given to the Presbyterian conventiclers: "whig," milk turned sour; and Tories received that honourable appellation from the Irish banditti so called—the Irish word tores being equal to "stand and deliver!" Whig or Whey is buttermilk.

Whigamores' Inroad (The), or 'The Whigamore Raid,' 1648. Cromwell with 8,000 men having defeated Langdale, whose army amounted to 20,000 men, made his way into Scotland, when the Marquis of Argyll, and the Earls Cassilis and Eglintoun, at the head of the Presbyterians of the west country and the Highlands, marched to Edinburgh, and conducted Cromwell to the metropolis in triumph. This expedition of the Covenanters to Edinburgh gave the finishing blow to the royal cause in Scotland, and is known in history as the 'Whigamore's Inroad' or 'Whigamore Raid. ('Encyclop. Britannica,' v. 411.)

The Duke of Hamilton supported what is called 'the Engagement' (q.v.) in the Scotch parliament. The Marquis of Argyll opposed it. The Duke of Hamilton was defeated at Warrington (1648), and surrendered to Cromwell.

Whip with six strings (The), 31 Hen. VIII. c. 14, A.D. 1539. 'The Bloody Statute.' See the 'Six Articles.

Whipping Boy (A). A boy kept to be whipped when a prince deserved chastisement.

Edward VI. Barnaby Fitzpatrick stood for Edward VI.

Henri IV. of France. D'Ossat and Du Perron, afterwards cardinals, were whipped by Clement VIII. for Henri IV.—Fuller, Church History, ii. 342.

Charles I. Mungo Murray stood for Charles I.

James I. of England. We are told that George Buchanan would not punish the Scotch by substitution, and when the Countess of Mar complained of his whipping the prince, he stoutly confessed it, and said he would do it again if the boy blundered over his Latin declensions.

Lesage, in his 'Gil Blas' makes Raphael to be flogged for the son of the Marquis de Leganes; but Raphael, not seeing the justice of this arrangement, ran away (v. 1).

Whipping Post (The), to which Jesus was fastened at the scourging, is now shown at Rome through iron railings in a little chapel in the church of St. Praxedés; and over it is inscribed words to the effect that John de Colonna brought it to Rome in 1223. The socle of the post, however, is in St. Mark's Cathedral, Venice. The post is of grey marble, a foot and a half long, one foot in diameter at the base and eight inches at the top, where an iron ring is inserted, to which the victim was tied. See p. 231, 'Crucifixion, Relics of the.'

White and Black Face, in Turkish phraseology, are terms of praise and reproach, meaning bright and downcast.

When the Janizaries were enrolled, a dervish blessed the new levies and said, 'Wheresoever they go, may they return with white faces.' Gibbon tells us that the Romans had the sentence 'Hic niger est, hunc tu, Romane, caveto.'—Decline and Fall, chap. lxiv., and note.

We also speak of a downcast leaden look. And say he looked black in the face; looked black at me; you need not look so black.

White and Black Factions (The). The Ommiades (whose colour was white), and the Abbassides (whose colour was black). Green was the colour of the Fatimites (8 syl.).

From the Indus to the Euphrates the east was convulsed by the quarrels of the White and Black factions.—GIBBON, chap. lii.

White and Crimson. In the Valois-Angoulême dynasty Protestant soldiers wore white jackets and scarfs, but the Catholic soldiers wore crimson jackets and scarfs. The Swiss guard wore a grey uniform.

White Battle (The), 20 Sept., 1319. The battle of Mytton, in Yorkshire, was so called from the number of clerks who fell. It was between the Scots (under Douglas and Randolph) and the forces of William of Melton archbishop of York. It is said that at least 300 men in holy orders were slain, and many were taken prisoners, among whom was William de Ayremyn (afterwards bishop of Norwich). Bishop Hotham of Ely narrowly escaped being taken captive. The battle is sometimes jocosely spoken of as 'The Chapter of Mitton.'

Of the yhet thre hundreth war
Prestis that deit [died] intill that chas;
Tharfore that bargane callit was
'The Chaptour of Mytoun,' for thare
Slain so many prestis war.
BARBOUR, The Brus.

White Books. The official reports of both Germany and Portugal are stitched in white wrappers. See 'Blue Books,' 'Black Books,' 'Red Books,' 'Yellow Books.'

White Brotherhood (The). The adventurers led by John Hawkwood (14th cent.).

An English mercenary, John Hawkwood, with a band of adventurers, the White Brotherhood, had ravaged Italy from the Alps to Calabria.—GIBBON, chap. xlvi.

White Camisards, 1703. Catholic volunteers, under the name of Cadets of the Cross or White Camisards, joined the regular troops of Marshal Montrevel as auxiliaries to extirpate the Camisards of the Cevennes, called by Pope Clement XI. 'a cursed brood from the execrable race of the Albigenses.' See p. 96, 'Black Camisards.'

A military night surprise is a camisade. Thus the taking of Pontoise in 1419 was a camisade, and the battle of Pavia in 1524 began with a camisade.

White Canons. Canons, like the Premonstratensians, who wore white habits. See 'Canons,' 'Black Canons.'

White Caps were worn by the Volones or volunteer slaves as a token of liberty.

Then Gracchus fulfilled his promise to the Volones, and celebrated their enfranchisement by a public festival, in which they all appeared wearing white caps in token of liberty.—The Student's Rome, p. 256.

White Caps (in the U.S., 1889–1890), bodies of self-constituted 'regulators' and correctors of morals.

White Caps (The), 1758. A seditious faction in China put down by the Emperor Kien-lông. They were zealous Mahometans. See p. 120, 'Brethren of the White Caps.'

White City (The). Belgrade, called Alba Græcia by the Franks in the 9th cent.

White Coats (The). I. The trainbands, as the 'Red Coats' were the regular soldiers, and the 'Blue Jackets' the sailors.

II. The Earl of Newcastle's pikemen, chiefly Roman Catholics, in the time of Charles I. They wore white coats.

White Company (The). A company of adventurers which, after the wars of Edward III. in France, passed into the service of the Marquis of Montferrat. When they were employed by the Pisans against Florence the famous Sir John Hawkwood was their commander.

White Cross Knights (The). The Knights Hospitallers, who had a white cross on their black robes. The Knights Templars were the Red Cross Knights, their badge being a red cross on a white robe. See 'Poor Brothers of St. John.'

White Eagle (Knights of the), 1325. A Polish order instituted by Ladislas king of Poland on the marriage of his son Casimir with Anne, daughter of the Grand Duke of Lithuania. The ribbon was blue. Extinct.

White Flag (The). Emblem of legitimacy in France. The flag of the Bourbon monarchs. Ordinarily, the white flag craves for truce and peace; a black flag indicates a pirate; a red flag, defiance; a yellow flag, that the vessel is in quarantine.

Those who reverence the symbol of the White Flag may feel that its latest upholder [the Comte de Chambord] did nothing to sully its purity.—Daily News, Sept. 8, 1883.

* * A white flag as a railway signal means the rail is clear, and everything in order; a red flag signifies danger, and means stop; a green flag intimates that caution is required.

White Flagellants (The). So called from their white mantles. See 'Flagellants,' and 'Blancs Battus.'

White Friars (The), 1171. The Carmelites. So called from the colour of their dress, as the Dominicans were called 'Black Friars' and the Franciscans 'Grey Friars.'

White Hats (The). I. In Flanders, were in the 14th cent. the badge of the democratic party, led by Jacob van Artevelde, the great brewer of Ghent, who was elected their captain in 1338, and was assassinated in 1345. Their next captain was John Lyon, who was supposed to be poisoned by the court party in 1381. Philip van Artevelde, son of the great brewer, next assumed the white hat of the party. He was slain in the battle of Rosebeque, Nov. 1382.

II. White hats were used in England to denote radical proclivities, because Orator Hunt (1773–1835), the great demagogue, during the Wellington and Peel administration, used to wear a white hat. Lord Liverpool, who was prime minister for fifteen years (1812–1827), rendered the badge no longer distinctive by adopting a white hat himself.

White Hood House (The). The Regents' or Upper House of the University of Cambridge. So called because the Masters of Arts wore hoods lined with white silk. It consisted of Masters of Arts of less than five years' standing, and of Doctors of less than two. If of longer standing, they belonged to the Black Hood House (q.v.), called the non-regent or Lower House. All this was abolished in 1858. See 'Senate.'

Regents originally meant tutors, lecturers, and professors. Members of the University having served their time were exempt from these duties, and Masters of Arts took off the white lining of their hoods to show they were non-regents.

White Hoods (The), or 'Les Chaperons Blancs.' I. 1379. The workmen of Ghent, when they revolted against the Duke of Burgundy, adopted as their badge a white hood.

II. 1407–1415. All Paris, on the assassination of the Duc d'Orléans, was divided into two factions—the Burgundians under Jean-sans-Peur duke of Burgundy, and the Armagnacs, who were partisans of the Orleanists. The Burgundians adopted for their badge a St. Andrew's cross on a white hood, the Armagnacs adopted a St. George's cross. After a time the Cabocians were enlisted by Jean-sans-Peur, and wore as their badge white hoods. So violent were these rowdies that they compelled the doctors of the Sorbonne to wear the white hood, and, having got the dauphin into their power, made him also adopt the same badge. See p. 348, 'French Brigands.'

White Huns (The), or the 'Hiatilla.' The Huns of Sogdiana.

Called White Huns by the Greeks, 'A cause de leur civilisation et de leur douceur.'—BOUILLET.

Gibbon says, chap. xxvi., they were called White Huns from the change of complexions. The Huns of the North are the black Calmucks.

White Knight (The), or 'Chevalier Blanc de Valaigne' (i.e. Valachia), John Corvinus Hunniädês, the Hungarian general (1400–1456). The Turks, who employed his name to frighten their perverse children, called him Jancus Lain (or the Wicked).

The white knight fought with the hand rather than the head.—GIBBON, lxvii.

White Knight of Wallachia (The). Same as the preceding.

White Laws. The Jus Honorarium, or Edicts of the Roman prætors. Red Laws or Rubrics were the Civil Law.

Alii se ad Album [i.e. jus prætorium, quia Prætores edicta sua in albo proponebant] ac Rubricas [i.e. jus civile] transtulerunt.—QUINTILIAN, xii. 3, 11. The Imperial Rescripts were written in purple ink.

White Mantles (The). I. The Servites (2 syl.), or 'Servitors of the Virgin.' A religious order founded in Florence in 1232. So called from their white mantles. The order was suppressed in France in 1274, but still subsists in Italy.

II. Williamites (3 syl.), or 'Guillemites' (3 syl.), were also called 'White Mantles' from their large white mantles. This was a religious order founded by William of Malavalle, which spread through all Italy, Germany, and France.

White Monks. The Bernardines or Cistercians. So called from the colour of their habit.

The Dominicans wore a black habit, the Franciscans a grey one.

White Penitents, 1399. These were men, women, girls, boys, townsfolk and countryfolk, nobles and burghers, laity and clergy, all with bare feet and dressed in white sheets from head to foot, who visited in succession the towns and villages of every district of Milan. Whenever they came to a cross road or to a cross, they threw themselves on the ground, crying 'Misericordia' three times; then recited the Lord's Prayer and the Ave Maria. On entering a town or city, they walked singing the 'Stabat Mater.' Corio, in his 'History of Milan,' assures us that the number was between 10,000 and 15,000 at a time. 'However (he adds), the people returned to a worse course of life than ever after the excitement was over.'

White Poet (The). Olaf, younger brother of Sturla, and nephew of Snorro the historian (13th cent.).

White Rent. Rent paid in silver or white money instead of corn. Quit-rents were so called. Anglo-Saxon, Hwit-rent, white-rent.

White Rose (The). Elizabeth of York; she married Henry VII., and thus united the rival houses of York and Lancaster.

White Rose of England (The), 1490. So Margaret duchess of Burgundy called Perkin Warbeck, appointed by her to personate Richard duke of York, younger son of Edward IV.

White Rose of Scotland (The). Lady Catherine Gordon, daughter of the Earl of Huntly, and grand-daughter of James I. Her first husband was Perkin Warbeck the pretender, her second husband was Sir Matthew Cradock. Called the 'White Rose' because Warbeck pretended to be the representative of the House of York (the White Rose party).

White Russia. Muscovy. The king of Muscovy was called the 'White King' from his alba tegumenta.

White Scarfs and White Hoods (The), 1407–1415. The Armagnac and Burgundian factions, after the assassination of the Duc d'Orléans. The Orleanists or Armagnacs adopted as their cognizance a St. George's cross on a white scarf. The Burgundians, led by Jean-sans-Peur duke of Burgundy, adopted a St. Andrew's cross on a white hood.

The Crusaders, the Armagnacs, and the Huguenots all adopted as their badge the white scarf; but the Burgundian badge was a white hood. A red scarf was the badge of Henri III. and Charles IX.; a green scarf of Mazarin, Isabella, and the Condé family. A tricolour scarf is still worn in France by municipal magistrates and the commissaires of police.

White Sheep (The), 1468–1497. Certain Turkomans who on the decay of Timur's dynasty fixed themselves (under the leadership of Uzun Hussun) in Armenia, Mesopotamia, and part of Asia Minor. They afterwards drove out the Black Sheep and made themselves masters of all Western Persia. They were utterly stamped out by Ismael, a native prince, who founded the Suffavĕan or Sofi dynasty.

At the decay of the Timur dynasty the dominions of Timur were divided into three parts: Hussein Mirza, a descendant of Timur, had Khorassan, and held his court at Herat; the Black Sheep acquired Azerbijan, Irak, Fars, and Kerman; and the Turkomans of the White Sheep held the third part. Called the White Sheep from the effigy displayed on their standard.

White Ship (The). La Blanche Nef, the ship in which Prince William, son of Henry Beauclerc, embarked at Barfleur, and was wrecked with 140 passengers and 50 sailors, by striking on the Ras de Catte (now Catteville), 25 Nov., 1120. It is said that the king fainted when he heard the news and 'never smiled again.'

White Staff (The). The staff of office presented by the sovereign to her privy council. Thus the premier, the lord chamberlain, the treasurer of the household, the lord steward, &c., bear white wands or staffs.

Shrewsbury refused to take the white wand (of chief minister), except from her majesty's own hand. It was therefore handed to her [Queen Anne], and she extended it towards Shrewsbury, saying, 'For God's sake, use it for the good of my people.' Shrewsbury was already chamberlain, and he presented the staff of that office in resignation of it, but the queen bade him retain both.—HOWITT, Hist. of England (Anne, p. 322).

Lord Harley of Wigmore will have the white staff given him to-morrow by the queen herself, and be declared lord high treasurer.—DEFOE (29 May, 1711).

White Standard, that of Charles Edward the Young Pretender. The white cockade was the badge of his followers. The Bourbons also adopted the white cockade and standard.

When the white standard is again displayed, it shall not be turned back so easily.—Sir W. Scott, Redgauntlet, chap. xxii.

White Strangers, or 'White Gentiles.' Norwegians, who took possession of Dublin in 838. Dublin and northwards was the territory of the White Strangers. From Dublin southwards was the territory of the Black Strangers.

Dublin and settlements in Leinster constituted the territory of the Fin-gall or White Foreigners. Called by the Four Masters Fionn-gentie (White Gentiles).

White Town (The). Belgorod, the third circle of Moscow. So called from the white wall with which it was encompassed.

Moscow had four concentric circles. Beginning with the innermost they were—(1) the Kremlin, (2) Kitaigorod or the Chinese Town, (3) Belgorod or the White Town, and (4) Semilangorod, which was defended by ramparts.

White Water-flower (The), or Pe-lien-kaou. An association at the close of the 18th cent. formed in China against Kea-king, the emperor. This brotherhood excited in Shan-tung an insurrection, which spread over three of the neighbouring provinces. The leader was designated San-hwang, and maintained his ground for eight years.

Or White Water Lotus. Kea-king reigned 1796-1820.

Whites and Blacks (The), 13th cent. Rival factions in Italy at the close of the 13th cent. and the first four years of the 14th. The Blacks were the noblesse, the Whites the rich bourgeois. The Whites were Guelfs, the Blacks were Ghibelins. Dante in 1302 was exiled for being a White.

Whites and Blues (The). 'Les Blancs et Bleus' in the great French Revolution mean the royalists, whose flag and livery were white; the republican troops wore a blue uniform.

Whites, Reds, Blues, and Greens were colour factions of Constantinople, being the liveries worn in chariot races, and party colours as formerly in our elections for members of parliament; but the Whites merged into the Blues, and the Reds into the Greens. See p. 106, 'Blues and Greens.'

Whites and Reds (The). 'Albati' and 'Russati.' The original liveries of the Roman charioteers, in the chariot races. Afterwards two more liveries, the Green and the Blue, were added, and the latter ultimately absorbed the original colours. In Rome, the colours were a Capulet and Montague standing faction, which led to street brawls and not unfrequently death; and such emperors as Caligula, Nero, Vitellius, Verus, Commodus, Caracalla, and Elagabălus, were Greens or Blues, and made their livery party questions as we do Whig and Tory, Church and Dissent. The same rage prevailed in Constantinople; the Greens were the partisans of Anastasius, the blues of Justinian. In fact, the whole empire was divided into Greens and Blues. Even religion had its Orthodox Blues and Heterodox Greens.

Whiteboy Acts (The), 1762. Laws against the Whiteboys, many of which are still in force.

Whiteboy Riots. It would be difficult to tabulate all the riots of these turbulent Irish since the formation of the society in 1760. Lord Drogheda was charged in 1762 with the task of suppressing the society, but he only scotched it. Outrages were renewed in 1822; and in 1828 Queen's County, Carlow, and Kilkenny were scenes of disgraceful 'Whiteboy riots.' These rioters robbed and murdered in every direction, much the same as the Moonlighters, as agents of the more secret leaders of the Land or National League, Home Rule, and Plan of Campaign (q.v.). See p. 455, 'Irish Associations.'

Whiteboys (The). I. Protestant rioters in the reign of Queen Elizabeth. See 'The Abbot,' chap. xvi., by Sir W. Scott.

II. 1760. An illegal association of Irishmen, so called because, in their nightly expeditions, they disguised themselves in white smocks. Their object was to resist the enclosure of commons, in order to increase the number of cattle required by the murrain which began in Germany and spread to England. They existed some time before 1760 under the name of Levellers (q.v.), and soon after 1760 became noted for agrarian aggressions. In 1762 Lord Drogheda was charged with the suppression of this riotous society. Outrages were renewed in 1807, and in 1811, 1812 spread to Tipperary, Waterford, Kilkenny, Westmeath, Roscommon, and Queen's County. The Whiteboys called themselves the agents of Captain Right.

In 1784 and the three following years houghing, tarring and feathering, and other personal molestations prevailed to a great extent. The Protestant clergy, especially in the south of Ireland, were subjects of especial persecution by the Whiteboys. Riotous assemblies were next organised, so that in 1787 an act was passed to prevent tumultuous assemblies.'

In 1822 the rioters became so violent that the 'Insurrection Act' was passed, and continued in force for three years. Similarly in 1807 an Insurrection Act had been passed which remained in force for four years; when withdrawn, two years of turbulence ensued of a very aggravated character. See p. 455, 'Irish Associations.'

. Parnellism and crime have had a long spell of late years. In 1890 it was thought 'patriotic' to insult the judges, slang the ministers, defy the laws, ruin the landlords, and obstruct the police in their attempts to keep order.

Whiteboyism. The political and agrarian platform of the Whiteboys of Ireland. In 1762 the outrages of this association were greatly repressed, but they reappeared soon afterwards in the south of Ireland. See 'Whiteboys.'

Whitefeet (The). One of the disturbing factions of Ireland in the Tithe War (q.v.). They were associated with the Blackfeet, Terryalts, Lady Clares, Molly Maguires, and Rockites. See each of these in loco, and 'Irish Associations.'

Whitefeet and Blackfeet. Illegal associations formed in Ireland during the sanguinary Tithe War (1830–1835) (q.v.). The names were in conformity with the colour of their shoes, assumed as badges of the associations.

Whitefieldites (3 syl.), 1739. Followers of the Rev. George Whitefield [Whit-field], an ordained clergyman of the Anglican Church, who separated from that communion and established a hyper-Calvinistic system of religion in opposition to Wesley, whose tenets were Arminian (q.v.). Whitefield insisted on the doctrines of predestination and unconditional election. Wesley founded the Wesleyan Methodist connexion.

Whitehall Preachers (The), 1724. Established by George I. One from the University of Oxford and one from the University of Cambridge. Appointed for two years. Originally there were twenty-four preachers, twelve resident fellows of each university. The two are now appointed by the Bishop of London, as dean of the royal chapel.

White-hood House (The), in Cambridge University, is the Regent or Upper House of the Senate, composed of masters of arts of less than five years' standing and doctors of less than two years' standing. See 'Black-hood House.' Abolished 1858.

So called because the hood of a Cambridge M.A. is lined with white silk. Called 'regent' because they were the tutors and professors, and as such were the 'rulers' of the university. After the time stated they were released from these duties, and stripped off the white lining of their hoods. This has been discontinued for many years.

Whit-Sunday. The Sunday which commemorates the descent of the Holy Ghost on the day of Pentecost on the disciples, in the form of 'tongues of fire,' after which they were all inspired to speak in foreign tongues, as the Spirit gave them utterance. Verstegan says: 'We yet say hallowed for halih-wied; also we hereof retain the name of Whitsonday, which more rightly should be written Weid-Sonday, i.e. "Sacred Sonday." So called by reason of the descending down of the Holy Ghost . . . .' ('Restitution of Decayed Intelligence,' p. 188).

Robert of Gloucester, under the article 'Wytte-Sonetyd,' says: 'Good men and wymmen, this day is called Wyt-sonday, because the Holy Ghost brought wytte and wisdom into Cristis disciples, and so by her preching after in all cristendom, and fylled hem full of ghostly wytte.'

Another derivate is 'White-Sunday,' from the white dresses anciently worn by the newly baptized catechumens, to whom the sacrament of the Eucharist was administered on the vigil of Pentecost. Whitsuntide includes the white octave, but is now in England almost restricted to Whit-Sunday, Whit-Monday, and Whit-Tuesday.

Whitsuntide Dancers. At Echternach, in Luxemburg, thousands of pilgrims take an active part in a 'sacred' dance, singing at the same time litanies in honour of St. Willebrod. The dancers take three springs forwards and one backwards, or five forwards and two backwards, to bands of music. The space traversed is about a mile and takes above an hour.

Le mardi de pentecôte une procession de sauteurs parcourt encore les rues d'Echternach du pont de la Sure à l'église, et cela, dit-on, pour conjurer la danse de St.-Guy, qu'une tradition locale dût avoir été très-commune dans le pays vers le huitième siècle.'—REGLUS, Nouvelle Géographie Universelle.

('St. Guy' or 'Gui' is the French form of our St. Vitus.)

Whitsun Week. 'Hebdomăda Pentecostês.' Beginning with Whit-Sunday; the week which commemorates the descent of the Holy Spirit.

Whyte's Professorship of Moral Philosophy (Dr.), in Oxford University, at 100*l.* a year. Founded by Thomas Whyte, D.D., in 1621. The stipend has been raised to 400*l.* a year.

Wicked Bible (The), 1632. Printed in London by Richard Barker and Martin Lucas, the king's printers, in the reign of Charles I. The printing was bad, the paper bad, and there were two monstrous errors. The seventh commandment, by the omission of not, ran thus: 'Thou shalt commit adultery'; and in one case 'greatnesse' got converted into 'great asse.' The printers were fined 500*l.*, and the edition of 1,000 copies was ordered to be burnt. See p. 90, 'Bibles.'

When the case was brought into the Court of High Commission, Laud said: 'The printeing is soe bad and the paper too, that, if it be not mended shortlie, they wilbe put downe by those of Amsterdam, and the trade spoyled.' See 'Rawlinson MS.,' printed by the Camden Society, N.S. 59.

Wicked Street (The) of ancient Rome, at the foot of the Esquiline Hill. So called because here Tullia, the daughter of Servius Tullius, drove her chariot over the murdered body of her old father, who had been king of Rome forty-four years.

Wic'lifites (3 syl.). Disciples of Wiclif. Also called 'Lollards.' They denied the dogma of transubstantiation. Wiclif lived 1324–1384.

Wigs. In the middle of the 18th cent. there were thirty-three different sorts of wigs in use:—

The Artichoke wig.	The Half-natural.
Bag wig.	Jansenist bob.
Barrister's wig.	Judge's wig.
Bishop's wig.	Ladder wig.
Brush wig.	Long bob.
Bush wig.	Louis' wig.
Buckle wig.	Periwig.
Chain wig.	Pigeon's wing.
Chancellor's wig.	Rhinoceros wig.
Corded wolf's paw.	Rose.
Count Saxe smode.	Scratch wig.
Crutch wig.	She dragon.
Cut bob wig.	Small black wig.
Detached buckle wig.	Spinage [sic] seed wig.
Drop wig.	Staircase.
Dutch wig.	Welsh wig.
Full wig.	Wild boar's back.

His periwig was large enough to have loaded a camel, and he bestowed upon it at least a bushel of powder.—BROWN, Letters (time Charles II.).

Sing [? singe] old Rose and burn the bellows (burn libellos).

Wigs were worn by bishops in the House of Lords till 1830, when Blomfield bishop of London obtained permission of William IV. for bishops to discontinue their use.

The oldest wig in the world is of ancient Egyptian manufacture. It was found in a tomb at Thebes, and is now in the British Museum.

Wilburites (3 syl.). A new sect of Quakers of great strictness, founded by John Wilbur, who insisted most rigidly on the traditions and peculiarities of the society. This movement was the counteraction of the Hicksite movement in 1827.

Wild Scots of Galway (The). The Galwegians, a mixed race, partly Irish-Scots of Argyllshire, partly Picts.

Wilfrid's Needle (St.). The crypt of Ripon Cathedral. The eye of this 'needle' is a hole in a wall through which women suspected of unchastity were required to 'thread themselves,' as evidence of their innocence.

There is a 'Wilfrid's Needle' in Belvoir Castle, spoken of by Bishop [Joseph] Hall. Others are also referred to occasionally.

Wilkes's Riots, 1768. In No. 45 of the 'North Briton,' conducted by Wilkes, member for Aylesbury, the king was charged with telling a deliberate lie in his speech from the throne. The royal party was so infuriated that Wilkes fled to France, but returned in 1768, and was sentenced to imprisonment for twenty-two months. The mob rose in insurrection on behalf of their champion, and resolved to conduct him in triumph to Westminster. The yeomanry were called out. Wilkes was expelled from the house, but was re-elected by an overwhelming majority. Soon afterwards he was made a London alderman, lord mayor, and eventually member for Middlesex, and chamberlain of London—a very lucrative office.

William I. 'Wilhelm' king of Prussia and German emperor; born 1797, died 1888.

King of Prussia, 1861–1888.
German Emperor, 1871–1888.

Father, Friedrich Wilhelm III. (second son); Mother, Louisa Augusta of Mecklenburg-Strelitz; Wife, Louisa Augusta, daughter of Karl Friedrich of Saxe-Weimar. Contemporary with Victoria.

* His son, Friedrich Wilhelm [Nicholas], born 1831, married Victoria princess royal of England in 1858. He succeeded his father in March, but died in June 1888.

William I. the Conqueror (1025, 1066–1087). First of the Norman dynasty of England, which supplied four sovereigns—viz. William I., William II. (his son), Henry I. (brother of William II.), and Stephen (brother-in-law of the last two kings).

Father, Robert le Diable duke of Normandy (William was a natural son). His mother was Arlete, Harlotta, or Herleva='beloved,' and her father was a tanner of Falaise. Wife, Matilda, daughter of Baldwin V. count of Flanders. His daughter Adela married Stephen count of Blois, and it was their son Stephen who usurped the crown.

Style and title: Gulielmus rex Anglorum, comes Normannorum et Cenomanentium.

 The Cenomani were a people in what is now called Mans, in France.

William II., Rufus, or 'The Red King' (1056, 1087–1100), the second king of England from the Conquest. He was the second son of William I. (q.v.), and usurped the crown of his elder brother Robert.

Father, William I.; Mother, Matilda, daughter of Baldwin V. count of Flanders. Never married; shot in New Forest while hunting by Sir Walter Tyrell, whether by accident or design was never known. His style and title: Gulielmus rex Anglorum. Sometimes 'Gulielmus monarchicus Britanniæ.'

William III. and Mary. Fifth of the Stuart dynasty of Great Britain. William III. (1650, 1689–1702). Mary (1662, 1689–1694). No issue.

Father of William, William II. of Orange; Mother, Mary, eldest daughter of Charles I.; Wife (see below).

Father of Mary, James II. of Great Britain; Mother, Mary d'Este of Moděna; Husband (see above).

Style and Title: William and Mary, D. G. of England, Scotland, France, and Ireland, King and Queen; Defenders of the Faith, &c. After the death of Mary in 1694 the needful alterations were of course made.

The horse on which William III. was riding when he received his fatal accident was named 'Sorrel.' Pope says:—

Angels who watched the guardian oak so well,
How chanced ye slept when luckless Sorrel fell?

 The principality of Orange consisted of a part of the present department of Vaucluse; and the House was founded in the 9th cent. In 1530 Nassau was added by the marriage of Otto of Nassau with Claude de Chalon of Orange. In 1599 William of Orange and Nassau was elected stadtholder of Holland. After the death of William III. of England the line of Orange and Nassau became extinct, whereupon Louis XIV. claimed the principality of Orange and added it to France.

William IV. (1765, 1830–1837). Third son of George III., and brother of George IV., the preceding king. His brother, Frederick duke of York, the second son of George III., died in 1827. William was duke of Clarence. Being brought up in the navy service, he became Lord Admiral of England, and was called 'The Sailor King.' By Mrs. Jordan he had eight children: George Fitzclarence, Frederick Fitzclarence, Augustus, and the five daughters Sophia, Mary, Elizabeth, Augusta, and Amelia.

Father, George III.; Mother, Charlotte Sophia of Mecklenburg-Strelitz; Wife, Adelaide, daughter of the Duke of Saxe-Meiningen; two children, both died in infancy. Next heir to the crown, Victoria, daughter of his brother Edward duke of Kent. Style and title, William IV., D.G. of England, Scotland, and Ireland, King, Defender of the Faith, &c.

William the Bad (*, 1154–1166). William I. of Sicily.

William the Conqueror. William I. (q.v.). So called because he conquered Harold in the battle of Senlac, and thus became king of England.

He had four sons and six daughters. His sons were Robert (twice supplanted by his younger brothers); WILLIAM II. (Rufus), who succeeded his father; Richard, who was killed by an accident; and HENRY I., who succeeded his brother William II.

His daughters were Cecilia, Constance, Adela who married Stephen count of Blois (whose son STEPHEN succeeded Henry I.), Adelisa, Agatha, and Gundred.

William the Conqueror's Comet, 1066. This comet was visible in China from 2 April for 67 days; it was visible in Europe from May for 40 days. Never comet excited such attention. In the famous tapestry of Queen Matilda several figures are represented gazing at this comet, and the inscription below is 'Isti mirantur stellam.'

William the Good (1154, 1166–1189). William II. king of Sicily, son of William the Bad.

William the Lion of Scotland (1166–1214). So called because he was the first who introduced a lion in the armorial bearings of Scotland. The chief of the Scottish heralds is called Lyon king of arms.

William the Silent (1533, 1544–1584), prince of Orange. Assassinated by Balthasar Gerard at Delft.

Williamites (3 syl.), in French 'Guillemites' (3 syl.), in Italy 'Guglielmotes,' 1153. A religious institution founded by St. William of Malavalle, which rapidly spread through all Italy, Germany, and France. They were called White Mantles because they wore large white mantles.

Williams Prize (The George). Theology. Given to the best student in the theological tripos. Value about 9*l.* Founded in the University of Cambridge by friends of the Rev. George Williams, formerly fellow of King's College, 1882.

Will's Coffee House. In the reign of Charles II. near Covent Garden, at the western corner of Bow Street. It was the great emporium of libels and scandals, but was one of the best in London, and had acquired the sobriquet of 'the Wits' Coffee-house.' Here the frequenters heard the talk of the town about the poets, authors, and other celebrities, and here was the 'Observator,' and all the Tory and Whig journals of the day; and here would be found Matthew Prior, John Dryden, Betterton the tragedian, and other celebrities.

Wills and Uses (The two Statutes of), 1634. Passed by the Irish parliament, giving to the crown of England a share and interest in the education of the heirs-apparent of the great families of Ireland. Of course, the object was to bring them up Protestants, like the son of the Earl of Ormond, formerly the king's ward.

Winchester. Henry III. of England was surnamed Winchester from the place in which he was born (1206, 1216–1272).

Winchester (The Statute of), 1285. A renewal of the 'Assize of Arms' (q.v.), i.e. basing the preservation of public order on the strict enforcement of the local system of frank-pledge. By this statute every man was bound to hold himself in readiness for the king's service, every man was to join in the hue and cry after felons, every district was held responsible for all crimes committed within its bounds, the gates of every town were required to be closed at nightfall, every stranger was required to give an account of himself to a magistrate, and all brushwood and cover for thieves was to be destroyed for 200 feet on each side of a high road.

Winchester Book (The). The register of King Alfred's survey of England drawn up by his council at Winchester.

Winchester College [Seinte Marie College of Wynchestre], 1887. Founded by William of Wykeham, bishop of Winchester.

The famous dulce domum is still sung in the courts of the college before the breaking up of the school for long vacation. It is very funny that the solecism should have so caught the fancy.

Winchester Reading Prizes (The). For reading classical English poetry and prose, the scriptures and liturgy. Two prizes of the value of 40*l.*, two-thirds to be given to the best reader, and one-third to the second best. Founded in the University of Cambridge by an anonymous donor in 1886.

Wind, Protestant and Popish. See p. 718, 'Protestant.'

Windsor Prophecy (The), 1712. A scurrilous set of verses by Swift, afterwards dean of St. Patrick's, Dublin. In this 'prophecy' Elizabeth duchess of Somerset is called 'Carrots' for her red hair, and is accused of assassinating Thomas Thynne of Longleat, her second husband. She was daughter and heiress of Joceline duke of Northumberland, and married Lord Ogle, son of the Duke of Newcastle, when only 11 years old. She was a widow at 18, and married Thomas Thynne, who was shot by Count Königsmark, a German adventurer. Being thus a widow again at the age of 14, she took for her third husband the Duke of Somerset, who died 1748.

But England, dear England, if I understand,
Beware of Carrots from Northumberland (daughter of . . .)
Carrots, however Thynne, a deep root may get (second husband),
If so be they are in Summer-set (third husband).
Their Cunning's-mark thou, for I have been told (shot Thynne)
They assassine when young and poison when old.
Root out those Carrots, thou whose name
Spelt backwards and forwards is always the same (Anna or Queen Anne),
And keep close to thee always that name
Which backwards and forwards is almost the same (Mrs. Masham).
And England, wouldst thou be happy still,
Bury those Carrots under a Hill,
(Mrs. Masham's maiden name was Abigail Hill).

When Swift's name was given to the queen for the vacant see of Hereford the Duchess of Somerset set her face against the appointment, and Swift lost his bishopric. The ostensible plea against him was his 'Tale of a Tub.'

Windsor Soap. 'Soapy Sam,' Bishop of Oxford. Called 'Soap' from an inscription on the porch of Cuddesdon College. S. Oxon was the founder and Alfred Potts the first principal. The bishop himself observed the curious combination of letters S.O., A.P. 'Windsor' was added because Samuel Wilberforce was a great favourite with the court at Windsor (1805–1873).

Samuel Wilberforce was transferred to Winchester.

Windy Cap. Eric king of Sweden, second to none, says Olaus Magnus, in magical arts, was so familiar with evil spirits that what way soever he turned his cap the wind would presently blow that way. Historia de Gentibus Septentrionalibus, Romæ, 1555.

Wines of Africa and Asia. Bithynian wine from the Mersites grape was of a very choice quality. The wines of Byblos, in Phœnicia, vied in fragrancy with Lesbian wine. The white wines of Mareotis and Tænia, in Lower Egypt, were of unrivalled excellence; the former was sometimes called Alexandrian. The wine of Merŏe resembled Falernian (Lucan, 'Pharsalia,' x. 161). Tæniotic wine was greenish, luscious, and aromatic. The wine of Antylla, in the vicinity of Alexandria, and the Sebennytic wines were also commended.

On the mountain of Tmōlus, in Lydia, was produced a brown wine, described as first rate by Virgil and Galen. The Scybellitēs of Galatia was thick and sweet. The Ahatēs of Cilicia was a sweet red wine. The Tibenum, the Arsynium, and the Titucazenum were of lighter growth, the first two being dry red wines, and the last a sweet wine of paler colour.

Wines of Ancient Greece. The earliest wine was the Maronĕan, a sweet black wine, so called from the district where it was made, which was on the coast of Thrace. Usually mixed with twenty parts of water; in Pliny's time with only eight parts of water; Sciathos, another black wine of lighter quality, being drunk half and half. Pramnian, a dry red wine, made from grapes grown on the Pramnian hill, in the island of Icaros. Corinthian wine, so astringent that Alexis declares it was real torture to drink it ('Athen.' i. 24). The luscious sweet wines were Lesbian, Chian, Thasian, Corcyrian, Cyprian, Cretan, Cnidian, and Rhodian, all white wines. The Saprian (qy. Chian) wine was famous for its aroma; the Lesbian had less aroma, but was very delicious. Pliny places the Clazomenian wine of Ionia in the first rank. Virgil calls the Phanean the king of wines. Of light wines we have the Mendean (from Mende, in Thrace), a white wine; the Argitis ('Georgics,' ii. 99), and Omphacitēs.

Winter King (The). Frederick V. (who married Elizabeth, daughter of James I. of England), who was crowned at Prague king of Bohemia, 25 Oct., 1619, and was driven from the throne by the Catholics, 8 Nov., 1620. He was king for one winter and no more.

Frederick, elector palatine, was made king of Bohemia in opposition to Kaiser Ferdinand II.

Winter Queen (The). Elizabeth, daughter of James I. of Great Britain, and wife of Frederick V. the 'Winter King.'

Winters (Cold). 1709, the severest winter on record. The following were cold winters:

1067. Thousands of travellers in Germany were frozen to death.
1133. Wine casks in France and Spain were frozen, and many trees in Italy were split by the frost.
1179. The snow up to Easter was eight feet deep in Austria.
1233. The Po was frozen over.
1236. The Danube was frozen to the very bottom. The Cattegat between Norway and Jutland was also frozen.
1281. Many houses in Austria were actually buried in snow.
1292. Travellers passed on the ice from Norway to Jutland. The Rhine was frozen over.
1814. All the rivers of Italy were frozen.
1323. Travellers passed on the ice from Dantzic to Denmark.
1364. The sea at Venice was frozen.
1408. Travellers passed on the ice from Norway to Denmark.
1434. It snowed forty days and forty nights in Germany without intermission.
1468. Wine in casks and bottles throughout all Europe was frozen.
1580. The Great and Little Belt were frozen over.
1622. The Hellespont was frozen over.
1658. Charles X. led his whole army over the ice from Holstein to Denmark.
1692. The Zuyder-Zee was entirely frozen over.
1684. Coaches plied on the Thames.
1709-10 was infinitely colder than any of the preceding. The frost penetrated three yards (!) into the ground. The olive plantations in France were utterly destroyed. Birds died by thousands, and trees with vegetables were killed in all directions. The Adriatic was frozen over, so was the coast of the Mediterranean about Genoa.
1729 was a continued frost from October to May 1730.
1740 was the coldest winter known except that of 1709.
1744 was a severe winter.
1776. Wine was frozen in the cellars in France and Holland. And in England the destruction of birds and fishes was frightful.
1794 was a continuous frost from 24 Dec. to 14 Feb., 1795.
1795. Dec. 25 was the coldest day ever known in London. Fahr. thermom. was 16° below zero (!).
1814. A fair was held on the Thames.

1848. On one occasion the mercury in the thermometer was frozen.
1860 was one of the severest winters ever known in Britain. On Christmas Day the thermometer on the grass stood 15° below zero Fahrenheit. The three coldest days were 24, 25, 26 Dec.
 Remember 32° is freezing, so that—16°=48° of frost. Apparently a correct observation.

Winton Domesday (The). Containing two surveys of the city of Winchester: one made between 1107 and 1128, and the other made in 1148. Published by Sir Henry Ellis in the second of the supplementary volumes of Domesday Book, 1816.

Wire Age (The). The Golden Age, the Silver Age, the Age of Bronze, and the Iron Age have had their day, and we now live in the Wire Age. Every street and almost every road is crowded with telegraph wires, which are stretched over our houses and sunk under our seas. Our books are stitched with wire, our clocks set by wire, our watches run by wire, our politics are managed by wire; we announce our wants, our news, our going and coming by wire; use wire covers for our meat, wire sieves, and wire pulls for our gongs; we sleep on wire mattresses, and indeed in every department of life wire is our slave (1890).

Wisconsin (U.S. America). So called in 1836 from its river of the same name. The inhabitants are nicknamed Badgers.

Wisest Fool in Christendom (The). James I. of England was so called by Sully, the French politician (1566, 1603–1625).

Witch of Eye (The). Marjory Jourdemain, with whom Dame Eleanor Cobham, the mistress and afterwards wife of the 'Good duke Humphrey [Duke of Gloucester], protector of the realm in the minority of his nephew Henry VI., Dame Eleanor was accused of sorcery with intent to bewitch the king and raise her husband to the throne.' Marjory was burnt as a witch at Smithfield, 1441.

Witchcraft. So late as 1805 a woman was tried at Kirkcudbright for witchcraft, and actually sentenced to a year's imprisonment, and to be set once a quarter in the pillory. Elspeth Rule in 1709 was tried in Dumfries in the Court of Justiciary, and condemned for witchcraft to have her cheek branded with a hot iron. Documents referring to Elspeth M'Ewen, who was burnt to death in a tar-barrel for witchcraft in 1697 at Kirkcudbright, have recently been unearthed, in which is this item: 'Payed to Robert Creighton . . . 8 shill Scots for beating the drum at Elspet M'Queen's funeral, and to James Carsson his wife threeten shillings drunken by Elspet's executioner at seall times.'

That is, James Carsson's wife.

Witches' Hammer (The), 15th cent. An infamous document drawn up by John Gremper, an ecclesiastic, laying down with great minuteness the characteristics of witches and wizards, the skin-marks to be sought for, the familiar which clung to them in the shape of cat, dog, goat, or other pet animal, and the questions to be asked in order to convict them out of their own mouths.

Pope Innocent VIII. led the way to this witch persecution by his bull of 1484, which charged the Inquisitors and all true Catholics diligently to search out and put to death all who practised the diabolical arts of witchcraft, magic, sorcery, and enchantment.

Wit'ena-gemo'te (The). The mote or council of wise men. In Saxon times each kingdom, before 827, had its separate gemote, but after that date there was one general assembly composed of ecclesiastics, aldermen, and large landholders, held every Christmas, Easter, and Whitsuntide. In the year 934 the gemote (2 syl.) was attended by King Athelstan, 4 Welsh princes, 2 archbishops, 17 bishops, 4 abbots, 12 dukes, and 52 thanes. The Witena-gemote ordained the king's succession, made laws and treaties, levied taxes, regulated military and church affairs, and was a supreme court of justice. See 'Shire-mote.'

Witena is the gen. plural of the Anglo-Saxon witta, a wise man (verb witan, 'to know'—our 'wit'), and gemote is an assembly, from the verb metan, 'to meet together.' The king presided in his robes of state.

Witling of Terror (The). Bertrand Barère de Vieuzac, president of the National Convention in 1792. So called from the flowery language in which he spoke on all measures of the reign of terror. Also called the 'Anacreon of the Guillotine.'

Wives of the English Kings.

I. Before the Conquest:—

Egbert	...	Lady Redburga.
Ethelwolf	...	Lady Osburga, whose father was the Great Butler of England (mother of Alfred the Great).

Alfred	1. Judith daughter of Charles the Bald of France. 2. Ethelswitha or Answinta daughter of the Earl of Mercia.

George II.	Wilhelmina daughter of John Frederick margrave of Anspach.
George III.	Charlotte of Mecklenburgh-Strelitz.
George IV.	Caroline princess of Brunswick.
William IV. ...	Adelaide daughter of the Duke of Saxe-Meiningen.
	(Victoria married Albert second son of Ernest duke of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha.)

* Cromwell married Elizabeth daughter of Sir James Bouchier of Essex.

Wizard of the Sea (The). Capt. Kidd, 17th cent. Executed for piracy 12 May, 1701.

Wolf of America (The). Montgomery, who led the attack on Quebec in 1775. The English Wolfe took Quebec, and fell in the hour of victory; Montgomery tried to take it, but failed, being killed in the hour of defeat.

Wolf of Badenoch (The). Sir Alexander Stewart, fourth son of Robert II. by his first wife Elizabeth, daughter of Sir William Mure of Rowallan, who was related to him within the prohibited degrees and was divorced. Sir Alexander, who was earl of Buchan, was fierce and savage as a wolf.

Some say he was grandson of Robert II., and third son of Robert duke of Albany.

Wolf of Plinlimmon (The). Gwenwyn prince of Powys Land during the reign of Henry II.

Wolsey of Hungary (The). The Cardinal Martinuzzi (16th cent.).

Wolsey's Foundation at Oxford, 1524. Called 'Cardinal College.' In 1546 the name was changed to 'Christ Church College.'

Woman-flogger (The). Julius Jakob baron von Haynau (1786–1853). An Austrian general who signalized himself during the Italian campaigns of 1848–1849 by ruthless cruelty. His flogging of women refers to his treatment of the defeated Hungarians, and his infamy excited the detestation of all Europe. In 1850 he came to England and visited the brewery of Barclay &

Perkins in London, when he was assaulted by the draymen and narrowly escaped with his life. He afterwards visited Belgium and France, and was received with strong demonstrations of popular hatred.

Women (The Four Perfect). Miriam sister of Moses, Mary mother of Jesus, Cadijah the first wife of Mahomet, and Fatima his daughter.

Women's Rights. A political movement first started in 1851 by the 'Westminster Review.' It includes the right of suffrage, for which a petition was presented to parliament in 1866. Their industrial rights include admission to the Universities and the right of engaging in the higher professions. The third claim is the right of married women to hold and bequeath property.

In 1869 the municipal franchise was conferred on women. Several colleges for women have been opened in Cambridge and Oxford; and the Women's Property Act enables them both to hold and bequeath property.

Wonderful Boy of Devizes (The). Sir Thomas Lawrence, born at Bristol, the great painter of portraits. Died 1830 at the age of sixty.

Wonderful Boys.

Baratier (Johann Philip), 1721–1740. German. At the age of five he knew Greek, Latin, and French, besides his native German. At nine he knew Hebrew and Chaldee, and could translate German into Latin. At thirteen he could translate Hebrew into French, or vice versâ. His life was written by Formey, and an account of him is inserted in most biographical dictionaries.

Bassle (Gustave Adolph). In the first half of the 19th cent. exhibited his wonderful powers at Willis's Rooms under the patronage of the Duke of Sussex. About 20,000 questions had been prepared by the duke's authority, and were circulated amongst the audience. These questions were in sacred and profane history, chronology, physical science, mythology, statistics, arithmetic, geography, cosmography, and natural history. Any one of the audience might put any question to the boy, or as many as he pleased, in any order, and the boy instantly answered without a mistake. Several members of the British Association were present, and took part in the function.

It was said that much of this was due to the science of 'sunemonics,' a predecessor of 'mnemonics.'

Betty (William Henry West). Made his début in London as an actor in 1803, being about twelve years of age. In fifty-six nights he realised 34,000*l*., and with wonderful sagacity retired into private life. He died in 1874 at the age of 84.

The greatest mark of genius was his retirement in the full tide of his popularity.

Bidder (George Parker). At the age of six amused himself by counting up to a million. He became an engineer, and baffled the parliamentary counsel on contested railway bills by confuting their statements of figures before the words were out of their mouths. In 1856 he showed to the members of the Institution of Civil Engineers that these calculations were not made by dodges, but seriatim, only with inconceivable rapidity (b. 1800).

Buxton (Jedediah), son of a schoolmaster. On hearing a sermon he would tell at once how many words the preacher had spoken. If a period of time was mentioned, he would instantly calculate how many seconds had elapsed since then to the time. He was taken to see Garrick in 'Richard III.,' but his sole amusement was to count the number of words he uttered. He once set himself to reckon how much a farthing would amount to if doubled 140 times; the answer contained thirty-nine figures representing pounds. In 1750 he reckoned how many grains of eight different kinds of corn and pulse would cover 200,000 miles, and how many hairs would make an inch. What is strange is this—he could suspend a calculation at any moment, and take it up again hours or days afterwards. (1704–1775.)

Candiac (Jean Louis Elizabeth de Montcalm de), we are told, knew his letters when an infant in arms. At three years he could read fluently both Latin and French either in print or MS. At four he could translate Latin. At five he could translate the most difficult Latin authors. At six he could read Greek and Hebrew, was good at arithmetic, history, heraldry, geography, and the science of medals. At seven years of age he had read the chief poets, orators, historians, philosophers, grammarians, &c. But he died before he had completed his seventh year. (1719–1726.)

Dictionnaire d'Education, 1819, and most biographical dictionaries, under the word 'Montcalm.'

His elder brother Louis Joseph marquis de Montcalm (born 1712) commanded the French army in Canada and defeated Abercromby; but was mortally wounded in 1759 under the walls of Quebec.

COLBURN (Zerah). A native of Vermont, in the United States; came to London in 1812, being eight years old, and answered most complicated problems, such as raising 8 to the sixteenth power; giving the square root of 106,929, the cube root of 268,336,125; and how many seconds in fifty years. He never required above a second or two for his answer, but knew nothing of arithmetic. Zerah had more than the usual number of fingers and toes, so had his father and brothers. Later, his mathematical powers disappeared to a great extent. (1804–1840.)

HEINECKEN (Christian Heinrich). At one year old knew the chief events of the Pentateuch! At thirteen months he knew the history of the Old Testament! At fourteen months he knew the history of the New Testament! At two-and-a-half years of age he could answer any ordinary question of history or geography. And at three years old he knew French and Latin, as well as his native German. The life of this boy was written by Schœneich, his tutor, and his name, like that of Baratier, is inserted in most biographical dictionaries. (1721–1725.)

MANGIAMETE (Nito). A Sicilian, son of a shepherd. At eleven years old (July, 1839) he was examined by Arago, Lacroix, Libri, Sturm, and others, sent for the purpose by the Academy of Science in Paris. He was asked to give the cube root of 3,796,416, which he answered in one minute; he gave the 10th root of 282,475,249 in three minutes. He was then asked by M. Arago, 'What number has the following proportions: if the cube is added to five times its square, and then 42 times the number, and the number 42 be subtracted from the result, the remainder will be 0?' Before M. Arago had finished his question the boy answered 5.

VISCOUNT (Ennius), we are told, could 'read Greek and Latin, as well as his own language [Italian], before he was four years old. He was exhibited as a prodigy between the age of four and five, and submitted to a public examination. Viscount died in 1818, aged sixty-seven.

Wonderful Castle (The). The palace built of stone at Tuam by Roderic O'Connor (1161). Castles were till the 12th cent. built of wood in Ireland.

Probably there were stone or brick structures in Ireland before the 12th century, as, for example, the Round Towers, but they were so rare that the palace of Tuam was called 'Wonderful.'

Wonderful Doctor (The). 'Doctor Mirabilis,' Roger Bacon (1214–1292). A Franciscan monk, born at Ilchester, in Somersetshire. His chief work is called 'Opus Majus.' He looked with contempt on 'Scholastic Theology.'

Wonderful Parliament (The), or 'Wonder-making Parliament,' 3 Feb., 1388. Convened by Thomas [Plantagenet] duke of Gloucester in the reign of his nephew Richard II. The chancellor, De la Pole, having been impeached in 1386 by the commons, the duke proceeded to establish a permanent council of fourteen, consisting of his own partisans, to inquire into everything in the king's household, the ministry, the law courts, and the condition of the people. Gloucester was at the head, and the king, now nearly twenty-one years of age, was virtually deposed. All sovereign prerogatives for five months lay with the council. The king protested, the judges declared the proceedings unconstitutional and the parliament guilty of treason. The king impeached the chief members, but Gloucester, at the head of 40,000 men, compelled the king to give way, and resolved to depose him. Several of the king's friends were arrested, and some were put to death. Strangest of all, it declared that its judgments should never be reversed, nor its acts repealed. It was dissolved 3 June, 1388. See p. 664, 'Parliament.'

Wood of the Cross (The). There is an ingenious legend that when Adam was buried at Hebron three trees sprang from his dead body. David transplanted these trees to Jerusalem, where they amalgamated into one. Solomon felled the tree, intending to use it for the principal of the Temple, but being too short it was laid on one side. The Jews used this very tree for the Cross, and after the crucifixion it was buried for more than 200 years, when it was discovered in a cave during the visit of Helĕna, the emperor's mother, to Jerusalem.

This can hardly be called a legend; it is a mere allegory, to connect the first with the second

Adam; the trinity with unity; and the short coming of the law with the everlasting gospel.

Wood Silver. A payment of money instead of wood for the manor fires by a tenant farmer (14th cent.).

Wood's Halfpence, 1724. Halfpence coined for Ireland by William Wood, an iron and copper founder of Wolverhamptom. There had long been a deficiency of copper coin in Ireland, and the government contracted with Mr. Wood to supply 108,000 pounds' worth of halfpence and farthings, of stated weight and fineness. Sir Isaac Newton, master of the mint, was fully satisfied with the way the contract had been carried out, and said that, although the weight of the Irish coin was a trifle less than that of the English copper money, yet Wood had fully compensated for this difference by superior fineness. Dean Swift, for political purposes, ran down the new coin both in prose and verse. One of his verses runs thus—

The halfpence are coming, the nation's undoing,
There's an end of your ploughing, and baking, and brewing,
In that you must all go to rack and to ruin.
See 'Drapier's Letters.'

Woodland Party (The). The Bianchi faction (q.v.), so called from the Cerchi, who lived in woodland (=rural) districts when Dante in exile was thrown amongst them.

Woodstock Ghost (The), 1649. A trick played on the commissioners sent by the Long Parliament to take possession of the house. The ghost was one of the commissioners' clerks, named Giles Sharp, who played his part so well that his companions fled from Woodstock in terror. The secret was kept till the Revolution.

The real name of Giles Sharp was Joseph Collins, a concealed Royalist, who had lived at Woodstock and knew every hole and cranny intimately.

Woodwardian Professor of Geology. Value 500*l.* a year. Founded in the University of Cambridge by Dr. Woodward, 1727. See 'Harkness Scholarship,' 'Sedgwick Prize.'

Woo-taë in Chinese history means 'The period of the Five Races.' During the first part of this period the empire was divided into southern and northern; the imperial line reigned in the southern empire, with Nankin as the seat of government. The seat of government of the northern empire was Ho-nân. In A.D. 534 the northern empire was split into the eastern or Tong-Oeï, and the western or Si-Oeï. In 587 the three empires were united again under the 12th imperial dynasty, that of Swi. The founder was a cobbler named Lieu-yu, and when he usurped the throne he was named Voo-tee III. The contemporary kings of the northern empire were Tao-Voo-tee and Ming-yuen-tee. The capital of the southern empire was Nân-kin, and of the northern empire Ho-nân.

The five races were Tsong, Tsee, Lèang, Tchin, and Swi, including the 6th, 9th, 10th, 11th, and 12th imperial dynasties.
 Voo means warrior, and tee means ruler.

Worcester College, Oxford, 1714. Founded by Sir Thomas Cookes. The head-master is called the Provost. It was originally called Gloucester Hall, and was used by the monks of St. Peter, Gloucester.

Working-men's Association (The), 1838. A title assumed by the Chartists (q.v.).

Works of Supererogation, 1274. The belief that our Saviour's sufferings were more than sufficient for the sins of the world, and hence good works were an extra stock which might be applied to balance off evil works. As saints abounded in good works they accumulated a stock of merits which could be applied for the benefit of others or for redemption of souls from purgatory.

Workshop Regulation Act (The), 1867 (30 & 31 Vict. c. 146), provides:

1. That no child under the age of 8 shall be employed in any handicraft.

2. That no child under 13 shall be employed for more than 6½ hours a day, between 6 a.m. and 8 p.m.

3. That no young person under 18 and no woman shall be employed more than 12 hours, between 5 a.m. and 9 p.m., with an hour and a half interval at least for meals.

4. Except in retail business no child or woman shall be employed after 2 o'clock on Saturdays.

5. No child under 11 shall in any wise be employed in grinding or fustian cutting.

Worms (The Diet of), 1521. Convened by Karl V. to put down the new opinions in religion. Luther was summoned, and defended himself; but the diet convicted him of heresy, and issued an edict for his apprehension, and the committal of his books to the flames. The Elector of Saxony concealed him for nine months, and he escaped.

Worship of Reason (The), 1793. A substitute for Christianity in the first French republic. It was the beauty of virtue and the arbitrament of reason. 7 Nov., 1793, Mgr. Gobet, archbishop of Paris, with a multitude of other ecclesiastics, went to the Hall of the Convention, and there solemnly resigned their functions and renounced the Christian religion. It was then decreed that the deities of France should thenceforth be Liberty, Equality, and Reason. The word 'God' was prohibited, and all Christian rites were abolished. A procession was then made to Notre Dame, where an actress was seated on the altar to represent the Goddess of Reason.

Worsley's Act (Lord), 1836 (6 & 7 Will. IV.). The General Enclosure Act. Nine years after came a more general Act for the enclosure of commons (1845).

Wranglers, 1753. In the University of Cambridge. Originally the Tripos consisted of Senior Optimes (3 syl.), Junior Optimes, and the Poll-men, or Οἱ πολλοί. But in 1753 the first class was divided, and the best men were made into a new division called Wranglers. The Poll-men were then cut off, and the Tripos consisted only of the three honour classes called Wranglers, Senior Optimes, and Junior Optimes. The first word referred to the disputations, or acts held in the school, which, being highly satisfactory, the moderator complimented the respondent by saying to him Summo ingenii acumine disputasti ('You have wrangled excellently'). To the other honour men he said Optime disputasti (for Junior Optimes), and Optime quidem disputasti (for Senior Optimes).

'Wright of Derby.' Joseph Wright (1734–1797), a celebrated landscape painter born at Derby. His landscapes are noted for elegance of outline and judicious management of light and shade.

Writ of Habeas Corpus (16 Car. I. c. 10). A.D. 1641. It enacts (1) that any person arrested for a bailable offence shall be set at liberty upon giving the awarded bail, with an assurance to appear and answer the charge when duly called upon so to do; (2) that officers shall not evade this law by shifting about the custody of a prisoner under a penalty of 100*l.* for the first offence and 200*l.* for the second; (3) no person delivered by habeas corpus shall be re-committed; (4) every person charged with an offence shall, if he requires it, be tried in the next session; (5) no prisoner shall be sent out of his own country to be tried. Thus an Englishman cannot be sent to Scotland, Ireland, the Channel Isles, or to any of the Colonies.

There are four other provisions, but they rather pertain to the legal profession than to the general public.

Writer to the Signet, or 'Clerk to the Signet.' A Scotch attorney of the highest class. At one time the clerks so called were in the office of the Secretary of State, where writs that passed under the royal signet were prepared.

Würzburg (Patron Saint of). St. Kilian, an Irishman, who converted a duke of Würzburg, and was assassinated by Geila, who was his brother's wife. Kilian told the duke it was unlawful to live with Geila, and the exasperated woman sent an assassin to murder Kilian while he was celebrating midnight service. Geilah = Gy-lah.

Wyatt's Rebellion, 1553–1554. Sir Thomas Wyatt the Younger formed a confederacy to oppose the marriage of Queen Mary with Philip II. of Spain. He marched on London, and the train-bands who were sent against him under the command of the Duke of Norfolk deserted in a mass to the rebel. Wyatt pushed on to Temple Bar, which was closed against him. He surrendered to Sir M. Berkeley, was committed to the Tower, tried, convicted, and beheaded.

Xabatatenses (Wooden shoes), so the Waldenses (q.v.) were called from xabatata (a wooden sandal), worn in imitation of the apostles.

Yankee. A name of badinage applied to the North Americans by the English, but accepted with pride and satisfaction by all true-hearted Americans. It was originally the corruption of the word Anglois by the American Indians. Jonathan Hastings, a farmer of Cambridge, in New England, in 1713, used the word as a synonym of excellence. 'It is Yankee good,' or good as if English made; and the people of the other colonies jocosely called the New Englanders 'Jonathan Yankees,' and sometimes shortened the phrase either into Jonathan or into Yankee.

Yankee Doodle. The name of a well-known tune, one of the 'national airs' of the U.S.; also a doggerel song set to that tune.

Yassanian Dynasty (The). The fourth of the fabulous dynasties of Persia. The two names given are Shah Yassan the founder, and Yassan Ajem the last of the race. It was preceded by the Kuleev dynasty, and followed by the Paishdadians (q.v.).

Yatagan, a Turkish sabre worn in the sash.

Napoleon publishes his Berlin decree, 21 Nov., 1806.

Year Books. Reports. These year-books are extant in an unbroken series from Edward II. to Henry VIII., and were made by the court scribes (prothonotaries) at the expense of the crown, and published annually.

Year of Confusion (The), B.C. 46, which consisted of sixteen months (445 days). It was the year A.U.C. 708 when Julius Cæsar inserted (beside the intercalary month of twenty-three days) two extraordinary months between Nov. and Dec., one of thirty-three days and the other of thirty-four days, in order to adjust the year according to the course of the sun. To prevent the recurrence of any future confusion, he reformed the calendar, making it to consist of 365 days and a leap year of 366 days, instead of 355 and the mensis intercalaris attributed to Numa.

The reform was the work of Sosigènes of Alexandria, who introduced the terms kalends, nones, and ides, to designate certain divisions of the Roman month. Kalends the first day of the month, when the priest called out or announced to the people the day of the new moon. Nones, nine days before the Ides. The Ides were the 15th of March, May, July, and October, but the 13th of the other eight months.

Year of Death (The), A.D. 687, is so called by the Arabian historians because of the terrible plague which desolated Syria. As many as 25,000 men of the army of the Kalif Omar, encamped before Jerusalem, fell victims. Next year it desolated Aleppo and Antioch.

Year of Destruction (The), A.D. 639, is so called by the Arabs from the dreadful plague which broke out at Medîna. It was preceded by violent hailstorms which destroyed enormous quantities of corn.

Year of Jubilee (The). Every fiftieth year among the Jewish race, when all lands returned to their original owners and all slaves were set free.

Year of Liberty (The), 1648. After the execution of Charles I. his statues in the Royal Exchange and in other places were taken down, and the following inscription was substituted by Act of Parliament: 'Exit Tyrannus, Regum ultimus, Anno Libertatis Angliæ restitutæ primo, A.D. 1648, Jan. 30' (old style).

Year of Revolutions (The), 1848. The Chartist demonstration in this country; the third of France; the insurrections of Italy; revolutions in Hungary and Austria.

Year of the Deputations (The). The eighth of the Hedjrah (A.D. 630), when, after the victory near Taïf, deputations flocked from various tribes to pay homage to Mohammed.

Yellow and Blue, in China. The followers of Lamaism wear yellow robes, the imperial colour, because Lamaism was promulgated in China by a son-in-law of the emperor. The other twelve sects wear blue.

Yellow Book (The). Reports of the inspectors of schools for England, Wales, and Scotland. So called from the yellow cover.

Yellow Books (The). In France, the government reports, papers, and other official documents are stitched in yellow covers. So are the government reports of foreign affairs. See p. 106, 'Blue Books.'

Yellow Caps. The caps worn in France before the 15th cent. were round as of a yellow colour, like the stockings our Blue-coat boys.

In Italy Jews were obliged to wear yellow caps as a badge. And Shylock ought to have such a head-dress.

Yellow Caps (Rebellion of the). In China in the reign of Han-ling-tee (168–189). This formidable insurrection, headed by Tchang-keo, received its distinctive name from the caps worn by the insurgents, which were all of the imperial colour. Till 220 rebellion followed rebellion in quick succession, and between 220 and 266 China was divided into three states, called the San Kuo period.

Yellow in China is the imperial colour, which these insurgents adopted.

Yellow Division (The), or Brigade of Pentonville Prison. A convict goes through three grades during his sentence after the probation: (1) the third class, when he wears black facings on his jacket; (2) the yellow division or second class, when he can, if he likes, have tea for supper instead of 'skilly' or gruel; and (3) the first class, when he may have roast instead of boiled beef.

Yellow Dress (The). A dress worn by convicts who have attempted to escape, but have been captured and brought back. One half is a bright canary yellow and the other half a sombre drab. If the man has used violence, the penalty is a 'yellow dress and stangs' [irons], while the drab half is changed to deep black.

Yellow Fever (The). So called from the yellow tint which extends over the whole body, varying from a pale lemon to a deep orange colour. Havannah and Vera Cruz may be termed nurseries of this fatal disease, which attacks Europeans in Sept. and Oct. It seems to reappear in Europe about thirty times in a century.

It ravaged Antigua in 1816.
" Barbadoes in 1647 and 1691, where it was called the 'New Distemper.'
" Barcelona in 1821. Above 5,000 died.
" Cadiz for the first time in 1705, brought by a ship from America; since then in 1730, 1733, 1744, 1753, 1764, 1819, when it also attacked the dogs, cats, cattle, birds (even canaries), and was most fatal.
" Carthagena in 1793, where it produced dreadful havoc.
" Domingo (St.) in 1730, 1740, 1791, 1792-3, 1798, when 15,000 Englishmen and nearly the whole French garrison fell victims to it.
" Gaudeloupe in the autumn of 1813-4, 1819.
" Gibraltar in 1804, 1814, 1828.
" Guayaquil in 1740 and often since.
" Havannah is its nursery.
" Isla de Leon in 1819, 1828-9.
" Livorno in 1803, where it carried off 1,560 persons out of 5,500 who were attacked by it.
" Malaga in 1741, 1803, when 6,884 persons died; in 1804, when 13,583 persons were attacked.
" Massachusetts in 1618, but not severe.
" Mauritius in 1815.
" Mexico in 1545, 1576, 1736-7, 1761-2, 1807.
" New York in 1791.
" North America eight times between 1790 and 1805 (sundry parts).
" Philadelphia in 1699, 1762, when its violence was unparalleled; in 1793, 1797, 1802.
" Spain (various parts) in 1800, 1803, 1813.
" Vera Cruz, like Havannah, is a nursery of the disease.
" Virginia in 1609 and 1665, where its havoc was horrible.
" West Indies in 1732, 1739, 1745, 1762, and often since.

Yellow Flag (A). A yellow flag flying from a mast indicates that the vessel is in quarantine.

A black flag indicates a pirate, a red flag defiance, a white flag craves a truce.

Yellow Flags (The), or 'Yellow Flag Troops.' The Anamese mercenaries. In the Tonquin war, 1883, they were for a time French auxiliaries. Their standard was a yellow ensign, and their headquarters was Ho-Tang. See p. 97, 'Black Flags.'

Yellow Palace (The), or Khoosk e Zurd, one of the hunting-seats of Baharam Gour in Persia.

The Yellow Mountain, or 'Koh e Zurd,' is the source of the Zeinderood, on which Ispahan stands.

The Yellow Sea, or 'Whang Hai,' is an arm of the North Pacific, on the north-east of China.

Yellow River (The), or 'Hoang Ho.' Known generally as 'China's Sorrow.'

Yellow Robe (Order of the). A religious order founded by Buddha. The founder himself wore a yellow robe and carried an alms bowl.

But to his own, them of the Yellow Robe,
He taught how they should dwell;
How live, free from the snares of love and wealth;
What eat, and drink, and carry: three plain cloths,
Yellow, of stitched stuff, worn with shoulder bare—
A girdle, almsbowl, strainer. Thus he laid
That noble order of the Yellow Robe
Which to this day standeth.
EDWIN ARNOLD, The Light of Asia, bk. viii.

Yellow Stick (Religion of the). Scotland. The reformed religion.

[Livingstone] has . . . recorded a tradition that the people of [Ulva Isle] were converted from being Roman Catholics by the laird coming round with a man having a yellow staff . . . [and] the new religion went long afterwards . . . by the name of the 'Religion of the Yellow Stick.'—BLAIKIE, Personal Life of David Livingstone.

Dr. Blaikie adds: 'The same story is told of perhaps a dozen other places in the Highlands.' See 'Notes and Queries,' 18 July, 1889, p. 29.

Y'en Dynasty (The) of China (1279–1368) succeeded the dynasty of Song, and was succeeded by the Mings. Kublaï Khan was the founder. It was the twentieth imperial dynasty—that of the Moguls—gave ten kings, and lasted ninety years. The seat of government was Pe-kin.

China was at the time divided into two kingdoms, north and south of the Yellow River. The Song kings reigned in the south. It was the old, old tale. The reigning king, threatened by the Tartars, called in the aid of the Moguls. Kublaï Khan repelled the Tartars, then dethroned the Song kings, and then made himself master of the north also, thus uniting again North and South China.

Kublaï Khan was called by the Chinese 'Ho-pee-lie.' His regnal name in China was 'Shee-tsu,' and his reign is still called 'the Wise Government.'

Yeoman Usher (The). The deputy of the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod. See 'Black Rod.'

Yeomen of the Guard, or 'Beefeaters,' 1485. Instituted by Henry VII. It was a corps of fifty soldiers, whose duty it was to attend upon the king and wait on him at meals.

It used to be generally supposed that 'Beefeater' was a corruption of the English-French buffet-er or buffetier, 'one who waits at the buffet.' That there is no such French word as buffetier is no argument against such a perversion. We have a small host of English-French words equally ignored in Paris. Take, for example, encore=the French bis, surtout=pardessus, while the French surtout=the English epergne. Nom de plume is English-French, in imitation of nom de guerre.

Yn (Dynasty of), B.C. 1401–1122. The latter part of the Chang dynasty was so called from the city Yn, where the court was held. The court had been previously held at Yang-tching, but Poan-keng, the seventeenth emperor of the Chang dynasty, moved his court to Yn (B.C. 1401), and changed the name of the dynasty from Chang to Yn.

This must not be confounded with the Y'en Dynasty. See above.

Ynglings of Norway (The). It is said that a family of Ynglings reigned in Norway from 863 to 1136, but the whole of this part of Norwegian history is very doubtful. The Ynglings of Norway were contemporaneous with the Skioldungs of Sweden, as will appear from the following lists:—

Norway Ynglings.	A.D.	Swedish Skioldungs.	A.D.
Harald Haarfagen I.	863	Emund of the race of Ivar.	859
Eric I. Blodæxe ...	933	Erik Emundson.	873
Hako I. the Good	936	Biorn Erikson.	923

Magnus II.	1066	Halstan.	1066
Olaf III.	1069	Inge I.	1080
Magnus III.... ...	1087
Olaf IV.	1103	Philip.	1112
Sigurd I.	1122	Inge II.	1118
Magnus IV.	1130	Sverker, founder of the race of Sverker.	1122
Harald IV. ...	1135–1136

Ynglings of Sweden (The). A semi-historic race of Swedish kings from B.C. 70 to A.D. 647. So called from Yngve, son of Odin, to whom at death he assigned Sweden. The Ynglings of Sweden were not kings of all Sweden, but chiefs of Upsāla, and overlords of the other chiefs. They gave twenty-four chiefs, and were succeeded by the Skioldungs.

Yoke of Infamy. Three spears arranged like a gallows, under which conquered troops were made to march in token of subjection. (A Roman custom.)

Yorick. The pen-name of Laurence Sterne, who died in 1768, at the age of fifty-five.

York (Frederick Duke of), son of George III., commander-in-chief. He was obliged to resign his office owing to the exposure of a wholesale traffic in army commissions, carried on by his mistress Mrs. Clarke.

York (The Line of) gives England three kings, viz. Edward IV., Edward V., and Richard III., through Lionel duke of Clarence, third son of Edward III.

Lionel was the father of Philippa, who married Edward Mortimer earl of March, and their son was Roger Mortimer earl of March, who was slain in Ireland 1398.

This Roger Mortimer was father of EDMUND MORTIMER earl of March, and of ANN MORTIMER who married Richard duke of York.

* * At the death of Richard II. EDMUND MORTIMER was heir to the throne. He died 1424. It was in Sept. 1399 that Henry IV. deposed Richard II. and usurped the throne, being succeeded by Henry V. (his son) and Henry VI.

Now take ANN MORTIMER. She was the mother of Richard duke of York (slain, in 1460, at the battle of Wakefield), leaving two sons, EDWARD IV. and RICHARD III. Edward V. was the son of Edward IV., and was murdered by his uncle Richard.

York (The Statute of), 12 Edward II., A.D. 1318. Ordered that all black money (noir monnoie) lately current in the realm be excluded. This base coin was introduced from foreign countries, and probably from Ireland also, for in 1339 black money, called turneys, was current in Ireland.

York (Trial of the Duke of), 1809. Colonel Wardle accused the Duke of York in the House of Commons of promoting improper persons to military rank through the influence of a Mrs. Clarke. An inquiry was made and the duke acquitted. Such things were common enough till the middle of the nineteenth century. 'Douceurs' [to mistresses] were even advertised in the daily press. I well remember when the 'Times' discontinued these advertisements.

This was Frederick duke of York, second son of George III.

York Prize (The) for an essay on the law of primogeniture. For any graduate of the University of Cambridge of not more than seven years' standing. The same person may receive the prize more than once. Value about 90*l.* Founded by Edmund York of St. Catharine's Hall, 1875.

Young Chevalier (The). The Prince Charles Edward [Stuart]. Also called the 'Young Pretender' [i.e. to the British throne], 1720–1788.

Young Clerical School (The), 1890. To draw more closely together the religious party and the masses. M. de Mun (in France), M. Decurtius (in Switzerland), and a large number of German and Austrian Catholics have made numerous journeys to Rome, and have succeeded in forming a very influential party at the Vatican. The pope (Leo XIII.) is in favour of the movement, and hopes thereby to solve the great labour question.

A man who styled himself 'General' Booth, because he was head of a religious society termed by him 'the Salvation Army,' said, in the autumn of 1890, that if he was entrusted with 100,000*l.* he would solve the great 'labour question.' In December, 1890, above 80,000*l.* had been subscribed. Mr. (General) Booth issued a book to explain his scheme, but it has not yet been put in operation (1891).

Young England, about 1840. A group of clever politicians with fantastic ideas who for a time commanded considerable attention. The chief of the party were Benjamin Disraeli [Lord Beaconsfield], Lord John Manners, George Sydney Smithe [Lord Strangford], Cochrane-Wishart-Baillie [Lord Lamington], and many others distinguished in oratory and literature. Their platform was laughed at by practical men as Utopian, and quietly sank out of notice.

Young Englanders. A set of young men who tried to revive the formality and court manners of the Chesterfield school. They wore white waistcoats, patronised the pet poor, looked down upon shopkeepers, and were altogether Red Tape Knights.

In 1882-3 Oscar Wilde made himself ridiculous by trying to introduce the 'esthetic foolery' both in taste, dress, and manners.

Young Europe, 1834. An Italian journal which took the place of 'Young Italy' (q.v.), and tried to propagate the same Utopian system.

Young German School (The) of literature followed the emancipation of Germany from the Napoleonic yoke.

Headed by Karl Gutzkow. The other chief authors of this school are Theodor Mundt, Gustav Kühne, Heinrich Laube, Ludolf Wienberg, Robert Heller, Ernst Kossak, and Heinrich Heine (the best of all).

Young Germany. A secret society mentioned in the report of the Government of Zürich, 1844, and said to be then in existence in Switzerland. This society aimed at a United Germany with a republican form of government.

Young Ireland, 1848. A party nursed by the newspaper called the 'Nation.' It differed from the Old Ireland party headed by Daniel O'Connell chiefly in this respect. The old party was a religious one and sought the supremacy of the Catholics; the young party wanted to unite both Protestants and Catholics in the great object of the severance of Ireland from the British crown. Though the Young Irelanders disclaimed warlike intentions, many of their speeches were very inflammatory. O'Connell headed the old repealers; the young repealers were led by William Smith O'Brien. The Young Irelanders gave birth to the United Irishmen (q.v.), a war party. See 'Irish Associations.'

In December, 1890, the Irish 'Nationalists,' who had been under the leadership of Charles S. Parnell for ten years, were split up into two parties, because Mr. Gladstone refused to cooperate with Mr. Parnell. Those who fell off from Mr. Parnell placed themselves under Justin M'Carthy, and the two Irish 'Nationalist' parties went by the name of Parnellites and M'Carthyites.

Young-Ireland Rising (The), 1848. This was the sequel of Daniel O'Connell's repeal agitation. The members called themselves the 'Patriots of the Nation.' They were quite ripe for active rebellion, but the ravings of Mitchel were of a piece with the stump orations of a music hall; and the Young-Ireland rising was easily suppressed. The 'Nation,' an Irish newspaper, was their organ, but the 'Nation' never had the slightest influence on public opinion. See 'Irish Associations.'

Young Italy, or 'The Young Italian Party,' 1831. Formed by Mazzini. The object of this party was 'the unification of Italy,' or 'Italy under one ruler.' At the time spoken of part of Italy belonged to Austria, part to France. Genoa and Lucca were a republic, Tuscany a grand duchy, Parma and Placentia were under a duke of the Bourbon line, Naples and Sicily were a kingdom, the States of the Church were under the pope, and so on. Young Italy wanted all the several parts to be united under one ruler, to be called the 'king of Italy.' In 1860, by the arms of Garibaldi, Victor Emmanuel was hailed 'king of Italy'; in 1866 Venice was added, and in 1870 Rome was made the capital of the new kingdom.

Mazzini lived till 1872; Garibaldi died in 1882; and Victor Emmanuel in 1878.

Young Pretender (The). Charles Edward, after the fatal battle of Culloden in 1746, made his escape to France, and his adventures resemble those of Charles II. after the battle of Worcester. The heroic lady who assisted him was Miss Flora Macdonald; and Charles Edward, dressed in woman's clothes, went by the name of 'Betty Bourke.' When Miss Macdonald left him, his guide was Malcolm Macleod; and the prince, as Macleod's man servant, assumed the name of 'Louis Caw of Crieff.' Ultimately he arrived at Roseau, near Morlaix, in Bretagne, and died at Florence in 1788.

Young Roscius (The). William Henry West Betty (1790–1874). He made his début in 1803, and in fifty-six nights realised 34,000*l.*, when he wisely withdrew from public life.

Young Switzerland, 1835. An association in Switzerland organized by Joseph Mazzini on the same platform as 'Young Italy' (q.v.). Mazzini was banished from Switzerland in 1836, and his association melted into air.

Mazzini's motto was not the French 'Liberty, Fraternity, and Equality,' but the word 'Humanity.' Abstract humanity is not a workable quantity.

Yuen or Y'en Dynasty (The). The twentieth imperial dynasty of China. Founded by Kublaï Khan, emperor of the Mongols. It gave ten emperors, and lasted ninety years (1278–1368). Pekin was rebuilt and made the seat of government. It was succeeded by the Ming dynasty.

Yuen-Oeï Dynasty (The). The first dynasty of the Northern Empire of China. Founded by the Goli Tartars. Chief city Ho-nân. It gave eleven kings, when the Northern Empire was split into two, called 'Tong-Oeï' and 'Si-Oeï,' or 'Eastern and Western Oeï' (386–534).

'Oeï' is written 'Goeï' by many authors.

Zadigism. The science of observation, or the practice of observation in scientific research. 'Zadig' is the hero and title of a novel by Voltaire. He describes a lost camel, which he had never seen, as blind of the left eye, as having lost two of its front teeth, and being slightly lame in the near fore-foot. When pressed to explain how he knew all this, never having seen the animal, he replied: 'I knew it was blind of the left eye because I noticed it browsed only on the right side of the road. I knew it had lost two of its front teeth because some of the leaves and some of the grass was bitten and some not. I knew it was lame of the near fore-foot because the marks of this foot in the sand were shorter than those of the other feet,' &c.

Zampieri. Better known as 'Domenichino' (1581–1641).

Zegris (The), or 'Zegries.' A Mauritanian dynasty. See 'Zeirides.'

Zeirides (The), or 'Zeirites.' A tribe and dynasty of Moors which furnished many kings to Fez, Tlemçen, Algiers, Tunis, Kairouan, Mahadia, and Tripoli. The chief were the Sanhadjides or Zeirides Badissides, and the Zeirides Zenates. The former rendered themselves independent of the Fatimite califs in 972, and their dominion continued to 1050. The latter was from 988 to 1070.

Called after Zeïri ben Mounad, chief of the tribe of the Badissides, who conquered Algiers and Tripoli. He founded Achir, and died A.D. 971. In the proper names given above the -s does not form a syl., but Ze-i-rides is trisyllable.

Ze'lotes (3 syl.). Simon is called 'the Canaanite'—i.e. Καναναίτης and also Ζηλωτής. Probably 'Kananite' is from the Hebrew root kana, whence kanani = 'zealous'; so that 'Simon Kananite' is merely the Aramaic translation of 'Simon Zēlōtēs.' The Zelotæ were Hebraists—that is, great sticklers for the Mosaic law.

Zemindary. The jurisdiction of a zemindar or officer who superintends the lands, protects the landowners, and sees that government receives its legal share. (Indian.)

Zendavesta (The) is said to have been written by Zoroaster in letters of gold on 12,000 skins of parchment, and to have been deposited by Darius Hystaspès in the Castle of Persepŏlis, about B.C. 500.

'Zend' is the language, and 'avesta' = text. The compound word means the sacred books of Zoroaster in the Zend tongue.

Zendicism, 8th cent. A Saracenic heresy resembling that of the Jewish Sadducees.

Zeugi'tæ. The middle bank of rowers in a Greek galley. The uppermost bank was the Thanītæ, and the lowest bank the Thalamitæ.

Zeyds (The). One of the numerous Shiite sects who profess to follow the tenets of Zeyd son of Ali, who is supposed to have received, through his father, some of the prophet's last injunctions. See 'Imaumians,' 'Khattabians.'

The Shiites reject the first three kalifs (Abubeker, Omar, and Othman), and also the traditions concerning the prophet and his will. The Sunis accept both. The Persians and Afghans are Shiites.

Ziobbagrassa. Read 'Zobia Grassa.' The last Thursday of carnival. See p. 559, 'Mardi Gras.'

Zisca ('one eye'). His name was John of Trockznov; he was born in Bohemia, and lost one eye in battle when a boy. In the Huss persecution he built a fort, which he called 'Tabor,' a place of refuge for the Hussites, who were thence called 'Taborites' (3 syl.). At the siege of Rabi, Zisca lost his other eye, and still continued to head his troops and win victories (1380–1424).

Zisca's Drum. Zisca, chamberlain to Wenceslaus, was the first leader of the Hussite War (q.v.), and died 1424. The tale is that he ordered his skin to be tanned and made into a drum-head. Byron, in his 'Werner,' and also in his 'Age of Bronze,' refers to this tradition.

But be it as it is, the time may come
His name [i.e. Napoleon's] shall beat th' alarm, like Zisca's drum.
Age of Bronze.

Zollverein (The), or 'Custom Union,' 1819. Hesse-Darmstadt joined it 14 Feb., 1828; Saxe-Meiningen and Saxe-Coburg-Gotha in 1829; Waldeck and Hesse-Cassel in 1831; Bavaria, Würtemberg, Saxony, Saxe-Weimar, Saxe-Altenberg, and the two Schwarzburgs in 1833; Hesse-Homburg, Baden, and Nassau, in 1835; Frankfort in 1836; Lippe-Detmold and Brunswick in 1841; Luxemburg in 1847; Hanover, Oldenburg, and Schaumburg-Lippe in 1851; Mecklenburg-Schwerin, Mecklenburg-Strelitz, and Lübeck in 1868. The effect of this union has been a greatly increased demand for German goods in foreign markets, and diminished imports. Pronounce Zol'-ve-rine.

Zoolactaf, or Dsulaktaf. So Sapor II. was called (A.D. 310–379), because he dislocated the shoulders of all Arabs capable of bearing arms.

Zoroaster. In Greek, ZOROASTRES; in the Zendavesta, ZARATHUSTRA; in Persian, ZERDUSHT. Founder of the Magian religion.

Zoroas'trianism. The religious system of Zoroaster, now called the Parsee religion. It was originally monotheism, but subsequently the dualism of good and evil. The Magi remained faithful to the monotheism of Zoroaster, while the Zendiks believed in the dualism as taught in the 'Zend-Avesta.' As 'Zoroaster' is also written 'Zarathustra,' so 'Zoroastrianism' is called 'Zarathustraism.'

John Malcolm, who died in 1833, attempted to prove that Zoroaster was the Jewish Ezra.

Zseklers, or Szeklers. A people who occupy the highlands of Transylvania, and belong to the Magyar stock, all noble and free. Some are Magyar Unitarians and some Catholics. They are spread over five districts, called Udvarhely, Haromszek, Csik, Maros, and Aranyos, and are about 350,000 in number.

Zürich (Treaty of), 11 Nov., 1859. For the ratification of the Treaty of Villafranca.

APPENDIX

THE CHIEF BATTLES OF THE WORLD

ALPHABETICALLY ARRANGED

Aboukir (Battle of), 1 Aug., 1798. Nelson defeated François Paul de Brueys, the French admiral, in the Bay of Aboukir. The French admiral was killed by a cannon-shot.

Generally called, in English history, 'The Battle of the Nile.'

Aboukir (Battle of), 25 July, 1799, won by Bonaparte over the Turks.

Next year (1800) Kléber was assassinated by a young Turk, and Egypt was lost to France.

Abu Klea (Battle of), 17 Jan., 1885, won by General Stewart with 1,500 men over an army of Arabs of 10,000 in the service of the Mahdi.

Abȳdos (Naval battle of), B.C. 411, won by the Athenians over the Lacedæmonians.

Aclea (Battle of), 851, in which Ethelwulf, the son of Egbert king of England, defeated the Danes. Aclēa is Ockley, in Surrey.

Actium (Battle of), 2 Sept., B.C. 31, gained by Octavian (Augustus Cæsar) over Antony and Cleopatra, both of whom killed themselves to prevent being made captives by the conqueror. Octavian dated the years of his imperial monarchy from the day of this battle.

Adrianople (Battle of), 3 July, A.D. 323. This battle obtained for Constantine the empire.

Ægatian Islands (Naval battle of), B.C. 241, won by the Roman consul Quintus Lutatius Catūlus over Hanno the Carthaginian, off the Ægātēs. This victory brought to an end the First Punic War, which had lasted twenty-three years.

Ægospot'amos, or 'Goat's River' (Naval battle of), B.C. Sept. 405. This was scarcely a battle, it was rather a surprise, for no fighting was needed. The Athenians left their fleet unguarded, and most of the men were on shore when Lysander captured above 150 of their ships, and put to death above 3,000 Athenian prisoners. This disaster virtually brought the Peloponnesian war to a close.

Aghrim, in Ireland (Battle of), 12 July, 1691, where William III. and General Ginkell defeated James II. and St. Ruth.

Agincourt (Battle of), 25 Oct., 1415, won by Henry V. of England over the French, led by D'Albret constable of France. The French army was five times greater than the English. The English loss did not exceed 1,600 men, but the French was 10,000 slain, and 15,000 taken prisoners.

Agnadello (Battles of). I. 14 May, 1509, in which Louis XII. defeated Petigliano and D'Alviano. This to the Venetians was one of the most disastrous battles in all their history.

II. 16 Aug., 1705, in which the Duc de Vendôme defeated Prince Eugene. Also called the 'Battle of Cassano.'

Agosta (Naval battle of), 1676, won by Duquesne over the Dutch. Here Ruyter, the Dutch admiral, lost his life.

Ai'rolo, in Italy (Battle of), 23 Sept., 1799, in which Suwarrow, the Russian general, defeated Gudin, the French general.

Aix (Battle of), July, B.C. 101, in which the Teuton host was annihilated by Marius the Roman consul.

Aiznaden (Battle of), 13 July, A.D. 633, in which Khaled, commander of the Koreish cavalry, defeated Werdan, general of Heraclius, commander of the Greeks.

Aland, in the Baltic (Battle of), 27 July, 1714, in which Peter I. the Great defeated the Swedish fleet. Pronounce O-land.

Alarcon, in Spain (Battle of), autumn 1195, in which Yacub ben Yussef defeated Alfonso VIII. of Castile.

Albans (Battles of St.). I. 22 May, 1455. This was the first battle of the Two Roses, and was won by Richard duke of York (the White Rose) over Henry VI.

II. 2 Feb., 1461, between the same factions. In this battle Warwick, the king-maker, joined the royal side of Queen Margaret, and defeated the Yorkists.

Albuera, in Spain (Battle of), 1811, in which Marshal Beresford defeated Soult, one of Napoleon's marshals. Pronounce Al-boo-a'-rah.

Albufera da Valencia (Battle of), 1811, in which Suchet marshal of France defeated Blake and the Spaniards. For this victory Napoleon created Suchet 'Duke of Albufĕra.'

Alcañiz', in Spain (Battle of), 23 May, 1809, in which Blake and the Spaniards defeated Suchet, one of the marshals of Napoleon.

Alcazar-quivir (Battle of), 4 Aug., 1578, in which Muley Moluc of Morocco defeated and slew Sebastian of Portugal.

Aldenhoven, in Belgium (Battle of), 1 March, 1793, in which Clairfait, the Austrian general, defeated Francisco Miranda.

Alessandria (Battle of), 17 May, 1799, in which Suwarrow, the Russian general, defeated the French under Moreau.

Alexandria (Battle of), 21 March, 1801, won by the British army under Sir Ralph Abercromble over the French under the command of Menou.

Alford (Battle of), 2 July, 1645, in which General Baillie, with an army of Covenanters, was defeated by the Marquis of Montrose.

Alia, or Allia, in Italy (Battles of). I. 16 July, B.C. 390, where the Gauls under [their] Brennus defeated the Romans.

II. B.C. 374 or 377, when Cincinnātus, the dictator, defeated the Prænestines and their allies.

Aliwal', in India (Battle of), 28 Jan., 1846, won by Sir H. Smith over the Sikhs.

Aljubarota, in Portugal (Battle of), 14 Aug., 1385, in which Joam I. of Portugal defeated Juan I. of Castile.

Alkmaar (Battle of), 1799. A bloody but indecisive battle between the allied English and Russian on the one hand and the allied French and Dutch armies on the other.

Allīfæ, in Italy (Battle of), B.C. 307, in which the proconsul Q. Fabius Maximus defeated the Samnites.

Alma, in the Crimĕa (Battle of the), 20 Sept., 1854, in which Lord Raglan, the English commander, and Marshal St. Arnaud, the French commander, defeated Prince Menschikoff, the Russian general.

Almanza, in Spain (Battle of), 25 April, 1707, in which the French Marshal Berwick defeated the Archduke Karl, and thus secured the throne to Philip V. (14 April, Old Style.)

Almarez, in Spain (Battle of), 24 Dec., 1808, in which Marshal Lefebvre defeated the Spaniards.

Almeida (Battle of), 5 Aug., 1811, won by Lord Wellington, commanding the Anglo-Spanish army, over the French commanded by Marshal Massena. Pronounce Al-ma-e'-dah.

Almenara, in Spain (Battle of), 27 July, 1710, in which the Earl of Stanhope and Count Stahremberg (or Starhemberg) defeated the Marquis de Bay.

Almham (Battle of), 723, in which Fergall (overlord of Ireland) with 21,000 men (who had invaded Leinster to enforce the Boarian Tribute (q.v.), remitted by Finactha) was utterly defeated by 9,000 Lagēnians. As many as 7,000 were slain, among whom were 200 kings [chiefs] and Fergall with all his bodyguard.

Almonacid, in Spain (Battle of), 11 Aug., 1809, in which General Sebastian, a marshal of France, defeated Venegras (3 syl.).

Alney (Battle of), 1016. This was a single combat between Edmund Ironside and Canute in sight of their armies. When Canute was wounded he proposed a division of the kingdom, and the south part fell to Edmund; but Edmund was murdered soon afterwards at Oxford, by Edric Streon.

Alsens, in Germany (Battle of), 8 Dec., 1795, in which Clairfait, the Austrian general, repulsed the French under Pichegru (2 syl.).

Altdorf, in Switzerland (Battle of), 5 May, 1799. The Swiss peasants were here defeated by Marshal Soult, the French general.

Altenberg, in Germany (Battle of), 24 Sept., 1813, in which Lefebvre Desnouettes, the French cavalry officer, defeated Thielmann, commander of the Russian forces.

Altenheim, in Germany (Battle of), 29 July, 1675, in which Montecuculi, the Austrian general, defeated the French armies under Comte de Lorges. Here the Marquis de Vaubrun fell in battle.

Altenkirchen, in Germany (Battles of). I. 4 June, 1796, where Kléber, the French general, defeated the Archduke Karl of Austria.

II. 19 Sept., 1796, in which the Archduke Karl of Austria defeated the French led by Jourdan. In this battle the French general Marceau was slain.

Altura, in Spain (Battle of), 25 June, 1838, where the Carlists defeated Amor.

Amberg (Battle of), 24 Aug. 1796. The Archduke Karl defeated Moreau, the French general.

American Civil War, 1861–1865. Brought to a close 10 May, 1865, by the surrender of General Johnston.

Amis'ia, or the Ems, in Germany (Battle of the), B.C. 12, where Nero Claudius Drusus defeated the Bructēri in a naval engagement.

Ancrum Muir, in Scotland (Battle of), 17 Feb., 1545, in which Archibald Douglas earl of Angus defeated Sir R. Eyre and Sir Brian Latoun.

Ancy'ra or Angō'ra (Battle of), 20 July, 1402, in which Bajazet I. sultan of the Otto-mans, was defeated and taken prisoner by Timour the Tartar.

Andernach (Battle of), 939, near Coblenz, won by Otto I. over his rebellious half-brother Tankmar and several disaffected nobles. Tankmar was slain and the rebellion quashed.

Andredes-lea, the Weald of Sussex (Battle of), 477, where Ella and his sons defeated the Britons.

Ango'ra (Battle of). See above, 'Ancyra.'

Anjou (Battle of), or 'Battle of Beaugé,' 3 April, 1421, won by the Dauphin of France over the Duke of Clarence. This battle turned the tide of success against the English.

Antietam, in Maryland (Battle of), 17 Sept., 1862, between the Federals under General McClellan and the Confederates under General Lee. Indecisive.

Antium (Battle of), May 1378, between 14 Venetian galleys under the command of Victor Pisani and 10 Genoese galleys under Luigi Fiesco. The Venetians won the victory. One of the Genoese galleys was dashed to pieces on the rocky shore, five surrendered, and the other four escaped.

Antoigné (Battle of), 13 Aug., 1792, won by the French over the allied Austrians and Prussians.

Aquæ Sextiæ (Battle of), B.C. 102, in which Caius Marius defeated the Teutons.

Arbēla (Battle of), B.C. 1 Oct., 331, in which Alexander the Great overthrew Darius Codomanus for the third time. It was fought near Gaugamēla, and is sometimes called the 'Battle of Gaugamela.'

One of Sir Edward Creasy's Fifteen Decisive Battles of the World.

At Arbela the united Egyptian and Syrian army defeated the Ottoman troops in the reign of Bajazet II. (1482).

Arcis-sur-Aube (Battle of), 20 March, 1814, between Napoleon's French army and Schwartzenberg's Austrian army. It was quite indecisive.

Ar'cola (Battle of), 15 and 17 Nov., 1796, in which Bonaparte defeated the Austrians under Alvinzy.

Argentorātum (Battle of), A.D. 357, in which Julian defeated the Alemanni.

 Argentorātum, now Strassburg.

Arginūsæ (Naval battle of), B.C. 406, won by the Athenians over the Lacedæmonians.

Arklow (Battle of), 10 June, 1798, where a small British force utterly defeated 31,000 Irish insurgents.

Arles (Battle of), A.D. 508, in which Clovis, founder of the French monarchy, was defeated by Theodore the Great king of Italy, and father-in-law of Alaric king of the West Goths.

Armageddon (Battle of), Rev. xvi. 16, where God will collect together his enemies for destruction. Ar-ma-geddon is supposed to be the 'city of Megiddo,' and Megiddo is a typical word for a battle-field. Zech. xii. 11 speaks of 'the mourning of Hadadrimmon in the valley of Megiddon.' The vicinity of Megiddo was noted as a great battle-field in Bible history. It was here Pharaoh-necho overcame and slew Josiah (2 Kings xxiii. 29, 30). The great slaughter of Jabin's and Sisera's army was at 'the waters of Megiddo' (Judges v. 19). It was in this plain that Gideon overthrew the Midianites (Judges vi. 33, vii.; here was the fight between Saul and the Philistines, and between Tryphon and Jonathan Maccabæus (1 Mac. xii.). In later times it was the battle-field of the Tartars and Saracens.

Armagh' (Battle of), 1318, in which Edward Bruce was defeated and taken prisoner. He was beheaded at Dundalk.

Arginūsæ (Naval battle of), July B.C. 407, won by the Athenians over the Lacedæmonians. What is especially noteworthy in this victory is that six of the ten admirals who commanded the Athenian fleet were put to death, for not picking up those swimming for their lives. The excuse was, they were prevented by a sudden storm.

Argoed, or Argoed Llyvain (Battle of), A.D. 547, won by Urien over Ida the Saxon invader.

Arques (Battle of), 21 Sept., 1589, in which Henri IV. with 7,000 men defeated the Duc de Mayenne at the head of 30,000 men.

Ascalon (Battles of). I. 12 Aug., 1099, in which Godfrey of Bouillon defeated the Sultan of Egypt.

II. 1192, in which Richard I. defeated the Soldan's united army, numbered at 300,000 men. It is said that 40,000 of the Saracens were left dead on the field.

Aschaffenburg (Battle of), 16 Sept., 1796. The Archduke Karl of Austria defeated Moreau, the French general. This was his third victory since August.

Ashdown (Battle of), or Æscesdun, or Ash-tree Hill, A.D. 870. The great battle in which Ethelred and Alfred overthrew the Danes and slew their king, Bacseg. This victory is commemorated by the famous White Horse. The town now called Ashbury used to be called Ayshesdown. The downs are still called Ashdown, and not far off is Ashdown Park.

Aspern (Battle of), 21 May, 1809, in which the Archduke Karl of Austria was defeated by Napoleon. Called by the French the battle of Essling.

Assandun (Battle of), 1016. A decisive victory of Canute over Edmund Ironside. The death of Ironside left Canute master of the realm.

Assaye, in India (Battle of), 23 Sept., 1803, in which Arthur Wellesley (afterwards Duke of Wellington) defeated Scindia and the Rajah of Berar. The forces opposed to the English were fully ten times the more numerous. This battle is especially noteworthy as being the first great victory of the Iron Duke.

Athenry (Battle of), 1316, in which Ferdlim O'Connor was utterly defeated by William de Burgh and Richard de Bermingham. It is said that 11,000 Irish fell in this battle, which gave a final blow to the restless O'Connors.

Audelay (Battle of), 1118, in which Henry I. (Beauclerc) defeated Louis VI. of France. The object of this battle was to regain the dukedom of Normandy, which Henry had taken, for William, son of the deposed Robert.

Aue stadt (Battle of), 14 Oct., 1806, won by the French Marshal Davoust over the Prussians the same day as Napoleon won the battle of Jena. [Pronounce Ya-nah.]

Aughrim, in Ireland (Battle of), 12 July, 1691. Same as Aghrim (q.v.).

Augsburg (Battles of). I. 955, won by Otto I. (the Great) of Germany over the Hungarians.

II. 24 Aug., 1796, won by Moreau, who commanded the French army, over the Imperialists.

III. Again 2 Sept., and again 7 Sept., 1796, won by the same general (Moreau).

Austerlitz, in Moravia (Battle of), 2 Dec., 1805, in which Napoleon defeated the Emperors of Austria and Russia. This great victory led to the treaty of Presburg. It is called 'The Battle of the Emperors.'

The Emperor of Austria was Francis, and the Czar of Russia was Alexander I. It was won by Napoleon on the anniversary of his coronation.

Aylesford, in Kent (Battle of), A.D. 449, between the Angles and the Britons. Horsa fell in this battle, and the victory gave Kent to Hengist the invader. The massacre which followed the battle was merciless, and drove the conquered Britons over sea or to lurking-places in the forests, where many were cut down and many were made slaves to the conquerors.

Badon, i.e. Bath (Battle of Mount), 520. Called in Latin Mons Badonicus. This legendary battle was the 12th won by Arthur over the West Saxons, and checked for a time their progress.

Ballinahinch (Battle of), 13 June, 1798, against the insurgent Irish. The royal army was, of course, victorious, but suffered very severely.

Baltimore (Battle of), 12 Sept., 1814, won by General Ross over the Americans, but Ross was slain, and the attack on Baltimore failed.

Bannockburn (Battle of), 24 June, 1314, in which Robert Bruce of Scotland defeated Edward II. In this battle the flower of the English knighthood fell into the hands of the conquerors, while the Irishry and foot soldiers were ruthlessly cut down as they fled. For centuries afterwards, the rich plunder of the English camp left its traces on the vestment rolls of Scottish castle and abbey.

Banos di Tolōso (Battle of), 1210, in which Alfonso IX. of Leon, &c. defeated the Moors. The loss of the Moors is stated to have been 180,000 men. They never recovered from this tremendous defeat.

Bantry Bay (Battle of), 1 May, 1689. This was merely an indecisive engagement with a French squadron. The English admiral was Herbert earl of Torrington, noted for his indolence and total want of seamanship.

Barbury Hill, in Wiltshire (Battle of), A.D. 552, in which the Angles defeated the Britons.

Barnet, in Hertfordshire (Battle of), 14 April, 1471, in which the Earl of Warwick was defeated and slain by Edward IV. This battle was a medley of carnage and treachery. It lasted six hours, and ended with the fall of Warwick, the 'king-maker,' as he fled for hiding to the woods. One more battle, that of Tewkesbury, three weeks afterwards, left Queen Margaret a captive in the victor's power.

Barrōsa (Battle of), 6 March, 1811, won by General Graham, leader of the British army, over Marshal Victor and his French army. In this sanguinary conflict was captured the first eagle that the British army had ever taken.

Bassāno (Battle of), 8 Sept., 1796, in which Bonaparte defeated the Austrians. In this battle Marshal Augereau and Marshal Massēna greatly distinguished themselves.

Bassorah (Battle of), 4 Nov., A.D. 657. The first civil war of the Moslems. In this battle Ali, the calif, defeated Ayesha, Telha, and Zobeir.

 Generally pronounced Bassōrah, but it should be called Bas'sorah or Bas'rah.

Bath. See 'Badon.'

Batowitz (Battle of), 1653, in which the army of John II. of Poland suffered a crushing defeat from Bogdan the Cossack and his son.

Battlefield (Battle of), 1402, won by Henry IV. over Percy, surnamed Hotspur.

Bautzen (Battle of), 21 May, 1813, won by Napoleon over the allied Russian and Prussian armies. Pronounce Bowt-sn.

Baylen (Battle of), 19 July, 1808, in which the Spanish General Castāños utterly defeated Dupont and his French army.

Bazabdê (Battle of), A.D. 360, in which Sapor the king of Persia repulsed Constantius II.

Beachy Head (Battle of), 30 June, 1690, in which the English and Dutch allied fleet was defeated by the French.

Beaugé (Battle of), 1420, won by the French over the Duke of Clarence, brother of Henry V. In this battle Clarence was slain, and the Earls of Somerset, Dorset, and Huntingdon were taken prisoners. The victory is ascribed to a contingent of Scotch mercenaries.

Beaumont (Battle of), 28 Aug., 1870, in the Franco-German war. Won by the Prussians.

Bedr (Battle of), A.D. 624, the famous battle in which Mahomet defeated the Koreishites. He ascribed his victory to Gabriel, who fought on his white horse for the 'prophet.'

Belgrade (Battle of), 1456, in which the Turks were defeated by a German army. The famous Siege of Belgrade was in May, 1717, by Prince Eugene. The Turks went to relieve the city, Aug. 5, with 200,000 men, and, after a very sanguinary battle, Belgrade surrendered.

 This city has often been besieged.

Bellair, or Moorfields (Battle of), in Maryland, 30 Aug., 1814. A small British force under Sir Peter Parker attacked the town, but, after an obstinate fight, were repulsed with loss, Sir Peter being slain.

Belle Isle (Naval battles of), 25 Oct., 1747, in which Admiral Hawke well nigh annihilated the French fleet. In 1759 Admiral Hawke obtained a second victory over the French near the same spot.

Benacus (Battle of Lake), 268, in which Claudius defeated the Alemanni.

Benburb (Battle of), 5 June, 1646, in which Owen O'Neill the Irish chieftain completely defeated the Scotch and English, led by Monroe. Of the Scotch and English, 3,243 were slain in battle and many more on the road; of the Irish army, only 70 men were slain and 200 wounded. Owen Roe O'Neill died soon after the battle, the last of the Irish chiefs.

Bennington, Vermont, U.S. (Battle of), 16 July, 1777. Here the Americans defeated the Germans in the American War of Independence. These Germans were British mercenaries. The American general was Stark.

Bensington, in Oxfordshire (Battle of), in which Offa king of Mercia defeated Cynewulf king of the West Saxons.

Beresina (Battle of), 28 Nov., 1812, in which the French were attacked by the Russians, and lost 20,000 men. It was a most terrible disaster on their retreat from Moscow.

Bergen (Battles of). I. 14 April, 1759, won by the French over the allies.

II. 19 Sept., 1799, won also by the French over the allies.

III. 2 Oct., 1799, won by the French over the allies.

Biberach (Battle of), April, 1799, in which Marshal Moreau, the French general, defeated the Austrians.

Bibracte (Battle of), B.C. 58, in which Julius Cæsar overthrew the Gauls.

Bibractê is Autun, in Burgundy.

Bicocca (Battle of), 1521, in which Charles V. defeated Lautrec, the French general. This defeat involved the loss of Milan to the French nation.

Bilbão (Battle of), 25 Dec., 1836, won by Espartêro over the Carlists. (Christmas Day.)

Blackheath (Battle of), 22 June, 1497, in which the Cornish insurgents led by Lord Audley, Michael Joseph, and Thomas Flammock, met a crushing defeat from the army sent against them by Henry VII. Above 2,000 of the insurgents were slain and 1,500 taken prisoners.

Bladensburg (Battle of), 24 Aug., 1814, in which General Ross defeated the Americans commanded by General Winder in the second American war.

Blenheim, in Bavaria (Battle of), 13 Aug., 1704, in which Marlborough and Prince Eugene defeated the French and Bavarians. The great benefit of this victory was that it broke the spell of French invincibility. The many victories that the French had won induced Europe to believe they were irresistible; but the fate of Blenheim dispelled the delusion and raised the fame of England in proportion.

Borodi'no, in Russia (Battle of), 7 Sept., 1812, between the French commanded by Napoleon, and the Russians under Kutusoff. This was one of the most sanguinary battles on record, and both sides claimed the victory; but as the Russians retreated, the advantage was with Napoleon, to whom the road to Moscow was left open.

This battle is also called 'The Battle of Moskwa.'

Boroughbridge (Battle of), 16 March, 1323, in which the royal troops of Edward II. led by Sir Simon Ward and Sir Andrew Barclay defeated the Earls of Lancaster and Hertford, two of the lords ordainers who had risen against the royal favourites Hugh le Despenser and his father. Lancaster, being taken prisoner, was hanged, drawn, and quartered as a traitor.

Fourteen bannerets and fourteen knights bachelors were hanged, drawn, and quartered, with the earl.

Borysthenes (Battle of the), 1508, won by Sigismund I. of Poland over the Muscovites. It is said that the Muscovites lost 80,000 men in this battle. Pronounce Bo-ris'-then-eze.

Bosworth Field, in Leicestershire (Battle of), 22 Aug., 1485, in which Richard III. was defeated and slain by the Earl of Richmond (Henry VII.). This battle brought the Plantagenet dynasty to an end, and established that of Tudor.

The Tudors were descendants of John of Gaunt's illegitimate offspring, born of Catherine Swynford. The last of this line, called Beaufort, was Lady Margaret, who married Edmund Tudor, and became the mother of our Henry VII.

Bouvines, in Flanders (Battle of), 27 July, 1217, in which Philippe Auguste king of France defeated the Kaiser Otto and his allies, the Flemish and English. The Flemish were the first to fly, then the German centre gave way, and lastly the English on the right wing, led by the Earl of Salisbury. This was a very important battle. If Philippe had lost it, France would have been partitioned among the conquerors. As King John was one of the defeated allies, his vengeance against the English barons was powerless, and hence the grant of Magna Charta.

Boxtel (Battle of), 17 Sept., 1794, in which the British allied army commanded by the Duke of York was defeated by the French republican army. The Duke retreated across the Meuse.

Boyne, in Ireland (Battle of the), 1 July, 1690, where William III. defeated James II., who the parliament declared had abdicated.

Bradford on the Avon (Battle of), A.D. 657, in which Cenwalh defeated the Britons.

Brandywine, a river in the U.S. (Battle of the), 11 Sept., 1777. Won by Lord Howe over Washington, in the American War of Independence. Philadelphia fell to the possession of the victors.

Breslau. Between 1757–60, in the 'Seven Years' War,' it was taken and retaken by the Prussians under Frederick the Great and the Austrians; but in 1763 Silesia passed definitively into the hands of the Prussians.

It was besieged and surrendered to the French 5 Jan., 1807; and again 31 May, 1813.

Pronounce Bres-low (ow as in now).

Bretigny (Treaty of), 1360, after the battle of Poitiers. It stipulated that Edward III. should renounce all claim to the crown of France; but should retain Calais, and be the independent lord of Poitou, Aunis, Angoumois, Saintonge, the Limousin, and Guyenne. The French also paid in money 666,000*l.* and gave 40 hostages.

Briar's Creek, in South Carolina (Battles of). I. 16 March, 1779, won by the English army led by General Prevost over the Americans commanded by General Ashe.

II. 3 May, 1779, by the same belligerents and with the same results.

Brienne (Battle of), 29 Jan., 1814, won by Napoleon over the allied Russians and Prussians led by Blücher.

Brooklyn, U.S. (Battle of), 27 Aug., 1776, where General Howe defeated the Americans in the American War of Independence. This is sometimes called 'The Battle of Flatbush.'

Brunanburh (Battle of), 937, won by Athelstan king of England over a confederacy organised by Anlaf king of Ireland. The confederated chiefs who joined Anlaf were from Scotland, Cumberland, together with some Welsh or British chiefs, and some of the Danes settled by Alfred in the Five Boroughs.

Bull Run, Virginia (Battles of), 21 July, 1861. I. The first of the conflicts in the American Civil War. The Federals, under General Irwin M'Dowell, were successful at first; but when some Confederate reinforcements arrived, being seized with a panic, they fled to Washington, leaving their baggage and ammunition behind. The Confederate generals were Beauregard and Jackson.

II. 30 Aug., 1862. A desperate conflict which also ended in the triumph of the Confederates, commanded by General [Stonewall] Jackson. The Northern army was under General Pope.

 It was General [Bernard] Bee who gave Jackson this cognomen at Bull Run.

Bulla (Battle of), 15 Sept., A.D. 533, in which Belisarius defeated Gelimer, last of the Vandal kings of Carthage. Gelimer was made captive, and Carthage became a Roman province.

Bunker's Hill, near Boston, U.S. (Battle of), 17 June, 1775, two months after the battle of Lexington. Nominally the result was favourable to Lord Howe and the British troops, but the real victory was on the side of the American insurgents, led by Colonel Prescot. The British loss of men was double that of the Americans.

Burford, Oxfordshire (Battle of), 752, in which Cuthred king of Wessex defeated Ethelbald king of Mercia. In a second defeat at Secandum, in 755, Ethelbald was slain.

This battle between Wessex and Mercia was one of the best contested battles of the heptarchy.

Burkersdorf (Battle of), 21 July, 1762, in which the Prussians drove the Austrians from their entrenchments. (In the seventh campaign of the Seven Years' War.)

Burlington Heights (Battle of), 6 June, 1813, won by the British, who carried the heights, but the Americans defended them with great valour.

Busaco, in Portugal (Battle of), 27 Sept., 1810, in which Lord Wellington, the British commander, defeated the French, commanded by Massena. After the battle, Wellington retreated to Torres Vedras.

Buttington, in Wales (Battle of), A.D. 894, in which Ethelred defeated the Danes.

Byland, in Yorkshire (Battle of), 1328, in which Robert the Bruce routed the chivalry of England and of France under Edward III.

Cadesia (Battle of), A.D. 636, in which Ysdegerd (king of Persia) was defeated by Khaled, commander of the Saracen army. The battle lasted three days. The first was called the Day of Succour, from a reinforcement of 30,000 which arrived on that day. The second day was called the Day of Concussion, from the conflict of the two armies on that day. The third day was called the Day of Barking, from the discordant noises of the Persian camp when a high wind drove clouds of dust into their faces. In this battle the famous standard called 'Durufsh e Kawanee,' better known as the 'Blacksmith's Apron,' fell into the hands of the Saracens.

Cambuskenneth (Battle of), 10 Sept., 1297, in which William Wallace defeated the English army under the Earl of Surrey. By this victory Scotland was lost to Edward I.

Cambuskenneth is close to Stirling Bridge. Wallace allowed half the English army to cross the bridge, then fell on them, and, taking possession of the bridge, prevented the rest of the English from crossing it.

Camden, South Carolina, U.S. (Battles of). I. 16 Aug., 1780. Here Lord Cornwallis defeated the American General Gates in the American War of Independence.

II. 25 April, 1781, won by Lord Rawdon, the British general, over General Greene of America.

III. 13 May, 1781, won by the same general over the same opponents. Camden was burnt.

Camperdown (Battle of), 11 Oct., 1797, in which Admiral Duncan defeated the Dutch.

Cannæ (Battle of), 2 Aug., B.C. 216, in which Hannibal the Carthaginian utterly defeated the Romans led by the Consul Varro. This was one of the most disastrous defeats ever suffered. At least 40,000 Roman foot and 3,000 horse were left dead on the field.

Cape St. Vincent (Battles of). I. 17 June, 1693, in which Sir George Rooke was defeated by Tourville the French admiral.

II. 14 Feb., 1797, in which Sir John Jervis defeated the Spanish fleet.

Caravaggio (Battle of), 1448, in which Sforza defeated the Venetians, took all their stores and 15,000 prisoners.

Caristo (Battle of), 29 Aug., 1351, a great naval victory of Venice over the Genoese.

Carthagena, South America (Naval battle of), 1747. It was seized by the French in 1544; taken by Sir Francis Drake in 1585; retaken by the French in 1697; and unsuccessfully besieged by Admiral Vernon in 1747.

Casal Secco (Battle of), 12 July, 1426. This was scarcely a battle. It was rather an affray between the Venetians led by Carmagnuola and the Milanese under the leadership of Francesco Sforza. It was not decisive, but the Venetians had the advantage in that they compelled the Milanese to retire to their lines.

Casalecchio (Battle of), 26 June, 1402, in which Visconti signally defeated the Bolognese.

Cassano (Battle of), 28 April, 1799, in which Suwarrow, the Russian general, defeated Marshal Moreau and took 5,000 French prisoners.

Cassel (Battle of), 1677, won by the Duc d'Orléans over the Dutch.

Castel Nuovo (Battle of), 29 Sept., 1806, in which the Russians were defeated by the French.

Castiglione (Battle of), from 2 to 5 Aug., 1796, in which Bonaparte defeated the Austrians under Wurmser. Here Marshal Augereau greatly distinguished himself, and was created Duc de Castiglione (5 syl.).

Castillon (Battle of), 17 July, 1453. The most signal defeat suffered by the English. Here the Earl of Shrewsbury and his son were slain. This victory put an end to the dominion of the English in France.

Castlebar, in Ireland (Battle of), 27 Aug., 1798. This was not strictly a battle. In 1798 the Irish rose in revolt, and were suppressed on Vinegar Hill, near Wexford, by General Lake, 21 June, 1798. Scarcely was this done, when General Humbert landed with 1,000 French soldiers, and defeated Lake and Hutchinson, who had some 3,000 men under them, at Castlebar. The lord-lieutenant, Lord Cornwallis, now marched against the invaders and Irish revolters, at the head of 30,000 men, and compelled Humbert to surrender.

Catalaunian Plains (Battle of the), A.D. 451. Here Attila king of the Huns was vanquished by the Gallic Mer-wig, or Merovēus, who united with the Roman army.

Cattraeth (Battle of), A.D. 547, won by Ida the Saxon over the British Confederacy. In this confederacy there were 363 Britons distinguished by golden torques.

Cerignŏla (Battle of), 1503, won by Gonzalvo of Cordŏva over the French.

Chæroneia (Battles of). I. B.C. 447, in which the Athenians were defeated by the Bœōtians, and their general Tolmidas was slain.

II. 2 Aug. B.C. 338, won by Philip of Macedon over the allied Theban and Athenian army. This battle made Greece a province of the Macedonian monarchy.

It was in this battle that Demosthenēs the orator served as a foot-soldier, and fled.

III. B.C. 81, in which Sylla, or Sulla, overthrew Archelāos, the best general of Mithridātēs VI. king of Pontus, sent to aid the Athenians who had revolted against Rome. The army of Mithridates (4 syl.) consisted of 100,000 men, with 10,000 horse, and 90 scythed cars. The whole army of Scylla did not exceed 30,000 men. Pronounce Ke-ro-ne'-ah.

Chalgrove, in Oxfordshire (Battle of), 18 June, 1643. This was a skirmish between the parliamentarians and royalists, which is only noteworthy because it was here that Hampden was mortally wounded. Generally called 'Chalgrove Field.'

Châlons (Battle of), A.D. 451, in which Aëtius and Theodoric utterly overthrew Attila.

This is one of Sir Edward Creasy's Fifteen Decisive Battles of the World.

Champ-Aubert (Battles of), 10 Feb., 1814, won by Napoleon over the Prussians led by Blücher. And again 14 Feb., 1814.

Chancellorsville, U.S. (Battle of), 2 May, 1863, won by the Confederates under Lee and Jackson. The Northern army was commanded by General Joseph Hooker.

Charford (Battle of), A.D. 519, in which a band of Saxons under Cerdic defeated the Britons. This victory set the crown of the West Saxons on the conqueror's head.

Charmouth (Battle of), A.D 850, in which Ethelwulf king of Wessex was defeated by the Danes.

Charræ (Battle of), B.C. 53, in which the Roman army under Crassus the triumvir was defeated by Surēnas, a principal officer of Urōdēs, 'king of kings.' Crassus was treacherously seized in a conference, and killed by molten gold being poured down his throat.

Charræ is Haran [Harran] where Abraham once dwelt.

Château Thierry (Battle of), 13 Feb., 1814, won by Napoleon over the Prussians led by Blücher.

Chesapeake (Battle of the), 1781, in which the British admiral, Graves, was repulsed by the French admiral, De Grasse, fighting for the Americans in their struggle for independence. See 'Shannon and Chesapeake,' &c.

Chester (Battle of), 607, won by Ethelfrith over the North Britons. In this battle 2,000 monks of Bangor, who had invoked divine vengeance on the invaders, were the first to fall.

Chickahominy (Battle of), 25 June to 1 July, 1862, in the American Civil War. 'Stonewall' Jackson, a Confederate general, greatly distinguished himself in these conflicts.

Chickamauga, U.S. (Battle of), 19, 20 Sept., 1863, won by the Confederates under General Bragg. The Northern army was commanded by General Rosecrans.

Chillianwallah (Battle of), in India, 13 January, 1849, in which the Sikhs were completely routed by General Lord Gough.

 Gough, pronounce Goff.

Chippewa (Battles of). I. 5 July, 1814, in which the British forces under General Riall were defeated by the Americans led by General Browne.

II. 25 July, 1814. Between the English and North Americans. Both claimed the victory. The British were led by General Drummond and General Riall; the Americans by Winfield Scott and General Browne. Riall was wounded and taken prisoner. See 'Lundy (Battle of).'

Chrysop'olis, Scutări (Battle of), A.D. 323, won by Constantine over Licinius.

Clontarf (Battle of), Good Friday, 23 April, 1014, in which Brian Boru king of Munster and Connaught utterly defeated the confederated Danes of England, Wales, Ireland, and Denmark. This battle, which lasted all day, was one of the most decisive ever fought. It is said that 14,000 Danes were slain, and 7,000 Irish. Brian fell by assassination in his tent, aged 88.

Cnidus (Naval battle of), B.C. 394, won by Conon, the commander of the allied Phœnician and Grecian fleet, over Pisander the Lacedæmonian. This defeat deprived Lacedæmon of her recently gained maritime ascendency.

Coblenz (Battle of), B.C. 55, in which Julius Cæsar annihilated the German swarms. It is said that 150,000 of them were either slain or drowned in the Rhine.

Cocherel, near Evreux (Battle of), 1364, in which Charles V. le Sage of France, by his General Duguesclin, defeated Charles the Bad king of Navarre.

Cold Harbor (Battle of), in Virginia, 3 June, 1864, between the Federals under Gen. Grant and the Confederates under Gen. Lee. It was very bloody, but indecisive.

Colline Gate (Battle of the), 23 Aug., B.C. 82, in which Pontius, leader of the Samnites, was defeated by Crassus. Sylla massacred the 6,000 captive Samnites taken in this battle.

Conquereux or Conquereuil, in France (Battles of). I. A.D. 981, in which Geoffrey count of Anjou was defeated by Conan comte de Rennes.

II. A.D. 992, in which Conan comte de Rennes was defeated and slain by Foulques Nerra duke of Anjou.

Copenhagen (Battle of), 2 April, 1801, won over the Danish fleet by Admiral Lord Nelson and Admiral Parker.

Corinth (Battle of), B.C. 394, won by the Lacedæmonians over the allied Corinthian army.

Coronēa (Battles of). I. B.C. 447, won by the Bœōtians over the Athenians. This great disaster caused the death of Isocrătēs, 'the old man eloquent.'

II. B.C. 394, in which Agesilāos king of Sparta defeated the allied Athenians, Thebans, Argives (2 syl.), and Corinthians.

Corrichie (Battle of), between the Earl of Huntley (a Catholic) and the Earl of Mar (a Protestant). The bone of contention was the earldom of Murray, which Mary the Queen first gave to the Earl of Huntley, and then recalled, that she might give it to her brother, the Earl of Mar. The feud culminated in the battle of Corrichie, in which the Earl of Huntley fell.

The houses of Huntley and Murray were mortal enemies. The fatal battle of Corrichie was an event not to be forgotten nor forgiven. Sir W. Scott, Hist. of Scotland, xxxviii.

Cortenuōva (Battle of), 17 Nov., 1237, in which Kaiser Frederick II. defeated the Milanese.

Corunna (Battle of), 16 January, 1809. This was not a battle, but a fight to keep the enemy at bay while the British troops were safely embarked. Sir John Moore had to retire before a French force, and repulsed the foe, which pressed hard upon him. The British loss was very great, and amongst the slain was Sir John Moore. The French say, 'Il y perdit le 16 Jan., 1809, la bataille, qui lui coûta la vie, et qui força ses troupes à abandonner toute l'Espagne.' Of course, after the British troops had set sail, Marshal Soult occupied Corunna, and therefore claimed the victory.

Corupedion, near Salamis (Battle of), B.C. 281, in which Lysimachus was defeated, and Macedonia, with most other parts of Alexander's vast empire, fell under the hands of Seleucus.

Courtray (Battles of). I. In 1302, in which the French were defeated by the Flemings, commanded by Count John of Namur [Na-moor'] and William de Juliers. This was 'The Battle of the Spurs,' so called because more than 4,000 gilt spurs were picked up on the field. These were the spurs of French knights slain in the battle.

II. In 1793, in which the French defeated the English.

 Courtray has been often lost and won.

Coutras (Battle of), 20 Oct., 1587, in which Henri (afterwards the IV. of France), at the head of the Huguenot army, utterly routed the Leaguers or Catholics led by the Duc de Joyeuse.

Cowpens, South Carolina, U.S. (Battle of), 11 Jan. 1811. Here the Americans defeated the British, in the American War of Independence. The English troops were led by Colonel Tarleton, the Americans by Colonel Morgan. The colours, cannons, and baggage waggons fell into the hands of the victors, and the loss of the British amounted to at least 600 men, while that of the Americans was trifling.

Cran'on (Battle of), B.C. 322, in which the Macedonians led by Antipăter and Cratĕros defeated the confederated Greeks both by sea and land. We are told that Hyperĭdēs, being taken prisoner, was put under torture, and bit or cut off his tongue that he might betray no secrets.

Crayford (Battle of), A.D. 457, in which the Saxons triumphed over the Britons, who abandoned Kent and fled to London.

Probably the same as the battle of the Darent. The river Cray runs into the Darent.

Cressy or Créci, in France (Battle of), Saturday, 26 Aug., 1346, in which Edward III. of England defeated Philippe VI. of France. The victory was mainly due to the Black Prince, who in this battle won his spurs. In this great victory 1,200 French knights and 30,000 footsoldiers (a number equal to the whole English army) lay dead on the field. The siege of Calais followed, and its surrender to the victorious king.

This is the greatest victory ever won. The French were at least four times more numerous than the English, but they lost two kings, eleven great princes, eighty bannerets, 1,200 knights, and 30,000 rank and file. The English lost three knights, one squire, and an insignificant number of inferior rank. After the battle, King Edward sent Lords Cobham and Surrey, with a number of secretaries and heralds, to take a record of the slain; and their record is still extant.

Cropredy Bridge, near Banbury (Battle of), 29 June, 1644, in which Charles I. defeated Sir W. Waller, one of the Parliamentary officers.

Cullod'en, near Inverness (Battle of), 16 April, 1746, in which the Duke of Cumberland completely overthrew the Young Pretender, Charles Edward, and stamped out Jacobitism for ever. Charles Edward escaped to France, three Scotch nobles were beheaded, fifty of Charles's followers were hanged, and forty persons of rank attainted.

Cunax'a (Battle of), B.C. 401, between Cyrus the Younger and his brother Artaxerxes Mnemon. Cyrus was slain. This event has been rendered especially famous by 'the retreat of the 10,000' Greeks, led by Xenophon the historian, who also wrote an account of it in his 'Anabăsis.'

Cunersdorf (Battle of), 12 Aug., 1759, won by the Russians over the King of Prussia.

Cunobizza (Battle of), 1444, won by Hunyădēs over the Sultan Amurath II.

Cynosceph'alæ, or the Dogheads (Battle of), B.C. 197, in which Philip V. of Macedon was utterly defeated by Flaminius the Roman consul. By this defeat Macedonia lost her supremacy in Greece.

Cynossēma (Naval battle of), B.C. 411, won by the Athenians over the Lacedæmonians. Cynossēma means 'dog's tomb,' so called from being the traditional tomb of Hecŭba, who had been metamorphosed into a dog.

Cyzĭcum (Battle of), B.C. 410, won by the Athenians over the Lacedæmonian fleet commanded by Mindăros and assisted by Pharnabăsus the Persian.

Czaslau (Battle of), 17 May, 1742, in which Frederick II. of Prussia defeated Prince Charles of Lorraine. In the War of the Austrian Succession. Pronounce Tshas-low (ow as in now).

Dægsaslan, north of the river Tees (Battle of), 603, won by Ethelfrith over the forces of the Northern Britons. By this great victory the rule of Northumbria, from the Humber to the Forth, was established. Dægsaslan is Dalton, in Yorkshire.

Danbury, Connecticut, U.S. (Battle of), 26 April, 1777, won by the English, who set fire to the town. In the American War of Independence.

Dego (Battle of), 15 April, 1796, in which Bonaparte repulsed the Austrians.

Delium (Battle of), B.C. 424, won by the Bœotians over the Athenians in the eighth year of the Peloponnesian war. This battle was the most disastrous and most decisive of all the battles fought in the first eight years of the war.

Denain (Battle of), 1712, won by the French, commanded by Marshal Villars, over Prince Eugene.

Dennewitz (Battle of), 6 Sept., 1813, won by Marshal Bernadotte [afterwards Charles

XIV. of Sweden] over Marshal Ney. The loss of the French was 16,000 men, Napoleon's defeat at Leipsic the following month (16, 18, 19 Oct.) closed his reverses in this disastrous year.

Deorham, in Gloucestershire (Battle of), 577, in which the West Saxons conquered the Britons. Gloucester, Cirencester, and Bath, which had leagued under the British king in this contest, became the spoil of the conquerors. Three British kings, viz. Conmail, Condidan, and Farinmail, fell in this battle.

Dessau (Battle of), 1626, won by Wallenstein in the Catholic interest. This was one of the battles of the Thirty Years' War.

 Pronounce Des-sow (ow as in now).

Dettingen (Battles of) I. 27 June, 1743, in which George II. defeated the French under Marshal Noailles. In a military point of view this battle was a very small matter, consisting of extricating Lord Stair from a position in which his blundering had placed him. George II. cut his way out. The effect of this success was considerable, for the French evacuated Germany, and the fortunes of Maria Theresa revived. This battle, which was in the War of the Austrian Succession, was the last in which an English sovereign engaged in person.

II. 26 July, 1866, in which the Prussians defeated the Bavarians in the Austro-Prussian war.

Diamond (Battle of the), Sept., 1795. A battle in Ireland between the Orangemen and Catholics; so-called from the place where it was fought, county Antrim.

Dolabella (Battle of), A.D. 24, in which Tacfarinas the African freebooter was defeated by a Roman army and slain.

Donnington (Battles of). I. in 1643, in which the parliamentarians were defeated by Colonel Cavendish.

II. in 1645, in which the royalists, led by Lord Ashton, were defeated by Colonel Morgan.

These are not the same places. The former is in Lincolnshire; the latter in Gloucestershire.

Douro (Battle of the), 12 May, 1809, won by Sir Arthur Wellesley (duke of Wellington) over Soult, the French marshal.

For this exploit Sir Arthur was created Baron Douro.

Dresden (Battles of). I. 28 Oct., 1806, where Napoleon defeated the Prussians.

II. 26, 27 Aug., 1813, won by Napoleon over the allies, led by the Prince of Schwarzenberg. Marshal Moreau was slain in this battle.

Dreux (Battle of), 1562, between the Catholics and Huguenots, in the first religious war of France. Marshal St. André, one of the French Triumvirate (q.v.), was slain; but the Catholics claimed the victory as Prince Condé was taken prisoner.

Dryfe Sands (Battle of), 1593. Between the Maxwells and Johnstones, the former of whom was left dead on the field. This was the last great clan battle fought on the borders.

Dunbar (Battles of). I. 27 April, 1296, in which the English, under John Earl of Warrenne, defeated Baliol's army with great slaughter.

II. 3 Sept., 1650, in which Cromwell utterly defeated the Scotch, led by Leslie. After this victory, Edinburgh Castle and several other strong fortresses fell into the hands of Cromwell.

Ten thousand prisoners fell into Cromwell's hands in this victory, with all the baggage and guns; and as many as 3,000 were slain. Spain instantly recognised the commonwealth, and Holland offered its alliance.

Dunes (Battle of the), 4 June, 1658, in which the English and French defeated the Spaniards.

Dungan Hill (Battle of), 10 July, 1647, in which the Irish were defeated by Colonel Jones.

Dunsin'nane (Battle of), 1057, won by Seward over the army of Macbeth. Macbeth fled and was slain at Lumphanan, in Aberdeenshire.

 Called by Shakespeare Dunsinane.

Dupplin Moor (Battle of), 1332, in which an army of 40,000 Scots was utterly defeated by some 3,000 Englishmen. Above 13,000 of the Scotch were slain, and not above 30 of the English.

Durham (Battle of), 17 Oct., 1346, in which Queen Philippa defeated David Bruce king of Scotland, who was taken prisoner.

Durham Station, North Carolina, the 'Sedan' of the American Civil War. Here (10 May, 1865) General Johnston, who had the chief command of the Confederates, surrendered to General Sherman, and thus brought the war to an end. The war began in 1861.

Durrenstein (Battle of), 11 Nov., 1805, in which the French were defeated by the Russians.

Ebersberg (Battle of), 13 May, 1809, in which the French Marshal Massena defeated the Austrians.

Eckmühl in Bavaria (Battle of), 22 April, 1809, won by Napoleon over the Archduke Karl, leader of the Austrians. All the Austrian artillery, fifteen standards, and 20,000 prisoners fell to the French in this battle.

April 23, Napoleon was wounded in the heel.

Ec'nomus (Naval battle of), B.C. 256, in the first Punic war. The Roman fleet was victorious over the Carthaginian.

 Eonomus, now Monteserrato.

Eddington or Ethandun, near Westbury in Wilts (Battle of), May 11, A.D. 878, in which Alfred completely overthrew the Danes and recovered his throne. Finding it impossible to drive the Danes out of the kingdom, he allowed them to settle in East Anglia, &c., provided they became Christians.

Edgecote (Battle of), 26 July, 1469, in which the royal forces were defeated by Lancastrian insurgents.

Edgehill (Battle of), 23 Oct., 1642. An indecisive battle between the royalists led by Prince Rupert and the parliamentary party led by the Earl of Essex. This was the first battle between Charles I. and his subjects. The king himself was personally present in this battle.

Elchingen (Battle of), 14 Oct., 1805, in which the French under Marshal Ney defeated the Austrians.

Ellandun (Battle of), 823, in which Egbert defeated Beornwulf of Mercia. Ellandun is Wilton, close by Salisbury, a little to the south-east of Ethandun or Eddington, famous for one of Alfred's victories.

Elster (Battle of), 5 Oct., 1080, won by Heinrich IV. of Germany over Rudolf, the pseudo-emperor appointed by the diet of Forscheim. Rudolf died of his wounds.

Emmendingen (Battle of), 19 Oct., 1796. The Archduke Karl of Austria defeated Moreau the French general.

Engen (Battle of), April, 1799, in which Moreau the French general defeated the Austrians.

Enghien (Battle of), 3 Aug., 1692, won by the French under Marshal Luxembourg over William III. Enghien (3 syl.).

Epila (Battle of), 1348, in which the Union of Aragon was overthrown. This was the last battle of Aragon fought in defence of public liberty. The 'Privilege of Union' was abolished, Peter himself cutting to pieces with his sword the original charter.

Espierres (Battle of), 22 May, 1794, in which the French were repulsed by the allied English and Austrians.

Essling (Battle of), 21, 22 May, 1809, won by Karl archduke of Austria over Napoleon. This was the greatest defeat that Napoleon himself had hitherto sustained. Marshal Lannes fell in the fight, and 30,000 French were made prisoners.

Here Kaiser Rudolf, in 1276, overthrew Ottokar king of Bohemia.

Eurymĕdon (Battle of), B.C. 470, won by Cimon, son of Miltiadês, over the Persians.

Eutaw Springs, U.S. (Battle of), 8 Sept., 1781, in which Colonel Stewart and General Arnold (a renegade American) defeated the Americans in the American War of Independence.

Evesham (Battle of), 3 Aug., 1265, in which Simon de Montfort and his son were defeated and slain by Prince Edward son of Henry III. It is said that at one period of the battle the king was on the point of being cleft down by a common soldier, and saved his life by exclaiming, 'Don't kill me, soldier; I am Henry of Westminster, the king.' See Hexham.

Eylau (Battle of), 8 Feb., 1807, a doubtful battle between Napoleon and the combined Russian and Prussian armies. Napoleon claimed the victory because the allied army decamped during the night. It was a most bloody fight. The French were 54,000 strong, the allied Prussians and Russians were 72,000.

 Pronounce Ey-low (ow as in now).

Falkirk (Battles of). I. 22 July, 1298, in which Edward I. defeated Wallace, who was afterwards captured and beheaded.

II. 17 Jan., 1746, in which the 'Young Pretender' defeated General Hawley.

Farnham, in Surrey (Battle of), A.D. 894, in which Alfred defeated the Danes under Hastings their leader.

Fère-champenoise (Battle of), 25 March, 1814, in which Marmont's French army was defeated by the Austrians led by Schwartzenberg.

Ferozeshah (Battle of), in the Punjab, 22, 23 Dec., 1845, in which Sir Hugh Gough defeated the Sikhs.

Hugh Gough was created a baronet in 1842 and a baron in 1846. (Gough=Goff.)

Flat-bush (Battle of), Long Island, 27 Aug., 1776, in which the Americans were defeated by the British forces.

Fleurus (Battle of), 17 June, 1794, in which the allied army, consisting of 100,000 men, under the command of the Prince of Coburg, marching to the relief of Charleroi, was signally defeated by the French revolutionary army commanded by Jourdan. In this battle the French made use of balloons to reconnoitre the enemy's army.

Flodden Field (Battle of), 9 Sept., 1513, in which the Earl of Surrey defeated the Scots.

Fontenoy (Battle of), 11 May, 1745, in which Marshal Saxe defeated the Duke of Cumberland at the head of an allied army of English, Dutch, and Hanoverian troops.

Formigny, in Normandy (Battle of), 18 April, 1450, in which the Constable of Richemont defeated an army of 3,000 Englishmen. This battle was the coup de grâce of our claim upon France. A monument on the field of battle records the victory.

Fornovo (Battle of), 6 July, 1495, in which Charles VIII. of France defeated the Italian allies. This was a most marvellous victory: the French did not number above 9,000, the allies exceeded 40,000. Yet the loss of the French was only 200, but that of the allies 3,500. Paulus Jovius terms this battle 'the extinction of Cisalpine military glory, an ignominious rout which made Italy contemptible, and the beginning of countless miseries.' This battle is also called 'The Battle of the Taro.'

Frankenhausen (Battle of), 1525, in which the Elector of Saxony utterly defeated the Anabaptists, and took their leader, Munzer, prisoner. Munzer was ignominiously beheaded.

Fredericksburg, in the United States (Battle of), 13 Dec., 1862, in which the Confederates under General Lee defeated the Northern army led by General Burnside.

Freiburg (Battle of), 1644, in which the French led by the Great Condé defeated François de Mercl, a general in the service of the Elector of Bavaria.

It was in this battle that Condé flung his bâton into the enemy's trenches.

Friedland (Battle of), 14 June, 1807, won by Napoleon over the Russian army which had fought at Eylau, 8 Feb., 1807. The peace of Tilsit was the result of this victory.

Friedlingen (Battle of), 1702, won by the French commanded by Marshal Villars over the imperialists commanded by the Prince of Baden.

Frithern (Battle of), A.D. 584, won by the Saxons over the Britons. Cealwin was the Saxon chief.

Fuentes de Onoro (Battle of), 5 May, 1811, between the British and Spanish forces under Wellington and the French under Masséna. It was an indecisive battle, but the French retreated out of Portugal on the 10th, and therefore the advantage was on the side of Wellington. The Anglo-Spanish loss was 1,500, the French loss nearly 5,000.

Gallip'oli (Battle of), 1294, a great naval victory won by the Genoese over the Venetians.

Garigliano (Battle of), 27 Dec., 1503, won by Gonsalvo, the great captain, over the French.

Gaugamela (Battle of), 1 Oct., B.C. 331. Same as the 'Battle of Arbela' (q.v.).

Gemblours (Battle of), Jan., 1578, in which the Dutch were defeated by Don John of Austria.

Genestrello (Battle of), 20 May, 1859, the first of the battles fought by the Sardinians against the Austrians. The allied army, consisting of Sardinians, Italians, and French, defeated the Austrians.

Germantown, U.S. (Battle of), 4 Oct., 1777. Here General Howe defeated the Americans in the American War of Independence.

Gettysburg, Pennsylvania (Battle of), 3 July, 1863, in which the Confederates under the command of General Lee were defeated by the Northern army. This was one of the great battles of the Civil War.

Ghuznee (Battle of), 23 July, 1839, won by the English, led by Sir J. Keane, over the Afghans. The citadel was attacked at 2 A.M.; at 3 the gates were blown in, and at 5 the English colours were flying on the towers.

Glenlivet (Battle of), 3 Oct., 1594, a trial of strength between the Highlanders and the Lowlanders. The Earl of Argyll led the Highlanders and the Earl of Huntley the Lowlanders. Victory rested with the latter.

The encounter came to resemble that of Harlaw (q.v.), where the force of the ancient Gael had been tried in mortal contest with that of the Low-country Saxons (Sir W. Scott, 'History of Scotland,' xxxviii.).

Goo'jerat, or Gûjerat (Battle of), 21 Feb., 1849, won by Lord Gough over the Sikhs. A magnificent affair.

 Gough, pronounce Goff.

Gorey (Battle of), 4 June, 1798, in which the king's troops were defeated by the Irish insurgents.

Grampian Hills (Battle of the), A.D. 79 or 82, in which the Romans, under Agricola, utterly defeated the Caledonians led by Galgac.

Grani'cus (Battles of the). I. May B.C. 334, in which Alexander the Great defeated Darius Codoman'us.

II. B.C. 73, in which Lucullus defeated Mithridâtês.

Granson (Battle of), 1476, in which the Swiss fell upon the army of Charles le Téméraire duke of Burgundy, and put it to utter rout.

Gravelotte (Battle of), 18 Aug., 1870, in the Franco-Prussian war; won by the Prussians.

Grochow (Battle of), 20 Feb., 1831, won by the Poles over the Russians.

Gross Beeren (Battle of), 23 Aug., 1813, when the French were repulsed by the Swedes.

Guildford, or Guilford (Battle of), 1781, in which Lord Cornwallis with 1,600 men utterly defeated Greene, the American general, who had 6,600 or 7,000 men. Marshall, in his 'Life of Washington,' says: 'No battle in the whole course of the war reflects more honour on the courage of the British troops than this of Guildford' (in North Carolina).

Guinegate, near Calais (Battle of), 18 Aug., 1513, won by the allied armies of Henry VIII. of England, the Kaiser Maximilian, and the Swiss, over the French. Called the 'Battle of the Spurs,' because the French used their spurs in flight more than their swords in fight.

Guzerat. 'See Goojerat.'

Gwenystrad (Battle of), A.D. 547, won by Urien over Ida the Saxon invader.

Hadriano'ple (Battles of). I. 3 July, A.D. 323, in which the Roman emperor Licinius was defeated by Constantine.

II. 9 Aug., A.D. 378, in which the Roman emperor Valens was utterly defeated by the Goths, and lost his life. No battle, except that of Cannæ, could be compared to this in its fatal consequences on the Romans.

Halidon Hill (Battle of), near Berwick, 19 July, 1333, in which Edward III. defeated the Regent Douglas (brother of the famous 'Good Sir James'). By this victory Berwick-upon-Tweed remained to the English, and Baliol was restored to the throne as sub-king to the English crown, but the wars with France drew Edward ont of the country, Baliol fled, and David Bruce returned to his kingdom.

It is said that 30,000 Scots were killed; but only 1 knight, 1 esquire, and 13 privates on Edward's side.

Halle (Battle of), 16, 17 Oct., 1806. Here Bernadotte defeated the Prussians.

Hanau (Battle of), 29 Oct., 1813. The French claim the victory because the Austrians were compelled to retreat. The French were led by Napoleon and the Austrians by General Wrede. The affair was doubtful, though the French army was double that of the adversary.

Harlaw (Battle of), 24 July, 1411, a trial of strength between the Gaels and Saxons. The Saxons, or Lowlanders, were led by the Earl of Mar; the Gaels, or Highlanders, by Donald of the Isles. The latter army was considerably more in number, but all the benefits of victory remained with the Saxons. On 3 Oct., 1594, a similar trial occurred at Glenlivet, when the Earl of Argyll led the Highlanders and Huntley the Lowlanders. In this case also the victory rested with the Lowlanders.

Hastings (Battle of), 14 Oct., 1066, where William duke of Normandy conquered and slew Harold II., and thus won, by conquest, the throne of England. Also called the 'Battle of Senlac.'

Hatfield, in Yorkshire (Battle of), 14 Oct., 633. Called the 'Battle of Hatfield Chase,' in which Edwine king of Northumbria was defeated and slain by Penda of Mercia.

Havenfeld, or Hefenfield (Battle of), 634, in which the Welsh under Cadwallon were utterly defeated by Oswald king of Northumbria. Havenfeld means 'heaven's field,' so called because Oswald just before the battle threw himself on his knees in the midst of the army, and asked God to give him the victory. Cadwallon fell fighting in this battle. Havenfeld was in Durham, not far from Hexham.

Hefenfield. See Havenfeld.

Heights of Romainville (Battle of the), 30 March, 1814, in which the French army under Joseph Bonaparte, Marmont, and Mortier was defeated by the allies, who entered Paris the next day.

Heilsberg (Battle of), 10 June, 1807, in which the Prussians were defeated by the French.

Hengestesdun (Battle of), 835, in which Egbert king of England defeated the Danes. Hengestesdun is now called Hengston Down, in Cornwall.

Heraclēa (Battle of), B.C. 280. In which the Romans were defeated by Pyrrhus.

Heraclēum (Battle of), B.C. 38, where Ventidius (Antony's legate) defeated the Parthians under Pacōrus.

Herara (Battle of), in Aragon, 24 Aug., 1837, in which Don Carlos of Spain defeated General Buerens.

Hermanstadt (Battle of), 1442, won by Hunyádés over the Turks.

Hexham, in Northumberland (Battle of), 15 May, 1464, in which the Lancastrians were defeated by Lord Montacute. There is a current legend that after the battle Queen Margaret, in her flight, encountered a brigand, and said to him, 'Man, I trust to your loyalty the son of your king.' We are furthermore assured that Margaret and her son escaped over the border under this robber's guidance. See Evesham.

Hobkirk's Hill, South Carolina, U.S. (Battle of), 25 April, 1781, where Lord Rawdon defeated the American General Greene in the American War of Independence.

Hochkirchen (Battles of). I. 14 Oct., 1758, when Marshal Daun defeated Frederick II. the Great of Prussia. (In the Third Campaign of the Seven Years' War.)

II. 22 May, 1813, when Napoleon defeated the combined Russian and Prussian armies.

Höchst (Battle of), 11 Oct., 1795, in which the Austrians defeated Marshal Jourdan, and compelled the French to cross the Rhine.

Hochstadt (Battle of), 19 June, 1800, won by Marshal Moreau, the French general, over the Austrians.

Hogue (Naval battle off Cape la), 1692, in which the French were defeated by the League (consisting of England, Germany, Holland, Spain, and Savoy).

Hohenlinden (Battle of), 3 Dec., 1800, won by Marshal Moreau for the French over the Austrian Archduke John. In this battle he took 100 pieces of cannon and 11,000 prisoners.

Holmedon Hill (Battle of), 14 Sept., 1402, between the Scots headed by the Earl of Douglas and the Percys. Hotspur, one of the Percys, was the victor; Douglas was taken prisoner, and so were the earls of Angus, Fife, Murray, and Orkney, with many more of the Scotch nobility and gentry.

Iconium (Battle of), 1387, won by Amurath the Turkish sultan over the Caramanians. Here Prince Bajazet greatly distinguished himself, and acquired the epithet of Yilderim (Lightning).

Ingolstadt (Battle of), 20 April, 1809, won by Napoleon.

Inkermann, in the Crimēa (Battle of), 5 Nov., 1854, won by the allied British and French armies over the Russians.

Inverlochy, in Scotland (Battle of), 2 Feb., 1645, in which the Marquis of Montrose, commander of the royal army in Scotland, defeated Argyll.

Ipsus (Battle of), B.C. 301, a decisive battle which closed the great contest between the generals of Alexander the Great for the succession to the empire. Antigonus being defeated and slain, Seleucus was confirmed in his kingdom.

Irun (Battle of), 17 May, 1837, in which the Carlists of Spain were defeated by the British auxiliary legion under General Evans.

Islip Bridge, Oxfordshire (Battle of), 22 April, 1645, in which Cromwell routed four regiments of cavalry convoying the king's artillery from Oxford to Worcester.

Issus (Battles of), Nov. B.C. 333, won by Alexander the Great over Darius Codoman'us king of Persia. The Persian army consisted of 600,000 men. Alexander's army did not amount to 30,000 men. In this battle Sisygamia, the mother of Darius, and Statira his wife, fell into the hands of the conqueror.

A.D. 194, Severus conquered Pescennius Niger in a decisive battle on the same plains. The loss of Pescennius Niger was 20,000 men and his own life. His head was sent to Rome.

Ivry (Battle of), 1590, in which Henry IV. gained a brilliant victory over the Duc de Mayenne.

Jalūla (Battle of), A.D. 637, won by the Saracens over Yzdegerd king of Persia.

Janvilliers (Battle of), 14 Feb., 1814, won by the French over the Prussians under Blücher.

Jarnac (Battle of), 13 March, 1569, in the third religious war of France. The Catholics were victors, and the Prince de Condé, the great Huguenot leader, was killed in cold blood by Moncontour.

Jemappes, in Belgium (Battle of), 5 Nov., 1792. This battle lasted four days; it was between the French revolutionary army led by General Dumouriez and 28,000 Austrians entrenched in woods and hills. Dumouriez was the victor; but he lost 12,000 men, the loss of the Austrians being 10,000.

Jena, in Saxe-Weimar (Battle of), 14 Oct., 1806, in which Napoleon defeated the King of Prussia and advanced at once to Berlin. Here the Duke of Brunswick lost his life. On the same day Marshal Davoust routed the Prussians at Auerstadt.

 Jena pronounce Ya-nah.

Jsaszeg (Battle of), 5 April, 1849, in the War of Independence. It was won by the Hungarians. With this battle the demoralisation of the Austrian army was complete.

June 1st (Battle of), 1794, a naval victory in which Lord Howe defeated and crippled the French fleet off the coast of Brest. The battle is called that of the 'First of June.' The French admiral was Villaret-Joyeuse.

Kadesiah (Battle of), or 'Kudseah,' A.D. 636, won by the Mahometans over the Persians. This battle decided the character of the Persian empire.

Kainardji, or Kutschuk-Kainardji (Treaty of), 21 July, 1774. A treaty of peace between Russia and Turkey. By this treaty the Azof was ceded to Russia, and the freedom of the Black Sea. The Crimea was severed from Turkey and declared free.

Kaiserlautern (Battle of), 30 Nov., 1793, won by the Duke of Brunswick over the French.

Kalitsch (Battle of), 13 Feb., 1813, in which the French were defeated by the Russians. The French general was Regnier and the Russian general was Winzingerode.

Kalusz (Battle of), 15 Oct., 1667, won by Sobieski, the Polish general, after seventeen days' fighting, over the Cossacks and Tartars.

Kapolna (Battle of), 1848, one of the battles of the War of Independence. Lost by the Hungarians, who were led by Dembinski. It is said that the jealousy of Görgey, who refused to obey orders, was the cause of this defeat.

Kars (Battle of), 29 Sept., 1855, won by the Turks, commanded by General Williams, over the Russians, commanded by General Mouravieff. Certainly, the Russians were thrice the number of the Turks. The Turks lost 1,094 men, the Russians lost 6,500. Kars was invested by Mouravieff, 16 June, 1855; after the battle it was obliged to capitulate, 12 Dec., 1855; but when peace was restored Kars was by the treaty of Paris restored to Turkey, 1856.

Katsbach (Battle of), 26 Aug., 1813, won by Blücher over the French.

Kesseldorff (Battle of), 15 Dec., 1745, in which Prince Leopold of Anhalt-Dessau defeated the Saxons under Prince Charles of Lorraine. (In the War of the Austrian Succession.)

Kiblene (Battle of), St. Andrews' day, 1335, won by the Scotch (led by Liddesdale) over the English, under the command of the Earl of Athol.

Kilcullen (Battle of), 23 May, 1798, in which General Dundas was routed by the Irish insurgents.

In a subsequent engagement General Dundas overthrew the rebels near Kilcullen Bridge.

Killiecrankie (Battle of), 17 July, 1689, in which John Graham viscount of Dundee (Claverhouse), a Jacobite, defeated General Mackay, who commanded an army in the service of the Prince of Orange (William III.) Claverhouse fell early in the battle.

Kilsyth, in Scotland (Battle of), 15 Aug., 1645, in which the Marquis of Montrose, commander of the royal forces in Scotland, defeated the Scots under Baillie.

Knoc-Auadh (Battle of), 1504, in which Kildare governor of Ireland (i.e. the Pale) utterly routed the confederated Irish. It is said that from 4,000 to 9,000 of the Irish fell, but not one single English soldier in Kildare's army.

Kolin, in Bohemia (Battle of), 18 June, 1757, where Marshal Daun defeated Frederick II. (the Great) of Prussia. (The Second Campaign of the Seven Years' War.)

Ko'nieh (Battle of), 20 Dec., 1832, in Turkey. The Turks were defeated by Ibrahim Pasha.

Königgrätz (Battle of), same as Sadowa (q.v.)

Konovics (Battle of), 28 Nov., 1442, in which Hunyádi defeated the Turks.

Kossova (Battle of), 27 Aug., 1389, won by Amurath, the Turkish sultan, over the allied Christian army. Amurath was slain, probably by treachery, after the battle was won.

Kotzim or Choczim (Battle of), 10 Nov., 1673, won by Sobieski, the Polish general, over Capitan Pasha, the Turkish general. This was a truly marvellous victory, and 40,000 Turks were slain.

Kowno (Battle of), 14 Dec., 1812, in which the French were defeated by the Russians.

Krasnoi (Battle of), 16 Nov., 1812, in which Marshal Davoust (Prince of Eckmühl) and his French army were defeated by the Russians under the command of Kutusoff.

Krefeld (Battle of), 23 June, 1758, in the third campaign of the Seven Years' War. Here the Duke of Brunswick, fighting on the side of Frederick II. (the Great) of Prussia, drove the French army across the Rhine.

Kulm (Battle of), 31 Aug., 1813, won by the allied armies of Austria and Russia over the French.

Kunersdorf (Battle of), 12 Aug., 1759, the fourth campaign of the Seven Years' War. Here Frederick II. (the Great) of Prussia suffered from the combined Austrian and Russian armies the greatest defeat in all his reign. He wrote in pencil to his chief minister, 'All is lost, save the royal family.' Strange to say, after this great victory, the Austrian and Russian generals fell to loggerheads, and Prussia was saved.

La Hogue (Battle of), 19 May, 1692, in which the French fleet, under Admiral Tourville, was utterly destroyed by the English and Dutch. This was a most important victory, won by the Admirals Russell and Rooke, as it not only put an end to the threatened French invasion, and overthrew the hopes of James II. of recovering his throne, but so crippled the navy of France that it ceased to be formidable.

La Rothière (Battle of), 1 Feb., 1814, won by Napoleon over the combined Prussian and Russian armies.

Lake Champlain, in North America (Battles of). I. 11 and 13 Oct., 1776, when the American flotilla was defeated by the English.

II. 11 Sept., 1814, when the Americans defeated the English squadron.

Lake Erie, in Canada (Battle of), 10 Sept., 1813, in which the Americans captured the British squadron.

Fort Erie, in Canada, was taken by General Brown from the British, 3 July, 1814; but 5 Nov. the same year was abandoned by the captors.

Lake Lemānus, in Geneva (Battle of). B.C. 108, in which Cassus Longinus the consul was slain, and his whole army cut to pieces by the Cimbrians.

Lake Merom (Battle at the), B.C. 1450, where the kings of the hill country and their allies were defeated by Joshua.

Lake Regillus. See 'Regillus.'

Landau, or Pirmasens (Battle of), 14 Sept.' 1793, won by the Duke of Brunswick over the French.

 Pronounce Lahn-dow (ow as in now).

Landen (Battle of), 29 July, 1693, in which Marshal Luxembourg defeated William III. of England.

Langensalza, in Prussia (Battles of). I. 14 Feb., 1761, in which the Hanoverians defeated the French (in the sixth campaign of the Seven Years' War.)

II. 27 June, 1866, in which General Flies defeated the Hanoverians in the Austro-Prussian war (in the Seven Weeks' War.)

Langport, in Somersetshire (Battle of), June, 1645, in which Fairfax routed the royal forces.

Langside, in Scotland (Battle of), 13 May, 1568, in which the Hamiltons, who supported the cause of Mary Queen of Scots, were defeated by the Earl of Murray. After this defeat Mary crossed the Solway and took refuge in the castle of Carlisle. Here she demanded one of two things—either her restoration to the throne of Scotland or a safe passage to France.

Lansdowne Hill, near Bath (Battle of), 5 July, 1643, in which the royalist army, under Sir Bevil Granville, defeated Sir William Waller and his parliamentarian forces.

Laon (Battle of), 9 March, 1814, won by the allied armies of Bernadotte of Sweden and Blücher over Napoleon.

Laufeld or Lawfield (Battles of). I. 1747, in which the French, under Marshal Saxe, defeated the allied English and Dutch, under the command of the Duke of Cumberland.

II. 1794, in which the French were victorious.

Laupen, Berne (Battle of), 1339, in which the Bernois, commanded by Rudolph d'Erlach, defeated the Austrians.

Lech (Battle of). 1632, won by Gustavus Adolphus over the German Catholic League. Here Tilly was mortally wounded. This was one of the battles of the Thirty Years' War.

Lechfeld (Battles of). I. A.D. 743 Pepin defeated the Bavarians and Saxons.

II. 794 Charlemagne defeated the Huns.

III. 910 the Hungarians defeated the Franks and Bavarians.

IV. 955 Otto I. of Germany defeated the Hungarians.

Legnāno, near Como (Battle of), 29 May, 1176, in which Frederick Barbarossa was defeated by the Milanese, and the independence of Lombardy was recognised by him in the treaty of Constance, 1183.

Leipzig (Battles of). I. 7 Sept., 1631, in which Gustavus Adolphus defeated Tilly. This was in the Thirty Year' War, and was one of the three great battles.

The other two were Lützen, won by Gustavus Adolphus in 1632; and Nordlingen, won by the Kaiser's son (afterwards Ferdinand III.) in 1634.

II. 16, 18, 19 Oct., 1813, won by the allied Russian, Austrian, and Prussian armies over Napoleon.

The bridge over the Elster, blown up by a mine, was the most disastrous part of this sanguinary battle. The French numbered 180,000 men, the allied army 300,000. The 17 German battalions in the French army deserted to the allies.

Lens, in the Pas-de-Calais (Battle of), 1648, in which the great Condé defeated Leopold brother of the Kaiser of Germany.

Lepanto (Naval battle of), 7 Oct., 1571, in which Don John of Austria defeated the Turks. It was recaptured by the Venetians in 1678, and restored to the Turks by the treaty of Carlowitz in 1699.

The naval victory of Lepanto was one of the most splendid ever achieved. 25,000 Turks were slain, 4,000 were taken prisoners; 12,000 Christian slaves were released; 130 ships were captured, 130 others were abandoned and destroyed, and 80 were sunk during the battle.

Leuctra (Battle of), 8 July, B.C. 371, in which the Lacedæmonians, led by Cleombrŏtus, received a crushing defeat from the Thebans, led by Epaminondas and Pelopidas.

Leuthen, in Silesia (Battle of), 5 Dec., 1757, in which Frederick II. of Prussia defeated the Austrians under Prince Charles of Lorraine. This was just one month after the rout of Rosbach (in the second campaign of the Seven Years' War).

Lewes (Battle of), in Sussex, 14 May, 1264, in which Simon de Montfort and his Londoners defeated and captured both King Henry III. and Richard earl of Cornwall, king of the Romans. Prince Edward escaped, and subsequently surrendered.

Lexington (Battle of), in Massachusetts. I. 19 April, 1775. The first skirmish in the American War of Independence. Gage, the British general, had the worst of it, and so far it may be scored as an American victory; but the affair, though honourable to the American militia, was not important, and was not a battle, but a mere skirmish.

II. Lexington, in Missouri, is noted for a battle between the Federals (or Northern States) and the Confederates (or Southern States) in Sept., 1861. In this case the town remained in the hands of the Confederates.

Liegnitz, in Silesia (Battles of). I. 9 April, 1241, in which Batou Khan defeated Duke Henry of Silesia and the Christian allies.

II. 3 May, 1634, in which the Saxons, under Arnheim, defeated Jerome Colloredo, commander of the Bohemians.

III. 16 Aug., 1760, in which Frederick II. (the Great) of Prussia, defeated the Austrians under Laudon (in the fifth campaign of the Seven Years' War).

Ligny (Battle of), 16 June, 1815, won by Napoleon over Blücher; but the defeat was not sufficiently grave to prevent Blücher from assisting at the field of Waterloo on the 18th.

Lincoln (Battles of). I. 2 Feb., 1141, where Stephen king of England was both defeated and captured by Ralph and Robert of Gloucester. After this victory Matilda (the wife of Geoffrey the Handsome, or Geoffrey Plantagenet, and daughter of Henry I.) entered London, and was received as 'the Lady of England.'

II. 19 May, 1217, in which Louis the dauphin of France was utterly defeated by the army of Henry III.

Linlithgow Bridge (Battle of), 1525, won by Sir James Hamilton over the Earl of Lenox, who wanted to obtain possession of the King (James V. of Scotland). Lenox was slain by Hamilton.

Lippstadt (Battle of). See 'Lützen.'

Lissa (Battle of), in Silesia, 5 Dec., 1757, in which Frederick II. of Prussia defeated Prince Charles of Lorraine.

Llongborth (Battle of), 530, won by Cerdic over the Britons. In this battle Arthur was the commander of the British army, and Geraint prince of Devonshire united with him against the Saxons. Geraint was slain.

Lobositz (Battle of), Oct., 1756, between Frederick II. of Prussia and the Austrians under General Brown. It was indecisive, but Frederick claimed the victory. (First campaign of the Seven Years' War.)

Loch Gary (Battle of), 26 July, 1654, in which General Middleton and his Highlanders were defeated by the Protector's army.

Lodi (Battle of), 10 May, 1796. At the bridge of Lodi Bonaparte beat the Austrians, and on the 15th entered Milan without opposition.

Logron'o (Battle of), 10th century, in the reign of Ramiro II. king of Asturias, when the Arabs under Abderrahman II. were overthrown. This was the famous battle in which St. James on his white horse fought, as we are told, for Spain.

Lonăto (Battle of), 3 Aug. 1796, in which Bonaparte vanquished the Austrians led by Wurmser.

Long Island (Battle of), North America, 27 Aug., 1776, in which Sir William Howe defeated the American troops. Same as Flatbush.

Lundy (Battle of), 25 July, 1814, between the United States and the United Kingdom. The American generals were Winfield Scott and General Brown; the British forces were commanded by General Drummond and General Riall. The victory was doubtful.

Sometimes called the battle of Bridgewater, battle of Niagara, battle of Lundy's Lane, &c.

Lützen (Battles of). I. 6 Nov., 1632, won by the Swedes over the German Catholic League. Gustavus Adolphus king of Sweden died of wounds received in this battle; some say foully in the moment of victory. This was one of the battles of the Thirty Years' War. Also called the battle of Lippstadt.

II. 2 May, 1813, won by Napoleon I. over the allied armies of Prussia and Russia.

Macato (Battle of), 11 Oct., 1427, in which Carmagnuola defeated the Milanese forces led by Carlo Malatesta.

Macziewice (Battle of), 10 Oct., 1794, in which the Polish general Kosciusko was defeated and taken prisoner by Suwarof, the Russian general.

Mag'dolon (Battle of). So Herodotus calls the battle of Megiddo (Hist. ii. 159). The Romans called Megiddo 'Legio,' and it is still called 'Lejjun.' The battle referred to by Herodotus is that in which Josiah was overcome and slain by Pharaoh-Necho king of Egypt (2 Kings xxiii. 29, 30).

Magenta (Battle of), 4 June, 1859, won by the French Marshal M'Mahon over the Austrians. For this brilliant action M'Mahon was created 'Duc de Magenta' by Napoleon III. The Austrian general was Gyulay.

Magheracloon (Battle of), 1843. This was no battle in the usual sense of the word, but an affray between the police and some Irish rioters. A Mr. Shirley, being unable to obtain his rents, obtained an order for 'substitution of service;' the process was to be attached to the walls of the Catholic chapel of Magheracloon. When the bailiff attempted to attach the process to the chapel wall, he was assailed by a volley of stones, and he ordered the police to fire on the rioters. One man was shot dead and others wounded, but the rioters became so violent that the bailiff and the police had to make off with all speed in order to save their lives. This the rioters called a victory, and the affray is still called in Ireland 'the Battle of Magheracloon.'

Magheracloon is near Carrickmacross, in Mon'aghan.

Magnano (Battle of), 5 April, 1799; won by the Austrian General Kray over Schérer the French general.

Magnesia (Battle of), B.C. 190, in which Antiochus king of Syria was utterly defeated by the two Scipios, and lost all his conquests in Asia Minor.

Maida (Battle of), 4 July, 1806. Sir John Stuart routed the French under the command of Regnier.

Makla (Battle of), in Algeria, 1834, in which the French were defeated by Abd-el-Kader.

Mal'aga (Naval battle of), 1704, won by Admiral Rooke over the French.

Malplaquet, in France (Battle of), 11 Sept., 1709, where the Duke of Marlborough and Prince Eugène defeated the French under Marshal Villars. The French lost 12,000, the allies many more, though they won the victory. The cause of this battle was this: the allies insisted that Louis XIV. should compel his grandson to give up the crown of Spain. Louis replied, 'If I must wage war, it shall be with my enemies and not with my own children.'

 Pronounce Mal-pla-ka'.

Mantine'a (Battles of). I. B.C. 418, won by Agis the Spartan general over the Argive League.

II. B.C. 362, won by the Thebans, led by Epaminondas, over the Lacedæmonians and Arcadians.

III. B.C. 207, won by Philopœmen, head of the Achæan League, over the Lacedæmonians.

Marathon (Battle of), 28 Sept., B.C. 490, in which Miltiadês the Athenian defeated the Persians under Datis and Artaphernês. This was one of the most important and decisive battles of the world—the 'Waterloo' of ancient history. If the Persians had been victorious, Attica would have been a mere satrapy of Persia, but as the Athenians were victorious they became one of the most brilliant people of all history.

Marengo, in Italy (Battle of), 14 June, 1800, in which Napoleon Bonaparte defeated the Austrians under General Melas. The French army was retreating, when General Dessaix arrived with reinforcements and turned the fortunes of the day.

Marignano, in Italy (Battles of). I. 14, 15 Sept., 1515, in which François I. of France defeated the allied Italian-Swiss armies, called by Trivulzio 'The battle of the giants,' from the great valour displayed on both sides. As many as 6,000 French and 10,000 of the allies were left dead on the field.

II. 8 July, 1859, in which the Austrians were driven from their position by Napoleon III.

Also called the battle of Melegnano.

Maritza (Battle of the), 1375, won by Amurath, the Turkish sultan, over the crusaders. This was the first of a long series of Turkish victories.

Markfeld, near Vienna (Battle of), 1278, in which Ottokar king of Bohemia was utterly defeated by Rudolf I. king of Germany, and was slain in the battle.

Here, 5 July, 1809, was fought the battle of Wagram, in which Napoleon defeated the Austrians, and took 20,000 prisoners.

Marsala (Battle of), 11 May, 1860, certainly the most marvellous and heroic battle in all history. Garibaldi, with 1,000 Italian volunteers, 6 small cannons, and 1,200 peasants, utterly defeated 50,000 Austrian troops with numerous artillery, posted in strong fortresses, and supported with a fleet of 500 guns. After this victory, he crossed the mountains and took Palermo on the 27th of the same month. The thing seems wholly incredible, but is yet an historic fact without hyperbole or exaggeration.

Marston Moor, in Yorkshire (Battle of), 2 July, 1644, in which Cromwell defeated Prince Rupert. The whole of the Prince's artillery fell into the hands of Cromwell, and the royalists never afterwards recovered the loss of that disastrous day.

Maserfeld (Battle of the), 655, in which Oswald king of Northumbria was defeated and slain by Penda king of Mercia.

Maxen, in Saxony (Battle of), 20 Nov., 1759, where Marshal Daun took Fink, a Prussian general, prisoner. (In the fourth campaign of the Seven Years' War.)

Megʻaletaphʻros, the 'Great Ditch' (Battle of), in which Aristomĕnēs and the Messenians were completely defeated by the Spartans. In this battle the Arcadians deserted in a body from the Messenians.

Megiddo (Battles of). I. The overthrow of Jabin and Sisera was 'at the waters of Megiddo' (Judges v. 19).

II. Here Pharaoh-necho overthrew and slew Josiah (2 Kings xxiii. 29, 30).

Melitēnē (Battle of), A.D. 576, in which Chosroes I. king of Persia was defeated by Justinian, general of Tiberias emperor of the East. This was the last conflict of the Persians with the Romans.

Meloria (Battle of), 1284, in which the whole navy of Pisa was utterly destroyed by the Genoese, and Pisa ceased to be a maritime power.

Merseburg, in Saxony (Battle of), 934, in which Heinrich I. the Fowler of Germany conquered the Hungarians with great slaughter.

Méry-sur-Seine (Battle of), 24 Feb., 1814, won by Napoleon over the Austrian army under Schwartzenberg.

Metaurus (Battle of), B.C. 207, in which the consuls Livius and Nero utterly cut to pieces the army of Hasdrubal sent to reinforce Hannibal in the south of Italy.

This is one of Sir Edward Creasy's Fifteen Decisive Battles of the World.

Mexico (Battle of), A.D. 1521, won by the Spaniards, because St. James on his white horse fought for them. Bernal Diaz, who was present and saw the mysterious rider, tells us he thought it was Francisco de Morla, but it might be St. James notwithstanding.

Meyenfels (Battle of), 8 Oct., 876, where Louis the Younger of Saxony defeated Charles the Bald of France.

Milazzo, or Melazzo (Battle of), 20 June, 1860, in which Garibaldi defeated the Neapolitan General Bosco.

Millesimo (Battle of), 14 April, 1796, in which Bonaparte repulsed the Piedmontese.

Minden, in Prussia (Battle of), 1 Aug., 1759, in which Prince Ferdinand of Brunswick with six English regiments defeated the French under Marshal Contades. (In the fourth campaign of the Seven Years' War. Ferdinand's army consisted principally of British and Hanoverian troops.)

Marshal Contades said: 'I have seen this day what I never thought possible, viz. a single line of cavalry break through three lines of cavalry ranked in order of battle, and tumble them all to ruins.' Contades (2 syl.).

Minorca (Naval battle off), 20 May, 1756. This was no battle, but a shameful retreat of Admiral Byng, who had been sent to the relief of Port Mahon. Byng was shot for his cowardice by sentence of court-martial 14 March, 1757.

Mockern (Battles of). I. April 1813, in which the Prussian army was defeated by the French under Eugène Beauharnais.

II. 14 Oct. 1813, between the French and the allies. The town of Mockern was taken and retaken five times in this conflict.

Mohatz (Battles of), in Lower Hungary. I. 29 Aug., 1526, in which the Turks under Solyman II. defeated Ludwig of Hungary, with the loss of 22,000 men. Ludwig after the battle was suffocated with his horse in a muddy brook called Csele.

II. A.D. 1687, in which a Christian army, commanded by Prince Charles of Lorraine, defeated the Turks, who lost 10,000 men.

Mohilow (Battle of), 23 July, 1812. A sanguinary battle between the Russians under Prince Bagration and the French under Marshal Davoust. The Russians were defeated, and their loss in killed and wounded was immense.

Moinmor (Battle of), 1151, in which Tordelvach O'Connor utterly defeated Thomond king of Munster with great slaughter, and became king of Ireland.

Molwitz (Battle of), 30 March, 1741, won by Friedrich III. of Prussia over the Austrian army sent against him by Maria Theresa. This was the first battle in the War of the Austrian Succession.

Moncontour (Battle of), 1570, in the third religious war of France. The Huguenots were defeated by Henri duc d'Anjou, brother of Charles IX.

Mondŏvi (Battle of), 22 April, 1796, in which Bonaparte defeated the Piedmontese.

Monmouth Court House, U.S. (Battle of), 28 June, 1778. Here Washington won his third victory over the British in the American War of Independence: (1) Trenton, (2) Princeton. At Brandywine he was defeated (q.v.).

Mons en Puelle, in Flanders (Battle of), 18 Aug., 1304, in which Philippe le Bel defeated the Flemings.

Mont St. Jean (Battle of), 18 June, 1815, called in English history the 'Battle of Waterloo' (q.v.).

Montebello (Battle of), 6 June, 1800, won by Napoleon Bonaparte over Ott, the Austrian general. General Lannes for his valour in this battle was created Duc de Montebello.

Montenotte (Battle of), 11 April, 1796, in which Bonaparte defeated the Austrians, commanded by Beaulieu. This was the first of his series of brilliant victories.

Montereau (Battle of), 18 Feb., 1814, in which the allied armies were defeated by Napoleon.

Montlhéry (Battle of), 1465, between Louis XI. and the 'League for the Public Weal.' The battle was indecisive, but led to the treaty of Conflans, and the league was soon broken up.

Montmirail (Battle of), 11 Feb., 1814, won by Napoleon over the Prussians led by Blücher.

Moodkee, in Hindustan (Battle of), 18 Dec., 1845, in which Sir Hugh Gough defeated the Sikhs. Sir Robert Sale was mortally wounded in this battle.

Hugh Gough was created a baronet in 1842, and a baron in 1846.

 Gough, pronounce Goff.

Mooltan (Battle of), 7 Nov., 1848, won by the British over the Sikhs.

The town was taken 2 Jan., 1849, and the citadel 22 Jan.

Mopsuestia (Battle of), A.D. 838, called by Arabian writers 'Mamuriyah,' in which 30,000 Greeks were left dead on the field.

Morat, or Murden, Switzerland (Battle of), 22 June, 1476, in which the Swiss defeated the brilliant army of Charles le Téméraire. The celebrated Ossuaire of Morat was made of the bones of the Burgundians slain in this battle.

Moravian Town (Battle of), 5 Oct., 1813, won by General Harrison over Proctor.

Morgarten (Battles of). I. 25 Oct., 1315, between 1,300 Switzers and 20,000 Austrians under the command of Duke Leopold. The Swiss army was made up of 600 men of Schwitz, 400 of Uri, and 300 of Unterwalden. These 1,300 slew 15,000 Austrians, and not a few of the army of Leopold were drowned in the Egrer See. This and Marsala (q.v.) are, perhaps, the most extraordinary battles of history, if we except that of Gideon, who with 300 men put to flight the allied Midianites and Amalekites. Gideon's victory, however, was from panic, the other two the result of indomitable valour.

II. A.D. 1798, between the French and the Switzers. The French loss was 2,754 dead, exclusive of wounded; the Switzers' loss was 431 men and women; but the Assembly thought it prudent to come to terms with the French and not renew the fight.

III. In 1799 the French defeated the Austrians on the same battlefield.

Mortemer, in ancient Normandy (Battle of), 1054, where William (afterwards called the Conqueror) defeated Henri I, king of France.

Mortimer's Cross, near Hereford (Battle of), 2 Feb., 1461, in which Edward duke of York defeated the Lancastrians under the command of Jasper Tudor earl of Pembroke.

Moskirch (Battle of), April 1799, in which Marshal Moreau, the French general, defeated the Austrians.

Moskwa (Battle of), 7 Sept., 1812, between the French under Napoleon and the Russians led by Kutusoff. Each claimed the victory. It was one of the most sanguinary conflicts in history. Also called the Battle of Borodino.

Mosul (Battle of), also called 'The Battle of Nineveh,' 1 Dec., A.D. 627, won by Heraclius emperor of Constantinople over Chosroes II, of Persia. Elmacin says 500,000 Persians fell in this battle, but Gibbon thinks 50,000 too high a number. Twenty-seven standards were taken by the victorious Romans.

Motta (Battle of), 7 Oct., 1513, in which the Venetians led by D'Alviano were defeated by the Spaniards.

Mount Tabor (Battle of), 1799, won by Bonaparte over the Mamelukes.

Muhlberg (Battle of), 1547, in which the Smalkaldic League was utterly defeated by Karl V. The Elector of Saxony and the Landgrave of Hesse were both taken prisoners.

Muhldorf (Battle of), in Bavaria, 1322, between Friedrich the Handsome and Ludwig V., rivals for the throne of Germany. The latter was victorious, and Friedrich was taken prisoner.

Münchengrätz (Battle of), 28 June, 1866, in the Seven Weeks' War. The Prussians defeated the Austrians.

Mursa (Battle of), 28 Sept., A.D. 351, in which Constantius II. defeated the usurper Magnentius. Constantius lost 30,000 men out of an army of 80,000; and Magnentius lost 24,000 men out of an army of 36,000.

Muta (Battle of), A.D. 629, in which Khaled, commander of the Khoreish cavalry, saved the army of Mohammed.

Mỹcălĕ (Battle of), 22 Sept., B.C. 479, in which the Persians were completely defeated by the Greeks. On the same day Mardonius was defeated at Platĕa.

Naas (Battle of), in Ireland, 24 May, 1798, in which the Irish rebels were defeated by the king's troops.

Nachod, in Bohemia (Battle of), 27–29 June, 1866, in the Seven Weeks' War. The Crown Prince of Prussia defeated the Austrians.

Nafels (Battle of), 6 April, 1388, in which 350 of the men of Glaris withstood 15,000 Austrians with such terrible slaughter that the Austrians were obliged to retreat.

Nahavund or Nehavend (Battle of), 637, in which Yzdegerd III. king of Persia was defeated by the Saracens, and subsequently murdered. His loss is stated at 100,000 men. This battle, called by the Arabs 'The Victory of Victories,' brought to an end the famous dynasty of the Sassanides (3 syl.) and also the religion of the Magi, which had existed in Persia more than 1,200 years.

Naïssus (Battle of), A.D. 270, won by the Emperor Claudius over 320,000 Goths, of whom 50,000 were left dead on the field. For this great victory Claudius was called Gothicus.

Najara, in Spain (Battle of), 3 April, 1367, in which Henry of Trastamare was defeated by his brother Pedro the Cruel assisted by the Black Prince. In this battle Duguesclin constable of France was taken prisoner.

Narva (Battle of), 30 Nov., 1700, in which Peter the Great of Russia was defeated by Carl XII. of Sweden.

While dictating despatches, a bomb fell through the roof of the house, whereupon his secretary dropped his pen in a fright. 'What's the matter?' asked Carl. 'The bomb, the bomb, sire!' said the secretary. 'The bomb?' replied the king, 'what have we to do with the bomb? Pray write on.'

Naseby (Battle of), north-west of Northampton, 14 June, 1645, in which Charles I. was defeated by Cromwell and Fairfax. The main body of the royal army was commanded by Lord Astley, the right wing by Prince Rupert, and the left by Sir Marmaduke Langdale. The king himself headed the reserves. In this battle the king lost all his cannon and baggage, and 5,000 of his army were made prisoners. This battle ended the war.

Fairfax led the centre of the parliamentary army, Ireton the right wing, and Cromwell the left. Ireton was therefore opposite Rupert, and Cromwell was opposite Sir Marmaduke. Ireton was routed, Fairfax fell back, but Cromwell overthrew his opponents and redeemed the day.

Navarete (Battle of). Same as 'Najara' (q.v.). The battle was fought between Najara and Navarete.

Navari'no (Battle of), 20 Oct., 1827, won over the Turkish navy by the combined fleets of England, France, and Russia, under the command of Lord Codrington. The Turkish navy was well-nigh annihilated.

This 'untoward event' occurred under Canning's administration. The weakening of Turkey and an alliance for such a purpose with Russia was certainly one of the greatest blunders ever committed.

Navas de Tolōsa (Battle of Las), 1214, in which Alfonso III. of Castile defeated the Almohades, and destroyed one of the largest armies that ever crossed the Straits of Gibraltar.

Naxos (Naval battle of), B.C. 376, won by the Athenians, led by Chabrias, over the Lacedæmonian fleet. This victory restored to Athens the supremacy at sea.

Nechlansmere, in Scotland (Battle of), 20 May, 685, in which Egfrith king of Northumbria was defeated and slain by the Picts. 'A solitary fugitive alone escaped the slaughter to tell how Egfrith and the flower of his nobles lay dead on the field.' With this battle fell for ever the supremacy of Northumbria; and Mercia succeeded to the overlordship.

Neerwinden (Battles of), I. 19 July, 1693, in which the French Marshal de Luxembourg defeated William III.

II. 18 March, 1793, in which the Austrians defeated General Dumouriez.

Nehavend. See 'Nahavund.'

Neresheim (Battle of), 10 Aug., 1796, in which the Archduke Karl defeated Marshal Moreau, the French general.

Netad (Battle of), A.D. 453, a great battle won by various dependent nations over the sons of Attila, after his death. Ellak, his eldest son, and above 30,000 of his people were slain. The great empire of Attila soon after this defeat crumbled away.

Neumarkt (Battle of), 22 Aug., 1796, in which the Archduke Karl defeated the French.

Neville's Cross (Battle of), near Durham, 12 Oct., 1346, in which David II. of Scotland was both defeated and taken prisoner. Aug. 26 the same year is noted for the battle of Cressy.

This battle was won by Philippa while Edward III. (her husband) was in France. King David was taken prisoner, and between 15,000 and 20,000 Scots were slain. Of the English, only one leader (Lord Hastings) fell.

New Orleans, in Louisiana (Battle of), 8 June, 1815, in which the American general Jackson defeated the English, and their general, Sir Edward Pakenham, was slain.

This, of course, was not the General Jackson who was one of the Confederate leaders in the American Civil War, 1861–1865.

Newark (Battle of), 21 March, 1644, in which the royal army, under Prince Rupert, was defeated by the parliamentarians.

Newburn (Battle of), 28 Aug., 1640. This was no battle at all, but a stampede. Lord Conway with 6,000 English troops was sent by Charles I. to resist the Scotch covenanters, but immediately the covenanters crossed the river the English fled without offering any resistance.

Newbury, in Berkshire (Battle of). 20 Sept., 1643, in which Charles I. repulsed the Earl of Essex, commander of the parliamentary army. Next year (27 Oct., 1644), was an indecisive engagement at Newbury between Charles I. and the Earl of Manchester.

In the former of these battles fell Lord Falkland.

Newtown Butler, in Ireland (Battle of), 1689, between James II. aided by French troops and the army of William III. The Protestants were besieged in Londonderry, and had food only for two days, when the men of Enniskillen came to their relief, and drove the besiegers before them like wild geese; the panic spread through Hamilton's whole army, which took refuge in Dublin, where James lay helpless. His French ally, Comte d'Avaux, advised the general massacre of all Protestants in the districts which remained still in James's interest; but James revolted from the proposal, whereupon the Frenchman sullenly replied, 'Mercy to Protestants is cruelty to Catholics.'

Nicop'olis, in Turkey (Battles of). I. 28 Sept., 1396, in which Kaiser Sigismund was defeated by Bajazet.

II. A.D. 1799, in which the French were defeated by the Albanians.

Nile (Battle of the), 1 Aug., 1798, in which Admiral Nelson defeated the French fleet. This victory obtained for the admiral a peerage, under the title of Baron Nelson of the Nile. His battle cry was 'Victory or Westminster Abbey!' The French admiral was Brueys.

Often called, especially in French history, the Battle of Aboukir (q.v.).

Nineveh (Battle of), 1 Dec., A.D. 627, won by Heraclius the emperor of the East over Chosroes II. the Great King. The slaughter was very great.

Nisbet (Battle of), 7 May, 1402, won by the English over the Scotch. It is said that as many as 10,000 Scots fell in this encounter.

Nordlingen, in Franconia (Battles of). I. 6 Nov., 1634, won by Ferdinand, son of Kaiser Ferdinand II. over the Protestants. This was one of the battles of the Thirty Years' War.

II. 6 Sept., 1645, won by the Duc d'Enghien over the imperial German army. (Ferdinand III. was kaiser.) This also was one of the battles of the Thirty Years' War.

Noreïa (Battle of), B.C. 113, in which Cneius Papirius Carbo the consul was slain by the Cimbrians and his whole army was cut to pieces.

Northallerton (Battle of), in Yorkshire, 22 Aug., 1138, in which David I. of Scotland was defeated by Stephen king of England. The battle is generally called 'The Battle of the Standard.'

Northampton (Battle of), 10 July, 1460, in which Henry VI. was defeated and captured by the Yorkists. Margaret the queen fled to Scotland.

Novăra (Battle of), 23 March, 1849, in which the Sardinians (under Charles Albert) were defeated by the Austrians led by Marshal Radetzky (a Bohemian).

Novi (Battles of). I. 15 Aug., 1799, in which Suwarrow, general of the allied Russian and Austrian armies, defeated Marshal Joubert and the French army. Joubert was slain in this battle and 4,000 French were taken prisoners.

II. 8 Jan., 1800, in which the French were defeated by the Austrians.

Nürnberg (Battle of), 1456, in Bavaria, between the barons and the townsmen. Eight times the barons were victors, but in the ninth contest the townsmen were the conquerors and Nürnberg vindicated its freedom.

In this battle Albrecht the Achilles and Ulysses of Germany was taken captive by the citzen soldiers.

Œnoph'yta (Battle of), B.C. 456, won by the Athenians over the Bœotians. The Athenian general was Myronidês.

Ohud (Battle of), A.D. 623, in which Khaled, commander of the Koreish cavalry, defeated Mohammed.

Olmütz (Battle of), 15 July, 1866, the last battle of the Seven Weeks' War, won by the Prussians over the Austrians.

Oltenitza (Battle of), 4 Nov., 1853, won by Omar Pasha, the Turkish general, over the Russians.

Orthes (Battle of), 27 Feb., 1814, in which the French under Marshal Soult were defeated by the Marquis of Wellington, commander of the allied British and Spanish armies.

Ostrach (Battle of), 20 March, 1799, in which the Archduke Karl defeated Marshal Jourdan, the French general.

Ostrolenca (Battle of), 26 May, 1831, between the Russians and the Poles. It was a most sanguinary affair, and both sides claimed the victory.

Otford (Battle of), on the Derwent, 773, in which Offa king of Mercia defeated the Kentish men. By this victory Offa became lord of Kent and all East Anglia.

Otterburn (Battle of), 10 Aug., 1388, in which the Scots under Sir William Douglas defeated the English under the Earl of Northumberland and his two sons. Douglas was slain by Henry Percy, surnamed Hotspur, but both the Percys were made prisoners. See p. 165, 'Chevy Chase.'

Oudenarde (Battle of), in Belgium, 11 July, 1708, in which the Duke of Marlborough and Prince Eugene defeated the French under the Dukes of Burgundy and Vendôme. Louis XIV. gave up ten Flemish fortresses to the Dutch, surrendered to the empire all that France had gained since the peace of Westphalia, acknowledged Anne, offered to banish the pretender from his dominions and to demolish the fortifications of Dunkirk.

By the peace of Ryswick, in 1697, Louis XIV. agreed to recognise William III.; but on the death of James II. in 1701 he recognised James the pretender as the lawful king of England, under the name and title of James III. This, in fact, involved him in the wars with Marlborough, so disastrous to France.

Oulart (Battle of), 27 May, 1798, in which the North Cork Militia were cut to pieces by the Irish insurgents.

Ourique (Battle of), 25 July, 1139, in which Alfonso of Portugal defeated a prodigious army of Moors, in which were five Saracen kings.

Palestro (Battle of), 31 May, 1859, in which the Austrians were defeated by the allied army of Sardinians and French.

Panormus (Battle of), B.C. 254, in which the Romans conquered the Carthaginians. Metellus was the Roman general and Hasdrubal the Carthaginian. This was the chief battle of the First Punic War.

Parret (Battle of the), 845, in which Ealstan (bishop of Sherborne) and Oarlo defeated the Northmen.

Patay (Battles of). I. 18 June, 1429. Talbot defeated by the Maid of Orleans and taken prisoner. This was the first battle lost by the English since their victory at Cressy in 1346. Talbot was taken prisoner.
II. 1 Dec., 1870, the Bavarians were repulsed.

Pa'via (Battle of). I. A.D. 774, where Charlemagne overthrew Desiderius, whom he afterwards confined in the monastery of Corbie, in France.
II. 24 Feb., 1525, in which François I. of France was taken prisoner, and all the flower of his army was cut to pieces. François, it is said, wrote to his mother, 'All is lost, Madam, except honour' (Tout est perdu, Madame, fors l'honneur).

Peterwaradin (Battles of). I. 1691, won by the Austrians over the Turks. Kaprioli, son and brother of two former viziers, fell in this fight.
II. A.D. 1711, in which Prince Eugene defeated the Turks with great slaughter.

Pfaffendorf (Battle of), 15 Aug., 1760, in which the Austrians were defeated by the Prussians.

Pharsa'lia (Battle of), 12 May, B.C. 48, won by Julius Cæsar over Pompey the Great. This victory made Cæsar the foremost man of Rome.

Philiphaugh, in Scotland (Battle of), Sept., 1645, in which Montrose, called 'the Great Marquis,' commander of the royal forces in Scotland, sustained a crushing and irretrievable defeat. This was ten months after the defeat of Charles at Marston Moor.

Philippi (Battle of), Oct., B.C. 42, in which Brutus and Cassius both met their death, and Antony and Octavian became masters of Rome.

Pinkie, in Scotland (Battle of), 10 Sept., 1547, in which the Lord Protector Somerset defeated the Scotch with such great slaughter that the day was called 'Black Saturday.'

Plains of Abraham (Battle of the), 13 Sept., 1759, in which the French of Canada were defeated by the English under General Wolfe, who fell dead at the moment of victory.

Plassey (Battle of), in Hindustan, 23 June, 1757, in which Colonel Clive defeated Surajah Dowlah, and laid the foundation of our empire in the East. Clive's army consisted of 1,000 Englishmen and 2,000 sepoys; the Surajah's army numbered 50,000 foot and 14,000 horse. The victory was complete, and Surajah Dowlah was one of the slain.

Platæa (Battle of), 22 Sept., B.C. 479, in which the Grecian army (110,000 men) under Pausanias utterly defeated the Persian army, which amounted to 300,000 men, under the command of Mardonius. Mardonius was slain at the very onset, and it is said that 200,000 of the Persians were left dead on the field. On the same day was won the battle of Mycalè.

Plattsburg (Battle of), 11 Oct., 1814, won by the Americans, under Gen. Macomb, over the English under Sir George Prevost.

Podaic (Battle of), 1672, won by Sobieski, the Polish general, over the Tartars.

Poitiers (Battles of). I. Oct., A.D. 732, in which Charles le Martel utterly defeated the Saracens under the command of Abd-el-Rahmah, viceroy of Spain.
II. 19 Sept., 1356, in which Edward the Black Prince defeated and took captive Jean II. le Bon of France. The English force was 8,000, the French 60,000. It is almost incredible, but we are assured on good authority, that 8,000 of the French were slain and 2,000 taken prisoners. Never was victory so unexpected, never was victory more complete.

Pola (Battle of), May, 1379, between a fleet of 22 Genoese galleys commanded by Luciano Doria and 20 galleys of the Venetians under Pisani. Doria was slain, but the Genoese won the victory, taking 15 galleys and 1,900 prisoners.

Pollentia, in Italy (Battle of), 29 March A.D. 403 (Easter Day). In this battle Stilicho attacked Alaric, and caused him to retreat.

Polotsk (Battle of), 30, 31 July, 1812, in which the Russians, under Wittgenstein, defeated the French under Marshal Oudinot.

Portlevoi (Battle of), 1016, won by Fulc, called the Black Count, over the Count of Blois. This great victory crushed the rival house of Blois.

Porto Bello (Naval battle of), 1739, won, with six ships, by Admiral Vernon over the Spaniards. All the fortifications of the port were demolished.

Porto Novo (Battle of), 1 July, 1781, in which Sir Eyre Coote defeated Hyder Ali regent of Mysore.
Also called the battle of Cuddalore (2 syl.).

Potsdam (Battle of), 25 Oct., 1806, where Napoleon defeated the Prussians.

Praga (Battles of). I. 10 Oct., 1794, in which 30,000 Poles were butchered by the Russian general Suwarrow or Suwarof.
II. 31 March, 1831, won by the Poles, led by Skrznecki, over the Russians under the command of General Giesmar. Above 6,000 Russians were taken prisoners.

Prague (Battles of), in Bohemia. I. 8 Nov., 1620, when Maximilian of Bavaria defeated Frederick V. the Elector Palatine. This was the first of the battles of the Thirty Years' War. Prague (1 syl.).
II. 6 May, 1757, when Frederick II. (the Great) of Prussia defeated Prince Charles of Lorraine. This victory was followed (June 18) by a crushing defeat at Kolin by Marshal Daun. (Second campaign of the Seven Years' War). This is the great and memorable battle of Prague.

Prescott (Battle of), in Upper Canada, 17 Nov., 1838, in which the Canadian rebels were defeated by Lieutenant-Colonel Dundas.

Preston (Battles of), in Lancashire. I. 17 Aug., 1648, in which Oromwell defeated the Scotch royalist army, led by the Duke of Hamilton.

II. 12, 13 Nov., 1715, after the 'clap of Sheriffmuir.' A very poor affair, where the Jacobites were cooped up, and driven to a most cowardly surrender. (Reign of George I.)

All that is known of James the Pretender only confirms the wisdom of setting him aside.

Preston-pans (Battle of), in Scotland, 21 Sept., 1745, in which the 'Young Pretender' Charles Edward (grandson of James II.) defeated Sir John Cope.

Never was a battle so quickly decided. It is said not to have lasted more than five or six minutes. Never was a defeat more absolute.—Howitt, Hist. of England, George II. p. 501.

Princeton, New Jersey, U.S. (Battle of), 2 Jan., 1777. Here Washington defeated Lord Cornwallis in the American War of Independence. This was Washington's second victory. See 'Battle of Trenton.'

Pultowa or Pultawa (Battle of), 9 July, 1709, in which Czar Peter the Great utterly defeated Charles XII. of Sweden.

Pultusk (Battles of). I. 1 May, 1703, in which the Saxons were defeated by the Swedes.

II. 26 Dec., 1806, between the French under Napoleon and the allied Prussians and Russians. Both sides claimed the victory.

Pydna (Battle of), B.C. 168, in which Perseus, last of the Macedon kings, was utterly defeated and his army annihilated by Æmilius Paulus, the Roman consul. Perseus was taken captive, and Macedonia was made a Roman province.

Pyramids (Battle of the), 21 July, 1798, in which Bonaparte defeated the Mamelukes.

Pyrenees (Battle of the), 28 July, 1813, won by Lord Wellington over the French under the command of Marshal Soult. Soult was sent by Napoleon to supersede Jourdan, who had been utterly defeated at Vittoria on the 21st, and to drive Wellington across the Ebro, but the French marshal met with a series of defeats between 25 July and 2 Aug., with the loss of 20,000 men.

Quatre-Bras, in Brabant (Battle of), 16 June, 1815. Two days before the battle of Waterloo. It was a combat between the British allied army and the French under Marshal Ney. The British under the Duke of Brunswick, the Prince of Orange, and Sir Thomas Picton, held their ground, but the Duke of Brunswick was slain and the Prince of Orange was taken prisoner. At the close of the day the French marshal withdrew his men.

Quebec, in Canada (Battle of), 13 Sept., 1759, where General Wolfe defeated the Marquis de Montcalm, commander-in-chief of the French armies in Canada. The taking of Quebec was the conquest of Canada. Wolfe died on the day of battle, and Montcalm the day after from his wounds. See below 'Quiberon Bay.'

Queenstown, Upper Canada (Battle of), 13 Oct., 1812, in the Second American War, where General Sheaffe defeated the Americans commanded by Van Rensselaer.

Quesnoy (Battle of), 11 Sept., 1793, in which the British forces defeated the French.

 Pronounce Keen-wah.

Quiberon Bay (Naval battle of), 20 Nov., 1795, where Lord Hawke defeated the French fleet, which was utterly ruined. The commander of the French fleet was Marshal Conflans. In one year the English won three great victories over the French, viz. Minden, Quebec, and Quiberon Bay.

Raab (Battles of). I. 1 Aug., 1664, won by Montecuculi, general of the imperial army, over the Turks.

II. June, 1809, in which the Austrian Archduke John was totally defeated by Eugène Beauharnais, and the country bordering on the Adriatic was annexed to the French empire. Raab (1 syl.).

Raclawice (Battle of), 4 April, 1794, in which Kosciusko the Polish general defeated the Russians.

Ram-hormus (Battle of), B.C. 226, in which Artaxerxes (called by the Persians Ardeshur Babegan, or Ardeschir ben Babek) utterly defeated Artabânês IV., shook off the Parthian yoke, and restored the empire of Persia Proper.

Ramillies, in Belgium (Battle of), 23 May, 1706, where the Duke of Marlborough defeated the French and Bavarians. The French general was Marshal Villeroy. France lost Flanders, and soon afterwards Italy.

 This word is often called Ram'-e-liz in English, but it is called by Belgians Ra-mel-ya'.

Rathmines (Battle of), 2 Aug., 1649, between Ormond the royalist and Colonel Jones governor of Dublin. The royalists were defeated, and 2,000 of them were taken prisoners.

Ravenna, in Italy (Battle of), 11 April, 1512, between the French under Gaston de Foix (nephew of Louis XII.) and the combined Spanish and Papal armies. De Foix won the battle, but was left dead on the field.

Gaston de Foix was called 'The thunderbolt of Italy.'

Regillus (Battle at the Lake), B.C. 499, between the Romans and the allies who sought to restore Tarquin. In this battle it is said that Castor and Pollux on their white horses fought for the Romans and won the battle.

Rigomago (Battle of), 1447, lost by Hunyádi, governor of Hungary through the treachery of the voivod of Wallachia. This was one of the bloodest battles ever fought.

Riv'oli (Battle of), 14, 15 Jan., 1797, where Bonaparte defeated the Austrians led by Wurmser and Alvinzy.

Rocroy (Battle of), 1643, in which the French, led by the Great Condé, sustained a most crushing defeat.

Roliça (Battle of), 16 Aug., 1808, the first encounter of Sir Arthur Wellesley (afterwards Duke of Wellington) with the French in Portugal. The French under Delaborde were defeated.

Roncesvalles (Battle of), A.D. 778. It was here that the rear-guard of Charlemagne's army on their return from Spain were attacked by the Moors and annihilated. Among the slain was Roland, the famous paladin, the king's nephew.

Roland in Italian romance is called Orlando.

Rosbach, in Prussia (Battles of). I. 17 Nov., 1382, in which 40,000 insurgent Flemings were cut to pieces by the French.

II. 5 Nov., 1757, where Frederick II. defeated the allied Austrian and French armies. This defeat was so disgraceful to the French that the 'Rout of Rosbach' is still a proverb and a byword. The loss of the Prussians was only 300 men, that of the allies was 1,300 slain and 6,000 prisoners. (In the second campaign of the Seven Years' War.)

Rosbecque (Battle of), Nov. 1382, in which Charles VI. of France defeated the republican army of Flanders, and re-established the earl who had been deposed. Philip van Artevelde, leader of the democratic party, fell in this battle.

Ross, in Ireland (Battle of), 4 June, 1798, in which the Irish insurgents, commanded by General Beauchamp Bagenel Harvey, were defeated by the royal troops under the command of General Johnston.

Rothière (Battle of), 1 Feb., 1814, won by Napoleon over the combined armies of Blücher and Schwartzenberg.

Roucoux, or Raucoux (Battle of), 11 Oct., 1746, in which the French, under Marshal Saxe, defeated the allied English and Dutch armies.

Roundway Down, near Devizes (Battle of), 13 July, 1643, in which the royalists under Prince Rupert defeated Sir W. Waller, a parliamentary officer.

Roverēdo (Battle of), 4 Sept., 1796, in which Bonaparte defeated the Austrians.

Saalfeld (Battle of), 10 Oct., 1806, won by Napoleon over the confederates.

Saarbrück (Battle of), 2 Aug., 1870. In the Franco-Prussian war. Won by the Prussians the same day as they won the battle of Wörth.

31 July, 1870, it was seized by Napoleon III., and here the young Prince Imperial received his 'baptism of fire;' a battle was fought 2 Aug., in which the French were dislodged, and on 6 Aug. it was occupied by the German allies.

Sadowa, in Bohemia (Battle of), 3 July, 1866, in the Seven Weeks' War. King William I. of Prussia defeated Benedek, the Austrian general.

St. Albans, Herts (Battles of). I. 22 May, 1455, in which Richard duke of York defeated and took prisoner Henry VI. of England.

II. 7 Feb., 1461 (Shrove Tuesday), in which battle Queen Margaret defeated the Earl of Warwick.

St. Denis (Battle of), 1567, in the Second Religious War of France. Here Anne de Montmorency, the last of the French Triumvirate (q.v.), lost his life, but the Huguenots were defeated.

St. Denis, pronounce Sahn Dnee.

St. Dizier (Battle of), 27 Jan., 1814, won by Napoleon over Blücher.

Pronounce Sahn De-ze-a.

St. Jacob's (Battle of), in the vicinity of Basle, 1444. Here 1,600 Swiss kept 32,000 French soldiers at bay for ten hours, and would not surrender till their number was reduced to ten men only.

St. Quintin (Battle of), 10 Aug., 1557, won by Philip II. of Spain over the French. This was their most severe defeat since the battle of Agincourt.

Pronounce Sahn Kahn-tohn (nasal).

St. Sebastian (Battles of). I. 5 May, 1836, won by General Evans, commander of the English Auxiliary Legion, against the Carlists of Spain.

II. 1 Oct., 1836, the Carlists were repulsed by De Lacy Evans.

St. Vincent, in Portugal (Battles of). I. 17 June, 1693, in which Admiral Tourville marshal of France defeated the allied English and Dutch fleets under the command of Sir G. Rooke. The allies lost 12 men-of-war and 80 merchantmen in this great naval battle.

II. 16 Jan., 1780, in which Admiral Rodney defeated Juan de Langara the Spanish admiral, who was also taken prisoner.

III. 14 Feb., 1797, in which Admiral Jervis defeated and won a great victory over the Spanish fleet, for which he was raised to the peerage under the name and title of John Jervis earl of St. Vincent.

IV. 2 July, 1833, in which Admiral Napier captured the Miguelite squadron.

Salamanca (Battle of), 22 July, 1812, won by Lord Wellington over the French forces led by Marshal Marmont. This was the seventh French marshal defeated by Lord Wellington in four years. In this battle 7,141 prisoners fell into the victor's hands, 11 cannons, 6 stand of colours, and 2 eagles.

Sal'amis (Naval battle of), 20 Oct., B.C. 480, in which the Greeks, under Themistoclēs, with only 371 triremes, defeated the Persian fleet, which consisted of 928 sail of much larger size. Of this formidable fleet only 300 ships escaped destruction. The Persian loss must have been very great indeed, that of the Greeks was only 40 men all told.

Xerxes, who was a spectator of the fight, returned at once to Asia.

Saminara (Battle of), north-east of Reggio, 21 April, 1503, won by Gonzalvo of Cordôva over the French.

Santes (Battle of), in which St. Louis of France defeated the insurgents under the Comte de la Marche. Santes (1 syl.).

Sapienza (Battles of), 4 Nov., 1354, in which the Venetian fleet under Niccolo Pisani was surprised and captured by the Genoese fleet under Paganini Doria.

II. 6 Oct., 1403, in which the Venetian fleet under Zeno defeated the Genoese fleet commanded by Boucicault.

Saratôga, New York, U.S. (Battle of), 11 Oct., 1777. Here the American General Gates defeated the British General Burgoyne. This was the worst disaster hitherto sustained by the English in the American War of Independence. General Burgoyne surrendered to General Gates, and, on capitulation, had a free passage to Great Britain, on condition of not serving again against America. After this terrible overthrow, France at once recognised the independence of America. Sir John Burgoyne, of course, retired from the army, and spent his time in writing for the stage.

Sasbach (Battle of), 1675, between Montecuculi on the German side and Marshal Turenne on the side of the French. Turenne was killed by a cannon ball, and victory was claimed by the Germans.

Scearstan (Battle of), 1016, won by Canute over Edmund Ironside; but Canute retreated at night towards London, unwilling to renew the fight.

Schellenberg (Battle of), 2 July, 1704. Here Marlborough defeated the Bavarians, and returned to England with 121 standards, 179 colours, the Bavarian general, and twenty-six officers of high distinction.

Schleitz (Battle of), Oct., 1806, won by Napoleon over the confederates.

Schliengen (Battle of), 20 Oct., 1796. The Archduke Karl of Austria defeated Moreau, the French general. He had defeated him the day before at Emmendingen.

Secandun (Battle of), A.D. 755, in which the Mercians were defeated by the West Saxons. Ethelbald was slain in this battle.

Sedan (Battle of). I. 11 Sept., 1870, in the Franco-Prussian war, won by the Prussians. On 2 Sept. the Emperor Napoleon III. gave up his sword to William I. king of Prussia.

This was just a month after the war began. The occupation of Saarbrück and 'baptism of fire' was 2 Aug., and Napoleon gave up his sword 2 Sept.

II. 10 May, 1865, General Johnston, at Durham's Station, North Carolina, surrendered to General Sherman, and thus brought the American civil contest to a close. This was the American 'Sedan.'

Sedgemoor (Battle of), 5 July, 1685, in which the Duke of Monmouth was completely defeated by the army of James II. The duke was made prisoner, and was soon afterwards beheaded.

Seidlitz (Battle of), in Poland, 10 April, 1831, won by the Poles over the Russians.

Sellasia (Battle of), B.C. 221, in which Cleomênês the Spartan was utterly defeated by Antigonus and the Achæan League.

Semincas (Battle of), A.D. 938, won by Ramirez II. king of Leon and the Asturias over the Moors. It is said that 80,000 of the Moors were slain in this conflict.

Sempach (Battle of), 9 July, 1386, in which 1,400 Switzers utterly defeated the Austrian army under Duke Leopold. The Austrian army consisted of 4,000 knights of high rank, and a numerous well-appointed host of foot soldiers. The duke and most of the knights were slain. It was in this battle that Arnold Struthan von Winkelried of Unterwalden rushed on the advancing spears of the Austrians, grasped as many of them as he could reach, buried them in his bosom and bore them to the ground; thus making a gap into which the Swiss rushed and slaughtered the Austrians right and left. The loss of the Swiss was about 200, of the Austrians at least 6,000.

Probably a part of this tale is only legendary.

Senef (Battle of), 1674, a drawn battle between William prince of Orange and the Great Condé.

Senlac (Battle of), 14 Oct., 1066, where William duke of Normandy conquered Harold II., and thus won, by conquest, the throne of England. Also called 'The Battle of Hastings.'

Serin'gapatam' (Battles of). I. 15 May, 1791. Lord Cornwallis defeated Tippoo Saib sultan of Mysore. In 1799 the city was assigned to the British.

II. 4 May, 1799, won by Major-General Baird. In this battle Tippoo Saib was slain.

Shannon and Chesapeake (Battle of the), 1 June, 1813. The 'Shannon' was an English ship, commanded by Captain Broke; the 'Chesapeake' was an American vessel, commanded by Captain Lawrence. In the second American war Captain Broke sent a challenge to Captain Lawrence to meet him, in order to prove whether the English or Americans were the better men. The two combatants met; and, after a most furious and murderous engagement, which lasted about fifteen minutes, the English seamen hauled down the American colours. Captain Lawrence was slain, and Captain Broke was made a baronet, under the style and title of Sir Philip Bowes Vere Broke, of Nacton, Suffolk.

Sheriffmuir (Battle of), in Dumblane, 13 Nov., 1715, in which the Duke of Argyll defeated the Jacobites led by the Earl of Mar. The worthless Pretender, James, arrived too late for the battle, and proved a more incompetent leader than even the Earl of Mar. James left England, and the clans dispersed like a dream.

Both claimed the victory; but, as the Pretender lost the battle of Preston on the same day, his cause hopelessly collapsed.

Shiloh, Tennessee (Battle of), 6 Feb., 1862, in the American Civil War. Won by the Federals.

Shrewsbury (Battle of), 23 July, 1403, in which Henry IV. defeated the Percys.

Shropshire (Battle of), A.D. 51, in which the Britons were completely subjugated to the Romans, and Caradoc [Caractăcus] king of the Silŭrēs was made a prisoner.

Silverhausen (Battle of), 1553, in which Maurice elector of Saxony was slain. His antagonist was Albert of Brandenburg.

Sin'gara (Battle of), A.D. 348, between Constantius II. the emperor of the East and Sapor the Persian. The Romans had won the battle, and had given themselves up to joy and revelry; but Sapor crept upon them in the darkness of night, recovered the victory, and made most dreadful havoc of the panic-stricken Romans.

Sinōpē (Naval battle of), 30 Nov., 1853, won by the Russians over the Turks.

Sluys (Naval battle of), in the Netherlands, 24 June, 1340, in which Edward III. defeated the French fleet, which for a time was utterly ruined. (Pronounce Slu-is).

Smolensko (Battle of), 17 Aug., 1812, won by the French over the Russians, led by Barclay de Tolli.

Sobrāon (Battle of), in the Punjab, 10 Feb., 1846, won by General Gough and Sir Henry Hardinge over the Sikhs. In this battle a bridge of boats over the Sutlej broke, and thousands of the Sikhs in their flight were drowned. It was the greatest battle ever fought in India.

Gough=Goff.

Socsawa (Battle of), 1676, won by John III. (Sobieski) of Poland over the Turks.

Soissons (Battle of), A.D. 486, in which Clovis, founder of the French monarchy, defeated Syagrius, son of Ægidius. After this victory Clovis made Soissons the capital of his kingdom. In 507 he removed to Paris.

Solebay (Naval battle of), 28 May, 1672, in which the Dutch were defeated by the English under the command of James duke of York [James II.].

Solferi'no, in Italy (Battle of), 24 June, 1859, in which Napoleon III. and Victor Emmanuel defeated Francis Joseph emperor of Austria.

Solonium (Battle of), B.C. 61, in which C. Pomptinus the prætor defeated the Allobrŏgēs.

Solway Moss, in Cumberland (Battle of), 25 Nov., 1542, in which the Scots under Oliver Sinclair were defeated by the Duke of Norfolk.

Somerton (Battle of), A.D. 733, in which the royal town of Somerton was captured by Ethelbald king of Mercia. This great victory ended the war with the West Saxons.

Sommershausen (Battle of), 17 April, 1648, won by Turenne and Wrangel. This was the last of the battles of the Thirty Years' War.

Spurs (Battle of the), 18 Aug., 1513, won by the English over the French, who used their spurs in flight more than their swords in fight.

Stamford Bridge, near York (Battle of), 25 Sept., 1066, in which Tostig, son of Earl Godwin, was defeated and slain by Harold II. king of England, his brother.

Steinkerke (Battle of), 4 Aug., 1692, in which the French Marshal de Luxembourg defeated William III. and his allies. The loss on both sides was about equal.

Stillwater (Battle of), 19 Sept. and 7 Oct., 1777, won by the British over the Americans. The loss of the British was 350 killed and wounded, of the Americans 1,500 slain.

Stillwater is a town on the river Hudson, belonging to the State of New York.

Stirling Bridge (Battle of), 10 Sept., 1297, in which William Wallace utterly defeated the English under the command of Warenne earl of Surrey.

Stockach (Battle of), 25 March, 1799, in which Marshal Jourdan, the French general, was defeated by the Archduke Karl, and Germany was lost to France.

Stoke, near Newark (Battle of), 1487, in which the conspiracy of Simnel was utterly crushed by Henry VII.

Stonar (Battle of), A.D. 465, in which Vortimer defeated Hengist, and drove the Saxons to their ships. They did not return till the death of Vortimer, five years afterwards.

Stony Creek, U.S. (Battle of), 6 June, 1813, where General Vincent surprised and defeated the American General Winder, in the Second American War.

Stony Point (Battle of), 1779. Stony Point, in New York, 30 May, was taken by Clinton. An engagement took place 20 June at Stone Ferry. General Wayne recovered Stony Point 15 July, but abandoned it to the British next day.

Stowe, in Bucks (Battle of), 1645, in which the Irish royalists, under the command of Lord Astley, were defeated by the parliamentary troops led by Colonel Morgan. Lord Astley was taken prisoner.

Strasburg (Battle of), Aug., A.D. 357, won by Julian over the Alemanni. In this battle

Chnodomar or Gundomar, the huge leader of the Germans, was taken prisoner.

Stratton Hill (Battle of), in Devonshire, 16 May, 1643, in which the royalists defeated the parliamentary army led by the poet Waller.

Strōm'boli (Naval battle of), 1676, won by Duquesne over the Dutch.

Duquesne=Duh-kāin.

Sukoro (Battle of), 29 Sept., 1848, between the Croats led by Baron Jellachich, and the Magyars, led by Moga. The former numbered 50,000, and were well armed; the latter not above 5,000, armed with scythes, pitchforks, and old muskets. The Hungarians, however, were completely victorious. This was the first battle in the War for Independence.

Tagina (Battle of), July, A.D. 552, in which Totila the Gothic king was defeated and slain by Narses the eunuch, commander-in-chief of Justinian's army.

Tagliamento (Battle of), 16 March, 1797, in which Bonaparte defeated the Austrians, led by the Archduke Karl.

Talavēra, in Spain (Battle of), 27, 28 July, 1809, won by Sir Arthur Wellesley (Duke of Wellington), commander of the united British and Spanish forces, over Victor and Jourdan, marshalsof France. The French loss was 10,000 men and 20 pieces of cannon; the allied British and Spanish forces lost 800 killed and 4,000 wounded or missing.

For this victory Sir Arthur (already Baron Douro) was created Viscount Wellington of Talavera.

Taillebourg (Battle of), 1242, in which St. Louis of France defeated the insurgents under the Comte de la Marche.

Taliacot'a, or Tagliacozzo, in Italy (Battle of), 23 Aug., 1268, in which Charles of Anjou overthrew Conradin.

Tara (Battles of), I. 980, in which Malachy monarch of Ireland defeated the Danes. This was the most decisive of all the battles fought by the Irish against the Danes, except the battle of Clontarf in 1014.

(II.) 26 May, 1789, in which the Irish rebels were defeated by the royal troops.

Tarbes (Battle of), in France, 20 March, 1814, in which the French army under Marshal Soult was defeated by the Duke of Wellington. Tarbes (1 syl.).

Taro (Battle of the), 6 July, 1495, won by Charles VIII. with 9,000 men over an allied Italian, German, and Spanish army of 40,000. Of the French not above 200 fell, of the allies 15,000. The Venetians called this a victory, and erected a tablet to one of the Provveditori with this barefaced lying inscription: 'Here lies Melchior Trivisano, who fought successfully against Charles [VIII.] king of France at the battle of the Taro.'

Tchernaya (Battle of the), 16 Aug., 1855, in which the French and Sardinians defeated the Russians. This was one of the great battles of the Crimēan War (q.v.).

Tel-el-Kebir (Battle of), 13 Sept., 1882, won by the English under General Wolseley over Arabi the Egyptian rebel.

Temesvar (Battle of), 1849. One of the battles of the War of Independence. The Hungarians were utterly routed by the allied Russian and Austrian armies.

Tenna (Battle of), 9 Nov., 1439, in which the Venetians led by Sforza utterly defeated the Milanese under the command of Piccinino.

Tewkesbury (Battle of), in Gloucestershire, 4 May, 1471, in which Edward IV. defeated and took prisoner Queen Margaret. Her son either fell on the field or was stabbed after the battle; and the death of Henry VI. in the Tower, some eighteen days afterwards, left Edward IV. of the House of York the undisputed sovereign of the kingdom.

Thapsus (Battle of), 4 Feb., B.C. 46, in which Julius Cæsar utterly defeated Juba king of Numidia and the senatorial army which befriended the cause of Pompey.

Thermop'ylæ (Battles of), I. 7 Aug., B.C. 480, between the Greeks and the Persians. Leonidas king of Sparta was sent with 300 Spartans to withstand the whole Persian army at the defile of Thermopylæ. He held his ground for three days, when Ephialtēs perfidiously led the enemy by a secret path to the rear of the Greeks, who were thus hemmed in between two forces. All but one man perished fighting gloriously, leaving 20,000 Persians dead in the pass. This was one of the most heroic acts in all history.

II. B.C. 191, in which Antiochus III. king of Syria was utterly defeated by the Romans.

Thionville, or Diedenhofen (Battle of), June, 1639, one of the minor battles of the Thirty Years' War. General de Feuquières was defeated by Ottavio Piccolomini.

Pronounce Te-on[g]-veel.

Thrasymēnus (Battle of), B.C. 217, in which the Romans under Flaminius were defeated by the Carthaginians under Hannibal. Of the Romans, 15,000 were slain and 10,000 taken prisoners.

Till (Battle of the), A.D. 556, in which the Asiatic Turks slew the Khan of the Ogors with 300,000 of his subjects (!!).

Tinchebrai (Battle of), 28 Sept., 1106 where Robert duke of Normandy (son of William the Conqueror) was utterly defeated by his younger brother Henry I. king of England. In consequence of this victory the duchy became a dependency of the English crown.

Tippermuir (Battle of), Sept., 1644, in which the Marquis of Montrose, commander of the royal forces in Scotland, defeated the Covenanters.

Toggenburg or Tockemburg, in Switzerland. This has been the site of two contests, called the 'first' and 'second war of Tockemburg.' The first in 1436 was a contest between the Count of Zürich and the Count of Schwitz for the succession. The second, in 1712, was the revolt of the Tockemburgers against the abbot of St. Gall their ruler, ending in favour of the revolters.

Tolbiac (Battle of), A.D. 496, in which Clovis, founder of the French monarchy, repulsed the Alemanni, a Teutonic league, with great slaughter.

Tolbiac is now called Zulpich; it is near Cologne.

Töplitz (Battle of), 1762, in which the Prussians were defeated by the Austrians.

Torgau (Battle of), in Prussia, 3 Nov., 1760, in which Frederick II. of Prussia encountered Marshal Daun. The battle was indecisive; but Frederick claimed the victory, because Marshal Daun decamped during the night. (In the fifth campaign of the Seven Years' War.)

Pronounce Tor-gow (ow as in now).

Torres Vedras, in Portugal. The French marshal arrived before the 'Lines' constructed by Wellington in Oct., but retreated Nov. 14, 1810. See p. 521, 'Lines of Torres Vedras.'

Toulon, in France (Battles of). I. 22 Feb., 1744, when Admiral Matthews was repulsed by the allied French and Spanish fleets.

II. 16 Nov., 1793, a conflict between the English and the French, in which the French were repulsed.

Toulouse (Battle of), 10 April, 1814, won by the Duke of Wellington over the French, led by Marshal Soult. This was the last of Wellington's peninsular battles.

Tours (Battle of), 10 Oct., A.D. 732, in which Charles Martel, mayor of the palace, leader of the Franks, utterly defeated the Saracens under Abderahman. This was one of the most important and decisive of victories. If the Saracens had succeeded, without doubt they would have planted in France the religion of Mahomet, and there, as in Spain, it would have dominated, at least for a time. It was the battle between the Crescent and the Cross.

Towton (Battle of), in Yorkshire, 29 March, 1461 (Palm Sunday), in which Edward IV. defeated Henry VI. This was one of the most terrible struggles in English history, second only to the battle of Hastings or Senlac. The number brought into the field on either side was about 60,000 men, and for six hours the fight lasted in the midst of a severe snow-storm. The loss on each side was more than 20,000. The Lancastrians lost six barons, the Earls of Devon and Wiltshire were taken prisoners and beheaded, the Lords Oxford and Aubrey were subsequently executed. An enormous number of the Lancastrians were charged with treason, and all their lands were confiscated.

Trafalgar (Battle of), 21 Oct., 1805, won by Admiral Lord Nelson over the combined French and Spanish fleets, commanded by Admiral Villeneuve (French) and two Spanish admirals. All the three admirals were taken prisoners. Nelson commanded in the ship called the 'Victory,' and lost his life in the battle. It was in this engagement he is credited with the signal, 'England expects every man to do his duty.' This is our most glorious naval victory.

Trasimēnē (Battle of Lake), same as Thrasymēnus (q.v.).

Trautenau (Battle of), 27 June, 1866, in the Seven Weeks' War. Prince Frederick Charles defeated the Austrians.

 Trautenau, pronounce Trow'-ta-now.

Tre'bia (Battles of the). I. B.C. 218, in which Hannibal the Carthaginian defeated Publius Scipio and Sempronius. This great battle ended Hannibal's first campaign.

II. 17–19 June, 1799, Suwarof, the Russian general, defeated Macdonald and his French army.

Trenton, in New Jersey, U.S. (Battle of), 26 Dec., 1776. Here Washington won his first victory over the British and Hessian troops in the American War of Independence.

Tricamarum (Battle of), A.D. 534, in which Belisarius defeated Gelimer, last of the Vandal kings of Africa.

Turin (Battle of), 1706, won by Prince Eugene over the French commanded by La Feuillade.

Ushant (Naval battle of), 27 July, 1778, in which the British fleet under Admiral Keppel defeated th French fleet commanded by the Comte d'Orvilliers. It was not a defeat, but the French withdrew their ships under cover of the night.

Val-ès-Dunes, near Caen (Battle of), 1047, in which William duke of Normandy defeated his revolted nobles.

Valmy', in France (Battle of), 20 Sept., 1792, in which the French Marshal Kellermann defeated the Duke of Brunswick. The duke looked on the French revolution as a contemptible riot, and was thunderstruck with the reception he met with at Valmy.

This is one of Sir Edward Creasy's Fifteen Decisive Battles of the World.

Varna (Battle of), 10 Nov., 1444, won by Amurath II. sultan of Turkey over the Hungarians, led by Ladislaus and Hunyādi. Ladislaus had sworn to preserve peace with Amurath for ten years, but, persuaded by Cardinal Julian and other churchmen, had scandalously broken his oath, and the defeat of Varna was the fruit of his perjury.

Vasag (Battle of), 1422, won by Hunyādi the Hungarian general over the Turks under Amurath II.

Vascape (Battle of), 1441. The greatest of all the victories of Hunyādi, won over the Turks under the command of Sciabedin Bey. The Turks were 80,000, the Hungarians not 15,000.

Vercellæ (Battle of), 30 July, B.C. 101, in which the Cimbrian host was annihilated by Marius the Roman consul.

Verneuil, in France (Battle of), 16 Aug. 1424, in which the Duke of Bedford defeated the allied French and Scotch. This battle was hardly less disastrous to the French than that of Agincourt, for full one-third of the knighthood were left dead on that fatal field. The loss of the French was 4,000, that of Bedford's army 1,600.

Among the slain were the Earl of Buchan, Earl Douglas, Lord James Douglas (the earl's son), Sir Alexander Meldrum, &c.

Verona (Battle of), 30 March, 1799, in which the Austrian General Kray defeated the French.

Veszprem (Battle of), 997, won by St. Stephen king of Hungary, soon after his baptism, over Kopán, a nobleman of the old Shaman faith. By this victory Christianity was established in the land.

Vienna (Battle of), 12 Sept., 1683, in which Sobieski king of Poland, with a relief force of 40,000 men, utterly defeated Kara Mustapha vizier of the Sultan Mahomet II., whereby the siege of Vienna was raised. This is one of the most important and decisive victories ever won. If the Turks had been victorious, probably Vienna, like Constantinople, would have been subject to the Crescent, and the Eastern and Western empires would have been united again, but under the power and religion of the sultan.

Villa Viciosa (Battle of), 1710, won by the French, commanded by the Duc de Vendôme, over the Archduke Karl.

Villafranca, in Sicily (Battles of), I. 1718, in which the Spaniards won over the Austrians.

II. 10 April, 1812, in which the British cavalry, led by Sir Stapleton Cotton, defeated Marshal Soult. Napoleon greatly blamed Soult for this defeat.

Villingshausen (Battle of), 15 July, 1761, in which Ferdinand duke of Brunswick defeated the French. (In the sixth campaign of the Seven Years' War.)

Vimeira, in Portugal (Battle of), 21 Aug., 1808, in which Sir Arthur Wellesley (afterwards Duke of Wellington) defeated the allied French and Spanish forces under Marshal Junot. This was the first of his peninsular victories.

Vindalum (Battle of), B.C. 121, in which Cn. Domitius the pro-consul defeated the Allobrôgês.

Vinegar Hill, near Wexford (Battle of), 21 June, 1798. This could hardly be called a battle. The Irish had risen in revolt, and mustered 15,000 strong on Vinegar Hill. General Lake was sent to put down the revolt. He took their camp, and utterly suppressed the rebellion. In the autumn 1,000 French soldiers, under General Humbert, landed in Mayo, and defeated Lake and Hutchinson, who had about 3,000 men under them, at Castlebar, 27 Aug., 1798; and then Lord Cornwallis, the lord-lieutenant, with 30,000 men, forced Humbert to surrender.

Vionville (Battle of), 16 Aug., 1870, in the Franco-Prussian war, won by the Prussians.

Vittoria (Battle of), 21 June, 1813, won by Lord Wellington over the French army commanded by Joseph Bonaparte and Marshal Jourdan. This was one of the most brilliant victories in the British annals. Marshal Jourdan lost 151 pieces of cannon, 451 ammunition waggons, all his baggage and treasure, and even his marshal's bâton.

Voglade. See below 'Vouglé.'

Volturno (Battle of the), 17 Sept., 1860, won by Garibaldi over the Neapolitan troops of Francis II.

Vouglé, near Poitiers (Battle of), A.D. 507, in which Clovis, founder of the French monarchy, overthrew Alario II. king of the West-Goths. Alario himself was slain on the field.

Wagram, in Austria (Battle of), 6 July, 1809, in which the French, led by Napoleon, overthrew the Austrians, led by the Archduke Karl. This battle led to a treaty of peace, in which Austria ceded all her sea-coast to France; the kingdoms of Saxony and Bavaria were also enlarged at the expense of Austria.

Wakefield, in Yorkshire (Battle of), 31 Dec., 1460, in which Queen Margaret defeated Richard duke of York. This was the only great victory of the Lancastrians in the long War of the Roses.

Walcourt, in Holland (Battle of), 27 Aug., 1689. Here Marshal d'Humières was defeated by the Prince of Waldeck. Marlborough was present in this battle, and laid the foundation of his future fame.

Wandewash, in Hindustan (Battle of), Jan., 1760, in which Thomas Arthur comte de Lally, the French governor in India, was defeated by Sir Eyre Coote, and Pondicherry fell into the hands of the English.

Wareham (Battle of), A.D. 876, in which the Danish fleet was repulsed by King Alfred. The Danes then allied themselves with the Welsh. Being hard pressed, the Danes swore to leave Wessex, but reappeared at Chippenham in the winter of 878.

Warna (Battle of), 10 Nov., 1444, in which Amurath II. defeated Ladislaus V. king of Hungary, who was also slain.

Warsaw (Battles of). I. 10, 12 Oct., 1794, in which the Poles were defeated by the Russians.

II. 20 Feb., 1831, in which the Russians were defeated. This is also called the battle of Growchow.

III. 7, 8 Sept., 1831, won by the Russians over the Poles.

Wartenburg, in Prussia (Battle of), 3 Oct., 1813, won by the allies over the French.

Waterloo (Battle of), 18 June, 1815, the most momentous victory ever won by the British arms, and the most happy in its results. Napoleon commanded the French and the Duke of Wellington the British and their allies. The battle lasted from seven in the morning till nine at night. Napoleon's career ended with this battle. He delivered himself into the hands of Captain Maitland, 3 July, and was banished to Longwood in St. Helēna, where he landed, 16 Oct., 1815.

The Duke of Marlborough won a battle over the French at Waterloo, 17 Aug., 1705.

⁂ The battle of Waterloo, 18 June, 1815, was exactly six centuries to a day of the signature of Magna Charta by King John, 18 June, 1215. See Colonel Gurwood's 12th vol. Creasy's 'Fifteen Decisive Battles.'

Wattignies, near Lille (Battle of), 15, 16 Oct., 1793. The Austrians defeated Jourdan, the French marshal, here.

Wawr (Battle of), 31 March, 1831, in which the Russians were defeated by the Poles under the command of Skrzynecki.

Weissenburg (Battles of). I. A.D. 1620, won by the Roman Catholics over the Protestants of Bohemia. Maximilian duke of Bavaria affirms that his success was due to the aid of St. John Nepōmuk.

II. 4 Aug., 1870. The first 'battle' of the Franco-Prussian war. Won by the Crown Prince of Prussia.

Wertingen (Battle of), 8 Oct., 1805, in which the French defeated Mack, general of the Austrian army.

White Plains, near New York, U.S. (Battle of), 28 Oct., 1776, where General Howe defeated the Americans in the American War of Independence.

Wig'an (Battles of). I. 1643, in which the royal forces, under the Earl of Derby, were defeated by the parliamentary army led by Sir John Smeaton.

II. 1651, in which the Earl of Derby was again defeated by the parliamentary army, led by Colonel Lilburne.

Wilhelmsthal (Battle of), 24 June, 1762, won for Prussia by the two Dukes of Brunswick. This was the last battle of the Seven Years' War.

Wilton (Battle of), A.D. 823, which Egbert king of Wessex won over Beornwulf king of Mercia. This victory led to the absorption of Mercia into the kingdom of Wessex.

Winceby-on-the-Wolds, Lincolnshire (Battle of), 1643, won by Cromwell and Fairfax over the Marquis of Newcastle. Here Cromwell had a horse shot under him.

Winwœd, near Leeds (Battle of), 655, also called Winwidfeld. In this battle Penda was slain by Oswi of Northumbria. Winwœd is Weewood in York.

In this battle Oswi vowed, if God gave him the victory, he would dedicate his daughter to the Lord and build twelve monasteries.

Witepsk (Battle of), 11 Nov., 1812, in which the French, under Marshal Victor, were defeated by the Russians commanded by General Wittgenstein.

Wittstock (Battle of), 4 Oct., 1636, won by the Swedes, in the Protestant interest, over the German Catholic League. This was one of the battles of the Thirty Years' War.

Wodensfield (Battle of), A.D. 910, in which Edward, son of Alfred, defeated the Anglo-Danes with great slaughter.

Wodnesbeorgh (Battles of). I. A.D. 591, in which Cealwin the Saxon was defeated by his nephew Ceolric, who had allied himself with the Cymry and Scoti. The death of Cealwin soon followed, in the thirty-third year of his reign.

II. 714, in which Ina, the greatest of the kings of Wessex, defeated and slew Ceobred king of Mercia. Wodnesbeorgh is Woodbury in Devonshire.

Woerden (Battle of), in Holland, June, 1672. Marshal de Luxembourg defeated the Hollanders.

Worcester (Battle of), 3 Sept., 1651, in which Cromwell utterly routed Charles II. Some 3,000 royalists were slain and 10,000 were taken prisoners, who were sent as slaves to the plantations. Charles made his escape to France, and his adventures make one of the most marvellous romances of history.

Cromwell says for four or five hours this battle was 'the stiffest contest he had seen.' The Scotch lost all their baggage and artillery, with 6,000 men, amongst whom was the Duke of Hamilton, their leader.

Wörth (Battle of), 6 Aug., 1870, in the Franco-Prussian war. Won by the Prussians over MacMahon, the French marshal.

Wurtschen (Battle of), 1813, in which Napoleon defeated the allied Russian and Prussian armies. The carnage on both sides was terrible.

Würtzburg (Battle of), 3 Sept., 1796. Archduke Charles of Austria defeated Moreau, the French general.

Wyppeds Fleot (Battle of), A.D. 465. won by Hengist over the Britons.

Xeres (Battle of), A.D. 1237, won by Alfonso, 'Infant' of Ferdinand III., over Abenhud, the Moorish king of Seville. In this battle, we are told, St. James on his white horse fought for Spain.

Ximera (Battle of), 10 Sept., 1811, in which the Spaniards, under General Ballasteros, defeated the French under the command of General Regnier.

Yermuk, in Syria (Battle of the), Nov. A.D. 638, in which Khalid and Abu Obeidah, with their Saracen troops, defeated the Greeks under Heraclius.

York (Battle of), A.D. 867, in which the two sons of Ragnar Lodbrog the Dane defeated Osbert and Ella, the Saxons, with great slaughter. Both Osbert and Ella fell.

Yvres (Battle of), 1591, won by Henri IV. king of France over the Catholic League.

Zalaca, in Spain (Battle of), 23 Oct., 1086, in which Alfonso VI. of Castile was defeated by Jussef ben Taxfyn or Taschfin of Morocco.

Zama (Battle of), B.C. 202, in which Scipio defeated Hannibal, and ended the Second Punic War. Zama is called the Waterloo of Hannibal, as Cannæ is called his Austerlitz.

Zelia, or Zeleia, in Mysia (Battle of), B.C. 47, where Cæsar defeated Pharnaces IV. king of Pontus. Cæsar announced his victory in the famous despatch VENI, VIDI, VICI.

Zelichow (Battle of), 6 April, 1831, in which the Russians, led by General Diebitsch, were defeated by the Poles with great slaughter.

Zenta, in Hungary (Battle of), 1697, won by Prince Eugene over the Turks. The prince fought contrary to orders; but so judicious were his plans and so well carried out, that he received a written licence from the kaiser to act ever after entirely on his own judgment. Certainly a most extraordinary licence.

Zingara (Battle of), A.D. 350, between the Persians, led by Shapûr Zoolaclaf, and the Romans, led by the Emperor Julian. The Romans won the field, but Shapûr recovered his advantage in a night attack.

Zlotzow (Battle of), won by John III. (Sobieski) of Poland over the Tartars.

Zorndorf (Battle of), 25, 26 Aug., 1758, in which Frederick II. of Prussia defeated the Russians under General Fermor, who retreated into Poland (in the third campaign of the Seven Years' War). This was one of the most tenaciously contested fields ever fought. It began at 9 A.M., and continued long after the moon had risen. As many as 19,000 Russians and 11,000 Prussians were slain.

Zutphen, in the Netherlands (Battle of), 22 Sept., 1586. Zutphen was under the power of Spain from 1572, but the States twice besieged it, in 1584 and in 1586, but without success. The second of these sieges is well known, because it was there that Sir Philip Sidney, 'the Marcellus of England,' and author of the prose-poem called 'Arcadia,' met his death. This was a mere skirmish, not a battle, Lord Leicester, with 8,000 men, being sent to assist the Flemish.

The tale is that he was mortally wounded in this battle; and, as he was raising a small bottle of wine to his lips, he cast his eyes upon a common soldier dying beside him. 'Poor fellow!' said Sir Philip, 'thy necessity is greater than mine;' so saying, he handed to the man the bottle, and died.
